

This is a digital copy of a book that was preserved for generations on library shelves before it was carefully scanned by Google as part of a project to make the world's books discoverable online.

It has survived long enough for the copyright to expire and the book to enter the public domain. A public domain book is one that was never subject to copyright or whose legal copyright term has expired. Whether a book is in the public domain may vary country to country. Public domain books are our gateways to the past, representing a wealth of history, culture and knowledge that's often difficult to discover.

Marks, notations and other marginalia present in the original volume will appear in this file - a reminder of this book's long journey from the publisher to a library and finally to you.

Usage guidelines

Google is proud to partner with libraries to digitize public domain materials and make them widely accessible. Public domain books belong to the public and we are merely their custodians. Nevertheless, this work is expensive, so in order to keep providing this resource, we have taken steps to prevent abuse by commercial parties, including placing technical restrictions on automated querying.

We also ask that you:

- + Make non-commercial use of the files We designed Google Book Search for use by individuals, and we request that you use these files for personal, non-commercial purposes.
- + Refrain from automated querying Do not send automated queries of any sort to Google's system: If you are conducting research on machine translation, optical character recognition or other areas where access to a large amount of text is helpful, please contact us. We encourage the use of public domain materials for these purposes and may be able to help.
- + Maintain attribution The Google "watermark" you see on each file is essential for informing people about this project and helping them find additional materials through Google Book Search. Please do not remove it.
- + Keep it legal Whatever your use, remember that you are responsible for ensuring that what you are doing is legal. Do not assume that just because we believe a book is in the public domain for users in the United States, that the work is also in the public domain for users in other countries. Whether a book is still in copyright varies from country to country, and we can't offer guidance on whether any specific use of any specific book is allowed. Please do not assume that a book's appearance in Google Book Search means it can be used in any manner anywhere in the world. Copyright infringement liability can be quite severe.

About Google Book Search

Google's mission is to organize the world's information and to make it universally accessible and useful. Google Book Search helps readers discover the world's books while helping authors and publishers reach new audiences. You can search through the full text of this book on the web at <http://books.google.com/>

DWIGHT'S
JOURNAL OF MUSIC.

A Paper of Art and Literature.

JOHN S. DWIGHT, EDITOR.

VOLUME XXXIX

BOSTON:
HOUGHTON, MIFFLIN & COMPANY.
1880.

STANFORD UNIVERSITY LIBRARIES
MUSIC LIBRARY
APR 16 1976

ML1
D993
v.39/40

Reprint Edition 1967

JOHNSON REPRINT CORP.
NEW YORK—LONDON

ARNO PRESS, INC.
NEW YORK, N.Y.

Library of Congress Catalog Card No. 67-24725

Manufactured in the U.S.A. by Arno Press Inc.

INDEX.

Acting, How the French learn it. London Times,
xxxix, 116
Adam, Adolph. His Faust Ballet, xl, 106
Adamowski, Timothée d', xxxix, 162, 182; xl, 94
Adams, Charles R. xl, 78, 192
Additional Accompaniments to scores of Bach,
Handel, etc. W. F. A., xxxix, 178, 183, 190
"Aesthetics of Musical Art," Dr. Hand's. Pall Mall Gaz., xl, 162
"Aida," and its Author. Dr. E. Hanslick, xl, 201
"A Rose by any other name," etc. Fanny Raymond Ritter, xxxix, 18
Astorga: His Stabat Mater. (W. N. E.) xxxix, 188; Do, xxxix, 188; Do, xl, 28
Award of the Thousand Dollar Prize, at Cincinnati, xl, 28
ART: PAINTING, SCULPTURE, ETC.
Our Painters: The new Departure. T. G. A.
Life School, and More. xxxix, 5
Wm. M. Hunt's Talks on Art. Second Series. Reported by Miss H. M. Knowlton. xxxix, 44, 52, 60, 69, 76, 84, 93, 101, 109, 125, 133, 141, 149, 157, 164, 172, 181, 196, 206; xl, 13
Real and Ideal in French Art. W. F. A., xxxix, 157
Death of William M. Hunt. T. G. A. Do, Miss Knowlton, xxxix, 157
Letter from Florence. "Odo," xxxix, 84
Delacroix, xxxix, 33, 41
Bach-Biting. W. F. A. Thorp, xxxix, 36
Bach, J. S. His Orchestral Suite in D, xxxix, 15; Motet: "Sing to the Lord," xxxix, 45; Concertos for three Pianos, xxxix, 29, xl, 200; Cantatas, xxxix, 30, 111, xl, 83, 96; St. Matthew Passion Music, entire in two performances on Good Friday, xxxix, 69, 78; Chorals, xxxix, 94; Pianoforte Compositions, xxxix, 137, 145; xl, 96; An alleged unpublished MS. xl, 136
Bailey, Miss Lillian, xl, 174, 192
Barker, C. S. Inventor of the Pneumatic Lever, xl, 8
Barnett, J. F. His Cantata "The Building of the Ship," xl, 183
Beethoven: his String Quartets, xxxix, 22, 64, 90; Piano Sonatas, xxxix, 54, 154, 182; xl, 1; Heroic Symphony, xxxix, 62; Ninth do. xl, 86; Seventh do. 197; Fifth do. 206; his arrangement of Scotch and Irish Songs, with trio accompaniment, xxxix, 190, 197; Missa Solemnis, xl, 96; Triple Concerto, xxxix, 206
Beethoven, at the height of his Activity. From Thayer's third volume, xxxix, 75, 90; his remarkable Concert ("Akademie") at Vienna, 90; Thayer's Biography, xl, 29; B. and Vienna (Hanslick), xl, 100; B. and his Music, London Mus. Standard, xl, 130; Wagner on, 140; his Violin (A. W. T.), 166
"Beggars' Opera," the. Springfield Republican (A. W. T.), xxxix, 148, 186
Benedict, Sir Julius. Grove's Dictionary, xl, 108
Berlioz, H.: his "Flight into Egypt," xxxix, 37, 197; Symphonie Fantastique, xxxix, 47, (Schumann) xl, 21; "L'Enfance du Christ," (W. F. A.) xxxix, 196; Do. (Ed.) 206; Song, "The Captive," xxxix, 207; "Prise de Troie," N. Y. Mus. Rev., xl, 11; "Damnation de Faust," xl, 86, 38, 39, 49, 58, 87, 121, 191, 207
Berlioz: Stephen Heller on, xxxix, 67; his Musical Creed, 91; his Letters (Ed. Hanslick), xxxix, 97; Do. xl, 149; B. on Beethoven's Fourth Symphony, xl, 41
Bernhardt, Mlle. Sara, the French actress. Mrs. F. R. Ritter, xl, 206
Bizet, Georges: his "Carmen," xxxix, 14; his life, by A. Marmontel, xl, 146, 166
Blind, the, in Music, xxxix, 110; xl, 110, 152, 180, 189
Boieldieu: his "John of Paris," Hanslick, xl, 10
Boito: his "Mefistofele," xl, 128, 136, 189, 204

BOOK NOTICES:

Apple Blossoms: Verses of two Children, E. & D. R. Goodale. F. H. U., xxxix, 4
A Masque of Poets. F. H. U., xxxix, 5
Henry James's "Society the Redeemed Form of Man," C. P. C., xxxix, 44
Mother-Play and Nursery Songs. From Froebel. J. R. A., xxxix, 12
O. W. Holmes's Memoir of J. L. Motley. F. H. U., xxxix, 68
Pole's "The Philosophy of Music." J. S. D., xxxix, 141
Thomas Hardy's "Return of the Native" F. H. U., xxxix, 68
"Zophiel," by Maria del Occidente. F. H. U., xxxix, 76
Borg, Miss Selma: her Orchestral Concert of Norse Music, xxxix, 95
Boscovitz, the pianist, in Chicago, xl, 167
Brahms, Joh.: his Sestet, op. 18, xxxix, 37, 55; Choral Hymn, xxxix, 46; Second Symphony, xxxix, 46; Deutsches Requiem, (Hanslick), xxxix, 201
Brassini, Louis: his Piano Concerto in F, xl, 30
Bronsart, H. von: his Trio in G-minor, xxxix, 54; P. F. Concerto, xl, 61
Bruch, Max: his "Frithjof's Saga," xxxix, 39; "Odysseus," xxxix, 30, 204, xl, 6, 14; "Lay of the Bell," 155; xl, 7
Buck, Dudley: his Prize Cantata: "The Golden Legend," xl, 23, 91, 96; his Comic Opera, "The Mormons," 192
Bull, Ole: his 70th Birthday at Cambridge, xl, 32; his career and death, 143, 159, 202
Bülou, H. von: Beethoven Recitals in London, xxxix, 3; Concerts in Hanover, xxxix, 104
Campbell, F. J., the blind Educator of the blind; his ascent of Mt. Blanc, xl, 180, 189
Cecilia (Club): President's Report, 1879. xxxix, 133
— Do, 1880, xl, 163
Chadwick, George W. His Overture "Rip van Winkle," xxxix, 184, 206; xl, 31
Chamber Music, Dr. F. L. Ritter's Lectures on, xl, 116, 125
Cherubini: his Overture to "Anacreon," xxxix, 29; Prelude to third act of "Medea," xl, 30; String Quartets, 78, 178, 193; D-minor Mass, 82
Chopin, and George Sand: a Study by Fanny R. Ritter, xxxix, 2, 9, 25, 33, 41, 65, 73, 81; A Souvenir of, T. G. A., 18; Anecdote of, 104; his Compositions, 177; List on C., reviewed by Hanslick, xxxix, 185; An Evening with (List), 203
Church Music, Reform in: Lecture of Eugene Thayer, xl, 126, 132
Cincinnati: College of Music, xxxix, 23, 31, 32, 71, 96, 103, 111, 127; xl, 56, 144, 176; Sängergesellschaft (June, 1879), xxxix, 124; Biennial Festival (May, 1879), xl, 80, 96, 192
Cochrane, Miss Jessie, the Pianist, xxxix, 54
Cohen, Henry: his "Marguerite et Faust," xl, 97
College Festivals, Music at, xl, 117
CONCERTS IN BOSTON:
Apollo Club, xxxix, 45, 66; xl, 30, 62, 103, 207
Borg, Miss Selma: Orchestral Concert of Norse Music, xxxix, 95
Boston Conservatory, xxxix, 190; xl, 23, 71, 191
Boylston Club, xxxix, 46, 102, 189; xl, 23, 62, 102
Campanari, Sig., and Mme. Ferris Bell C., xxxix, 175
Campbell, Miss Teresa Carreno, xl, 47
Capplani, Mme., xxxix, 46, 206; xl, 31
Cecilia, The, xxxix, 30, 78, 85 (President's Report), 123; xl, 6, 14, 47, 75, 103
Currier, Mr. T. P., xxxix, 92
Doubt Children, xxxix, 22
Dunham, Mr. H. M. Organ Recitals, xl, 71
Eddy, H. Clarence: Organ Recital, xxxix, 30
Eichberg, Julius: Violin Classes, xxxix, 7, 78; xl, 71
Episcopal Parish Choirs: Fourth Festival, xxxix, 85, 94
Euterpe: Chamber Concerts, xxxix, 21, 37, 64, 71; Second Season, 206, — xl, 14, 39, 78, 207
Foote, Arthur, xxxix, 38; xl, 63
Frobock, Mrs. L. S., xl, 63
Hanchett, H. G., xxxix, 62, 190

CONCERTS IN BOSTON:

Handel and Haydn Society: "Messiah" at Christmas, xxxix, 14; xl, 6; Miscellaneous Programme, 37; Bach's Passion, 63, 69, 78; "Judas Macabaeus," 71; "Elijah," (Zerrahn Testimonial), 78; Sullivan's "Prodigal Son," etc., 197; "Israel in Egypt," xl, 61; Fifth Triennial Festival (May, 1880), xl, 70, 77, 85, 93
Harvard Musical Association: 14th Season of Symphony Concerts, xxxix, 6, 15, 29, 38, 46, 83, 62; 15th Season, 110, 206; xl, 13, 30, 38, 47, 54, 61; 16th Season, 110, 197
Hill, Junius W., xl, 102
Jeffery, Raphael, xxxix, 182; xl, 54, 94; (with Wilhelm, etc.), 198
King, Oliver, xl, 174
Lang, B. J., xxxix, 64; xl, 78; Berlioz's "Faust," 87, 191, 207
Liebling, S., xxxix, 61
Locke, Warren A. (Cambridge), xxxix, 94
Maurer, Miss Henrietta, xxxix, 111; xl, 47
Mendelssohn Quintette Club, xxxix, 166
New Tremont Temple: Organ Exhibition, xl, 174; "Messiah," 174; "Elijah," 174
Old Bay State Course, xl, 191
Orth, John, xxxix, 61; xl, 71
Osgood, George L., xxxix, 86
Patti, Mme. Carlotta, xxxix, 175
Parab, Ernst, xl, 31, 62, 102
Perry, Mr. Edward B., xxxix, 103, 190, 198
Philharmonic Orchestra: xxxix, 110, 181, 190, 198, 206; Second Season, xl, 190, 197
Preston, John A., xxxix, 46; xl, 102; Organ Concerts, 176, 182
Redpath Boston Lyceum, xxxix, 166, 175
Sherwood, Wm. H., Ten Piano Recitals, xxxix, 30, Concert with Mr. A. Desève, xl, 190
Simonds, Mrs. Anna Mayhew, xxxix, 111
Sherwood, Allen and Fries, xxxix, 79
Sumner, G. W., Piano Concert, xxxix, 15
Testimonial to J. S. Dwight, xl, 196, 206
Tucker, H. G., xl, 162
University Concerts, Cambridge, xl, 6, 14, 22, 31, 47, 53, 54
Ware, Miss Josephine E., xxxix, 62
Whiting, Arthur B., xl, 102
Wilhelmi and Di Murska, xxxix, 7
Conservatoire, the, in Paris, xl, 3
Corelli, Arcangelo, xl, 125
CORRESPONDENCE:
Aurora, N. Y., xl, 112
Baltimore, xxxix, 8, 16, 94, 99, 56, 71, 79, 95, 175, 199, 207; xl, 18, 24, 40, 45, 55, 63, 79, 88, 103
Chicago, xxxix, 8, 31, 39, 47, 56, 64, 73, 80, 87, 94, 108, 112, 119, 160, 176, 183, 191, 192, 207; xl, 1, 6, 24, 40, 53, 80, 96, 167, 176, 183, 198, 206
Cincinnati, xxxix, 23, 31, 55, 71, 86, 111, 127; xl, 85
Defiance, O., xxxix, 143
Florence, Italy, xxxix, 64
Leipzig, xl, 48
Milwaukee, xxxix, 16, 31, 49, 56, 64, 90, 97, 103, 119, 151, 184, 192, 199, 206; xl, 32, 56, 72, 88, 112, 175, 183
Newport, R. I., xxxix, 4; xl, 150
New York, xxxix, 7, 15, 23, 30, 38, 47, 63, 79, 196, 207; xl, 15, 23, 32, 39, 48, 55, 63, 72, 121, 199, 204, 206
Paris, xxxix, 8, 47
Philadelphia, xxxix, 7, 24, 30, 39, 55, 67, 143; xl, 63
Princeton, Ind., xxxix, 136
Providence, R. I., xxxix, 50, 86; xl, 7, 24, 55, 71
St. Louis, Mo., xxxix, 151
Trieste, Austria, xl, 198
Tokio, Japan, xl, 136, 151
Vassar College, Poughkeepsie, N. Y., xl, 103
Wilkesbarre, Pa., xxxix, 103
Cramer, J. B., xxxix, 161
Crazy Critics. London Mus. Standard, xl, 107
Culture and Music. London Mus. Standard, xxxix, 122
Days in Normandy. Julia Ward Howe, xxxix, 11
Dictionary of Music and Musicians, edited by George Grove, xl, 165
Display, Influence of in Music. C. H. Brittan, xxxix, 107
Doubt Children, The, xxxix, 22
Drama, the Lyrical. G. A. Macfarren, xl, 124, 190, 139
Dresden: Reminiscences of a week there in 1880, J. S. D., xl, 109, 145
Dvorak, Anton. Dr. E. Hanslick, xl, 2
Dwight's Journal of Music: Salutation, (Jan. 1879), xxxix, 5; Plans for 1880, 173; Another year; Testimonial Concert to Its Editor, xl, 206
Dyspepsia, Musical, xl, 134

- Elsteddod, a German. Tonic Sol-Fa Reporter, xl, 173
- Emma of Nevada. A. W. T. xl, 198
- Euterpe, The: a new Musical Society in Boston, xxxix, 21
- Expressive Power of Music, The. W. F. Apthorp, xxxix, 77
- Fashion in Music. W. F. Apthorp, xxxix, 165
- Faust, Goethe's: the Musical Versions of, Adolphe Julien, xl, 89, 97, 105, 113, 121, 129, 137, (See also Berlioz, Boito, and Liszt), Field, John: his Sonatas, etc. xxxix, 161
- Five Sonatas at a sitting. London Mus. Standard, xxxix, 3
- Flautist, a Lady: Maria Bianchini. Hanslick, xl, 60
- Foot, Arthur W. xxxix, 88, — xl, 63
- Folk Songs, Russian. Fanny R. Ritter, xl, 84
- Form, Musical. Prof. Macfarren, xxxix, 179
- Franz, Robert: his Songs, xxxix, 85; Is he a Failure (in his added accompaniments to Bach and Handel Scores)? W. F. Apthorp, xxxix, 173, 183, 190
- Gabrieli, Giovanni: his Benedictus in twelve real parts, xxxix, 85
- German Schools, Musical Instruction in, xxxix, 181
- Gerster-Gardini, Mme. Etelka, xxxix, 13, 23; in Berlin (Die Gegenwart), xxxix, 17
- Gluck: his Operas (G. A. Macfarren), xl, 139; with Wagner's additions to the scores, 196; his Overtures, 196
- Goetz, Hermann, and his Symphony in F. xxxix, 40, — xl, 22; Cantata, "Nemesis," xxxix, 143; Opera "Taming of the Shrew," xl, 37; 187th Psalm: "By the Waters of Babylon" (W. N. E.), 51
- Gounod, Charles F. His "Faust," xl, 129
- Gregoir, Joseph: his "Faust" music, xl, 97
- Grieg, Edward: his Quartet, Op. 27, xl, 7; piano Concerto in A-minor, xl, 190
- Grove's Dictionary of Music and Musicians, xl, 165
- Gueymard, Louis: his career and death, xl, 183
- Hanchett, H. G. His unique Circular and Concerts, xxxix, 62, 190
- Handel: his "Messiah" in Italy, xxxix, 128; his will and other relics, 144; The Leipzig edition of his complete works (Part 27, Chamber Music), xl, 2; his "Solomon" (J. S. D.), 75, 94; "Utrecht Jubilate" (J. S. D.), 83; Concertos for Organ and Orchestra, 114; his Italian Operas, 132; "Alessandro," 197
- Handel and Haydn Society, of Boston: its influence in other places, xxxix, 10; Annual Report of the President (June, 1879), 100; Annual Meeting (June, 1880), 95; Do., President's Address, 99
- Hanslick, Dr. Eduard: his musical lectures in Pesth, xl, 8; from his critical writings: on the letters of Berlioz, xxxix, 97; on Historical Ballets in Paris, 171; on Lavoix's History of Instrumentation, 172; on Liszt's "Chopin," 185; on a Wagnerian attack on Schumann, 185; on "Idomeneo" in Vienna, 193; on Music in Vienna (Brahm's "Deutsches Requiem," etc.), 201; on Boieldieu's "John of Paris," xl, 11; on Schubert's "Des Teufels Lustschloss," xl, 16; on the Mozart Week in Vienna, 42, 50; on Hiller and Zelter in Vienna, 74; on a Lisztian Programme, 82; on Beethoven and Vienna, 100; on Jacques Offenbach, 187; on "Aida" and its author, 201
- Harvard University: its Musical Clubs. (J. S. D.), xxxix, 147; Do: Reminiscences of an ex-Pierian, 155, 163; music in its annual festivals, xl, 117; proposed performance of "Oedipus Tyrannus," 198
- Hauk, Miss Minnie, in "Carmen," xxxix, 14
- Haydn: his Symphony in D (No. 14), xxxix, 54; his Piano works, xxxix, 154; his "Seasons," xl, 87
- Hearing Music on Compulsion. J. S. D. xxxix, 126
- Hegel on the "Content" (Inhalt) of Music. W. S. B. Mathews, xl, 38
- Heller, Stephen: on Hector Berlioz, xxxix, 57
- Henschel, Georg, xl, 119, 191, 204, 207
- Hensel, S. His "Die Familie Mendelssohn," xl, 17, 25, 29
- Hiller, Ferd. and Zelter in Vienna, xl, 74; his "Faust" Overture, 105
- H. M. S. Pinafore, xxxix, 118
- Home versus "Pinafore." Fortnightly Review, xxxix, 115
- Household Music. Geo. T. Bulling, xl, 142
- How the French learn to act. London Times, xxxix, 116
- Hummel: his Piano works, xxxix, 161
- Hunt, William Morris: Obituary notices. T. G. A. and Miss Knowlton, xxxix, 157
- Influence of Display in Music. C. H. Brittan, xxxix, 107
- Is Robert Franz a Failure? W. F. A. xxxix, 173, 183, 190
- "Italophobia." W. F. A. xxxix, 21
- Ivry, Marquis D': his Opera "Les Amants de Verone." London Academy, xxxix, 104
- Japan: Mr. L. W. Mason's Music-teaching in its Schools, xl, 95, 135, 161
- Joachim, Joseph. Pesther Lloyd, xxxix, 59; and Clara Schumann, in Dresden, 1860 (J. S. D.), xl, 109, 145
- Joseffy, Raphael: in New York (Tribune), xxxix, 172, xl, 40, 48, 55; in Boston, xxxix, 182, xl, 32, 79, 94
- Julien, Adolphe: on the Musical Versions of Goethe's "Faust," xl, 89, 97, 105, 113, 121, 129, 137
- Karasowski's Life of Chopin, xxxix, 2, 9, 25
- Kellogg, Miss Fanny, the Singer, xxxix, 15, 16
- King, Mme. Julia Rivé, the Pianist, xxxix, 63, 71
- King, Oliver: Pianist and Composer for Orchestra, xl, 174, 181
- Krebs, Carl: Obituary, xl, 115
- Kreissmann, August: Obituary notices and tributes, xxxix, 61, 72; Address by F. H. Underwood before the Orpheus Musical Society, 123
- Kreutzer, Conradin: his "Faust" Music, xl, 97
- Lassen, Eduard: his Musical Adaptation of Goethe's "Faust," xl, 98
- Leipzig Conservatorium, The, described by a young English Lady, xl, 141
- Leipzig Strasse, No. 3. From "Die Familie Mendelssohn" by Hensel, xl, 17, 25
- Letters from an Island. Fanny Raymond Ritter, xxxix, 92, 117; xl, 18, 84, 44
- Liebling, S., the pianist, xxxix, 61
- Lindpaintner: his "Faust" music, xl, 90
- Lisztian Programme, A. Hanslick, xl, 82
- Liszt, Franz: his Hungarian Fantasia, xxxix, 62; xl, 190; "Benediction de Dieu dans le Solitude," xxxix, 85; his "Chopin" (Hanslick), 185; his "Faust Symphony," 200; xl, 67, 105; his Career (Grove's Dictionary), xl, 20, 27, 35; Do. (Gartenlaube), 161, 169; Catalogue of his Works, 35, 43; his Dante "Inferno," 197
- Local Orchestras: Plan of. C. Villiers Stanford, xl, 142
- Locke, Warren A. xxxix, 93
- London "Monday Popular Concerts": their Rise and Progress. Mus. Standard, xl, 148, 154, 165
- Luther, Martin, as a Musician, xxxix, 164
- Lyceum Bureau Concerts, xxxix, 159, 166
- Lyrical Drama, The. G. A. Macfarren, xl, 124, 130, 139
- Malibran, Maria Felicità (Grove's Dict.), xxxix, 180
- Marsick, M., the Belgian Violinist (Hanslick), xxxix, 202
- Mason, William, Mus. Doc. His "Pianoforte Technics." C. B. Cady, xxxix, 28, 35
- Mason, Lowell, Mus. Doc. A. W. Thayer, xxxix, 186, 195
- Massenet, M. His Opera "Il Rè di Lahore," xxxix, 128
- Mendelssohn, Die Familie, by Hensel, xxxix, 24, 40; xl, 17, 25, 29; his many pursuits (Grove's Dict.), xl, 49, 57, 65; his desire to compose "Faust" 187
- Mendelssohn: his B-flat Quintet, xxxix, 37; his Octet, xl, 26, 46, 71; "St. Paul," xl, 77; 43d Psalm, 84; Overture "Meeresstille," etc. xl, 206
- Mephistophelian Mummery. London Mus. Standard, xl, 138
- Moscheles, Ignaz, as a piano composer, xxxix, 169
- Mozart, as a dramatic composer (F. L. Ritter), xxxix, 49; a Portrait of, 152; Mozart Week in Vienna, xl, 50; his Skull, 90
- Mozart: his Piano Concerto in A-major, xxxix, 15; Conc. for two pianos, 140; "Magic Flute," xxxix, 23; Leporello's "Catalogue" Aria, xxxix, 49; Quintet in G-minor, xxxix, 55; Quartets, xl, 14; his "Idomeneo" in Vienna (Hanslick), xxxix, 193; Symphonies, xl, 13
- Murks, Mils. Di, xxxix, 7
- MUSIC ABROAD. [See also CORRESPONDENCE.]
- Aix-la-Chapelle, xxxix, 128
- Baden-Baden, xxxix, 40; xl, 104, 119
- Bayreuth, xxxix, 104; xl, 39, 60, 119, 123, 160, 164, 200
- Berlin, xxxix, 126, 158, 162
- Birmingham, Eng., xxxix, 136
- Bologna, xl, 69, 93
- Bonn, xl, 88, 123, 135
- Brussels, xxxix, 126; xl, 60, 77, 104, 112, 173, 200
- Cologne, xl, 168
- Copenhagen, xl, 20, 103, 112, 123
- Dresden, xl, 160
- Düsseldorf, xl, 160
- Music.
- Florence, xl, 64, 77
- Frankfort-on-Main, xl, 8, 176
- Gloucester, Eng., xl, 160
- Hamburg, xl, 38
- Hannover, xxxix, 104, 108; xl, 8
- Hereford, Eng., xxxix, 138
- Leipzig, xxxix, 40, 48, 50, 126, 144, 192, 200, 208; xl, 8, 21, 35, 46, 60, 77, 103, 119, 123, 160, 164, 205
- Leeds, Eng., xl, 108, 153
- Liverpool, xl, 76
- London, xxxix, 40, 48, 64, 88, 104, 112, 120, 126, 144, 165, 168, 176, 192, 200, 208; xl, 8, 37, 45, 76, 82, 92, 104, 111, 118, 122, 123, 135, 143, 152, 168, 184, 190, 200
- Manchester, Eng., xxxix, 208
- Meiningen, xl, 184
- Moscow, xl, 70
- Munich, xxxix, 208
- Oxford University, xl, 111
- Paris, xxxix, 40, 64, 80, 96, 104, 126, 144, 168, 176, 200, 208; xl, 3, 8, 12, 29, 46, 77, 112, 126, 144, 164, 200
- Pesth, xl, 8, 184
- Ratisbon, xxxix, 144
- Rome, xxxix, 129; xl, 8, 98, 184
- Stuttgart, xxxix, 40
- St. Petersburg, xxxix, 104; xl, 60, 119, 124, 168
- Trieste, xl, 123
- Utrecht, xl, 119
- Vienna, xxxix, 88, 102; xl, 8, 10, 16, 29, 38, 42, 50, 62, 83, 126, 128, 162, 184, 200
- Wiesbaden, xl, 77
- Musical Colleges, Academies, Conservatories: at Cincinnati, xxxix, 32, 103, 127, 200; xl, 56, 72, 176; Philadelphia, xxxix, 18; Vassar, xl, 103; Paris, xl, 8, 144; Boston, xl, 23, 71, 191; Normal Mus. Institute, at Canandaigua, N. Y., xl, 135; Leipzig Conservatorium, 141
- Musical Festivals: of Episcopal Parish Choirs in Boston, xxxix, 85, 94; Leeds, Engl. xl, 168, 183; Saengerfest at Cincinnati, xxxix, 111, 112, 124; Cincinnati (fourth Biennial), xl, 80, 91, 95; Rhenish at Aix-la-Chapelle (1879) xxxix, 128; Cologne, xl, 77, 104, 112, 173; at Salzburg, xxxix, 139; Birmingham (Engl.), xxxix, 155, 168, 162; Handel Fest. London, xl, 92, 118; Worcester, Mass., xxxix, 166, xl, 144; Fifth Triennial of Boston Handel and Haydn Society, xl, 70, 77, 84, 85, 93, 99; Utrecht, 119
- "Musically Mad." London Times, xl, 125
- Musical Education, Thoughts on (W. F. A.) xxxix, 93, 101; in German Schools (Dr. W. Langhans), 181; Form (Macfarren), xxxix, 179; Prejudice (W. F. A.), xl, 6; Commentators (W. F. A.), 30; Notation, (C. B. Cady), 66; "Dyspepsia" (J. S. D.), 184; Advertising (W. F. A.), 150; Chats (G. T. Bulling), 164, 171
- Music Hall, Boston: in danger of Vandal "Improvement," xxxix, 77, 150
- Music: in the West (C. H. Brittan), xxxix, 10; its Expressive Power (W. F. Apthorp), 77; with the Blind, 110, xl, 110, 162, 180, 189; M. and Culture (London Mus. Standard), xxxix, 122; heard on compulsion, 126; Fashion in (W. F. A.), 165; M. and Musicians, Schumann's (F. L. Ritter), 178, 187, 194, 202; "Content" of, Hegel on (W. S. B. Mathews), xl, 38; a Practical View of (N. Lincoln), 41; "Scientific" (W. F. A.), 101; at College Festivals (J. S. D.), xl, 117; at English Universities, 170; in the Low Countries, 170; Prof. Macfarren's Lecture on, 179
- MUSICAL INTELLIGENCE, AMERICAN. (See NOTES AND GLEANINGS.)
- Musicians in Motley. London Mus. World, xl, 101
- "Musiker" and "Musikant" (J. S. D.), xl, 117
- Nohl, Ludwig: his Life of Beethoven (Prof. Franz Gehring), xxxix, 114
- Normandy, Days in. Julia Ward Howe, xxxix, 11
- Norman-Neruda, Mme. Wilma. H. Van Buelow, xl, 60
- Notation, Musical. C. B. Cady, xl, 66
- NOTES AND GLEANINGS: LOCAL INTELLIGENCE:—
- Albany, N. Y., xxxix, 168, 200
- Auburn, N. Y., xxxix, 120
- Aurora, N. Y., xl, 192
- Boston, xxxix, 55, 72, 120, 127, 128, 182, 183, 176, 184, 192, 199, 208; xl, 16, 24, 32, 40, 56, 60, 95, 110, 119, 143, 151, 160, 167, 176, 192
- Buffalo, N. Y., xl, 120
- Cambridge, Mass., xxxix, 48, 55, 199; xl, 32, 40, 176
- Chicago, xxxix, 40, 112, 126; xl, 160
- Cincinnati, xxxix, 32, 48, 88, 103, 112, 160, 184, 200; xl, 66, 72, 80, 144, 176, 192
- Canandaigua, N. Y., xxxix, 88
- Dayton, O., xl, 104
- Detroit, xxxix, 120; xl, 72
- New York and Brooklyn, xxxix, 60, 127, 128, 151, 152, 160, 168, 184, 192, 200; xl, 16, 56, 73, 104, 120, 160, 167, 192
- Philadelphia, xxxix, 135, 200; xl, 16, 32
- Pittsburgh, Pa., xxxix, 88
- Pittsfield, Mass., xxxix, 38
- Salem, Mass., xl, 16
- San Francisco, xxxix, 32
- Stoneham, Mass., xl, 192
- Syracuse, N. Y., xxxix, 128
- Winchester, Mass., xxxix, 160
- Worcester, Mass., xxxix, 40, 94, 120; xl, 72, 120, 196
- Worcester, Mass., xxxix, 160; xl, 120, 144, 168
- Offenbach, Jacques: his death and his career. (Chicago Tribune), xl, 171; (Hanslick), 187

- Onslow, George, A Marmontel. xl, 106
 Opera, Shortcomings of (Walter B. Lawson), xxxix, 19, 27, 36; English, origin of, 148;
 French, archives of, xl, 36
 Opera Abroad: in Berlin, xxxix, 51, 104; xl, 29, 69, 128, 160, 184, 200
 in London, xxxix, 104, 128, 208; xl, 8, 28, 37, 98, 118, 128, 135
 in Paris, xxxix, 144; xl, 8, 29, 40, 112, 144, 200 in Vienna, xxxix, 193; xl, 8, 10, 16, 29, 42, 50, 184, 200
 in Dresden, xl, 20, 103, 130 in Hamburg, xl, 38; Frankfurt, xl, 170 in Leipzig, xl, 60, 77, 103, 119, 128 in St. Petersburg, xl, 60, 119, 130 in Brussels, 128, 130
 in Trieste, xl, 198
 Opera: in Boston (Her Majesty's Theatre, London), xxxix, 13, 23; its Prospects, xxxix, 153; xl, 151; "Ideal" Company, xxxix, 176 in Chicago, xxxix, 31, 56, 135, 183, 199; xl, 24, 100, 208
 in Philadelphia, xxxix, 39, 143
 in Milwaukee, xxxix, 64 in New York, xxxix, 127, 184, 192, 200; xl, 167, 204
 in Baltimore, xxxix, 176; xl, 24, 48
 in New Orleans, xl, 120
 Orchestral Societies in Boston, xxxix, 110; xl,
 110; Question, the, xl, 5, 142, 150, 158
 Orchestras: Theatrical (Philadelphia Bulletin), xxxix, 144; Local (C. Villiers Stanford), xl, 142 Organ, The: Wanted a Composer for (H. B.
Statham), xl, 9; at the New Tremont Temple, xl, 175
 Originality in Music, False notions of, G. A.
Macfarren, xxxix, 179
 Otis, Philo A. His 121st Psalm (Chicago Trib- une), xl, 133
 Overture, The, its origin and development
 (Grove's Dictionary), xl, 196, 204
 Paine, Prof. J. K. His "Spring" Symphony,
 xl, 53
 Palestrina: Republication of his works, xxxix,
 61; his life and music (W. N. Fayers), 69
 Paris; its Conservatoire and Classical Concerts
 (Corr. Chicago Tribune), xl, 3
 Parker, J. C. D. His "Redemption Hymn,"
 xxxix, 37
 Pathetic Fallacy, The. T. G. A. xxxix, 43 Pianoforte: Wm. Mason's Technique, (C. B.
Cady), xxxix, 28, 35; Playing, the Brain in (W. S. B. Mathews), 139; Music, development of from Bach to Schumann (C.
Van Bruyck), 130, 137, 145, 154, 161, 169, 177
 Pierian Sodality, the, of Harvard College,
 xxxix, 147, 155, 163
 Pierson, Hugh. His Music to Goethe's "Faust,"
A. Jullien, xl, 97
 "Pinafore," Homer versus, xxxix, 115; (J. S.
D.), 118
 POETRY:—
 To Thaliarchus. Transl. from Horace. C. P.
Cranch, xxxix, 1
 T. Apollo. Transl. from Horace. C. P. Cranch, 9
 Afghan Song. Fanny Raymond Ritter, 17
 To Publius Virgilius Maro. Transl. from Horace.
C. P. Cranch, 33
 Sonnet. Stuart Sterne, 41
 Found. From Goethe. M. E. Harmon, 49
 Sonnet. Stuart Sterne, 81, 105, 113, 121, 129, 131, 145, 153
 Songs, translated from Mirza-Schaffy. Fanny Ray- mond Ritter, xl, 19
 Russian Folk-Songs. Fanny Raymond Ritter, 34
 Songs, Russian, Greek, Oriental, Maori. Fanny
Raymond Ritter, 44
 Dialogue between an inquiring young Musician and a Doctor of the "Advanced" School. Lond.
Mus. World, xl, 129
 Sonnets: To an Artist. Stuart Sterne, 153
 A Finnish Rune. Transl. by Fanny Raymond
Ritter, 169
 Prejudice in Music, W. F. A. xl, 6
 Preston, John A., the pianist, xxxix, 46; his Organ Recitals, xl, 177, 182
 Programme Music. A. W. Thayer, xxxix, 75
 Prout, Ebenezer: his Cantata "Hereward the Wake." Lond. Mus. Standard, xxxix, 107
 Public, the, and the Virtuoso. W. F. Apthorp,
 xxxix, 11
 Purcell, as an Opera Composer, xl, 13
 Radziwill, Prince: his "Faust" Music, xl, 97
 Raff, Joachim: his Symphonies, xxxix, 38, 190, 203; xl, 180, 190; his Suite in C. op. 101,
 xxxix, 54; String Quartet "Die Schöne
 Müllerin," 90; xl, 79; his Career, xl, 68
 Rasoumowsky Quartet, the. A. W. Thayer,
 xxxix, 90
 Reform in Church Music: Mr. Eugene Thayer's
 Lecture, xl, 126, 132
 Reeves, Herbert, son of Sims Reeves, the Tenor,
 xl, 111
 Reissiger, C. G. His Quartet, op. 111 (R. Schu- mann), xl, 178
 Remenyi, the Hungarian Violinist, xxxix, 8
 Richter, Ernst Friedrich: Obituary, xxxix, 82
 Richter, the Conductor, in London, xl, 119, 123
 Rietz, Julius: his "Faust" Music, xl, 97
 Ritter, Dr. F. L. His Lecture on Chamber
 Music. (N. Y. Mus. Rev.), xl, 116, 125
 Rive-King, Mme., the Pianist, xxxix, 71, xl, 46
 Roda, Ferdinand de: his "Faust" Drama, xl, 98
 Rossini: his Stabat Mater, xxxix, 72; his "Le Comte Ory," xl, 200; how he wrote "Otello" (Alex. Dumas), xxxix, 170; his proposed "Faust" Opera (A. Jullien), xl, 137
 Rubinstein, Anton: his Piano Concerto in G,
 No. 3, xxxix, 54; "Ocean" Symphony, xl,
 13; his Songs, xxxix, 85, 94
 Rummel, Franz, the Pianist, xxxix, 38, 196
 Russian Folk-Songs. Fanny Raymond Ritter,
 xl, 84, 44
 "Ruth Burrage Room," The: Letter from B.
J. Lang, xxxix, 127
 Saint-Saëns, Camille: his "Phaëton," xxxix,
 29; "The Lyre and the Harp" xxxix, 162; "Rouet d' Omphale," xxxix, 190;
 "Deluge," xl, 84
 Salvi, Lorenzo: Obituary, xxxix, 60
 Sand, George, and Chopin. Fanny Raymond
Ritter, xxxix, 2, 9, 25, 33, 41, 65, 73,
 Schapler, Julius: his Prize Quartet (Schumann),
 xl, 193
 Schindler-Beethoven Papers, The. A. W.
Thayer, xl, 160
 Schubert, Franz: his Unfinished Symphony, xxxix, 15; Symphony in C, xl, 37; his Piano Music, xxxix, 161; "Des Teufels
 Lustschloß," xl, 16; his Overtures, xl, 22;
 Chamber-Music, xl, 55; his "Faust" Songs,
 xl, 89
 Schulz, Chretien: his "Faust" Overture, xl, 105
 Schumann, Clara and Joachim: Dresden in 1800 (J. S. D.), xl, 109, 145
 Schumann: his Symphony in C, xxxix, 29;
 his "Manfred" music, xl, 73, 78, 81; String Quartets, xl, 7; his Song Series: "Frauen-Liebe und Leben," xxxix, 86; Piano Works, xxxix, 177, 192; Overture to "Julius Cæsar," xl, 197; his "Music and Musicians" (F. L. Ritter), xxxix, 178, 187, 194, 202; (J. S. D.), xl, 182; a Wagnerian attack on (Handlick), xxxix, 186; on String Quartets, xl, 177, 185, 198
 "Scientifically," W. F. A. xl, 101
 Seiler, Mme. Emma: her School of Vocal Art
 in Philadelphia, xxxix, 135
 Sherwood, Wm. H. xxxix, 96; xl, 72; his Normal Institute, xl, 96
 Singing Clubs: Report of the President of the Cecilia, xxxix, 138
 Smart, Henry: Obituary, xxxix, 136
 Sonatas: Five at a Sitting, xxxix, 8
 Sonata, The, as an art form, xxxix, 138, 145, 161; the physical basis of unity between its different movements (W. S. B. Mathews),
 xl, 1
 Spohr: his "Last Judgment," (J. S. D.), xl, 66; his Opera "Faust," xl, 113 Sternberg, Constantin, the Russian Pianist, (G.
T. Bulling), xl, 158
 Strauss, Joseph: his "Faust" opera, xl, 89
 Suite, The, as an art form, xxxix, 138
 Sullivan, Arthur: his Career, xxxix, 146; his "Prodigal Son," 198; in Victoria Street, xl,
 12; his "Martyr of Antioch," 186
 Svendsen, Johann: his Symphony in D, xxxix, 104
 Thayer, A. W. His life of Beethoven, Vol. III, xxxix, 24; xl, 29; Translations from, 75,
 90; Nohl's Criticisms on, xxxix, 114
 Theatrical "Tremolo" Fiend, The, xxxix, 134
 Theatrical Orchestras (Phila. Bulletin), xxxix, 144
 Thomas, Theodore, in Cincinnati, xxxix, 31, 111, 100; his retirement from the College of Music, xl, 72; Conducts the Cincinnati Festival, 90
 Thursby, Miss Emma, in Paris and London,
 xxxix, 80
 Tone-Quality. Geo. T. Bulling, xxxix, 100
 Toujours Perdrix: Nohl vs. Thayer on Beethoven. Prof. Franz Gehring, xxxix, 114
 Tremont Temple, (Boston); the New Hall and its Organ, xl, 174, 175
 Tchaikowsky: his Piano Concerto in B-flat minor, xxxix, 108; his Miniature March, xl, 107 University Music in England, xl, 170; at Harvard, 170, xl, 117
 Vandal "Improvement": Boston Music Hall in Danger, xxxix, 77, 150, 184
 Vassar College, F. R. R. xxxix, 92, 117; (A. Z.)
 xl, 103
 Veit, W. H. His Second Quartet reviewed by Schumann, xl, 185
 Verdi: his Manzoni Requiem, xl, 85, 86, 112, 125; his "Aida" and its Author (E. Han- lick), 201; his String Quartet in E-minor,
 xxxix, 111
 Vienna and Beethoven. E. Handlick, xl, 100 Violin Classes, Julius Eichberg's, xxxix, 7,— xl, 23; Collectors, xxxix, 64; Violin and bow Piano: a California Invention, 174;
 "Violin Fairy," the: Mme. Neruda, xl, 59;
 V., Beethoven's, 166; V. Story in five acts
 (C. H. Brittan), 52
 Virtuoso, The, and Public. W. F. Apthorp,
 xxxix, 1
 Virtuosity. Some peculiar phases of. W. F. A.
 xxxix, 53
 Vocal Clubs: their rapid spread in England, xxxix, 188; the orchestra question in, xl, 5
 Wagner, Richard: his relations with Berlioz, xxxix, 99; his "Work and Mission," addressed to the New World, 171; from his book on Beethoven, xl, 140; his Theories
 (W. S. Rockstro, in Grove's Dictionary), 153, 161; a French View of (Henri Blaze de Bury), 172; Compared with Gluck (Han- lick), 196
 Wagner, Richard: "Siegfried Idyl," xxxix, 15, 54; "Götter dämmerung" at Vienna (Han- lick), xxxix, 67; his "Faust Overture," xl, 106
 Wagnerian Attack on Schumann (Handlick), xxxix, 185; Appeal to American (Freiherr von Wolzogen), xl, 4
 Wanted—a Composer for the Organ. H. H.
Statham, xl, 9
 Ware, Miss Josephine, the Pianist, xxxix, 62
 Warning: Perils of Young American Girls in European Cities, xxxix, 141
 Weber, Albert, the Piano Maker: Obituary,
 xxxix, 136
 Weber, C. M. von: his "Oberon" revived in London, xl, 8
 Wenzel, Ernst Ferdinand: Obituary, xl, 164, 178
 West, John A. His cantata "Dornröschen," Chicago Tribune, xl, 133
 What lack we yet? W. F. A. on the need of a Permanent Orchestra, xl, 150; (J. S. D.), 158
 Wilhelm, A., in Boston, xxxix, 7
 "Wunderkinder": the Douste Children, xxxix, 22 Zelter and Ferdinand Hiller in Vienna (Han- lick), xl, 74
 Zerrahn, Carl: Testimonial Concert to, xxxix, 78, 83

BOSTON, JANUARY 4, 1879.

CONTENTS.

TO THALARCHUS. Translation from Horace. C. P. Cranch	1
THE VIRTUOSO AND THE PUBLIC	1
GEORGE SAND AND FREDERIC CHOPIN. A Study. Fanny Raymond Ritter	2
FIVE SONATAS AT A SITTING	3
BOOK NOTICES	4
Apple Blossoms: Verses of two Children. — A Masque of Poets. — An American Consul Abroad.
OUR PAINTERS: THE NEW DEPARTURE	5
EDITORIAL: SALUTATION	5
CONCERTS	6
The Harvard Musical Association. — [Wilhelm] and Di Munka. — Mr. Eichberg's Violin Classes.
MUSICAL CORRESPONDENCE	7

All the articles not credited to other publications were expressly written for this Journal.

TO THALARCHUS.

TRANSLATION FROM HORACE, BY C. P. CRANCH.

THOU seest how on Soracte's lofty brow
The white snow gleams.
The laboring forests bend, and scarcely now Sustain their load. Sharp ice hath stopped the streams.
— Dissolve the frosty cold, heap high the wood
Upon the fire, and with a cheerier mood,
O Thalarchus, draw
The four-year vintage from its Sabine jar!
Leave to the gods all else, by whose great law
The warring winds upon the seas afar
Are lulled, and ancient ash and cypress tree
Remain unscathed and free.
Seek not to know what lot the morrow brings;
And what to thee thy daily fortune grants,
Place to thy gain. Spurn not love's dallies,
O youth, nor shun the dance.
While crabb'd age is far, and hath no power
To touch thy bloom, now let the field and park,
With soft low whispers in the dark,
He sought again at the appointed hour;
Or in some secret nook the hiding maid
Be by her merry laugh betrayed,
Yielding from finger or from dainty wrist
The forfeit jewel, feigning to resist.

THE VIRTUOSO AND THE PUBLIC.

A VERY excellent article entitled "Virtuosity versus Art," which was copied from the London Musical Standard into the number of this journal for November 9th, emphasizes certain points concerning the relation which virtuosity, properly so called, is too often made to bear to true art. If the habit some brilliant performers have of altering the printed letter of respectable compositions for the sake of displaying their personal executive powers, and of fascinating the not over-earnest listener by their facile toying with astonishing difficulties, were the only evil result of that self-love which tempts the virtuoso to try to outbid the composer in the esteem of the public, the Standard's article would cover the whole ground. But this is the least of its evils. The parading of unnecessary difficulties can nowadays mislead the admiration of only the very partially musical person. No one who is in earnest about listening to music for musical ends can be carried away by it. And let it be said here, at once, that the class of listeners whose applause lies in wait for mere executive pyrotechnics are of the merest imaginary importance in the world of art. The purity or impurity of the musical impressions they receive is of very secondary moment. As it is unimportant whether the pitiable individual whose whim leads him to take singing lessons, though he have no music in his soul, and no voice in his throat, be well taught or ill, so is it unimportant what music is played (or how it is played) to the unmusical listener whose ear on the alert for the mere circus-riding side of the art. If a savage have a taste for glass beads, we are content to purchase the right of way through his territory with that article, without attempting to develop his taste for diamonds. There is no need of people being musical who have no natural bent that way. We sow seed in the soil that is fittest for it; and if a farmer's land can bear wheat, he were foolish to go to the expense of artificially making it rich enough to bear tobacco.

It is the really musical people whose musical culture we should have at heart, and they are for the most part little to be harmed by the exhibition of fireworks. The virtuoso, if he be nothing better, is soon enough appreciated at his proper value by them; they do not let his flash ground-and-lofty-tumbling influence their musical notions one whit.

But there is another sort of virtuosity — what might be called a transcendental virtuosity — which is far more insidious and harmful than the mere physical kind, and which, especially in our own day, works much ruin among just that class of listeners whom the true music-lover and artist should most try to cultivate. This is the virtuosity which does not so much seek to dress up music in unworthy gew-gaws to catch the applause of the tinsel-loving masses, as to pierce to the heart of the music itself and change its very essence. Here we have the very devil in music. The man who plays certain great compositions "in his own way," — "with overpoweringly grand subjectivity of conception" is a longer term for it, — even if he do not add any unnecessary flourishes of his own, can do almost incalculable harm to the general musical taste. He presents the works of great composers in a false light, which is the more injurious in that its æsthetic untruth is not always to be easily detected. The Venus of the Medici, decked out in diamond bracelets and ear-drops, would call forth a cry of horror from a vast number of persons who would not be shocked by seeing the god-like statue hewn out of a block of alabaster. Many music-lovers would scorn admiring virtuoso ornamentation, while they might be unsuspectingly carried away by virtuosity of conception. The day has now gone by when Leopold de Meyer could win applause by heaping gratuitous trills and arpeggi upon a Chopin nocturne, and Liszt could bedevil the first movement of Beethoven's Opus 27 sonata without fear of reproach; but Sir Michael Costa puts trombones and a big drum and cymbals into the first finale of Don Giovanni, and substitutes a bass-tuba for the 'celli in parts of the second finale, without running any risk of the gallows; Anton Rubinstein plays the Schumann quintet "in the Russian [quære: rushing?] manner" to the almost unanimous applause of enraptured audiences. Yet Mozart knew how to make his Don Giovanni finale one of the most overpowering pages in dramatic music without having recourse to crashing instrumentation, and Schumann wrote his quintet in the Schumann manner, but by no means in the Russian manner.

The sins against composers that are committed by many artists to-day, and of which

I have tried to give two significant examples, have been too generally referred by critics to the (real or supposed) inclination toward the intense in art which characterizes the spirit of our era. I do not think that this is the true explanation of the evil. In the first place I utterly deny that art is more intense in its intrinsic character now than it was years ago. Homer's Achilles is as intensely passionate a person as any character in modern poetry; Victor Hugo's Barkilphedro cannot outdo Iago; King Lear puts any modern unhappy father to the blush by the unbridled vehemence of his invective; Heathcliff can do his worst to nurture fury in the bosom of his luckless ward, but he cannot make a Caliban of him; Emily Brontë cannot ring out a curse as Shakespeare could; Verdi's Dies Irae is weak beside Sebastian Bach's "Donner und Blitzen;" the wildest-whirling Tarantelle Liszt ever concocted is tame by the side of Beethoven's Dervishes' Chorus; the Commendatore's "Non si pace di cibo morale" chills the blood as Alberich's "Der Lebe fluch' ich" cannot do; even in the domain of the purely horrible, which our age seems to be in some respects ambitious to claim as especially its own, the most tremendous example I know of in all modern music, the appalling phrase to the words "Dévoré palpitant par ces monstres hideux," in Berlioz's La Prise de Troie, is not more terrible than Händel's "They loathed to drink of the river." No, it is not intensity that is our besetting sin; it is lack of discrimination; the ancients were quite as intense as we. But nowadays, if we try to express passion, we are, in general, too prone to deal in broad generalities; we express love as we instinctively feel it, with little regard for whether we impersonate a Juliet or a Messalina; if cursing is to be done, we do it with heartiest good will, but we do not sufficiently distinguish between the invective of a King Lear or a Duke of Gloster (in Henry the VI., not in Richard the III.) and the billingsgate of a Thersites. We make a Chopin A-flat polonaise pass as legal tender for the warlike fury of a Cossack horde with as little compunction as we change the high-bred elegance of Verdi's "Bella figlia d'amore" into the screaming of a drunken candidate for six months in the house of correction, or the chivalric fire of the andante of the C-minor symphony into the flaccid sentimentality of a fashionable boudoir in the days of Louis XV. We make Mendelssohn sigh like Schumann; we make the graceful and winning Mozart chant like Palestrina; we make Schumann sound like Brahms; we turn Weber, Meyerbeer, and Beethoven into — well, the metamorphoses that we have not made Beethoven undergo would be difficult to name. By "we" I mean a large class of performers who command the admiration of audiences to-day.

Many otherwise admirable artists, and of the very highest reputation too, seem to try their uttermost to adapt whatever composition falls into their hands to their own — often transcendently brilliant — powers, instead of trying to adapt their powers to it; they have a sort of Procrustes' bed, which everything they sing or play must be made to fit willy-nilly. This is what I have called transcendental virtuosity; not the mere showing off of technique, but the improper display of personal qualities — "glorious individuality" some people call it — at the expense of the intrinsic characteristics of the music. This is immoral. More than immoral, it is stupid.

An artist worthy of the name desires (one would imagine) to appeal to the most earnest and culture-seeking (that is, truth-seeking) audience. Does this artist, be he pianist, violinist, singer, or orchestral conductor, fondly think, when he announces on a programme that he will play, sing, or conduct a really exalted composition, that he, or the composition, is the more important object in the eyes of the listener whom he should most try to interest? Unquestionably, the composition is of the greatest importance, and every listener has an inalienable right to hear that composition in all the integrity that the performer's high talents, — genius, if you will, — and his thorough and conscientious study can compass. The sincere music-lover does not honor Mr. X. for the amount of his own "glorious individuality" that he can put into a Beethoven sonata, but for the amount of Beethoven's individuality and spirit that he can get out of it. The performer whose local or world-wide reputation lends authority to all he does, and who puts his own genius before that of the composer whose works he presents to the public, is little better than a cheat. Aye, and a clumsy cheat too; for however much the "glorious-individuality"-people may compel the admiration of the world, one can find, in looking over the list of great artists, that those who have most surely won the respect (which is better than admiration) of the majority of true musicians are those who have been most anxious to do reverent justice to the works of great composers, and not to parade the glorious, or inglorious, individuality of their own precious selves. A great artist should not merely dazzle, and lay hold of the emotions of his hearers; he should try, as far as in him lies, to be a model also.

WILLIAM F. APTHORP.

GEORGE SAND AND FRÉDÉRIC CHOPIN.

A STUDY.

BY FANNY RAYMOND RITTER.

IN Karasowski's recently published life of Chopin,¹ the following passage occurs: "The spirit of Chopin breathes from the best of George Sand's romances; like many authors of vivacious fancy, she often lost patience while at work, because her mind was already busy with a new plan before she had completed an older one. To confine herself more closely to her desk, and to be able to work with greater care, she begged Chopin to improvise at the piano, while she wrote, and thus, inspired by his playing, she produced her best romances." When I read this passage, I could not avoid pausing to wonder whether it was not one of M. Karasowski's romances?

The friendship and the intercourse of artists and literati have always been a subject of interest to the student, and of inquiry to the psychologist. In what manner, and how far, did one mind influence the other? Was that influence voluntarily or involuntarily yielded to, and what effect did it produce on the works of the artists who experienced it? Such questions are asked in such illustrious examples of love, friendship, or artistic collaboration as existed, or exist, between Liszt and Wagner, the Rossetti family, Erckmann and Chatrian, Robert and Elizabeth Browning, Robert and Clara Schumann, Goethe and Schiller, Byron and Shelley, Abélard and Héloïse, and others. Was the well-known friendship between George Sand and Frédéric Chopin one of a similar character? What was her influence on his music; and did she really "write her best romances under the influence of his playing"? To form an opinion, we must first recall the outlines of an episode in the lives of these artists, — one of an unwonted nature, though in its social aspects not wholly foreign to French manners and habits thirty or forty years ago.

Chopin, when thirty years old, met Madame Dudevant, five years his senior, for the first time at a soirée given by a Countess C——, at Paris. The lady, already surrounded by the halo of recently and suddenly acquired celebrity attached to her nom de plume of George Sand, had previously admired more than one of the then published compositions of Chopin, and wished to make his acquaintance; Liszt, the friend of both, informs us² that Chopin was a little afraid of the famous novelist, and rather deferred an introduction. It occurred, however, amid music, flowers, elegant society, and all the surroundings of a Parisian evening party. Chopin, in writing to his parents of this meeting, said, "her face does not inspire me with sympathy; there is something in it that repels me." He should, judging from after events, have rather said, "that fascinates me;" for he was certainly powerfully impressed by "the dark steady gaze that seemed to read his soul," and still more, adds Karasowski, by the exceptional influence which this extraordinary woman involuntarily exerted on those capable of understanding all that she really was; while "in listening to her poetic expressions, uttered in a deep, euphonious, gentle voice, overflowing with spirit and feeling, he felt that he was understood as he had never yet been understood." It was not long after his first presentation to the lady that Chopin became one of Madame Dudevant's almost daily visitors, while she was often to be found at his musical reunions, the most admired and fêted among many famous representatives of art and literature, besides some of the most distinguished members of the Polish nobility then in Paris. Before this period, Chopin's health had begun to show symptoms of decline; the political troubles of his father-land, his at first unsuccessful struggles to obtain a position in Paris, disappointment in his projects of marriage, the late hours of fashionable society, excessive artistic labor, had injuriously affected his sensitive temperament; but, under the influence of this new, engrossing friendship, his health seemed to revive, his gayety returned, and he became more exclusive and reserved than ever in his social habits, devoting himself with greater assiduity to composition.

More than a year after their first acquaintance, Madame Dudevant determined to take her children to spend the winter in Majorca, in hopes of improving the health of her son Maurice. I will translate an extract from her own account of what occurred in consequence of that determination:³ —

"There is another soul, not less fine and pure in its essence [than that of M. Everard, of whom she had been speaking], not less sick and troubled in this world, in whose face I gaze peacefully in my imaginary contemplation of the dead, and whom I shall, I trust, find again in that better world which I await, where we shall learn to know each other better, in a light more living, more divine, than that of earth. I speak of Frédéric Chopin, my guest at Nohant during the eight years of my retirement there under the monarchy. In 1838, when the care of my children had been definitively confided to me, I resolved to seek a warmer winter climate than our own, for my son Maurice. I thus hoped to save him from a return of the cruel rheumatism of the preceding year. I also wished to find a quiet spot, where I could continue to educate him and his sister, and write — not in excess — myself. We gain so much time when we do not receive company; we are not obliged to sit up so late! Chopin, for whose genius and character I entertained an affectionate admiration, and whom I then saw almost daily, was aware of my plans and preparations, and insisted that if he were in Maurice's place, he would get well at once. I mistakenly believed it would prove as he said, and took him, — not in the place of my son! — but beside him. He was thought to be seriously consumptive, and his friends had long besought him to try the climate of the south. Dr. Gumbert, after examining Chopin, told me he was not yet dangerously affected, adding, 'Your care, with open air, exercise, and rest will save him.' Other friends, knowing that Chopin would never leave Paris except with an attached friend, beloved by him, added their entreaties that I would allow him to accompany our party, and begged me not to oppose the wish he manifested so opportunely and unexpectedly. I afterwards became convinced that I had done wrong in yielding to their hopes, and my own interest and anxiety. It was enough care for me to travel into a foreign country with two children, one already ill, the other exuberant with health and turbulence, without also taking a physician's responsibility upon me, and trouble of the heart besides."

Many incidents of their life in Majorca have been related by her in the book she published respecting her stay in the island,⁴ as well as in her autobiography. They were obliged to take up their residence in

¹ Friedrich Chopin, sein Leben, seine Werke und Briefe. Von MORITZ KARASOWSKI. Dresden: F. Ries. 1877.

² Life of Chopin. By F. LISZT. Translated by M. W. COOK. Philadelphia: F. Leopoldt. 1863. London: W. Reeves.

³ Histoire de ma Vie. Par GEORGE SAND. Paris: Michel Lévy, Frères. 1856.

⁴ Un Hiver à Majorque. GEORGE SAND. Paris: Lévy. 1867.

the ruined Chartreuse of Valdemosa, a most romantic, but possibly, for an invalid, a not very comfortable habitation. It was Madame Sand's custom to give her children their lessons in the morning, and to write in the afternoon; their evenings were passed together, and the only time left to her for the out-door exercise she seems always to have needed, in order to continue her labors in health and with success, was an hour or two with her children in the evening, when Chopin had retired. But in the rainy winter season his health again declined; the provisions and service necessary for an invalid, were difficult to obtain in that wild country, and Madame Sand, who says she would often have given all she possessed to procure beef soup or claret for Chopin, more than once risked her own life and that of her son, in her endeavors to bring home what was needful for him from the distant town of Palma. The physicians at Palma insisted that a course of bleeding was necessary to the patient; Madame Sand says that Providence alone gave her strength of persuasion enough to prevent such treatment, which she felt would have been certain to put an end to Chopin's illness only by putting an end to his life. Her own health began to suffer under her countless cares; and when the ignorant people who surrounded them discovered that Chopin had a cough, they, believing it to be an epidemic, avoided the whole family as though its members were plague-stricken.

The lovely spring weather of Majorca returned, Chopin's health seemed again restored; the family wished to spend the summer on the island, but he impatiently insisted on returning to France at once. Madame Sand says: "Playful, amiable, charming in society, Chopin, in the domestic retirement of intimate friendship, drove one to despair. No disposition more noble, delicate, disinterested than his, no character more loyal and true, no mind more brilliant in gayety, no intelligence more serious and complete in its own domain; but, on the other hand, alas! no temper more unequal, no imagination more suspicious, no susceptibility so easily irritated, no attachment so exacting. Yet this was not his fault, but his misfortune. His spirit was flayed alive; the fowl of a rose-leaf, the shadow of a fly, caused it to bleed. Everything under the sky of Spain now seemed repulsive and revolting to him, — except myself and my children, — and he was dying to be gone, not so much on account of the inconveniences of our residence, as from mere impatience." The party accordingly returned to France through Barcelona, Marseilles, and Genoa, and Madame Sand allowed Chopin to accompany them to her chateau at Nohant, where the physicians pronounced him entirely recovered, save for a slight affection of the larynx. Life at Nohant, and the air and surrounding scenery, were especially pleasing and congenial to Chopin, and quieting to his nature; but Madame Sand, after debating with herself whether she should allow him to remain there as a member of her household, finally determined to go to Paris, to continue her children's education under more favorable auspices, and with the especial intention of placing Maurice as a student of painting under Delacroix. The residence she engaged in Paris consisted of two pavilion-like houses in an extensive garden, which last was the great attraction to her, as it offered to her children the opportunity of exercise combined with retirement and safety. Chopin had rented an apartment in the Rue Tronchet. It unfortunately proved damp, his health began to decline, and a distressing cough returned. Affection, pity, yielding good-nature, that love of nursing every one she cared about into health and happiness, which always characterized her, and the alternative of either giving up her friend altogether, or of consuming much time in useless visits to and fro, induced Madame Sand to let half of one of her pavilions to Chopin, with whom she installed her son Maurice. She, with her daughter, and other relatives and their children, inhabited the other house in the garden. Here, for seven or eight winters, resided Madame Sand, and her "habitual invalid," as Chopin was called. The days of the two great artists were filled with continual and assiduous occupation: in his rooms Chopin received his pupils, ladies of the highest Parisian aristocracy, some of the greatest beauties of the capital, women of talent, we may be sure, besides, — for without talent there was little hope of being accepted by Chopin as a pupil, — or, in the intervals of teaching, he played and composed; Madame Sand, when at home, writing in her pavilion, surrounded by the children, whose presence, she says, she often found her best inspiration, and for whose especial delight she wrote many tales and dramas. The tradition of the performance of these dramas by the children at the Chateau of Nohant (which contained a private theatre) in summer, has been preserved. What representations! — with that small family circle, and sometimes Chopin's sister Louise, and Madame Sand alone as audience; Eugène Delacroix for stage manager and scene-painter, Liszt and Chopin the orchestra! Happy children, with four of the most gifted, and peculiarly originally gifted, minds in Europe pressed into service for the furtherance of your holiday games and pleasures!

When in Paris, the salons of Madame Sand or of Chopin were opened several evenings in the week to receive many of the most illustrious men and women of the day, such as Cavaignac, Louis Blanc, Henri Martin, Arago, Liszt, Delacroix, Heine, Mickiewicz, Madame Garcia, Madame Mariani, the Princess Czartoryska, etc., etc., and Chopin's friends among his pupils and the circle of Polish nobility then in Paris. Nevertheless, Madame Sand complains that she passed through many trials during this period, not the least of which, she says, were the sight of Chopin's sufferings, and her own struggles against his exacting disposition and morbid irritability, which must have pained and oppressed those who saw so much of him in domestic life, in spite of his tender and devoted attachment, his genius and his graces. Persons who were familiar with the literary or fashionable Parisian circles of that day relate that a general feeling of surprise existed that Madame Sand, whose good graces were almost fought for by many of the most distinguished men in Paris, as a sort of diploma of literary or artistic ability, should have allowed so much of her time to run to waste in ministering to the caprices and sufferings of an irritable invalid who was not related to her; and that it was thought Chopin displayed little delicacy in remaining so long an inmate of her household. The malicious gossips of the day also whispered that Chopin was perfectly well aware of the prestige and increased artistic distinction he was likely to acquire by means of the intimate friendship, openly displayed, and the literary influence of so famous a woman as George Sand. The first opinion had possibly some foundation; the second could not have had any; it is too incompatible with a character so generous, fastidious, noble, and disinterested as was that of Chopin. It sounds as inapplicable to him, as another, about some lady of rank, who complained that when she went to take her lessons from Chopin, "his nails were not clean." The elegant Chopin, with nails untrimmed! Ink-stained they may sometimes have appeared, from accident; but that is a different affair. However, in taking these and similar or more serious slanders for what they are worth, we must remember, in partial excuse of the slanderers, that Chopin was not then estimated at his true intellectual value as a composer, however he may have been admired as a pianist. Among those who understood Chopin's great, original genius, save Madame Sand herself, Madame Garcia, Liszt, Schumann, Delacroix, and a few other representatives of the highest art-aristocracy of the day, the circle of Chopin's admirers extended little beyond that of his pupils and the fashionable habitués of a few dozen Parisian drawing-rooms, among whom his grace, elegance of manner, and social accomplishments, made him an idol. Indeed, his admirers would all seem to have been rather adorers; nevertheless, his rank as a genius of the first magnitude was disputed; he was a rising, not a risen star, whose ascent to recognition was a slow and difficult one.

(To be continued.)

FIVE SONATAS AT A SITTING.

WE are now beginning to reap the harvest which is the natural outcome of the seed sown by the disciples of the "higher development school" in piano-forte playing. Dr. Von Bülow has recently played at one recital five of Beethoven's piano-forte sonatas — in fact, the entire programme was thus made up. These five were the last five of the thirty-two, namely: A major, Op. 101; B-flat major, Op. 106; E major, Op. 109; A-flat major, Op. 110; and C minor, Op. 111. This is a great feat; and the Doctor is probably as proud of it as his admirers are proud of him for having accomplished it. To play these five sonatas at all is no easy task; to play them from music, at one sitting, would be still more surprising; but to play them all at one sitting from memory is a truly astonishing performance. Robert Schumann said that a performer who played in public without music, whether from charlatanism or any other motive, showed that he possessed at all events the quality of thorough musicianship; and this quality we should be the last to deny to Dr. Von Bülow, who has so often proved his right to be regarded as an artist of the first rank. But we do protest—and we feel that we cannot protest too much—against these extraordinary displays of virtuosity. They are not good for art; they are not an advantage to the artist; they are not good for the public; they are unfair to the composer; and, on these grounds, we are bound to oppose them.

It is not to be imagined for one moment that the matter will stop where it is; others will attempt it; and where an artist of the first rank has succeeded, a second or third-rate artist will fail, though, with a pertinacity worthy of a better cause, failure will only incite to further and probably more disastrous attempts. If this sort of thing goes on, it is easy to foretell the consequences. We shall have artists, who can never do justice even to one of Beethoven's sonatas, announcing that they will play six or seven; and the competition will become so keen that the quality of the work done will be quite hidden by the enormous quantity of pages played. Just as Cleopatra tried to draw out Anthony by asking him, "If it be love indeed, tell me how much?" so, by and by, the public will begin to say to artists, "If you are really an artist, show us how much!" and players will strive to show how much music they can cram into their memories. The result will be utterly destructive of all true art. We shall have conductors announcing as an attraction that they will conduct without the score; that Mr. So-and-So's band will play the nine symphonies of Beethoven in a day without copies; that such-and-such a choir will sing the Elijah without books; and that no candidate will be admitted to a band, or choir, who cannot play, or sing, his part in the Passion music from memory. It will be a struggle—not to do best, but most; and he who can endure most fatigue, and play longest from memory, will win most applause and most guineas. We shudder to think what would become of music as an art, if this kind of thing should become a precedent.

We must remember, too, that artists themselves would suffer in a conflict of this sort, where "natural selection" would come into operation with terrible effect. The weakest would go to the wall, and the "survival of the fittest" would be secured; but the "fittest," in a scramble of this kind, would be the men who possessed the best memory and the strongest physique. It is a tremendous strain upon the system to play a great work from memory, and none but those who have experienced it can tell how great are the lassitude and depression which, especially in persons of only moderate strength, succeed these efforts. Artistic feeling, taste, judgment, conscientious adherence to the text of the composer,—and, in fact, all those qualities which combine to make the true artist,—would be at a discount, if such displays as that of Dr. Von Bülow should become general; and artists proper would have but little chance of being either heard or paid in the headlong rush for big memories and strong bodies.

We have often insisted that the artist is of no consequence as compared with the interests of art and the faithful rendering of the works of the composer; but this system of big recitals, by fostering vanity and discouraging accuracy and taste, would make the artist everything, and the art and the composer nothing.

The public should also be consulted in this matter. Concert-givers have, of course, a right to expect that their enterprises will pay; but, from an art point of view, the true object of giving concerts is to give the public an opportunity of hearing either a great art-work or a great artist—or both. If the public are to hear works of art, and to profit by hearing them, such works must be so placed before them as to give an opportunity for studying and contemplating their beauties. This, however, is utterly impossible under such conditions as those against which we are protesting. It is like studying paintings by means of a moving panorama, where the pictures succeed each other so rapidly that no idea of any one of them can be retained in the mind; or sculpture through the medium of beautiful statues and groups which come and go with the rapidity of actual life. The thing is manifestly impossible. Great works like Beethoven's Op. 106 cannot be studied if other great works of a similar kind precede and follow them so closely. The public needs to be instructed by hearing great works; but these exhibitions, from their very nature and object, must end in bewilderment without profit. We once studied the A-flat Sonata, Op. 110, and then went to hear Charles Halle play it at the Popular Concerts, and the effect on eye and ear together was to fix the beauties of the work in our memory; but with two other great works before and two after, without intermission, the effect would have been lost. Such great ideas can only be assimilated by slow degrees; and to overfeed the public will be to ruin its musical digestion.

We think the composer—if it were possible to consult him, or if artists thought it worth their while to do so—would protest with more vigor and effect than we can do, because, though we feel strongly on the point, he would feel much more strongly. But it is one of the failings of the school of which Dr. Von Bülow is so distinguished a leader, that its tenets, to quote a contemporary, "permit fantastic readings, occasional departures from the letter of the partition, and false notes, in an attempt to arrive at a 'higher development' of piano-forte playing." This means, in plain English, that a player can alter his text to suit his purpose. It is for this very reason that we are bound to oppose such attempts as that made by the great pianist. One sonata is enough for one concert; and he who attempts three or four not only does injustice to himself and his art, as well as to the public he is supposed to instruct, but also sets in a false light the composer whose works he is supposed to play. — Lond. Musical Standard, Nov. 30.

BOOK NOTICES.

APPLE BLOSSOMS: Verses of Two Children, ELAINE GOODALE and DORA READ GOODALE. New York: G. P. Putnam's Sons.

People like to believe in the miraculous; and to the general apprehension genius is a miracle. Certainly the dictum of Charles Dickens that "genius is only patience and attention" is a narrow and inadequate statement. If the great caricaturist had said that genius works by patience and attention, he would have been nearer right. The original impulse is still to be accounted for. After allowing what we must to heredity,—and in a certain way heredity must claim everything,—we still find genius to be an unexpected combination of ancestral traits, near or remote,—a development so new and strange that the astonished mother must, like Virgil's grafted tree, wonder at the strange leaves and blossoms, and the fruit not her own:

"Miraturque novas frondes et non sua poma."

These children, born in 1863 and 1866 respectively, have produced a volume of near 250 pages of genuine poetry. It is not all equally good, but the poetic feeling pervades every page. The poetry seems spontaneous; there is no invocation of the unwilling Muse, no preparation for song. The scenery and wild flowers of Berkshire County, the vicissitudes of the seasons, the joys of home, the mere delight of living,—these are the simple materials out of which the child artists have made some of the most exquisite pictures of our time. The literary art appears not to have been thought of, but yet the choice of words has often been guided by a divine instinct. You do not feel that there is any conscious attempt at decking the thought with ornament; and the phrase, "jeweled perfection," which we have seen applied by a warm admirer, though well meant, is singularly inappropriate.

At the time when most girls are just beginning to abjure dolls, these young priestesses of nature are celebrating the praises of the beautiful, and furnishing pictures of country life worthy of the most mature and experienced poets. Generally this power comes only with maturity, and, when it comes, the freshness of early feeling has too often been exhaled. If, in addition to this natural exuberance, there were attempts at diving into the mysteries of life, and of tracing analogies between the soul of nature and the soul of man, we should suspect the soundness of their growth, and should anticipate an early decay of their powers. To be sure, what they have done is not the less miraculous, but the tone of it agrees with the spring-time of life, and its charming youthfulness leaves room for the hope of a deeper and more spiritual development in after years.

Such poetry is at once antidote and relief to the sentimental sorrow and melodious woe of which much (feminine) poetry seems to be made. There is not a false intonation in all the volume. There are crudities which experience will hereafter detect and work out; but the most obvious lapses are less offensive than the pretense of feeling to which the poet is a stranger.

But the verses are finer than anything we can write about them.

[POEMS BY ELAINE GOODALE.]

O WILD azalea, rosy red,
In every woody hollow
Put out, put out your pretty head
That I may see and follow!
That I may see and follow, dear,
That I may see and follow!

ASHES OF ROSES.

Soft on the sunset sky
Bright daylight closes,
Leaving, when light doth die,
Pale hues that mingling lie,—
Ashes of roses.

When Love's warm sun is set,
Love's brightness closes;
Eyes with hot tears are wet,
In hearts there linger yet
Ashes of roses.

TRANSFIGURED.

SILENTLY away, away,
Glides the day,
Underneath her misty robes,
All of gray.

Close her dark mists settle down,
O'er the crown
Of the mountains tipped with clear
Golden brown.

Ah, what ray so glad and bright
Cheers my sight?
Parting, breaking see the clouds
Fringed with light!

Soft and clear the sunset air!
Fresh and fair
Dreamy hues that blush and mingle
New and rare!

Robed in purple glides the day
Still away,
At her feet red roses tremble
In the gray.

[POEMS BY DORA READ GOODALE.]

SUNSHINE AND SHADOW.

SUNSHINE plays on the hill-side steep,
Or kisses the daisied meadow,
Leaving the forest and waters deep
To quiet shadow.

When we pass thro' this life, this life below,
When we find no flowery meadow,
Shall we wait and wait for the sun's bright glow,
Or rest in shadow?

IN THE LOFT.

In the hay-loft, dark and sweet,
With the breath of new mown hay;
There the lights and shadows fall
Weird upon the scarred, scarred wall,
And the dusky swallows soar,
High above the broken floor,
Lightly poise on tiny feet,
Quiver, dip, and dart away.

MAIDEN'S HAIR.

(With a gift of pressed ferns.)

Where the tinkling water-falls
Sparkle over rocky ledges,
Where the slate-gray catbird calls
In and out the tangled hedges,
Green and slender, spreading fair,
You may see the maiden's hair.

'Tis as tho' some lady left
By the stream her floating tresses
Long ago, and now, bereft,
Where they be she little guesses,
But they still are tossing there,
And we call them maiden's hair.

Then may these a picture bring
Of green alders overhanging,
Of a wind-blown brook in spring,
And a thousand ripples, clanging
In a silver mingling, where Nods the slender maiden's hair.

Tho' their grace more formal be
Than when by the brook they fluttered,
Touched by winds that lazily
In among the treetops muttered,
Still the same quaint charm they bear
Of the earliest maiden's hair.

A MASQUE OF PORTS. No Name Series: Roberts Brothers. Boston.

In a real masquerade some prudence and reserve are needful, or you may speak evil of dignities in their own ears. In this mock masquerade there is less danger. We don't think the Dii majores are here. The huge mask opposite the title page is held by a child; at least it is a pair of plump and well rounded baby knees we see below, — not the strongly articulated joints of Apollo or his stately sons.

The general impression made by such a book is unpleasant. Much of the delight of poetry comes from the sense of personality. In even the scraps of the masters there is some suggestion. In this volume the promise is alluring, the result disappointing. There are a number of very fine poems in it; poems that would be creditable to the first in the land. There are others which we wonder at: —

"The things, we know, are neither rich nor rare,
But wonder how the devil they got there."

The Horizon is a delicate piece of work, much like the admired verses of H. H. Avallion is written in a noble strain, much as Dr. Joyce would have done. Appledore is an exquisite picture which only one woman (we think) could have written. Theocritus is simple and strong, a fine paraphrase of the thought of the antique world. The series of Medallion Heads shows the touch of a practiced hand, — perhaps that of the sculptor Story. Running the Blockade is full of spirit; but we remember Brownell, the Connecticut poet, and the author appears to remember him also. Aucassin and Nicolette is a sprightly little poem, one that would have delighted Thackeray at the time he wrote "Ho! pretty page, with the dimpled chin." There are many other pleasing things in this book; but as, perhaps, their few mannerisms are imitated, it might not be safe to assign them to the poets whose works they resemble. An anonymous poem may give sincere pleasure, but if it is one that the world wishes to cherish, the authorship becomes a matter of public interest, quite beyond curiosity. Then through the poem we come to know the poet, and afterwards we feel we have a right to the ideal intimacy. Thus it is, as Holmes has finely said, "the soul of the poet is naked and not ashamed." This is the legitimate place of the great poet, — a friend as well as high priest to his readers; and as this comes from what is personal and characteristic in him and his verse, we cannot feel any more than a transient interest in a play of masquers like this.

The novelette in verse, Guy Vernon, appeared at first unreadable, but (waiving the objection to the Byronic stanza) it proves to be a fine story, containing passages of indisputable poetry. We have only hinted at resemblances above; but in this instance we will make a guess; and it is that Guy Vernon was written by the accomplished author of The Blameless Prince.

AN AMERICAN CONSUL ABROAD. Boston: Lee & Shepard.

Many readers of the JOURNAL will remember Luigi Monti, the accomplished professor of the Italian language and literature. This book shows how he did not go consul-ing; but how many a well meaning American does go, and how he fares at it. Its pictures are sad, or rather mortifying to the national pride; but we believe them faithful. The state department, and Congress also, must feel complimented in view of the liberal treatment of the public servants in foreign countries.

If any adolescent littérateur thinks of becoming consul as a part of his training, the lesson of this book will be wholesome. F. H. U.

OUR PAINTERS: THE NEW DEPARTMENT.

This rejuvenescent musical journal will not forget to look after the interests of Painting, — the sister art. And all the more interest will she feel, as the date of her own fresh start coincides pretty well with the date of the new departure America takes in painting. The old is passing away; a newer and brighter day is cheering us. The ardent crowd of youth, who thirty years ago were the pioneers of the hour in Art, are now its veterans. Most ungenerous is it to say, — when we remember that they too once led, and opened a path to their fellows; and the art, like everything else of a country's green youth, must look poor before its maturer strength. Each of us has in him, or should have, that laudator temporis acti, the affectionate conservative of the past, and that radical, overturning old walls to build new ones.

"Superfluous lags the veteran on the stage,"

A drawing-master in Rome once spoke to me of a certain "affectation of bad drawing," which the English had. I told him I feared that with our Anglo-Saxon race it was no affectation; nor is it. A timidity of assertion, an unwillingness to be uncompromising, mark the American outline with feebleness. Our pictures debilitate when they should strengthen us. In this connection it is pleasant to observe the crowd of accomplished young artists returning from the best schools of Europe and longing for recognition. We are amazed when we see that they can draw the figure. They are bold in design, strong and cheerful in color, and make us believe we may yet see schools of our own which the world will respect. And to do this we must have life schools of our own, life schools which the artists must feel they need, pay for out of their own pockets, and assiduously study in. The hour has struck when we need and must have such life schools. Without them America can never hold up her head before foreign training. With them we can accomplish as good art as Rome, Munich, or Paris furnish. T. G. A.

Dwight's Journal of Music.

SATURDAY, JANUARY 4, 1879.

Published fortnightly by HOUGHTON, OSGOOD AND COMPANY,
220 Devonshire Street, Boston. Price, 10 cents a number;
$2.50 per year.

SALUTATION.

ON the eve of Christmas and New Year's, with the greetings of the joyful holy season to our readers, this first number of another volume of our new-old JOURNAL, bearing the imprint of new publishers, presents itself a fortnight in advance of date. Of course when its date arrives it will no longer be found fresh in all its matter, though some topics and some records do not lose their freshness in a day. We issue it thus early simply to satisfy the very many calls for a "specimen" number.

Everybody knows, a "specimen" never is a specimen, and never can be. An hour is no specimen of a year. A part cannot show the whole. A brick is not the house in little. A specimen paper is made up in a hurry, in a distracted and unnatural condition of the editorial mind, thinking of too many things at once, and lacking that repose of settled routine in which the happy thought, the clear and quick decision, comes. Every man is scatterbrained, half-idiotic, when he is in a hurry; his thought deserts him, his consciousness is blank; not so are the Muses won. We do our best when we are not thinking of doing something great. A general, who should go into a battle with the idea of showing the world a specimen, would be pretty sure to lose the fight. He would wish to exhibit all the elements of his strength, all his strategic arts and subtleties, whether the occasion called for them or not; would order up artillery only to find it in the way. So we, having issued a Prospectus of our plans and topics, with an attractive list of writers for the coming year, set out to make a specimen number just to show that all these writers, all these things, are really to figure in the volume here begun. But in the first place there is no time; in the next place no room. This is a small paper; its eight pages cannot make a show of all its departments and contributors at once; the little bark cannot hold all its crew; they must take turns. We have invited our trusty contributors to this trial trip; but when it comes to taking all aboard, it is like going to sea in a bowl. Some, of whose companionship we should have been proud, must wait. Some have contributed in such generous abundance that were we to accept it all, though good as gold, our boat would founder before leaving shore. Some have offered us whole books, where we timidly asked for occasional short papers. Of correspondents from other musical cities we have been anxious to include as many as possible; but in almost every instance we have been obliged to cut their letters short by full one half; besides contracting our own editorial space more than in duty to our readers seems excusable.

Nevertheless (to change the metaphor) we make what show we can. As a manager, on the opening night of his new theatre, marshals his whole company before the audience, so we endeavor to present a goodly number of our contributors in this first issue: and, if the actors jostle one another, if each is cut down to a short part, appearing hardly long enough to make his bow, it is because the stage is narrow and the evening soon spent. When the auditorium too is crowded, we'll enlarge the stage.

Of our artistic faith, ideals, principles, our journalistic policy, etc., we cannot say much here; they are perhaps hinted with sufficient clearness in the Prospectus on another page. We think there will be no mistaking the spirit of the paper, or its high aim and honesty. Whatever its shortcomings, it will be found faithful to high and noble views of art; always striving to uphold a high artistic standard; to make the enduring master-works appreciated and cherished, that thus, informed and duly oriented, we may listen to new things intelligently, without danger of bewilderment and dissipation of all sound artistic sense. We want to make the ground so solid, and the atmosphere so wholesome, that one may gratify the curiosity for novelties, new schools, new forms, new styles and fashions, with no fear of losing his head, or of becoming a victim of that musical dyspepsia which afflicts so many amateurs and critics.

It may be that we have some hobbies, which we shall ride as opportunity or provocation comes. We shall continue, for one thing, to throw out suggestions tending toward what may be called a unitary organization of the concert management in each of our important musical centres; an understanding and arrangement whereby the best interpretation of the best in music may reside in guaranteed and permanent institutions, and not be left entirely to the competitive, conflicting interests of speculating showmen. We shall keep hinting and appealing to the public-spirited, wealthy would-be benefactors to the cause of art and culture, to make liberal endowment of such institutions, by placing money in the hands of fit societies or trustees, instead of building vast and showy halls and theatres, with vaguest notions of their uses. Mindful of one institution, out of which our journal sprang, — the Harvard Musical Association, — and of the simple germ from which that sprang, the little "Pierian" club in college, we shall still plead for the endowment and establishment of what would be a central and presiding institution among all the members of such an ideal organization of our musical opportunities and culture, to wit: a complete School or Conservatory of Music under the wing of Harvard (or any other) University, on an equal footing with the School of Medicine, or Law, or Natural History, having its seat both in Cambridge and in Boston, strong and permanent under the guaranty of that respectability, authority, disinterestedness, and broad, wise catholicity of view which goes with a university. Then, be the pupils many or few, the education will be sound and thorough, the influence inspiring and far-reaching, and there will be, what we now want in music, an authoritative standard.

And again, as naturally flowing out of this last thought (and echoing the brief but pregnant word of the friend who writes us in another column of a "new departure" in the sister art of Painting), we trust we shall make it appear that this turning over of a new leaf in our journalism comes just in time to herald and to help a corresponding "new departure" in the culture and the art of Music in America. The musical student also begins to recognize the importance of the "life school." The real, earnest music lovers are getting past the period of sentimental, superficial dilettantism. They set themselves to watch and study Nature in the works of genius; to learn how musical beauties and splendors and precious memories and meanings develop by natural law and process, through the sympathetic instinct and trained insight of the genial composer, out of musical seed-thoughts, themes, and motives. For soon they find that every so-called classical form and structure, the subtle shining web of imitative Counterpoint, the exhaustless Fugue, the thematic development of the Sonata, and all the established musical forms grew out of Nature's own "life-school," and are in very truth the organic life and principle of Music, the only musical manifestations which are not arbitrary and merely of the moment. Signs of this beginning are the musical courses recently established at Harvard under Professor Faine, and the appearance in a literary periodical of such articles as that by Mr. Apthorp, in the Atlantic, on "Additional Accompaniments to the Scores of Bach and Händel," most of which we copied at the time. At all events, Music is becoming a more earnest matter among its votaries in our country than it ever was before. It is beginning to be studied in a deeper sense; and to further this tendency, this movement, must be one main object with our journal.

CONCERTS.

In spite of the bad prospect in October, the ante-Christmas half of the musical season has kept attention busily occupied with frequent concerts, remarkable artists, and excellent performances of many first-class compositions. We have not been entirely deprived of orchestral delights, as there was danger that we might be; and it is no disadvantage on the whole that we have had to fall back on our own local resources.

The HARVARD MUSICAL ASSOCIATION, by the time this is printed, will have given two Symphony Concerts of its fourteenth season. The first, on Thursday, December 5th, though not so well attended as one might expect of Boston, made a decided mark, delighting the audience and holding all in their seats to the last chord of a two hours' performance of a programme purely classical, and winning the approbation of all the critics, as we have already shown in our last number. That experience proved that a programme may be made up wholly from the so-called solid works of the great classical masters, and be thoroughly enjoyed by a whole audience.

The interpretation, too, was worthy of the programme. Knowing all behind the curtain, from the beginning of the brief and hurried preparation, we had hardly dared to expect so much. Yet so well did the orchestra (of forty-four men, with Mr. C. N. ALLEN at the head of the violins) play, in such true intonation (even the oboes always in tune), with such precision and well blended coloring, such good light and shade, and such spirit, — almost one might say enthusiasm, — that many spoke of it as a miraculous transformation, the dawn of a new era, and gave credit for a most unusual amount of time and care spent in rehearsal. The fact is that hardly ever, in the whole history of these concerts, had the musicians rehearsed so little. How account for the encouraging surprise? Was it that, in the withdrawal of an exceptionally perfect, and in fact virtuoso orchestra for comparison, and of the distracting influence of all the startling, brilliant novelties that orchestra continually set before us, the criterion now reverted to the calm, true court of appeal in the hearer's own mind and sincere impression, so that we took things naturally, and judged them by the "inner light," not brow-beaten by comparison, not dragged off our centre by surrounding excitement? In other words, does not perhaps this freedom from outside "attractions" that distract, this quiet being left alone, for once, to listen to our music in more peace and leisure, help us to see and feel it as it is intrinsically, and find great joy in it, without being over-sensitive to real or fancied imperfections in the rendering? We do believe there is something in this, but certainly not all. Our musicians did play remarkably well. And we fancy one secret of it was that these are hard times for musicians; they find not so much promiscuous employment as in past years; they have time upon their hands, and they have enough of the artist feeling in them to try to improve it artistically, and use the unpaid hours in making for themselves artistic character against the better times when good engagements will flow in. Hence they played the symphony not like hack Musikanten, fagged out with theatres and balls all night, but as lovers of good music, having now a chance to give their whole soul to it, as well as automatic breath and hands. Such are the precious uses, sometimes, of adversity! And we believe the same privation sharpened the sense and predisposed the sympathetic recognition of the audience. All was in good earnest; the artists played well, and the people listened well, — not as in the spoiled and pampered times when all were running after new sensations.

We can cast back but a glance upon the details of that concert. It opened with an effective rendering of Mendelssohn's noble overture to St. Paul, never so appreciable in the bustle of a gathering oratorio crowd. By some strange oversight, however, the organ was left out. How many thought of it? Then came Mr. SHERWOOD's masterly performance of the great E-flat concerto of Beethoven, — the "Emperor" concerto as the English call it, — being in truth the greatest ever written. We cannot say we ever heard this glorious work more satisfactorily presented on the part of the pianist. With perfect certainty of technique, musical, clear touch, graduated to all degrees of power or fineness, and firm, sustained, symmetrical unfolding of all the grandeur and the beauty of the work, and a thoroughly intellectual well thought out and well felt conception of his task, he brought it home to every listener, and it was impossible not to listen. Spohr's Jessonda overture came next, and that, too, was relished.

Part II. opened with Bach's great organ fantasia and fugue in G minor, transcribed by Liszt, which Mr. Sherwood played with great power and distinctness. Then, since the E-flat concerto is equal to a great Beethoven symphony, a short, light, charming symphony by Haydn was selected for this time,—one never heard here but once before, composed by Haydn on receiving the honorary degree of Doctor of Music at Oxford. Light, playful, airy, as are most of its themes, yet it is a gem of masterly musicianship; by the subtle art of thematic development and the fine instinct of instrumentation, every theme is worked up into a thing of wondrous beauty. Just such a sample of his art as Haydn cared to lay before the Oxford Dons! Rossini knew how good it was; in the second subject of the allegro you see where he found and used (unconsciously, no doubt) one of the melodic ideas in Il Barbiere! Schubert's Heiter-Marsch, transcribed for orchestra, by Liszt, made a spirited conclusion to a noble concert. Mr. CARL ZEKRAHN is to be heartily congratulated on the fine results his baton has elicited from a band so newly brought together.

WILHELMJ returned to us, with that remarkable coloratur singer, Mlle. DI MURSKA, for three concerts in the Music Hall, December 4th, 6th, and 7th. They were largely attended, and offered much that was excellent. In the first, Wilhelmj played the first movement of Beethoven's greatest of all violin concertos, in D, and played it with supreme, consummate mastery. It would have been better with a larger and more trained orchestra, yet the accompaniment was not bad. He gave Ernst's fantasia on the Desdemona romanza and aria (the song of "Willow") in Otello, and some of his fine encore pieces. Mlle. DI MURSKA, though her middle tones are worn and harsh, and she lacks sustained tone for cantabile, displayed a marvelous perfection of florid execution in "Una voce," etc., and in some bravura variations by Proch. Her very highest notes are liquid purity and sweetness free from all alloy, and revel with all ease in ornamental passages.

On the second evening, Wilhelmj's pièce de résistance was a concerto, composed for him by Raff,—a strange, unsatisfactory production in itself, which hardly seemed a concerto after those greatest ones we had just been hearing of Beethoven. It consisted of a long, slow, vague, sentimental movement, in which we felt no progress, but a sort of spell-bound, nightmare state of mind, followed by a quick movement mainly made up of a march. The march was a relief after the nightmare, but Raff is always marching. There are immense difficulties in it for the principal instrument, but Wilhelmj carried all before him with all ease. On Saturday he played the adagio and allegro of the Mendelssohn concerto wonderfully well, except that there was some moody humoring of tempo in the first part. But the memorable thing in that concert was the adagio and variations from the rare old "Kreutzer Sonata," which he and Mme. TERESA CARAKNO at the piano played as if possessed with one spirit, both moved by a higher power invisible. It was one of those inspired moments which now and then occur to relieve the tedium of too many concerts. The beautiful pianist, whose face and movements had until then worn an expression of impatience and almost disgust at being repeatedly recalled after flashy virtuoso pieces (Gottschalk, etc.), now evidently felt at home and happy in good music; her cooperation was perfect, and her face grew poetic and inspired. Why cannot an artist always have artistic tasks to do? Sig. TAGLIAPIETRA, one of the most artistic and refined of baritones, made a very fine impression by his singing of a beautiful romanza of Wilhelmj's composition, as well as by several songs by Gounod and others in two concerts. Mme. DI MURSKA again and again displayed her finished, facile art in Benedict's variations on the "Carnival of Venice," Meyerbeer's "Shadow Song," and the aria from Linda, besides "Robert, toi que j'aime."

The little improvised orchestra, under CARL ZEKRAHN, played the Prometheus overture of Beethoven, and Mendelssohn's to Das Heimkehr, in a manner quite refreshing.

MR. EICHBERG'S VIOLIN CLASSES.—The exhibition of the Boston Conservatory of Music at Tremont Temple, on Saturday, Dec. 14, was most attractive and significant. Half a dozen of the pupils were young ladies, some of them mere girls, and there were three young men. They played difficult solos, concertos, Hungarian airs, fantasias,—such pieces as we have been hearing from Wilhelmj and Remenyi,—and they played quartets. A very young girl, Miss Edith Christie, of delicate, poetic appearance, stood forth and performed the first concerto of De Beriot with great purity of intonation, clear phrasing, and good accent, excellent bowing and expression. The violin seemed to belong to her and she to it. Another of the youngest, Miss Lillian Chandler, led in a smooth, effective rendering of the theme and variations from Beethoven's fifth quartet, being ably supported by Miss Lettie Launder, second violin, Miss Abbie Shepardson, viola, and Miss Lillian Shattuck, cello. The fair cellist also figured as violinist, and to good advantage. In Beethoven's romanza in F, in a beautiful nocturne for four violins by Julius Eichberg, with the same three associates; and these four performed in unison the adagio from Mendelssohn's concerto; the unison was perfect, the technical rendering and expression really artistic. The solo performances by Miss Launder and Miss Shepardson showed natural aptitude, with the thorough training of several years.

It all tended to confirm us in the opinion we have long held, that the violin is a true instrument for woman. Her fine sense of touch, her quick and delicate perception, and the natural grace with which she can handle the bow, give her advantages for such a practice. She looks well in the action and the attitude. But all this we expressed more fully a year since, when Mr. Eichberg produced a much larger number of young girls in a similar exhibition. This time it was confined to some of the more advanced and gifted pupils.

We must not forget to mention the solid proofs afforded also by the young men of satisfactory progress, and indeed real mastery in the handling of this most difficult of instruments. Mr. Albert van Raalte, one of the older graduates of this school, is an artist; his performance of Ernst's Otello fantasia did not sound badly after the two great virtuosos we have lately had here. And Mr. Willis Nowell played the Hungarian airs by Ernst in true, sound, manly fashion. Perhaps the most remarkable thing about the whole exhibition was the playing in good tune, almost without exception. Great good must come from such a school. Imagine the delights and the refining influence in homes where sisters and brothers, or neighbors of like training, can play a string quartet together in the evening! And think, too, how surely this will give us fresh material for our orchestra and chamber concerts!

MUSICAL CORRESPONDENCE.

NEW YORK, DEC. 12.—The programme of the first concert of the Philharmonic Society, Nov. 30, was as follows:—Symphony, No. 2, in D Brahms. Concerto Pathétique Ernst.

HERR E. REMENYI.
Aria, from "Il Giuramento" Mercadante.
Sig. A. GALASSI.

Overture, "Leonora," No. 3 Beethoven.
(a.) Nocturne, E flat | Chopin.
(b.) Mazourka, B flat | Chopin.

HERR E. REMENYI.
Romanza, from Tannhäuser Wagner.
Sig. A. GALASSI.

Symphonic Poem: "Die Hunnenschlacht" Liszt.
The second symphony of Brahms is graceful and pleasing, but in no sense a great work. "The Battle of the Huns" was performed here years ago under the direction of Thomas. Herr Remenyi gained much applause by his performance of the "Concerto Pathétique," a work which fairly bristles with technical difficulties.

The second concert of the New York Symphony Society took place at Steinway Hall, Dec. 7, with the following programme:—Symphony in G, No. 13 Haydn. Pianoforte Concerto, E flat, No. 8 Beethoven.

M. MAX PINKER.
Overture, "King Lear" Berlioz.
Norwegian Melody, for string orchestra Sæviolen.
Allegro, for string orchestra and two hautboys Hindel.
Kammarakaja Glinka.
Overture, "Fingal's Cave" Mendelssohn.

I reserve an account of the work of this orchestra under Dr. Hamroch, and a comparative estimate of its merits with those of the Philharmonic orchestra under Mr. Neudorff, and the ci-devant Thomas orchestra under Mr. G. Carlberg.

The season of Italian Opera at the Academy of Music has been fairly successful. Colonel Mapleson has, to begin with, a well-drilled chorus (something which his predecessors have always managed to get along without), and an orchestral leader par excellence, Signor Arditi.

The repertoire thus far has not been remarkable, consisting mostly of such works as Il Trucatore, La Samrambula, Rigoleto, Faust, the ever-welcome Nozze di Figaro, etc. The only departure from the beaten track is the representation of Bizet's opera, Carmen, and Il Talismano, the posthumous work of Balfe.

It has been said that there can be nothing harmful or impure in music, except by the association of words. Be this as it may, there is certainly music that in itself is insufferably vulgar. Of this kind is the music of Carmen.

Il Talismano is not entirely a novelty. It was brought out here four years ago by Miss Kellogg and her English opera troupe. This season it is given in Italian for the first time in New York.

The "Talisman" contains not a single idea of any true significance or value. The music reminds one of Thoreau's description of modern society, where people "feebly fabulate and paddle about in the social slush." The work contains a number of pretty airs of the ballad order. So does Arthur Sullivan's new burlesque, "H. M. S. Pinafore," which the composer has not dignified by the name of opera, although it has real musical value, while Il Talismano has none. The opera was well presented and was listened to by a large and (of course) delighted audience.

I am glad to say that the singing was generally good, except that the singers were not in their best voice, owing to the bad weather. Mme. Gerster is in no sense a great singer; but her voice is excellent and cultivated to the highest extent. She is certainly an artist who charms both by her singing and her acting.

Mme. Sinico has a hard and not altogether agreeable voice, but makes the best of it. Signor Campanini is well known to be the best tenor who has appeared here for many years. His voice is of peculiar timbre, and particularly beautiful in cantabile passages. His stage manner is awkward: he is no actor, but one quite forgets this defect in admiration of his singing. Sig. Del Puente is also well known to the opera-going public, with whom he is deservedly a favorite.

Sig. Galassi has a fine voice and sings in good style. Mme. Gerster and Sig. Campanini gained a double encore in the duet, "Oh va! La mia preghiera."

On Saturday evening, Dec. 14, the Brooklyn Philharmonic Society will give the first concert of the season. Theodore Thomas will come from Cincinnati to conduct the orchestra. A. A. C.

PHILADELPHIA, DEC. 13, 1878.—Just now the musical elements are in a condition of blissful repose with us, as is generally the case immediately preceding the Christmas holidays. So our attention will be directed towards the music of the future, that is, of the immediate future. The rehearsals and preparations are being conducted with energy, and there is a prospect of a good time coming. The Cecilia is rehearsing the healthy music of good old Father Haydn, and the charming melodies of the Crantion are daily growing more familiar to this fine choral body; but no date is yet fixed for the performance, as, in the judgment of the excellent president, the oratorio should not be produced prematurely. A chorus formed of Madame E. Seiler's pupils is studying Dr. Loewe's oratorio of the Seven Sleepers. No announcement of date has yet been made.

The Stoll and Barli Soirées will be continued monthly in the Natatorium Hall. Mr. Jarvis's superior Chamber Concerts will be given in the same hall at more frequent intervals, and his future programmes look very inviting. The Philharmonic Club, assisted by Mme. Montago, a young soprano of great promise, has taken the pretty little theatre known as North Broad, for a series of matinees, and Colonel Mapleson has been negotiating with the directors of the Academy of Music for a series of operas with his fine company now performing in New York, but with what success we are not informed.

Mr. F. T. S. Darley, the composer of "Malchus," has held the position of organist and choir-master in the Church of the Holy Trinity for nine years past, and had under him the finest chorus choir in our city, which sang music of a superior character in the very best style. His labors in the interest of church music have not been appreciated, and he has met the fate of all reformers. His resignation left the situation open, and Mr. M. H. Cross has been appointed his successor. If he obtains as good results as his predecessor he will be entitled to all praise, but it will be done only by dint of earnest and persistent labor. Mr. Cross occupies the organ bench on the first of the year. Great regrets are expressed that Mr. Darley's excellent work of nine long years will go for naught: more's the pity, for church music, with one or two exceptions, is at a discount with us, and the new Methodist Hymnal, by the aid of Moody and Sankey, is doing yeoman's work in its degradation and destruction. The first number of the new old JOURNAL is looked for with much interest, and its editor is greeted with a "Happy New Year" from AMERICUS.

BALTIMORE, DEC. 12, 1878. — Verily, our musical public would puzzle a Philadelphia lawyer. Remyeny was not expected to accomplish what Wilhelmj had done, and in this he did not disappoint us; but, as an artist making his first appearance here, he certainly deserved a fair hearing. The small attendance is the more surprising because his selections and style of playing are calculated to please a mixed audience, and because his support was superior to that accompanying Wilhelmj.

First, Remyeny played the Otello fantasia by Ernst, evidently to solicit comparison with Wilhelmj's performance of the same piece. If so, it was a most unfortunate selection. The other violin solos were three by Chopin: a nocturne, Hungarian melodies, and the beautiful mazurka, Op. 7, No. 1. The last two of these (both transcribed by Remyeny) were best suited to his style, and in them he appeared to decided advantage. The programme closed with Paganini's capriccios, Nos. 21 and 24.

This class of music was about what I expected to hear, but I was not prepared for the "Suwanee River," and, oh, horror of horrors! must it be told? "Grandfather's Clock," which were thrown in by way of good measure after the Chopin mazurka. The audience applauded uproariously, probably in the hope of hearing "Whoa, Emma," with original Hungarian variations.

Remyeny has, by his selections, courted comparison with Wilhelmj, but if the latter has any fear of being deprived of his laurels by the Hungarian virtuoso, he has but to hear his performance of the Otello fantasia to dispel any such fears. The unerring precision in runs in octaves, thirds, etc., chromatic scales, the fingétolet, and above all, the massive power, the masculine force, of the German violinist, — where are they? Remyeny's striking characteristics are pathetic interpretation of melody calculated to arouse tender emotions and verging on the sentimental, and subtle delicacy in the use of the bow. He is a virtuoso, but only a virtuoso, and it would be just as ridiculous to elevate him on a par with the solid German musician as it is to call him the "Liszt of the violin."

The support was much above the average, with the exception of Mr. Courtney, who made a deplorable mess of Beethoven's "Adelaide." Mr. Courtney was evidently suffering from a cold, which seems determined not to leave him, for he is reported as having been troubled with it continually while in New York.

Miss Helen Ames has a pure, sweet voice, not strong, but possessing a clear ring, and giving evidence of substantial training.

Signor Enrico Campobello sang very acceptably an air from Handel, and the "Village Blacksmith." His name looks very Italian on the programme, but the singer looks very Scotch on the stage.

Mr. Dulcken accompanied well, except that he tried to impress too much on the audience the importance of the accompaniment, and inserted in a well-filled programme a trashy "Valse de Concert" of his own composition, which it would have been more becoming in him to have left out, for more reasons than one. MUSIKUS.

CHICAGO, DEC. 10, 1878. — Last week was the most favored one of fine vocal performances for several years. On Monday evening we had the Marie-Rose concert troupe. This, they say, was well attended.

On Tuesday came the opening concert, for the season, of the BRETHOVEN SOCIETY. The programme was very good indeed. It embraced Mendelssohn's "First Walpurgis Night," Rubinstein's Night alto solo and chorus, Gade's "Spring Message," and selections from Tannhäuser, consisting of the overture, Wolfram's "Evening Star" air, two duets, and a trio. The chorus consisted of about 150 singers, who sang with good volume of tone. The orchestra was of forty pieces, also of good body of tone and not obstreperous. The solos in the "Walpurgis Night" were taken by Mrs. Watrous, who has a large contralto voice and a good delivery of the text, but a rather monotonous style of singing; Mr. Chas. Knox, who, in spite of fatigue, succeeded very nicely with his part, and Mr. Juan Moranski, who has a very heavy and solid but rather unelastic bass voice.

This interesting work was given with good spirit and in an enjoyable way. The chorus is well balanced, the tenors and basses showing a marked improvement over last year. The attack is very good. Shading was manifested to a certain degree. But it must be confessed that in spite of the efforts of the enthusiastic conductor, Mr. Carl Wolfsohn, the phrasing is decidedly slovenly, and the performance as a whole too unelastic. This is the more to be regretted because the present fault is alike trying to the singers and the hearers.

Nor can I omit the opportunity to comment on the orchestra, which, though showing an improvement over former efforts, is still too monotonous and unsympathetic.

The Rubinstein Night solo was taken by Miss Ella White, one of our very best singers and most indefatigable lovers of music. Her voice is not large, but of compact and remarkably good carrying quality, in spite of which she was too much accompanied, so that her excellent delivery of her text was covered up and to a great degree lost. On the whole I think the Gade "Spring Message" the best chorus singing of this concert. The overture to Tannhäuser was played in good honest style, and I must say I think it a masterpiece always worth hearing. That "Pilgrim Chorus" is a grand and massive melody, which goes far to make me a Wagnerite, besides which I always enjoy hearing a less finished orchestral performance; one can follow the different instruments so much better. The vocal selections were also well received, the best being unquestionably Mr. John McWade's "Evening Star" aria. The part of "Elizabeth" was taken by Miss Hannah McCarthy, who has a very large and agreeable soprano voice. Her singing was a succès d'estime, the good voice compensating for the extremely cavalier manner in which she treated the words of the part (if indeed she sang any words at all, of which I am not sure).

THE APOLLO SOCIETY comes out this year with a mixed chorus of about the same size as the former. The music this time consisted of Handel's "Acis and Galatea," given after the original score (it having been found impossible to get the Mozart parts in time), and half of Mendelssohn's "St. Paul."

The Handel solos were given by Miss Fanny Kellogg, Dr. C. T. Barnes (tenor), and Mr. Myron W. Whitney. Those in "St. Paul" by Miss Kellogg, Miss Abby Clark, Mr. Fessenden, and Mr. Whitney. Having named the solo artists, I perhaps need say no more, for from your acquaintance with most of them you will at once know how well they must have done them.

This was the first time I had heard Miss Fanny Kellogg, and her singing was a genuine and most delightful surprise to me. It was not alone the flexible and agreeable voice, the pleasant method and the refinement of her phrasing; but the union of these with so much intelligence. And so I am pleased to record how perfectly and most satisfactorily she sang (for there is a kind of inspired perfection, such as Theodore Thomas sometimes gets, and Tomlin is sometimes guilty of).

Dr. Barnes is a native, and it was an unexpected pleasure to find him capable of the work he did in the part of "Acis." His voice is light, and like all those light tenors prone to the nasal. But I did not observe this peculiarity the other evening. Whitney was glorious, as he always is.

The orchestra was another most agreeable surprise to me. For, wonderful to relate, Mr. Tomlin proved equal to this demand also, so that they played with a most delightful subjection to the voices, and with refined and sympathetic expression. This was the case throughout, but especially and altogether unusually so in the recitatives, which were accompanied in the most exquisite manner. I have never heard so fine phrasing from a Chicago orchestra, and did not believe them capable of it, though "The Chicago Orchestra" under Mr. Rosenbecker's direction shows a marked improvement.

The chorus singing was the best we have ever had. I have never heard a chorus of the size sing with such delicacy and precision, such elasticity, such easy and natural shading, and with plenty of power, rising at the close of the "St. Paul" selection, at the words "Oh, great is the depth," to a climax so impressive as to set the audience wild with enthusiasm.

The Whitney combination is doing fine work throughout the West, and, I hear, doing well in pocket. And this I am glad of, for it deserves to succeed when such singers as Whitney, Miss Kellogg, and Fessenden and Miss Clark can be heard in small places in Wisconsin, Iowa, Illinois, and the rest. . . .

. . . I find that musical people generally look with interest at your new departure, — for which we wait.

DER FREYSCHUETZ.

NEWPORT, R. I. DEC. 6, 1878. — Last night the Newport Choral Society gave its fourth concert at the Opera House, having been engaged for the occasion by the Lecture Association. The programme was judiciously selected by the committee of the Choral Society, and was well received by an audience which has hitherto had but little opportunity of hearing classical music.

The opening cantata for chorus, "Spring's Message," by Gade, was charmingly rendered; the lights and shades being well brought out. The burst of religious fervor towards the end was given with a vigor and force which was by no means studied or conventional, but showed a natural abandon, quite remarkable in so young a society.

In Mendelssohn's beautiful motet, "Hear my prayer," the chorus did their part delightfully, singing with true feeling, and managing the pianissimo passages with great skill. The Finland Song, by Henry Hiles, was well rendered, although lacking a little of the usual vigor. Schumann's "Gypsy Life" was, on the whole, good; the only fault being a slight want of unity in the ritardando parts. Beethoven's cantata of two movements: (1) "Becalmed at Sea," (2) "Prosperous Voyage," was open to criticism in two respects; the last movement was too hurried both by accompaniment and chorus. Mr. Sharland's baton seemed powerless to get them into order; and they continued their reckless career to the end. Then, too, there was a need of more soprano. The male voices overbalanced the female element; and in the high notes, especially, the lack of high soprano voices was felt.

The solo singing I will not dwell on at length, as the choral work is what I particularly wish brought into notice; only saying that it was all warmly appreciated by the audience, as it deserved to be. The two gentlemen, Mr. Seabury and Mr. West, made their appearance in public for the first time last evening, and astonished all with their fine voices and great promise. When we consider that it is but two years since this society was organized, and that it is the first attempt at anything like a higher order of music here, we must regard the progress made in that time as really remarkable. The members have shown an ability and readiness to learn most praiseworthy; and what is even more to the purpose, an earnest persistency in carrying out the instructions of their excellent leader, Mr. J. B. SHARLAND, of Boston. His patient perseverance, his good sense and wonderful tact, his thorough training, added to very remarkable musical instincts, combine to make him one of the most efficient choral leaders, not only in America (indeed many who have had much experience abroad think he has few superiors in Europe) for that kind of work. Having had so propitious a beginning, we trust that the Newport Choral Society may continue to flourish and expand under its admirable director. E.

PARIS, NOV. 28, 1878. — Parisians ought never to complain of a lack of good music, for certainly we have been favored the last week with two fine orchestral concerts and any quantity of operas; although among the latter there was not much to boast about. At the Padeloup Sunday Popular Concert (a fine institution, and one that ought to be introduced in the United States) we had a purely classical programme with a few exceptions. The "Surprise" symphony of Haydn was exquisitely rendered; as the main defect in M. Padeloup's orchestra was not so palpable, namely, the brass and drums. But a greater contrast could not be imagined to Haydn than the second number played. It was printed thus: "Les Erinyes, musique pour une pièce antique," by J. Massenet. If my memory serves me aright, this Drama Symphony or Symphonique Drama has never been heard in America, and, by the shades of Mozart, may it never be! It opened with a movement called on the programme entr'acte, a very sweet air but repeated ad nauseam. A lively but remarkably eccentric dance followed; then a dirge, expressive of a Trojan woman weeping over her country. This is all for clarinet and 'cello, and in its instrumentation reminds one of the worst side of Berlioz; I mean the theatrical and sensational. Of course it was applauded to the skies, as it just suits the taste of the Parisian public, who will have novelty or die. A "drame des Saturnales" closed the suite. The composer, Massenet, is of the school of Berlioz and St. Saëns, but lacks the spontaneity of the former and the occasional happy touches of the latter.

The old familiar "Scotch Symphony" was given next. It was very well played, except that the delicacy of the scherzo was marred by the drums, — a serious defect. Mr. Theodore Ritter, the well-known pianist, who is very popular here, played the sonata of Beethoven, Op. 111, in C-minor. Mr. Ritter's technique is enormous; but somehow he does n't touch you. He had a very metallic-toned piano to play on, and the consequence was there was too much bang in the introduction. However, the variations were given as near perfection as possible. One would naturally suppose that such a late work of Beethoven's would not be popular; but it appeared to be just the reverse. The concert closed with the well-known Marche Turque of Mozart.

On Sunday afternoon also was given, at the Concert du Chatelet, Berlioz's Damnation de Faust with a large chorus and orchestra, under the direction of M. Ed. Colonne. This was the eighteenth and last representation. Next week we are to have the Drama-Oratoire that took the prize at the concours of the city of Paris. It is called Le Paradis Perdu. The music is by Theo. Dubois. On the 22d of this month, St. Cecilia's Day, a great day here among the musicians, a new mass by Charles Gounod was sung at the Church of St. Eustache. It was largely attended, and the mass was a perfect success. The morning's performance closed with a grand Marche Religieuse, by the same composer, with the principal solos for the harp. The operas are almost numberless: Polyeucte, Grand Duchesse, a new opera by Lecocq, Camargo, and Les Amants de Verone by Marquis d'Ivry, — a very large mixture to swallow, but which I have not yet attempted. So you see the week has not been a bad one in a musical sense. J. H.

BOSTON, JANUARY 18, 1879.

CONTENTS.

TO APOLLO. Translation from Horace. C. P. Cranch . . .	9
GEORGE SAND AND FRÉDÉRIC CHOPIN. A Study. Fanny Raymond Ritter . . .	9
THE PROGRESS OF MUSIC IN THE WEST. C. H. Brittan . . .	10
DAYS IN NORMANDY. Julia Ward Howe . . .	11
BOOK NOTICES . . .	12
Mother-Play and Nursery Songs. . .
LIVE SCHOOLS — AND MORE . . .	13
EDITORIAL: ITALIAN OPERA . . .	13
CONCERT RECORD . . .	14
The Christmas Orations of the Handel and Haydn Society. — The Symphony Concerts of the Harvard Musical Association. — G. W. Sumner's Concert. . .
MUSICAL CORRESPONDENCE . . .	14
New York. — Baltimore. — Milwaukee. . .

Published fortnightly by HOUGHTON, OSGOOD AND COMPANY, 220 Devonshire Street, Boston. Price, 10 cents a number; $2.50 per year.

All the articles not credited to other publications were expressly written for this Journal.

TO APOLLO.

TRANSLATION FROM HORACE, BY C. P. CRANCH.

FROM great Apollo's dedicated shrine
What seeks the bard to gain,
While pouring out new sacrificial wine?
Not rich Sardinian grain;
Not the sleek herds that hot Calabria yields;
Not gold, nor Indian ivory, nor fields
By Liris' silent waters washed away.
Let those to whom their fortune gives the vines
Their careful pruning-books upon them lay.
Let the rich merchant quaff his wines —
By Syrian traffic bought — from cups of gold.
Dear to the gods is he.
Four times a year, forsooth, he must behold —
And nothing lost to him — the Atlantic Sea.
For me, plain olives are my food,
And mallows soft, and chicorey.
O thou, Latona's son, grant I may be
With health and strength endued;
With a sound mind enjoying what I own.
No base old age in me be ever known;
Nor let me lack my lyre or poet's mood.

GEORGE SAND AND FRÉDÉRIC CHOPIN.

A STUDY.

BY FANNY RAYMOND RITTER.

(Continued from page 8.)

NERVOUS prostration, hallucinations, the loss of dear friends by death, the exhaustion of too severe artistic labor, combined with the late hours of Parisian society to break up Chopin's health entirely. Madame Sand vainly endeavored, by persuasion and country excursions, to tear Chopin from his piano and the over-exertion of composition. She says: "I did not dare to persist. Chopin, angry, was terrible; and as he always restrained himself with me, he seemed, at such times, to be on the point of suffocation and death. My life, active and successful on the surface, had become inwardly more painful than ever. I began to despair of ever being able to bestow on others the happiness I had long ago renounced for myself, for I had many reasons for profound sadness. Chopin's friendship had never been a support or a refuge for me; my son Maurice was my real source of strength, for he was now old enough to understand the serious interests of life, while he sustained me by his precocious intelligence, equable disposition, and unalterable cheerfulness." Chopin appears always to have taken pains to retain the affection of Madame Sand, but he was not so careful with the other members of her family; quarrels, recriminations, misunderstandings, ensued, until the situation became insupportable, and Maurice declared to his mother that, unless she requested Chopin to find another place of residence, he would leave the house himself. The mother, a woman, too, always the slave of children, as well as their idol, to her last hour, was not likely long to hesitate; and, after eight years of daily intercourse, a sudden and decisive break took place between the friends, who then parted, — meeting but once again, at an evening party a year after, when only one word was spoken between them, the name "Frédéric!" from the lips of George Sand. The blame of this rupture has been almost universally given to George Sand, especially as Chopin died two years after it, and people thought she might have supported the harassing presence of her "customary invalid" for so short a period longer, — as if she could have foreseen what was to ensue. The reasons and causes that brought about the parting of George Sand and Chopin have been variously stated by friends and foes. Among the foes of George Sand it is difficult to avoid classing M. Karasowski, whose estimate of her character and actions is, throughout his book, narrow, prejudiced, yet often sentimentally weak. M. Karasowski, who, in placing Madame Sand's conduct in the worst light, scarcely shows himself an enlightened friend of the artist who so wholly adored her, tells us that Chopin only desired to marry her "in his youth," — yet their entire acquaintance merely extended over a period of a little more than ten years; that she "poisoned his whole life;" and deplores the fact that this infatuation prevented Chopin from entering into some happy marriage that would have brightened his life and greatly augmented his artistic success. He forgets that twice before Chopin's acquaintance with Madame Sand his projects of marriage came to naught, though without any fault on his side; and that during his residence in her house he failed to carry out a matrimonial alliance, because, when visiting the lady, she offered a chair to a more famous man before asking Chopin to take one; and that although, with an artist's natural susceptibility to beauty and elegance, he would sometimes return from an evening party enthusiastically in love with three graces at once, he had the next day forgotten them all in his absorbed devotion to the genius, and reposeful, sympathetic qualities of the woman whose friendship and almost maternal care were bestowed on him. In vain, after their parting, he attempted to forget one who had filled his existence for ten years with dreams of happiness; during the visit he made to England in the following year, he took little pleasure in the brilliant reception accorded to him at the English court, or by the public at the few concerts he gave. His health suffered from the climate; the state of his mind was betrayed by many expressions in his letters to his friends: "If I begin to complain, I shall never end, and all is in the same key. I am wearied to death, though the people here almost kill me with their kindness. I am disgusted with life; nothing touches me any more; I only wait for the end." On his return to Paris, his health gave way entirely. The details of his last days on earth, the sufferings he endured with so much resignation and piety, seeming rather to long for than to fear death, are related by Karakowski with much pathos.

The Rev. Mr. Haweis,¹ in speaking of Madame Sand's "deliberate refusal" to marry Chopin, treats the whole subject from the merely sentimental and superficial point of view commonly accepted. Lenz is one of Madame Sand's most severe judges.² He laments the web into which Chopin had fallen, "to which a spider was not wanting." Should we not describe the situation more truthfully, if we were to deplore the entanglement of two butterflies in a net; if we entitled that the web of circumstance, and the spider Destiny, or shall we say mortal fallibility? But indeed Herr Lenz must have found it difficult to forgive Madame Sand, when, after he had played — no doubt, finely — to her, "she did not say one word;" and Chopin showed himself once very deficient in his usual delicate tact, when he told Lenz that all contemporary writers ought to lay down their pens, and leave the whole field in possession of the incomparable George Sand! It is quite true, as Karasowski observes, that George Sand was not found among the friends and relations who attempted to soften Chopin's sufferings during his last hours; but be it remembered that Chopin "did not request to see any one at all;" he was too proud and reticent in character, and just then, no doubt, too hopeless and discouraged to ask for the presence of the woman he perhaps most desired to see. Had he not declared that "his whole life was contained in one episode," and that after it had closed he "merely vegetated"? The bitter things he said of her after their parting were but natural from a man who had passed through such a disappointment, and possess little weight as evidence against her; they must be accepted with reservation, as the expressions of the deepest, most sensitive, but morbid feeling on the part of one who, as Liszt says, "refused to be comforted, while all attempts to fix his attention on other subjects were vain." Vainly, alas, has an acute French critic advised men to be more chary with their hatred, which is, he says, "a poison more precious than that of the Borgias, for it is compounded of our blood, our health, our sleep, and — two thirds of our love"!

The commonly received reason of the parting of Chopin and Madame Dudevant is that she, in order to force him to leave her house, depicted him in her novel "Lucrezia Floriani" as Prince Karol, a jealous, tiresome, transcendental invalid; threw the proof-sheets in his way, and instructed the children to inform him that "Mamma intended Prince Karol for M. Chopin." But, as Ehlert says,³ "I cannot judge whether Karasowski's information be correct, or derived from authentic sources, but I doubt it. No woman acts thus, not even one whose patience has been completely wearied out." More than twenty years ago, Madame Sand found it necessary to deny this report, as well as partially to refute the charge that she had kept Chopin dangling on for her own entertainment, the most devoted of her slaves, until she was tired of him, and dismissed him broken-hearted. The following remarks occur in this passage of her autobiography, illustrative of the character of Chopin as displayed in his intercourse with her: "The depth of Chopin's emotion was always disproportioned to its cause. A slight grief, some awkwardness in a person to whom he was indifferent, the small contrarieties of real life, affected him for days, for weeks; while he heroically supported the great dangers and sufferings of his deplorable health, he was miserably vexed by its insignificant variations. But such is the history, the destiny, of all persons in whom the nervous system is developed to excess. . . . Long life was impossible to one of such an extreme artistic type. He was consumed by a dream of the ideal, unbalanced by mundane charity or philanthropic toleration. He never would make terms with human nature. He accepted nothing of reality. In this lay his vice and his virtue, his grandeur and misery. . . . Chopin was an epitome of those magnificent inconsistencies that must possess their individual logic, since Heaven pleases to create them. . . . I accepted all this, and, differing from him in ideas outside of art, in political opinions and judgment of passing events, I did not attempt any modification of his character, but respected its individuality as I did that of Delacroix and many other friends, whose paths differed from my own. On his side, Chopin accorded to me, nay, I will say honored me with, a friendship of a nature so entire that it made an exception in his whole life. He was always the same to me. He must have understood me thoroughly, without illusion, as I never descended in his estimation. A stranger to my studies and researches, and consequently to my convictions, bigotedly attached as he was to the Catholic dogma, he nevertheless always said of me, as did the gentle nun in my convent, Mother Alicia, in the last hours of her life: 'Pooh, pooh! I am sure she loves God!' But if, with me, he was all respect, deference, devotion, he did not abjure the asperities of his character towards those who surrounded me. With them he gave free vent to the inequalities of his character, by turns generous and fantastic, passing from infatuation to aversion, and vice versa. And yet he displayed little of his interior life, save in those masterpieces of art, in which he expressed it even then only vaguely, mysteriously; his lips never betrayed his deepest feelings, and his reserve was so great that I alone, for many years, was able to divine them, and, where I could, to mitigate them and retard their outbreak." In alluding to the current report that "Lucrezia Floriani" had been the cause of their parting, she explicitly contradicted it, as well as the statement that Chopin was depicted in Prince Karol. She says that he, always anxious to read her romances before any one else, also read the proof-sheets of this, and never dreamed of connecting their own characters or experience with it, until long after, when evil-disposed persons put the idea in his head, and when he had forgotten the book. In describing their separation, she says there was no recrimination between them. "We never addressed to each other a reproach save one, — alas! the first and the last. So elevated an attachment broke asunder, as was best; it was at least not worn away in ignoble quarrels." It seems to me, as to M. Fétis,¹ that amid what he calls "the gilded language of the greatest French writer of her day, the truth is evident," — far more so than in the comments upon this famous friendship, to be found in novels, biographical sketches, dictionaries, and encyclopædias, too many of them flip-pant, as well as incorrect. But, while accepting Madame Sand's denial of having intended to sketch the character of Chopin, especially with cruel intention, in "Lucrezia Floriani," — that story, so different from her own, one of the dullest of her novels, — we are at liberty to surmise that as certain types must have floated before her imagination, often involuntarily, when writing, since she wrote with the inspired speed of an improvisatrice, so her own character and that of Chopin may have stood before her mind's eye at this time, objectively, without her being aware of it. I am the more inclined to think so, since the epithets "expansive" and "exclusive," applied by her to Lucrezia and Karol, so exactly define her own large, sympathetic nature, and the intense and concentrated character of Chopin's genius.

¹ Music and Morals. By the Rev. H. R. HAWEIS, M. A. London and New York.

² Die grossen Pianoforte-Virtuosen unserer Zeit. VON W. VON LENZ. Berlin. 1873.

³ Aus der Tonwelt. Essays by LOUIS EHLERT. Berlin. 1877.

While attempting to describe with impartiality an episode in the lives of two famous artists, — one that is supposed to have exerted so much influence on many of their works, — let it not be thought that I am inspired by prejudice in favor of one, who is now almost universally regarded as perhaps the most illustrious example of feminine imaginative power, or by an equally illiberal prejudice against the other. For Chopin, who can feel anything but the deepest, the most tender admiration and pity? A disappointed patriot, the child of two nations, without a country or a home he could call his own, eternally consumed by the inward fire of genius, his wounded soul reacted on his body, his suffering body embittered his mind; the possibility of passing his life in the security of a tie hallowed by religion, under the happy influence of the sunlike nature that could have reduced all this discord to harmony, was denied to him; ever to have met Madame Sand was a terrible fatality for him, considering the circumstances that surrounded them; but since such was his destiny, he would not have been the profound, sensitive, fervid poet-nature that he was, if he could have met her without loving her, or lost her without a despair that sometimes led him almost to "curse the day he had met her."

It is difficult to arrive at conclusions uncolored by indulgent pity for both parties, after endeavoring to sift the truth from a mass of conflicting opinions, and the vituperation that was hurled at that "large-brained woman or large-hearted man" after Chopin's early death, and more recently since her own decease; and without the sincerest attempt to be just and unprejudiced, it is impossible to enter into the exceptional, abnormal character of one artist, or that of the other, so unique from hereditary descent and individual peculiarities, and therefore not to be measured by ordinary standards. Common justice towards George Sand, however, has been too often lost sight of by Chopin's admirers, especially by German writers on music, either from prejudice towards a Frenchwoman, or because the old-fashioned idea of regarding literary women as necessarily cold-hearted, selfish, hard, and self-asserting, seems to linger longer in Germany than in other countries.

Were I inclined to listen to the promptings of my own individual feelings alone, I should be anxious to yield all the merits in the case to Chopin, if only out of gratitude for the exhaustless, exquisite fountain of enjoyment unsealed to me in the works of this most original, profound, delicate, yet powerful of tone-poets. For me to pronounce which of the two artists in this question was the greater would be presumptuous; but I do not hesitate to declare that I have derived more continual, ever-renewed, stronger, finer, — if sometimes also painful — pleasure from the audition or in the performance of the works of Chopin, than from the perusal of those of George Sand. And this I confess, in spite of my keen appreciation of all her noble qualities, deep feeling for nature, and for all great art; in spite of her swing, verve, picturesqueness, and, above all, her style — a style so clear, limpid, richly-rolling, that I cannot recall any more perfect, in spite of its occasional exuberance, in the merely artistic qualities of style in itself, than that of our own De Quincey, that master magician in the command of splendid English prose, whose manner is nevertheless so different, that it presents rather an opposition than a pendant to that of George Sand.

(To be continued.)

THE PROGRESS OF MUSIC IN THE WEST.

BY C. H. BRITTAN.

It is now some ten years since the writer of this article, fresh from musical experiences in Boston, began his life in the West. Every indication of musical progress has been carefully noted from that time until the present hour. The great West has bent the full force of her energy to commercial and agricultural life. Yet the development of a love for art and music is being manifested in so marked a manner, and its aspect is so noticeable in the generous support that is given to all that is worthy of recognition, that at last we have reached a position which entitles us to respect and consideration. The condition of music in the West is one that is brighter than ever before. The organization of important musical societies and home orchestras gives evidence of a more extended interest. A better class of music is studied by these societies, and our programmes often bear the marked words, "for the first time in America," even of an important composition. When one considers the vast influence that flowed, year by year, from the Handel and Haydn Society in Boston, and realizes the benefit that has been derived from its example, by the formation of musical societies in many of the towns and cities in New England, he understands that a greater service was rendered to the cause of music than that which came from the mere development of local taste. At the close of the last season, the Handel and Haydn Society had given six hundred and ten public concerts, and an examination of the number of great works performed in the years of its existence indicates that a high motive prompted the organization to work for the pure, the grand, and the true in classic and modern music. Thus we realize that the concentrated efforts made in the cities indicate the general movement of taste and culture throughout the land.

¹ Biographie universelle des Musiciens. F. J. FÉTIS. Paris. 1861.

In three or four of the great cities of the West, we see efforts made in the same direction that was taken by Boston in the earlier years of its musical life. The growth may be more rapid, from the greater number of helps and influences that surround us; but we have every reason to believe it is no less real and positive. When I first came to the West and attempted to find some of Robert Franz's lovely songs, it was with much difficulty that I made the music clerk understand what I wanted. There was little market for the so-called classical music, and the general tone of musical taste was largely indicated by the trashy compositions that found the largest sale. Yet there were influences at work that soon developed a taste for the better class of musical works, and Schumann's, Schubert's, and Franz's songs got a vocal hearing. The musicians were aided in their work by music lovers, and everywhere the signs were brighter. Should our Eastern friends watch our programmes for a season, and note the works which our local societies are producing, in contrast with their own, they could but admit that in endeavor, at least, we were equal. The first concert of the Beethoven Society of Chicago, this season, gave us "The First Walpurgis Night" of Mendelssohn, the overture and scenes from the Tannhäuser of Wagner, besides smaller pieces from Rubinstein and Gade; while the Apollo Club produced Handel's Acis and Galatea, and the first part of Mendelssohn's St. Paul. The orchestral accompaniments were better performed than last season, while the chorus did its work with more earnestness and a greater finish. When we contrast the programmes given in Cincinnati at the musical festivals with those offered by the Handel and Haydn Society at their triennial performances, we see that the West is in no way behind the East in her endeavors to produce the works of the great masters. The piano and organ recitals, that form no insignificant part of our musical season, are devoted to the performance of the best music. One society had all the sonatas of Beethoven, and the complete piano works of Schumann and Chopin, performed in an artistic manner, for the edification and education of its members, active and honorary. Thus also with the classical song-writers, a wider acquaintance has been made with their beautiful compositions by efforts of the same noble character.

I do not speak of the support given to operatic representations, for where fashion largely reigns, perhaps its motives are other than those which spring from a real love for the beautiful in art. To support an orchestra of excellence at home, to found and endow a music school of an exalted character, and to build noble halls to enable societies to have a proper place to perform great works in, would indeed show an atmosphere in which art could flourish. But, unfortunately, we are as yet in the early years of our development, and the whole country has hardly been able to support one really great orchestra, such as that of Mr. Thomas. Real culture must develop from germs that unfold in the home, and we cannot expect a great Conservatory of Music that can produce noble artists, and be above the low plane of a money-making concern, until we have created that love for music that shall induce the capitalist to part with some of his treasures, expecting no return but that which would come to him in benefiting his country and its people.

The various musical "conventions," "Normal Music Schools," and local gatherings for the performance or study of music, which have been held in the small towns in the West, have presented marked indications of progress during the past few years. Not long ago, a singing-book maker would hold gatherings of the "convention" character for the purpose of introducing his work; give an indifferent concert or two, with the aid of all the church choirs in the town or village, and pass on to another place to do likewise if possible. But of late there has been a great difference manifested in the work attempted at these conventions. Local societies are formed for the study of oratorio or cantata music, and as soon as they are able to perform it a public concert is given. Thus the convention director is obliged to furnish better works for study, if he would obtain an engagement, for the old and crude idea of music is giving way to one that shows a fuller culture. The normal schools that are held all over the western country during the summer months, bring together a better class of teachers and performers. As one notes their programmes, he observes the weekly "recitals" at which classical music is largely given, while the evening chorus rehearsals are devoted to parts of oratorios, or choruses of the better class. Solo talent of no mean order is employed, and year by year improvement is made in the manner of conducting all their public performances. These musical gatherings are but the forerunners of permanent organizations, and leave behind them a local interest that in time will develop into better things. It is no uncommon occurrence to have pupils come into the city for instruction, bearing with them perhaps a sonata of Beethoven, a nocturne of Chopin, or something from Mendelssohn, which they had learned in a far distant little town. Upon being questioned as to their instruction, we hear of some devotee of music, who, having settled in the Far West, made his influence felt by training young fingers to play the noble works of the truly great masters. Thus, in thousands of cases, is the good seed planted all over this western land. It is not alone in the cities that a deeper love for the pure in art is manifested. Not long since a letter was received by one of our local teachers, coming from a little town in the extreme western part of Kansas. The writer mentioned a young daughter who had been studying the piano, with the best assistance that could be obtained in the village, and also stated that the little girl had found Mendelssohn's and Beethoven's letters among the books in a small library in the place, and from her interest in them was eager to have some of their music. "Would it be possible," wrote the father, "for you to send us some little things from these masters, that young fingers might try?" for although we are living beyond the reach of the benefits of a city's culture, we do not wish to degenerate in our love for what is beautiful and grand." Any number of pleasing indications of this character are constantly coming to the observer of the advancement of culture in the West.

Yet, notwithstanding our seeming progress, we are far from being, even as a nation, a musical people. Can Boston be really a musical city, when it becomes necessary to send out most earnest appeals to the cultivated part of its people to give a better support to the Harvard Musical Association, that it might go on another season, and furnish orchestral concerts of an artistic character without the danger of financial ruin? Is New York musical, when she allows a fine organization like Thomas's Orchestra to be disbanded for want of enough support to live? Can we be a musical people, and yet have no permanent opera in any city in the country, and no endowed musical school of a high rank anywhere in the land? We force even our best musicians into the teaching rank to earn their bread. Until home organizations in good musical societies, fine orchestras, and conservatories worthy of the name are supported by the great cities of our land, and the musical talent is given proper encouragement, we cannot be more than slowly approaching the rank of a music-loving nation.

Yet Music will live. Her melodies shall be reëchoed throughout the land, and manifest the idea of beauty through the harmonious medium of sweet sounds. The musician will yet prove his intellectuality, not only by thinking in sounds, but by manifesting his ideas in compositions that shall have universal recognition. And the tidal wave of progress shall not only sweep westward, but it shall penetrate into the dark corners of the globe, and make radiant all lands. The pure rays of the light of a truer culture shall send forth brighter illuminations, until civilization shall make one great family of the many races of humanity.

CHICAGO, Dec. 21, 1878.

DAYS IN NORMANDY.

DIEPPE and Rouen belong to the beaten track of common travel. In the one, you have an unsurpassed exposure to the sea, with a current of ozone much prized by valetudinarians. Here is also a casino, where one may hear music, and on certain occasions dance to it. The beach just below is good for bathing, and is well provided with cabins. The display here reminds one of the beach at Newport in the season, but the hour for bathing is somewhat earlier, as breakfast is taken in the middle of the day. At the casino, the toilettes are usually simple, and there is a preponderance of cotton materials, which the Parisian dress-makers know how to fit and trim very tastefully, and for which they charge heavy prices, thirty dollars being the ordinary price for a gingham or batiste dress, trimmed with very cheap lace and with the ribbons now so much in vogue. The materials for such a dress would scarcely cost ten dollars in America, and must here amount to much less, so that the profits of the façon must be large. I would here suggest a new proverb: "Qui dit modiste dit principe." So lofty are the pretensions, so unbounded the expectations, of this class.

In Rouen, we visit the fine old cathedral, where the choir particularly interests us. It contains on the right the tomb of the Sieur de Brésé, husband to Diana of Poitiers. The chief feature in this is the figure of the deceased, represented in the moment which succeeds the last agony, with the traces of the final struggle still impressed upon the lifeless face. The winding sheet which drapes the body is gathered in a curious knot above the head, the whole as realistic as possible, said to be the work of Jean Goujon. At the head of the tomb stands the afflicted widow; at its foot, the dead man appears as a child in the arms of his mother. The epitaph expresses a grief and fidelity which history does not credit. The monument of the two cardinals d'Amboise, uncle and nephew, is on the right of the choir, in florid Gothic. In the nave is shown the effigy of Richard Cœur de Lion, rudely carved, in his crown and royal robes. Beneath it lies the heart to whose qualities he owes his title.

The architecture of the church of St. Ouen is considered much more perfect than that of the cathedral. Its walls show the largest possible proportion of glass to stone, the windows occupying nearly the whole space, while the weight of the roof is supported by pillars and buttresses only. One of the rosaces is beautifully reflected by the water in a baptismal font of black marble, which has the effect of a black mirror. The windows are all of ancient glass, very beautiful in coloring. The museum of antiquities contains fifteen windows of stained glass, taken from suppressed churches and convents, forming a series from the thirteenth to the seventeenth century, and of unrivaled interest and value. Many other things of interest are shown here, among them the chimney and mantel-piece of the house in which Corneille was born, and the sad mask taken from the features of Henri IV. of France, after his untimely death.

So much for Rouen, which deserves fuller mention. It is now a place so full of life that the bustle of trade and manufacture puts to flight the pale memories of the past. But in Caen, the past still asserts itself. The quiet streets leave room for imagining the old victories and processions. Here is St. Pierre, one of the most beautiful of Norman churches. Here also are the two great abbeys built by William the Conqueror and his Queen Matilda, as a peace-offering to the Pope, who was offended by their marriage. Of these, the church of St. Étienne, otherwise termed L'Abbaye aux Hommes, is the finest and the most extensive. It is of the style termed Normanno-Romanesque, and is very severe and grand. It was completed and dedicated during the monarch's life, having been intended by him to serve as a resting place for his remains. A slab of gray marble in the pavement before the altar marks the place where they did rest. The inscription is as follows:—

HIC SEPULTUS EST INVICTISSIMUS
GUGLIELMUS
CONQUISTOR NORMANNIAR DUX ET ANGLIAR
REX HUGUJCE DOMUS CONDITOR
QUI OBIT ANNO 1087.

A superb lamp of bronze, heavily gilded, hangs above the tomb, and near it stands a paschal candle forty feet in height. The Huguenots in 1562 destroyed the ancient monument, and left of its contents only one thigh-bone, which the Revolutionists of 1793 in their turn demolished. If we add to this the fact that the death of William was of a very painful character, and that his funeral was really given him by the charity of a private individual, we shall conclude that the vicissitudes to which royalty is subject received no small illustration in his person.

The Abbaye aux Dames, built by Queen Matilda, is a smaller edifice, in pure Norman style. Its front is adorned by two square towers, and within its choir is shown the tomb of the queen. The most interesting memento of Queen Matilda will be found in the tapestry preserved at Bayeux, said to have been wrought by her hand. It is worked in crewel on a strip of linen many yards long, and represents, somewhat remotely, the Norman conquest of England. The mind of the beholder is, however, much assisted by divers Latin sentences, also in embroidery, which accompany and explain the various groups and figures. The first of these shows King Edward the Confessor telling his son Harold that William, Duke of Normandy, should one day be king of England. Harold next appears in the act of taking the oath of fealty to William. After this Harold is seen wearing the crown of England, and Duke William, hearing of this act of treachery, orders the building of a fleet to convey his forces to England. Then follow various battles, processions, and so on, till matters culminate in the death of Harold and the victory of William. The whole work is very incongruous. The horses are sometimes wrought in crimson worsted, sometimes in blue. Cities and palaces are represented by curious figures resembling nothing in particular unless it be a soup tureen or fancy pagoda. The faces are in outline, and the anatomy of the figures reminds one of the "Slovenly Peter" book once so much in vogue in the nursery. And yet, in spite of its grotesque imperfection, the work remains a very interesting one. It suggests so much: the queen and her maidens, day after day, returning to toil at its tedious length; the king looking on with interest; the admiration of the primitive court for a work considered in its time so remarkable. Poor as it is in design and execution, it has yet a certain merit and expression. The work improves as it goes on. One wonders who drew the endless outlines which the queen followed and filled, since artists must have been rare in those fighting days. A modern painting, hanging near the tapestry, represents the queen with her work on her knees, surrounded by her ladies in waiting. It is said that when Napoleon I. was intent upon an invasion of England, he caused Queen Matilda's tapestry to be carried in honor through the streets, in order to excite the multitude by the remembrance of this ancient achievement.

King William could not write his name. A charter, long shown in Rouen, but now removed elsewhere, bears his attested mark, he having no signature.

In traveling through Normandy, one is struck with the resemblance of the country to some parts of England. The English look of the people is perhaps still more striking. They are fair and blue-eyed and the children might easily be supposed to be of English birth. As we drove past a roadside inn, one day, we saw upon its humble sign, "Plantagenest Aubergiste," Plantagenet, tavern keeper. This man was, no doubt, a remote "collateral" of royal Richard and the rest. His name, thus encountered, led one to think of the various circumstances which at once connect and separate the prince and the peasant. Both may be not only of one humanity, but of one race. The source of the aristocracy which culminates in royalty is almost always to be sought in some superiority of physical force and of animal courage, helped by cunning. When one reads the record of these things one almost admires the candor of the Spartans, who made successful theft a credit, and only failure a disgrace.

The Normans are considered very cunning people by the French in general. They are shrewd experts in horse-dealing, ranking with the Yorkshiremen in this respect. In looking over a series of hotel accounts, I am led to believe that their talent in making money at the expense of others is not limited to one branch of industry. The traveler in Normandy pays very dearly for the necessities of life. He may be surprised to receive in a small and remote town a bill for board and lodging which would not discredit London or Paris. Travel by diligence, on the other hand, is cheap. Cider, the common drink of the country, is furnished at most tables d'hôte without extra charge. Damp beds are rather the rule than the exception. Finally, I see no reason why Norman French should be considered better than any other, and I, for my part, would rather have come over with the Pilgrim Fathers than have gone over with the Conqueror.

J. W. H.

BOOK NOTICES.

MOTHER-PLAY AND NURSERY SONGS. From the German of FROEBEL. Boston: Lee & Shepard.

A beautiful English edition of this admirable book is before us. The charming, lively German songs, with the thoughtful verse addressed to the mother by which each is headed, have been exquisitely reproduced in our own tongue by the translator (Miss F. E. Dwight), and the music to each little song and game is given in full. The book is thus a play-house from which happy child-life may be drawn, day after day and week after week, while the ordinary book of rhymes is quickly thrown aside when the first stimulus of infantile amusement is over. What strikes us as especially important in these games is that they contain so much good sense; for we are sure that the flatness and pointlessness of ordinary rhyming games not only pall upon, but sometimes seriously puzzle, little children. Not realizing that the seniors who composed "Uncle John is very sick," or, "Lady Queen Anne, she sits in the sun," were simply making fools of themselves for their benefit for the nonce, the intelligent little child supposes that there is a hidden meaning to these purely abstract and gratuitous statements, which it is his duty to find out, and is troubled at his failure to fathom the freakish mystery. The rhyming games of Froebel, on the contrary, are full of practical suggestion, yet do not lose their beauty, or even jollity, on this account. The little versified appeals to the mother, before noticed, which introduce each song-game, like the verses before the chapters of an old-fashioned novel, are touching in their pleading on the child's behalf.

Froebel is truly the advocate of children, and as such seems as much a part of the "kingdom of heaven" as they do. We cannot close this brief indication of the merits of the work before us without quoting two of the little songs, which seem to us especially picturesque and characteristic:—

SONG OF SMELL.

Now my little rogue may smell
These sweet flowers he loves so well.
Ah! what is it? Canst thou tell —
So sweet! — where the hidden source may dwell?
Yea, an angel in the cell
All the cups with sweets doth fill;
Says, "Though from the child concealed,
Sweet perfumes I freely yield,
So sweet, so sweet!"
Let me too the angel greet,
Let me smell the perfume sweet, so sweet! etc.

THE KNIGHTS AND THE GOOD CHILD.

FIVE knights I see riding at rapid pace;
Within the court their steps I trace.
"What would ye now, fair knights, with me?"
"We wish thy precious child to see."
They say he is like the dove so good,
And like the lamb of merry mood.
Then wilt thou kindly let us meet him,
That tenderly our hearts may greet him?"
"Now the precious child behold:
Well he merits love untold."
"Child, we give thee greetings rare,
This will sweeten mother's care.
Worth much love the good child is,
Peace and joy are ever his.
Now will we no longer tarry, —
Joy unto our homes we'll carry."

THE KNIGHTS AND THE ILL-HUMORED CHILD.

FIVE knights I see riding at rapid pace;
Within the court their steps I trace.
"What would ye now, fair knights, with me?"
"We wish thy precious child to see."
"Ah, friendly knights, I grieve to say
That I cannot bring him to you to-day;
He cries, is so morose and cross
That all too small we find the house."
"Oh, such tidings give us pain;
No longer we sing a joyful strain.
We'll ride away, we'll ride afar,
Where all the good little children are."

The book is embellished by very attractive engravings on every page. Germany is so pre-eminently the country of domesticity that it seems especially appropriate that Froebel, the apostle of children, should be a native of that land; but we heartily rejoice to see the gospel of good things for children spreading throughout every country, appealing to the native goodness of little children, and perpetuating and carrying it forward into manhood and later life.

J. R. A.

LIFE-SCHOOLS — AND MORE.

"T. G. A." is right in saying that we need life-schools to keep our young artists up to good drawing, but it seems to me that we need something more. Of schools we have no end. Boston is in the midst of an academical furor. She is nothing, if not artistic; less than nothing, if not academical. Drawing per se is the sine qua non of existence.

But is this school-drawing all that is needed? Did ever an academy produce an artist? Is it not always the same story, — that the atelier and the master make the artist? To be sure, the alphabet must be learned; but don't let us stop there, and never get beyond spelling b-o-y, and making our pot-hooks and hangers.

What we do need is the life-giving presence of a true and a great artist who long ago left behind him the minutiae of the schools, and who shall be to Boston what Liszt is to Weimar.

Said an artist who lives more in Europe than in America: "In Boston everything is wrong. The women paint strong and broadly. Most of the men do not." The reason is evident. The women-students asked for instruction, and paid for it. Hence Mr. Hunt's class of three years' duration, and his subsequent instruction in classes that were the outgrowth of his. I doubt not that if a score or two of young men were to meet together, show their work, and, in a spirit of docility, ask for help, it would be given with the same generous spirit with which it was bestowed upon the thirty or forty young women who asked Mr. Hunt to teach them.

I say nothing against art-schools and academies as such. The majority of students require their help; but there will always be a few who go on faster and with more enthusiasm without them, — students who must go their own way, under guidance, and who would be cramped and injured by school-training.

Let us have the life-schools, by all means, for the study of the figure is the key to all artistic knowledge; but let us not expect to be a great art-centre without the inspiration of a master.

X.

Dwight's Journal of Music.

SATURDAY, JANUARY 18, 1879.

ITALIAN OPERA.

BOSTON has been enjoying two full (overfull!) weeks of opera, given on a grander scale as to completeness, and in a finer style throughout, of execution, than we have ever had before. This we are not afraid to say while not oblivious of the delights of the old Havana troupes, the Grisi and Mario period, and others ever memorable. But this time we have actually had one of the standard opera companies of Europe, in its completeness, brought into our beautiful and spacious Boston Theatre. To the enterprise of Colonel Mapleson, lessee and manager of Her Majesty's Theatre, London, — the only rival of Covent Garden Theatre with its Royal Italian Opera, — we are indebted for this rare visitation.

In the disturbance of our fortnightly routine, and the long interval necessitated between two numbers by the transfer, just at this time, of our journal to new publishers, we have found nothing quite so hard to reconcile ourselves to as this long compulsory silence about such singers, such operas, and such an orchestra, until now that all is over. How we have envied those young midnight writers who could publish every morning the glowing, fresh impression of each opera before they had even slept upon it! Ours is no such privilege, and we must look back over the whole period and gather up what memories we can of it into one condensed, brief summary.

Of the twelve performances announced, the first (December 30) was to have been the new French Opera Carmen, — one of the last sensations, — with Miss Minnie Hauk in the rôle she has made so famous. Nearly all the seats in the house had been bought at high prices, and the event was eagerly awaited. But the prima donna remained sick in New York; the Trovatore had to be substituted at short notice; most of the tickets were returned, and this great disappointment cast a damper over the opera-going enthusiasm, which was felt throughout the week. Report speaks highly of the style in which the hackneyed, hateful Trovatore was presented. For us the opera began with Bellini's ever fresh and beautiful Sonnambula on the second evening, with Mme. Etelka Gerster-Gardini, the purest, sweetest star that has risen in the lyric firmament for many years, in the character of Amina. She is very young, — twenty-three, they say; with a slight, graceful figure, and a face which, though perhaps not handsome, yet has all the fine effect of beauty as it lights up with the inspiration of true feeling and of genius. From her first entrance upon the stage she seemed to identify herself instinctively with the part of the artless village maiden. In her first tones of welcome to her companions, the voice was not only fresh, but individual, almost peculiar in timbre; the lower notes not strong; but as it rose it grew purer, clearer, sweeter, and more powerful, revealing what we were tempted to call a clarinet quality. The impression of peculiarity, however, gradually passed away; and as she went on singing night after night, that voice became so much the standard of what is loveliest and purest in soprano sounds, that all its peculiarity was hidden in its own perfection. The part of Amina was completely suited to her; and while her action was altogether natural and admirable, her singing was entirely in harmony with it, and as near to absolute perfection as we ever hope to hear. In the pathetic cantabile passages, like "Ah! non credea," she sang straight to the heart with an unconscious simplicity which could not be doubted; and in all the ecstatic floriture and high flights in which the bird-like Bellini melody is prone to revel, not only was the voice adequate, the execution perfect, even to the extreme highest notes, — the form of every leaf and tendril cleanly, delicately finished as in rivalry with Flora's kingdom, — but, what was a greater wonder, every phrase and every note of all these "vocal pyrotechnics," commonly so coldly and mechanically rendered, was touched with the chaste fire of true dramatic expression. It did not suspend the action for one infinitesimal instant; it was the same soul that shone in the face and pervaded every motion. When she holds out one of the very highest tones, it is not merely very sweet or brilliant, but it is a tone of substance, charged with feeling and expression, which she can modulate like any lower tone. We need not say that her intonation is unimpeachable; there is never a shade of variation from the perfect pitch. We have seen and heard many good Aminas, but none, upon the whole, so beautiful as this of the young Hungarian singer.

But we must leave her for a moment, or we shall forget to speak of the performance of the opera as a whole. It was the best performance of La Sonnambula that we remember. This most genuine and happy inspiration of Bellini's muse, — the very soul of melody, — which never loses its freshness for us, renewed its youth and charm wonderfully that night. It was all good. Sig. Frapolli sang and acted earnestly, and like an artist, as Elvino, and his tenor voice, though sometimes a little pinched and forced, has much essential sweetness. Sig. Foli, with a bass voice of remarkably rich, elastic, and expressive quality, did full justice to the music of the Count, which character, in spite of his remarkably tall and slender form, he impersonated with dignity and ease. The secondary parts, the Lisa of Mlle. Robiati, the Alessio of Sig. Grassi, and even that of the Mother, were better than we ordinarily hear. The chorus, imported from London, was numerous, fresh, and musical in tone, and admirably trained. It were worth a long walk to hear the noble "Phantom Chorus" sung so satisfactorily; and the pretty episodic chorus in the middle of the play was most refreshing as a relief from the pathetic progress of the drama, as well as a foreshadowing of the happy end. But, rarest element of all in our local operatic experiences, a most complete and admirable orchestra! It is mainly made up of the best New York musicians, many of them from the late orchestra of Theodore Thomas. Sig. Arditì is one of the best of conductors, and has brought them all into perfect unity and sensitive obedience to every hint from his baton. The violins played as one, and all the reeds and brass were smooth and sympathetic. There was power enough, yet no superfluous noise, no brutal covering up of the voices. The Sonnambula was a success, and Gerster was acknowledged even to exceed all that fame had said in her praise. The audience was only moderately large, but those who saw and heard were thoroughly convinced, and they were persons of enough taste and experience to assure and persuade the many for another time.

Yet the next night's experience was far from creditable to Boston's musical taste and culture. One would suppose that a chance to listen merely to the exquisite music (without the singers and the actors) of one of the first operas of Mozart, Le Nozze di Figaro, with so fine an orchestra, would have been seized upon as a rare privilege and have filled the house; but by far the best, most faithful and complete performance of the work we ever had was given before empty benches; there were barely three hundred people in the auditorium! Fashion, fickle goddess, who is nothing if not absurd and treacherous, had ruled that to be an "off-night," — no Gerster, Hauk, nor Roze! Do we go for music, the divine, or only for the prima donna, whom men call the Diva? Judging by that evening, Col. Mapleson would have reason to think ours not a musical community. There are other ways, however, of accounting for the strange indifference. First, the natural reaction and desire for rest after two days of excitement, one disappointing, the other too glorious, too much of a revelation not to dull the appetite for anything else immediately after. Periods of excitement and of keen enjoyment run in waves, and there is room for "off-nights" in the alternate moments of depression. But Mozart's Figaro! Can one afford to lose it? Here, again, several reasons suggest themselves in our past experience of the opera itself. It is very hard for the average audience to understand what is passing on the stage dramatically; the plot is far from clear, unless one has studied it carefully beforehand, and there are reasons why it is perhaps not best to pry too deeply into its motives. Then, its long stretches of dialogue in dry old-fashioned recitative, with only those irritating scrapes upon the double-bass and 'cello for accompaniment, which some judicious person might, we should think, prune out pretty freely to the advantage of the work, — or else let the parties simply talk together. Then again, wearisome recollections of the inadequate performances which we have had of it in past years; the associations were not predisposing. The fortunate few who did go on that New Year's night have exchanged the old associations for fresh and bright ones; they listened from beginning to end, for three hours and a quarter, with delight. For the first time we heard this masterwork in its completeness; it was all there, and justice done to every rôle, to every measure of the music. Nothing in the whole fortnight has done more to show the rich resources of the Mapleson company than the fact that not only the principal, but all the secondary rôles, some ten in all, and all important, were satisfactorily filled by excellent artists, not one of the "bright peculiar stars" appearing. Mlle. Parodi, with a sweet, full, powerful mezzo-soprano voice, and fine, generous presence, made an acceptable Countess. Mme. Sinico sang and acted charmingly as Susannah. Mme. Lablache, who has proved herself one of the most versatile and ever-ready artists of the troupe, — having already harrowed up the feelings by her intense impersonation of Verdi's unlovely witch Azucena, — made a very pleasing Cherubino, singing the arias finely (albeit transposed to a lower key, as were some other parts), encored after "Voi che sapete," and entering with much spirit and grace into all the pretty action and roguish by-play of the boy lover's part. Marcellina was worthily presented by Mme. Robiati. The Figaro was Sig. Galassi, who has a musical, rich, flexible baritone voice, which he uses artistically and with expression, and he put plenty of vivacity and volubility into the droll, gay part. Sig. Del Puente, an admirable baritone, easy and dignified in action, was as good a Count Almaviva as one could desire. M. Thierry, thick and rotund in person, had a good unctuous bass voice for Dr. Bartolo, and the parts of Don Basilio, Don Curzio, even to the drunken gardener Antonio, were no mere shadows in the song and action of Signori Bignardi, Grazi, and Franceschi. Add the fine orchestra and chorus, and it will be clear that there we had for once a memorable presentation of a hitherto but half appreciated masterpiece in opera.

Donizetti's Lucia di Lammermoor, musically, does not keep its freshness like the Sonnambula. Its music is far less spontaneous. Yet it abounds in ever-pleasing and pathetic melody, and has superb ensembles. It still remains, and probably will long remain, one of the popular favorites among operas. It palls and again grows upon us by turns, and should not be heard too frequently. Such pathos and pervading gloom, even if the paths were all real, though for a while it fascinate, may easily grow irksome, and the sum of its expression morbid. Some of the happiest and brightest of its musical ideas occur in strange connection, malapropos dramatically; for instance, that lively strain with which the chorus suddenly interrupt Edgardo's dying scene — strange form of sympathy! And again much of the florid vocal virtuosity of Lucia's mad scene, especially the rivalry of voice and flute. But then, such was the power of Gerster's genius, with her wonderful purity of voice and perfect execution, to lift it all up into a higher atmosphere and spiritualize it, making the highest tones and brightest ornamental passages to thrill with feeling, that you lost all thought of anything at all technical and artificial, and took it all as pure, consistent, simple and divine expression. In her singing and entire impersonation of the part, she was to us the very ideal of Lucia. The rustic simplicity of Amina had given place to the refined and high-born maiden. All she does is characteristic, and the discrimination seems to be without calculation and unconscious, one of the instinctive processes of the artistic genius.

It was the best performance of the opera as a whole that we have ever had here. Sig. Campanini, greatly improved in voice, and wonderfully so in action, came in for his full share of the enthusiasm of the public, leaving little to be desired in the Edgardo. Galassi made a very marked impression as Enrico. Foli, with his imposing voice and stature, lent great weight to the part of the priest Raimondo; and, for once, the ungrateful tenor music of Arturo found an agreeable exponent in Bignardi. The great sextet and chorus was magnificently sung, and received with the wildest enthusiasm.

We hardly trust ourselves to speak of Carmen (given on Friday evening, January 3), so disappointed were we and so little interested in the music, of which we had read and heard such glowing praise. It was the romantic plot, the intense dramatic action, the picturesque local coloring, the Spanish scenes and tableaux, that made the principal appeal, and that mostly to the eye. Bizet's music has a certain piquancy, and charm of nationality; the instrumentation is brilliant, often rich, and sometimes overloaded; some of the melodies have a strange, peculiar beauty; but the resulting impression of the whole, in our mind, and we believe in most minds, was of a continual and rather tiresome succession of Spanish dance-tunes, — many of them very pretty, but so many of them very cloying. The song of the hero of the bull-fight created some enthusiasm; but nearly every aria or song of any serious pretension seemed to be bedeviled by a restless struggle to get away from the key, right in the middle of a period sometimes, and then wriggle or jump back again; we cannot think it anything but willful, a desperate endeavor to appear original. Perhaps this is what some of the admirers mean by "traces of the Wagner style," which they discover in it. We will not hold Wagner responsible for anything so bad, although he did wage war upon the family relationship of keys. In Wagner's "unendliche Melodie," such restless confusion of all keys is one thing (his thing), but in set melodies, like these of Bizet, it is quite another.

We cannot think it can be wholesome to become infatuated with such an opera, or such a drama. It seemed to us unfortunate for the first introduction of Miss Minnie Hauk, that she should be identified with such a character as the reckless, selfish, sensual, degraded Spanish gypsy and girl of the streets, Carmen. And identified she was with it about as fully and as cleverly as one dramatically could be. Her rich dramatic quality of voice, her ease and versatility of song, her beauty, enhanced by the picturesque costume, her dashing and defiant air, and her intensity of passion, with her complete consistency of action (though upon so low a plane) combined to make a strong impression. But we had rather that her triumph had been in some other music and in another sort of play. Moreover, the Carmen music confines her to the middle and lower region of her voice, which is not her best, although she made it singularly expressive; the part is now taken in London by Trebelli, the famed contralto, whom it suits better as a singer, while Hauk is probably the better actress.

As for the way in which the piece was put upon the stage and sung and acted, and accompanied by Ardit's admirable orchestra, we have only praise. Sig. Campanini, as the tormented soldier lover, Don Jose, surpassed himself in song and action; his acting in the last scene was superb and carried all before it. Sig. Del Puente had all the vivacity and conscious power and triumph of the Toreador; and M. Thierry and Sig. Grazi, the two gypsy smugglers, filled out the music and the picture well. Excellent, too, in their by-play and in their singing, both in solo and concerted passages, were Mlle. Lablache and Robiati, as Carmen's two gypsy friends. But the one redeeming element of innocence and purity, amid so much that is repulsive and depraved, was the small but gracious part of Michaela, modeled apparently upon the Alice in Robert le Diable, which was most sweetly sung and impersonated by Mme. Sinico. But think of Meyerbeer's Alice music, and what is this to it in point of beauty, freshness, or originality! There were some graceful bits of ballet introduced. After listening to it all as well as we were able, we came away caring but little about Carmen, and many confessions to the same effect were whispered in our ear.

On Saturday afternoon the Sonnambula was repeated to a crowded theatre, when the enthusiasm for Mme. Gerster was almost at fever height. Of the second week we must speak in our next number.

CONCERT RECORD.

THE long interval between this number of our new volume and the first, which was issued two weeks in advance of date, and then the all-absorbing claims of a dozen nights of opera have left us sadly in arrears in our attempts to keep up with the calendar of concerts. We have to go back to a week or more before Christmas to pick up the thread. Perhaps the best thing we could do would be to wipe the slate off clean and open a fresh account. But memory will furnish a few fragmentary notes out of the confused and crowded past to bridge the chasm over, though but slightly.

— The Christmas Oratorio, The Messiah, given by the old HANDEL AND HAYDN SOCIETY (Dec. 24), was religiously attended by as great a crowd as usual, and the performance as a whole may be recorded as a remarkably good one, — at any rate, so far as the grand chorus, orchestra, and organ (Mr. B. J. Lang) were concerned. Some of the noblest and seldom quite successful choruses, like "And with his stripes," and the final "Amen" chorus, went better than we ever heard them here. Mrs. Dexter, of Cincinnati, sang the soprano solos, some of them, like "He shall feed his flock," with fine expression; but on the whole she disappointed by the effort with which she strove to control her voice and by her unclear enunciation; we have heard her when she did herself more justice. Mr. Courtney, too, the English tenor, seemed not quite to have recovered from the hoarseness which has affected his fine manly voice in all his public efforts since he came to this country, although his style was excellent. Miss Ita Welsh, our young contralto, made her first attempt in oratorio, and with marked success. She sang with fervor and with simple, true expression; her rich and sympathetic voice only lacking weight sufficient for so large a hall. It is to her credit that she did not omit (as nearly all contraltos have done) the second part of the air: "He was despised." Mr. John F. Winch (in place of Mr. Whitney, who was ill) bore off the triumphs of the evening in the great bass airs. The chorus was in force, at least 500 voices, and bore noble testimony to the thorough training of the experienced conductor, Carl Zerrahn.

— HARVARD MUSICAL ASSOCIATION The second Symphony Concert (Dec. 19) had for programme:—

*Pastorale, from the Christmas Oratorio . . . J. S. Bach.
Piano-forte Concerto, in A major . . . Mozart.
Allegro. — Andante. — Presto.

H. G. TUCKER.
Overture to "Alfonso and Estrella" . . . Schubert.
Siegfried Idyl . . . Wagner.

Transcription for Piano, "Der Ritt der Walküren" . . . Wagner-Tausig.
H. G. TUCKER.
Seventh Symphony, in A, Op. 92 . . . Beethoven.

(One star means first time in these concerts; two stars first time in Boston.)

The lovely Pastoral of Bach, far finer even than that in Handel's Messiah, was beautifully given with Franz's additional instrumentation. The short Schubert Overture is very spirited and brilliant, and was brilliantly played. The "Siegfried Idyl" is a remarkably mild piece for Wagner, — in one rather short moderato movement, and but lightly scored, with no brass but a single trumpet and two horns. It was composed some time before the Siegfried of his Niebelungen Cycle, on the occasion of the birth of a young Siegfried Wagner. Its themes are characteristic enough of Wagner in his gentler and more sentimental moods, and are worked up into a vague and dreamy web of sensuous sweet sound, which is all that many people ask of music. It seems to hint of the mystical and fascinating influence of the sounds of Nature on a young, heroic, and poetic mind wandering in the forest. There are birds warbling in abundance. The music, though it has sensuous beauty, rich and delicate coloring, lacks progress; the themes do not develop; they revolve, or rather squirm within a narrow circle; they give you a sort of nightmare feeling, an intense restlessness, but no getting forward; we have felt and expressed the same with regard to his Meistersinger prize song. It was, however, warmly received, as it was carefully and nicely played, on this first hearing.

Mr. Tucker, who came in at a day's warning when the committee were disappointed in a singer, generously sacrificed himself in some degree to give us the not too common pleasure of hearing a Mozart Concerto. This one in A major is very beautiful, and Mr. Tucker, accustomed to bolder and more modern tasks, went so far in his loyal tenderness and deference to Mozart, that the music did not speak quite freely for itself. The piano-forte part, having but little of the modern breadth and brilliancy, was treated delicately to be sure, yet timidly and coldly. The tempo of the slow movement was taken much too slow, so that it did not seem to march. The brilliant, strong, young virtuoso did not seem to feel quite in his element. Those, therefore, who did not fix their attention mainly on the orchestra, voted the work dull and disappointing; taken as a whole it is a rich and beautiful Concerto. Mr. Tucker had his chance for strength and brilliancy in Tausig's transcription of the "Ride of the Walküren;" if that piece seemed a reckless, mad extravagance, it was Tausig's fault, not his interpreter's. But the ever-glorious, the divine Seventh Symphony came after to purify the air and hush the Babel; the first two measures of it transported one into a serene, pure heaven of delight. That, too, was played with fine precision and with fervor, and has seldom been more heartily enjoyed.

The third concert came last week (Jan. 9), and these were the selections:—

Orchestral Suite in D . . . J. S. Bach.
Overture. — Air. — Gavotte. — Bourrée. — Gigue.

*Soma, "Ah! perfido"
*Aria, "Per pietà, non dirmi addio" } . . . Beethoven.
Miss FANNY KELLOGG.

Overture to "Genoveva" . . . Schumann.

Song, "The Young Nun," with orchestral accompaniment by Liszt . . . Schubert.

Miss FANNY KELLOGG.
Second Symphony, in D, Op. 73 . . . Brahms.
Allegro non troppo. — Adagio non troppo. — Allegretto grazioso quasi Andantino. — Allegro con spirito.

The Bach Suite made a fine impression; its first movement (overture), so seldom heard, opens the series of pieces in a large, broad, solid, hearty style; and, though with no contrast of other instruments, except three trumpets, against the strings and oboes in unison with them, it seems to lack no wealth of color. It was a satisfaction to hear the well-known heavenly Aria, so often played of late by the great virtuosos of the violin for a solo on the G string, given for once in its proper place and as Bach wrote it, — as a soprano melody, in right relations with the accompanying instruments. It seemed a pity that the brusque and jovial Gavotte should not end the Suite, after the tamer Bourrée and Gigue.

Schumann's Genoveva overture, one of the greatest overtures since Beethoven, was splendidly performed, and can more properly be called the striking feature of the concert than the new Brahms Symphony, with which we will not wrestle just now, having neither room, nor time, nor mood. Suffice it to say, the orchestra, considering the few rehearsals, gave a very creditable interpretation of it; and that, if the Adagio and some portions of the other movements were obscure and vague to most listeners, it was in the main followed with interest and much enjoyed. We shall, perhaps, have a better opportunity to discuss its merits more at length.

Miss Fanny Kellogg is one of the most improving and most satisfactory of our young soprano singers. Her beautiful voice has gained much in strength and in endurance, as well as in sweetness, throughout its compass. Beethoven's Italian Scena is a severe trial for any singer. She gave the recitative with strong dramatic emphasis and power, and sang the Aria, "Per pietà," beautifully. The whole piece was well conceived and given in the right earnest spirit, the voice only showing symptoms of fatigue in the trying finale. Schubert's "Die junge Nonne" is a song well known with piano; but Liszt's instrumentation supplies a rich, imposing background, against which the singer's voice was well relieved, although the heavy basses now and then partially obscured it. It was sung with true feeling and expression.

— One of the most delightful of the smaller concerts of the season was that of Mr. G. W. SUMNER, at Mechanics' Hall, on Monday evening, Dec. 16. The programme consisted of four pieces, beginning with the first movement of Mendelssohn's fine old Quintet, in B flat, Op. 87, — the Quintet which formed the corner-stone, as it were, of the original Mendelssohn Quintette Club; this time it had the brilliant interpretation of the club as it is admirably composed to-day, Mr. Thomas Ryan being the only one left of the original members; Messrs. B. Listemann, G. Dannreuther, Edward Heindl, and Rudolph Hennig being now associated with him. Next, Mr. Sumner played Tausig's extremely difficult arrangement of the Toccata and Fugue, in G minor, by Bach, which showed a remarkable development of his powers as a pianist — now taking rank among our foremost ones. He then joined with our masterly violoncellist, Mr. Hennig, in a brilliant performance of the bright and genial Sonata, in A major, Op. 69, of Beethoven. Finally came a most clear and finished, and in every way enjoyable performance of the great Septet by Hummel. All the seven instruments were adequate; the flute of Mr. Heindl, the oboe of Mr. de Ribea, and Mr. Hamann's horn blending delightfully with the strings, to which Mr. Ludwig Manoly supplied a sure and noble contrabass.

MUSICAL CORRESPONDENCE.

NEW YORK, DEC. 30. — On Saturday evening, Mr. Carlberg gave his second Symphony Concert at Chickering Hall, with the following programme:—

Overture to "Medea" . . . Bargiel.
Fourth Concerto (G) . . . Beethoven.

MR. S. B. MILLS.
Romanza (from Suite in A) . . . H. W. Nicholl.
Recitation and Aria, "Nozze di Figaro" . . . Mozart.

SIG. CAMPOBELLO.
Symphony, in A (Scotch) . . . Mendelssohn.

Perhaps Mr. Carlberg is wise in giving us few novelties, although he certainly deviated from his system — if it be one — in placing upon his programme the Romanza, by Nicholl; this was really a very neat bit of composition, with an instrumentation full of color (possibly too full), while the treatment suggested the classic-romantic school. I should be greatly pleased to hear the remaining movements.

The overture to Medea is a charming work of a most serious and elevated character; almost every composer sometimes dismounts from his Pegasus and descends to — well — if not triviality, to something very like it. This Bargiel never does; he may, perhaps, be bizarre or weird, but every phrase is full of serious intention and noble purpose.

Sig. Campobello sang the Mozart Aria very acceptably, and received an encore to which he responded with Gounod's "Valley;" he is a manly, earnest, and painstaking singer.

Candor compels me to say that Mr. Mills did not distinguish himself in the Concerto, which requires far different treatment from that which he chose to give it. In the first place, in almost every one of the forte passages, he forced the tone of the piano in a way that was positively painful. In the second place he made many slips and errors, which may be attributed to his being out of practice. Lastly, he hurried the time in the most unexpected places, in a way for which the score seemed to furnish no warrant. Added to all this, there seemed to be an entire lack of sympathy between the orchestra — as conducted — and the pianist; they seemed to be, in one sense, at swords-points, and there were repeated instances where the piano was half a beat in advance of the other performers: in one case — in the final movement — it was only by the utmost agility that Carlberg managed to jump his forces to the correct spot. On the whole, it was a performance which reflected credit neither upon the pianist, whose ability we all know and recognize, nor upon the conductor.

The "Scotch" Symphony went really very well, albeit Mr. Carlberg takes some singular liberties with the tempo; and, by the way, the orchestra, unused to the latitude which he made use of, could hardly be induced to conform to his ideas, and did so with obvious reluctance. This, of course, was all wrong, for even if his conception of the symphony be erroneous (I certainly think it is), it is still the business of the private to obey their officer, and it would seem that adequate rehearsals should have secured a unity of purpose which was conspicuous by its absence. F.

NEW YORK, JAN. 6. — The Brooklyn Philharmonic Society have secured the services of Theodore Thomas as musical director for the coming season. He will conduct the orchestra at each concert and at the rehearsal immediately preceding. The first two rehearsals of each concert will be conducted by Mr. William G. Dietrich. The orchestra numbers sixty-five performers, and is mainly composed of players formerly in the Thomas Orchestra. It is substantially the same as that engaged by Mr. Carlberg for his symphony concerts at Chickering Hall, in New York. The programme of the first concert of the twenty-first season (Dec. 14) was as follows:—

Symphony, "Eroica" . . . Beethoven.
Aria, "Ach! Ich habe sie verloren" . . . Gluck.
Miss ANNETTE McCULLUM.

Concerto for violin . . . Mendelssohn.
Andante — Rondo.

MR. EDWARD REMENYI.
Overture to "Genoveva" . . . Schumann.

Solos for violin:—
(a.) Nocturne, E flat, Op. 9, No. 2 . . . Chopin.

(b.) Melodies heroïques et lyriques Hongroises.
Transcribed by REMENYI.

(c.) Mazourka, Op. 7, No. 1 . . . Chopin.

Vorspiel, "Die Meistersinger" . . . Wagner.

Opinions may vary concerning the manner in which Thomas interprets the music of certain classical composers; but there can be only one voice with regard to his command of an orchestra, and we know that the Thomas band without the magnetic influence of Thomas is like the play of Hamlet minus the Prince of Denmark. The orchestra is one of the best in the world, and, with Thomas at the head, it is perfection.

In the performance of the Symphony, a close observer might have noticed the absence of certain fine touches of tone-shading which formerly characterized the work of this orchestra; but the strength, clearness, and brilliancy of the interpretation were beyond question. The Vorspiel of Die Meistersinger also was performed in magnificent style.

Mr. Edward Remenyi gave an admirable performance of Mendelssohn's beautiful Concerto. The orchestra was a sustaining power, instead of a drag upon the performance, as was the case when he played in New York. In response to an encore, after the Chopin pieces, he played a transcription of Mendelssohn's "Spring-Song." Altogether his performance was the best I have heard from him, being really admirable, albeit the eccentricities of his style will come out in the oddest manner. Miss McCullum is endowed by nature with a good voice, but she has yet to learn how to sing. Her efforts in this direction were warmly applauded by the assemblage and crowned with flowers, if not with success. . . .

JAN. 11. — At the third concert of the Symphony Society, at Steinway Hall, on Saturday evening, Jan. 4, the programme was:—

Unfinished Symphony, in B minor . . . Schubert.
Air from "Xerxes" . . . Handel.

Miss ANNA DRASDIL.
Concerto for piano, Op. 16, A minor . . . Edward Grieg.

MR. FRANZ RUMMEL.
"La Captive." Reverie for contralto, with orchestra.

H. Bertios.
Symphony in C, No. 2 . . . R. Schumann.

The strangely beautiful fragment by Schubert affects the imagination with an indescribable charm. It is a tragedy of the gods. What the rest might have been who shall dare to fancy? As well attempt to restore the Venus of Milo. Schumann's Symphony, in C, is among the greatest of all the great symphonies, — a masterpiece of genius. The subjects are lofty and poetic, and developed with matchless skill. The work, as a whole, is symmetrical in form as well as noble in design. It contains not a trivial nor a redundant measure. The work of the orchestra was not quite what it should be. With all respect to Dr. Damroch, who is a sound musician and who is doing good work, it must be said that certain portions of the Symphony were slighted; notably the Scherzo, which was rushed through at a terrible pace, at the sacrifice of clearness and expression. Miss Drasill sang the air from "Xerxes," familiar to concert goers as the "Largo," for violin, with organ, harp, and strings, arranged by Helmsberger. Afterwards (for encore) she sang Hiller's "Prayer." Her phenomenal voice and her fine phrasing were best displayed in the "Reverie" by Berlioz, a composition of considerable difficulty, and remarkable for the exquisite beauty of the orchestral setting, as well as the skill with which the melody is varied to suit the changes in the poet's thought.

Mr. Franz Rummel plays with facility and good taste, but for some unknown reason he failed on this occasion to do justice to the Grieg Concerto, a remarkably original and elegant composition, which I have found occasion to praise heretofore. His interpretation was lacking in force, and he failed to produce a broad, sonorous tone from his instrument. The orchestral accompaniment was too heavy, and at times the piano was quite inaudible. I hesitate to sit in judgment on Mr. Rummel's playing, as I bear from every quarter that it is remarkably fine. I am inclined to believe that from nervousness or some other cause he failed to do himself justice at the concert.

A. A. C.

BALTIMORE, JAN. 11. — We are to have our Peabody Concerts, eight of them as usual, the first to take place the 25th of this month. Rather a late beginning this, and to be ascribed mainly to the usual delay in opening the subscription list, which the committee should have done in October instead of putting it off until December. If this had been done the requisite signatures would probably have been obtained by this time. As it is, the list falls short, about one hundred subscribers, of the number calculated on, and the deficit will have to be made up in some way or other before the end of the month. Perhaps a trustee with a big heart and a plectronic purse will assist the musical department out of its present dilemma. The arrangement with the orchestra is essentially the same as last winter. The performers are guaranteed a certain sum out of the subscription fund, for thirty rehearsals and eight concerts, the receipts for admissions at the door being divided equally among them. The Institute furnishes gratis the hall, gas, printing, attendance, and the director.

As a natural consequence of such an arrangement, the orchestra will be smaller than might be wished (there will be but thirty-two performers), and scarcely able to cope with the new music of the new schools, for which our ambitious director entertains so decided a predilection. We shall therefore have to content ourselves with the more simple compositions of the earlier standard classics, and the opinion of your correspondent is that we can well afford to do without the clashing innovations of Berlioz and Saint-Saëns for a season, and turn with keener enjoyment to the pure simplicity, the passionate depth, and the sublime beauties of Haydn, Beethoven, and Mozart.

It is just to be deplored that, while the other departments of the Peabody Institute are enjoying ample appropriation from the Institute fund and from private sources, the musical department should suffer so much neglect. It is true, the Institute, like some other institutions and corporations to-day, is, to use a common but suitable term, "short," for reasons given in former letters to the JOURNAL. But how does such an excuse agree with the new annex erected for the library, and the unstinted appropriations to the lectures? Without inquiring more deeply into the causes of this unfortunate state of affairs, let us rather look about us for a remedy. The Institute will probably not be in position to make appropriations to the concerts as formerly, for some years to come, and until that prosperous condition of affairs is reached, the only way in which the concerts can be made an absolute certainty is by private donation. The Peabody Art Gallery sprung into existence entirely in this way; by donations of works of art from such men as Mr. W. T. Walters, and Mr. John McCoy, and a good round sum from Mr. John W. Garrett. Mr. Charles Eaton, chairman of the musical committee, and the only trustee who seems to take an intelligent, active interest in the welfare of the musical department, has, on several occasions, substantially assisted the concerts.

These are steps in the right direction. Seventy-five thousand dollars, properly invested, would, with the addition of what should be realized from the sale of tickets, yield a sufficient sum annually, to insure the performance of ten symphony concerts, with four rehearsals each. Surely a few of our wealthier citizens should have $75,000 to spare for so laudable an object!

For the immediate future, we are satisfied to know that we shall have the concerts this season, at any rate. The advent of the Boston Mendelssohn Quintette Club, which is to give a concert here on the 21st, is looked forward to with interest in musical circles.

MUSIKUS.

MILWAUKEE, WIS., DEC. 14, 1878. — The week from Dec. 6 to Dec. 13 brought us four concerts of note, two by local organizations, and two by visiting musicians. The first was by the Arion Club, a male chorus of about sixty voices, whose leader is Mr. Wm. L. Tomlins, of Chicago.

They have associated with them the Cecilian Choir, a chorus of some sixty ladies, who assisted at this concert, the programme of which was composed of Handel's Acis and Galatea and the first part of Mendelssohn's St. Paul. The choruses of these two compositions were sung, in the main, with precision of attack, with accuracy throughout, with purity of intonation, with delicate gradation of light and shade, with fire, spirit, and vigor such as I have never seen surpassed and rarely equaled. It is evident that Mr. Tomlins has very rare gifts as a chorus director. He knows how to select his singers; he restricts the number to precisely those required to balance the parts properly; he weeds out poor material remorselessly; he carefully develops every voice which can be made available, giving personal attention to each individual singer; he knows exactly what he wants done, and insists on its being done, requiring strict attention from every singer from the start; he has the gift of command, and of inspiring his forces with unbounded enthusiasm, and he is full of power and unfading energy. He pays the closest attention to minute details, and he studies the compositions he is to conduct with the utmost care, so as to give a true interpretation of them. The result of all this was that the choruses were almost faultlessly done. I should not be obliged to write "almost" but for the fact that the chorus had only a single rehearsal with the orchestra, and that in a place so different from the room where their usual rehearsals are held that they felt awkward and embarrassed. The same uneasiness appeared somewhat at the concert, and in some parts of the most difficult choruses the singers showed a tendency to pull apart; but Mr. Tomlins, who also seemed slightly anxious, succeeded in holding them well together. The remedy for this is obvious. There should be more rehearsals with the orchestra, and in the place where the concert is to be given. The orchestra, also, ought to be better than this one, which was very weak in strings.

The part of Acis was taken by Dr. C. T. Barnes of Chicago, who gave it very creditably. The other soloists were Miss Fanny Kellogg, Miss Abby Clark, Mr. W. H. Fessenden, and Mr. M. W. Whitney. Miss Kellogg has made marked improvement during the past two years. Her voice has gained in fullness and evenness, and she has grown a more mature artist. Her style shows everywhere the careful training and example of Mme. Rudersdorf. One could desire to feel more power behind her rendering of such music as St. Paul; at the last recitative, especially, before the chorus at the climax, "Oh great is the depth," it was evident that she had reached her limit, and had no power in reserve; but she makes noble use of the gifts she has, and we are to be thankful and ask nothing more. Miss Clark has a beautiful tone, and sang the Aria "But the Lord is mindful of his own" so exquisitely, and with such pure and deep feeling, that we all regretted that there was nothing more for her to sing. This Aria was as enjoyable as anything else in the whole evening. Mr. Fessenden was not in his best voice, but his work was entirely adequate, as was, of course, Mr. Whitney's, who sings as easily as if he had power enough in reserve for half a dozen other parts at the same time if it could only be made available.

On the whole, except the inadequate orchestra, the performance was one which Mendelssohn himself might have admired.

The second concert was the 259th of the Milwaukee Musical Society, also a male chorus with an associated chorus of ladies, about the same in numbers as the Arion Club and Cecilian Choir, under the leadership of Prof. Wm. Mickler, a sound and learned musician, and an excellent conductor. The following was the programme: —

1. Second Symphony (D major) Op. 73, Johannes Brahms.
2. Aria for Soprano, from the Opera "Orpheus" Chr. v. Gluck.
- Miss LINA ALLARDT.
3. Maennerchor, "Take wing, my song" . . . F. Taubert.
4. Songs for Soprano.
- (a.) Asra Rubinstein.
- (b.) The Violet Mozart.
5. Reverie for Violin H. Vieuxtemps.
- Mr. EMIL O. WOLFF.
6. Introduction and Chorus of the Messengers of Peace from the Opera "Eisenstein" Rich. Wagner.

Soprano, Miss LINA ALLARDT.

Tenor, Mr. J. OESTRICHER.

Of course, the main interest of the evening centred in the Symphony, a noble, satisfying, and inspiring composition, every way worthy of a great writer. I heard it all twice in rehearsal before the concert, and, having previously gone through the score at the piano with Professor Mickler, was able to form a very good idea of the whole. The form is the traditional one, the only noteworthy peculiarity being the interruption of the Allegretto, which reminds one of a minuet, though it has by no means the dance spirit of the Mozart minuet, by a genuine scherzando movement in six-eight time. This interruption occurs twice, if I remember rightly, and contrasts with the stately and graceful movement of the Allegretto most charmingly. It combines new motives with a modification of the principal motive of the Allegretto in a thoroughly musician-like way, and so gives the most perfect balance of unity and variety. In fact, these qualities appear throughout the work, the more one studies it, not only in the separate movements, but in the balance and contrast of the four movements. The thematic treatment is admirable, the counterpoint masterly, and the instrumentation a continual surprise and delight. The themes of the first and third movements are well marked melodic phrases, easily remembered, and very charming, those of the first movement impressing at once by their significance, and by their broad, noble character. The Adagio and final Allegro are formed of motives not so easy to carry away with one, but the total effect of the former is very pleasing, while the latter, rushing forward merrily to the final climax, makes a very satisfactory ending to an extremely fine composition. This Symphony is not what the Germans call an "epoch-making" or a "path-breaking" work, but it is nevertheless thoroughly original, both in its motives and treatment; and coming, as it does, from a composer twenty years younger than Wagner, it proves that those prophets of the future who sung dirges over the grave of pure instrumental music were too hasty. The Symphony has life in it yet, and only requires the touch of a master to show that genius is still able to express its conceptions through forms which sufficed for Beethoven.

As to the performance of this work, the orchestra was of fair size, — eight first and eight second violins, five violas, five cellos, three double-basses, and the usual wind instruments, — but had to be made up in part of young and inexperienced players; and the number of rehearsals was limited by lack of funds, so that one must not think of applying the tests of excellence which we apply to orchestras of mature artists, who play together continually under the same leader. But though various crudities and roughnesses were perceptible, the horns being especially uncertain, the performance as a whole was very spirited, and good enough to enable us to keep our attention fixed on the work itself, and to make it thoroughly interesting and delightful. We owe cordial gratitude to the Musical Society, and to its able conductor, for this performance. The rest of the programme does not require lengthy mention. The solo performances were not remarkable either for merit or demerit; the male chorus was well sung, as was also the chorus from Rienzi, a chorus simple enough in form to be by anybody else than Wagner; it is really charming in its motives and instrumentation, and even in its perpetual modulations, so characteristic of its author.

I approach the topic of the Marie Rose concert, which comes next in order, with some diffidence. Is it not presumption, even damnable heresy, to find fault with a great "prima donna assoluta," the only legitimate successor of Paganini? And yet, if I must confess the honest truth, I not only was not inspired by this renowned lady's singing: I was even dissatisfied and displeased by it. She sang a grand Aria from Il Trovatore, she tore a passion to tatters, she worked her tremolo stop (Italian "wobble"?), and I forgave her; for though I felt even more strongly than ever before that the music was all rubbish, I recognized the fact that, if she must sing and act this stuff, she must needs be melodramatic and sensational. But she also sang a song in English, "It was a dream," by Cowen, and kept on her tremolo all the same. I doubted here, but smothered my doubts because of the semi-pathetic character of the song. But when she sang "Comin' thro' the rye," and "wobbled" through this also, I gave her up. Deliver us from prima donnas who can't sing a single plain straightforward tone in a simple ballad! The programme had this merit, it was a very consistent whole, — not one really noble or fine thing in it, though most of it was better than the forenamed grand Aria. Mme. Rose was very well supported; but I confess to enjoying Brignoli more than all the rest put together. I hope this doesn't do injustice to Mr. Carleton, Mr. Kaiser, or Mr. Pense, whose performances, as such, were certainly creditable; but nothing but the highest virtuosity can redeem a programme of inferior, uninspiring music, and prevent it from being tedious.

Virtuosity we had in Wilhelm's concert, the last one I have to mention, and plenty of it; unfortunately we had also a programme the chief aim of which was the display of virtuosity. But somehow the general tone was higher, and despite the fact that there was little real music played or sung, one could n't help being not only interested but enthusiastic. Your readers need no estimate or eulogy of Wilhelm's playing from me; those who have heard him will believe that in him the highest point of technical excellence has been reached. Pity that we could n't have heard him play the Beethoven Concerto instead of Paganini's. Next to him, Mme. Carreno interested and pleased us; but she also had no music to play which could show whether she is a great artist or only a skillful executant. More's the pity. Why must artists leave all the good music out when they give us a chance to hear them but once? I am firmly convinced that the inferior programmes do not satisfy even the general public as well as the best music would. And however much a virtuoso may rejoice in the consciousness of ability to overcome difficulties, surely every real artist must feel that mere ability to play a violin or piano, considered as an end, is no more worthy of respect than ability to walk a rope stretched over Niagara. It is the end to which technical attainment is a means, the interpretation of the noblest productions of human genius, which makes a violinist higher and better than a tight-rope performer. Will artists ever learn to appeal to what is best in their audiences?

J. C. F.

BOSTON, FEBRUARY 1, 1879.

CONTENTS.

AFGHAN SONG. Fanny Raymond Ritter	17
ETELKA GERSTER IN BERLIN, 1877. Paul Lindau	17
A SOUVENIR OF CHOPIN. T. G. A.	18
"A ROSE BY ANY OTHER NAME," ETC. F. R. Ritter	18
SHORTCOMINGS OF THE OPERA. W. B. Lawson	19
EDITORIAL: "ITALOPHOBIA." W. F. A.	21
CONCERTS IN BOSTON	21
The Mutter. — The Douste Children.
THE OPERA (concluded)	23
MUSICAL CORRESPONDENCE	23
Cincinnati. — New York. — Baltimore. — Philadelphia.
NEW MUSICAL BOOKS	24

Published fortnightly by HOUGHTON, OSGOOD AND COMPANY, 220 Devonshire Street, Boston. Price, 10 cents a number; $2.50
per year.

All the articles not credited to other publications were expressly written for this Journal.

AFGHAN SONG.

RENDERED INTO ENGLISH BY FANNY RAYMOND RITTER.

She. I am the chasm whose hidden ground
Timorous hunter shall never sound;
How canst thou measure those depths profound?
He. I am the rains that, descending, sweep
Interspace, fissure, and channel steep;
I will awaken thine echoing deep!

She. I am a poniard, I dazzle or smite;
I am a serpent, as sage as slight;
I am the teeth of the topmost height!
He. Feint, that defends from the dagger blow,
Knowledge that baffles the snake, I know;
Paths round the uppermost peak may go!

She. Seek not thy wandering way to wend
Up where no chamols yet dared ascend;
Over pine summits my branches bend!
He. I am the silvery flakes that rest
Wrapt in the folds of the snow-cloud's breast;
I will repose on thy lofty crest!

She. I am the motionless mountain mere,
Century-fettered by frost-chains drear;
Hope not to breathe in mine atmosphere!
He. I am the beams of the burning sun,
Warming to life all I shine upon;
I will enkindle that heart of stone!

She. Gate of the garden of Paradise,
Haughty as Khyber, my heart defies
Open approach or astute surprise!
He. Love, dauntless daughter of rock and snow, —
Love strong as mine will the power bestow
Hearts proud as Khyber to win, sweet foe!

ETELKA GERSTER IN BERLIN.

(Translated from Die Gegenwart, May, 1877.)

BERLIN has just had, at the close of winter, a great and unexpected pleasure. At the present hour, can be made the rare, supremely consoling, I might almost say exalting, observation, how an honest and sincere goodwill, in the best sense, such as under ordinary circumstances one is fortunate to find in a single individual, has suddenly seized a whole community. Commonly, through the crowding together of individuals, the nobler emotions are suppressed and the baser are forced to the surface; commonly unkindness, envy, ill-will, rule the masses, and, as a matter of course, the world is mentioned as "the wicked world, the stupid crowd;" but now the sweet miracle is to be seen of Berlin — yes, Berlin, execrated for its coldness and its lacerating criticism — pleasing itself with the office of a loving, tender, and indulgent father.

The young girl who has worked this miracle is called Etelka Gerster; and it is a real tenderness, an affecting and solicitous friendship, that Berlin offers this young maiden.

About four weeks since, there stood in the newspapers the announcement that one of the usual Italian opera companies, such as have been accustomed to favor us for many years, would appear at Kroll's Theatre. Every one knows what is generally to be expected from such a company.

"Sie war nicht in dem Thal geboren,
Man wusste nicht woher sie kam,
Und schnell war ihre Spur verloren,
Sobald sie von uns Abschied nahm."

The "accomplished artists" outbid each other in insignificance. The affair then took its natural course. At the first performance, three weeks ago, the hall of Kroll's Theatre was empty; if we except the critics, who in the way of business were obliged to be present; only a few of those people had strayed in upon whom it depends whether an impression is to be made upon the public; and thus of this singing company it could almost with certainty be prognosticated that it would share the fate of its predecessors, and, like the rose, would blossom but a day.

Three weeks later, and in Kroll's great hall not a seat remains unoccupied! Hundreds and hundreds must turn away from the door disappointed and cross; and the privilege to attend a performance must be paid for, by those who are unable to procure tickets in the customary way, at prices that remind one of the extravagant days of commercial prosperity. The first rows of the parquet are reserved for the court, which is represented in a completeness only seen on extraordinary artistic occasions. The Emperor himself is present long before the beginning of the performance, and salutes his guests. All the high officers of the court have appeared. The gray-haired field-marshal, Moltke, the ministers, the highest representatives of foreign diplomacy and ambassadors, are here; and farther in the hall the eye beholds nearly all the well-known and renowned persons of the capital; and the name of the so recently entirely unknown "artiste," who sings Lucia, is to-day in every mouth!

The younger people cannot remember ever to have seen so sudden and tremendous a triumph; the elders, to find a counterpart, refer to the first days of Henrietta Sontag, Pauline Viardot, and Jenny Lind. The entire public is as if electrified. All the professional critics announce, with a unanimity entirely unexampled, that a wholly unusual, divinely-gifted artist has appeared before us, furnished by beneficent nature with every gift to reach the loftiest heights; and who, under judicious direction, and an intelligent appreciation of her wonderful natural capacity, will also reach them.

The critic's praise sounds this time quite otherwise than when laurels are to be bestowed on those who have already achieved greatness. It is plainly to be perceived in the criticisms, how the writers rejoice to be able to praise the unusual appearance in an unusual manner, and do it with a heartiness and cordiality, with the sincere conviction of doing good, while they demand what is good. At the same time can be read, from the joyous and unreservedly appreciative criticisms, a friendly care for the future of the new bosom child, a sort of melancholy anxiety lest the tender germ may not be allowed to mature, lest, in the foolish haste to force its growth, it may be materially injured, if not perhaps entirely destroyed. And this anxious forethought is fully justified.

Etelka Gerster is a girl in the bloom of youth. Her power of voice is in no way remarkable; she does not possess one of those voices that defy the storm, that through their improving proportions compel universal attention. Her's has nothing striking, nothing on a large scale. It is therefore entirely natural that the directors of both the great German operas, who have had the opportunity to hear Fräulein Gerster, have passed this modest and unassuming nature by, without having made an attempt to win her for their prominent establishments. Her lovely and poetic voice corresponds with her appearance: a simple, sweet face, with intelligent, speaking eyes, modest and maidenly, and no great beauty. Through her entire absence of stage routine (until now she has appeared before no important audience), she shows still in her bearing and gestures a certain want of security and a helplessness which a refined public, already beginning to love the singer, finds charming, but which, perhaps, might be otherwise judged by a foreign audience, before whom Etelka Gerster might now appear with a famous name. Her repertoire is still small.

Everything indicates that Etelka Gerster's duty toward herself and toward us is: to oppose herself steadfastly to all allurements that may hereafter arise, and to show herself firm now amid the temptations of a sudden fame. This restraint must be doubly hard for her at the present time. She has stepped in a day out of complete obscurity into renown. The nowhere justly appreciated prima donna of an insignificant Italian troupe is to-day mentioned in one breath with the first living artists. The stormy applause must have something intoxicating in it, and it would be strange if the incense that rises to her to-day in thick clouds should not bewilder her senses. But at the same time let her make the most earnest efforts, in the midst of the turmoil that must seize her, to preserve for herself some sobriety and deliberation. Let her think of the truth of Voltaire's utterance, that there is no heavier burden than a suddenly renowned name: "Il n'est plus lourd fardeau qu'un nom trop fameux;" and that she must become strong not to succumb under this sweet burden.

The characteristic of Etelka Gerster's art is, as has already been said, not the imposing, powerful, gigantic; it is the lovely, tender, the maidenly charm. It does not transport, it wins; it does not seize, it touches; it does not shake, it holds. A favorable star has so decreed that these charming gifts have been immediately recognized here. It has been an inestimable piece of good fortune that Etelka has sung for the first time before a small audience on Kroll's small stage. Had her debut taken place at the Opera House, in that great building, with a spoiled and not always considerate audience — in which yesterday the trombones blared out the Consecration of Swords, and which to-morrow will be visited, it may be, by the mad dances of the Venus Mount, — who knows, whether the weighty orchestral masses would not have covered the modest voice, and whether the peculiar charm of her soulful tones might not have died away in the vast space, unrecognized before an apathetic public.

Now the case is quite different. Now that it is known how wonderfully beautiful the voice is, how masterful its cultivation, now Etelka Gerster may feel sure in Berlin, wherever she may sing, of full appreciation. How would it be in another, greater, more pretentious city, in which she has not had the opportunity to show herself under the conditions that here offered the proper opportunity for the unfolding of her peculiar art? How would it be in great, noisy Paris, which, rumor says, seeks to allure the young artist who is truly ours?

I must honestly confess that I cannot imagine this timid girl, who has entranced us all by her simple and heartfelt expression, by her masterly execution, as now appearing on the stage of the Parisian opera-house, behind the powerful orchestra, which forbids every fine shading, where one must scream at the side of singers in whom routine and great register of voice take the place of true art.

Etelka Gerster belongs to the same family of artists from which sprang Jenny Lind, and she knew quite well what she did when she consistently refused the most brilliant offers to sing in Paris; it was a true knowledge of herself that directed the Swedish singer. It is a good friend of Etelka Gerster who now repeats to her the beautiful verse from Simrock's "Warning from the Rhine:—"

"Dich bezaubert der Laut, Dich bethöret der Schein, Entzücken fasst dich und Graus."

It is no petty self-seeking, no selfish desire to gain permanently an excellent singer, that has inspired these lines. Berlin, which has installed Etelka Gerster in art, feels itself much more called upon to care that the wonderful talent shall remain preserved to art, and that it shall not be too soon exhausted by a foolish overstraining of its powers, and through compulsion, become entangled in a false position and discouraged. Etelka Gerster has for the present but one duty: to enter upon no new duties. Let her use the coming time, after the close of her present obligations, in completing her studies, and in the extension of her repertoire. Let her strive for a further cultivation in dramatic action, for which she possesses an unlimited capacity, and then—let her stay with us in Germany! She is a complete mistress of the German language; and, besides, Germany offers to a true artist, quite other and more profitable duties than are placed at the disposition of artists in France. Glance only at the repertoire of the Parisian opera: Huguenots and William Tell, William Tell and Huguenots, in pleasing alternation! And when she has really sung the queen in the Huguenots and Bertha in Tell fifty times in the course of the year, she will, in the most favorable case, stand at the end of the year in the same artistic grade at which she stood at the beginning, or perhaps will have descended some grades lower in the path of routine. Mozart's operas alone should be able to hold her back from the serious step of crossing the Rhine.

Etelka Gerster is the appointed singer of Mozart,—let her remain with us! But however her fate may be decided, we deem ourselves fortunate to have been able to greet her at least at the brilliant commencement of her career, and our heartfelt wishes will henceforth accompany her. PAUL LINDAU.

A SOUVENIR OF CHOPIN.

CHOPIN was a genius, pleasant to remember. He was sui generis, unique. When with him, he seemed to you in a certain sense far off and intangible. We are not very familiar with the Polish character, and he was a Pole, and, as such even, not like other Poles, though they have a dash of the charm and mysticism of the East; but he had a personality which was of no country. Like Hawthorne, and made them both evanescent and weird, if not spectral and unreal.

"Something o'erinformed the tenement of clay,"

The genius of each precisely answered to that feeling of remoteness which we had when near them. If Hawthorne had not written a line, if Chopin had not traced a note, we still should have felt each to be a genius. For this mysterious something which we call genius is not composed wholly of the brain, but the entire nature and temperament go to its formation. And in all geniuses it is this total force which agitates and interests us. Shelley is another instance. He is never familiar, humdrum, and ordinary. We hear of his sailing paper boats, or wandering with a book into the forest, but we know that something kept him apart from others who do so. It is not by choice, but by a high necessity, that they ravish us with their gifts. The sacred fire, so bright to us, often hurt and branded them with pain.

Chopin, with blonde hair and light blue eyes, had a whiteness of complexion all his own. We feel sure that Shelley's face shone; and from Chopin's came a sad and plaintive brightness which excited your highest sympathy.

Another great genius was living with him at the same time in Paris; but what worlds kept them apart, in temperament as in gift! Rossini seemed the embodiment of jovial worldliness. A thousand Barbers seemed to look out from his merry eyes, and in his capacious frame one could fancy stored, in order as on shelves, a thousand operas.

He often dined at a table d'hôte, where I met him, and, when there, seemed the king of it. His wit, his laughter, his spacious plenitude of jovial strength, illumined and led the company. He seemed happy with a crowd about him; and is not his sunny music made for the many, full of sociable fire and a nobleness which the crowd could understand, if not emulate? But in no such gatherings would you find Chopin. He shrank like a sensitive plant from the rude touch of the world. His music cannot be called popular, or nimbly expressive of pleasant commonplaces. There is a wail through it, like the cry "Finis Poloniæ!" attributed to his heroic countryman. There is something maladif, saccadé, petulant, whimsical, in it, full of surprises. I should suppose it would be called, as art, very personal and distinguished. It was written for the select few, for those who suffer and for those who think. Therefore it was a pleasure, in every sense rare, to encounter him.

I had several times that pleasure. I heard him at a concert in St. James' Square, London, where, in a nobleman's house, all that was choicest in that capital came to do him honor. While he played, a row of prima donnas stood behind his piano,—Viardot, Garcia, Madame Sartoris, and others. He seemed to play as much upon the expressive nerves of their faces as upon the ivory of the piano. His mood, his touch, were reflected in their looks, and as his transparent hand and long, far-reaching fingers shot along the keys, there was a mute echo in their sympathetic eyes. Through the room there was that feeling of exaltation which is known when something superior is acting upon you. Each heart by itself conversed with that other, so alien, so mystic, so impossible, in the heavy atmosphere of London.

I had the great pleasure of dining with him afterwards, with a few of his lady friends. The whole man was changed. The reaction had come. There was the détente, the unbending, the escape from that too high strain. He was infinitely frolicsome, playful, and bizarre. By the law of sympathetic antagonism, antipathy, he was obliged to ridicule and make fun of a fat lady and her daughter, who had sat just before his eyes. He mimicked the mother's suggestions to her daughter as to when applause was fit, and the fine efforts this worthy lump of prose had made to follow the flights of so strange a bird.

But he was a genius in all this as much as in his playing; and it was delightful to see the gamesome boy appear, instead of the lyrical and suffering poet. One of the ladies, with much simplicity, asked me to describe Niagara to him, that he might write a piece of music upon it. I did so, and he was pleased, but it was asking too much, even of such a genius as his, to describe what he had not seen, and it was very plain he would not care to get his wares at second-hand.

I also had the privilege of sitting with him, an old lady friend of mine our sole companion, while Jenny Lind sang for the first time in London the "Mariage de Figaro." There was something in her exceptional and Northern nature which pleased him. They were, perhaps, in their intensity and strangeness, somewhat akin. He spoke of her having accepted his advice to banish all additions, and sing the music simply, just as Mozart wrote it. It made one of those evenings one never forgets; and, alas, I have none such afterwards to remember in the society of the illustrious master. T. G. A.

"A ROSE BY ANY OTHER NAME," ETC.

A MUSICAL work may sound "as sweet," although some other name than that of its true creator has been bestowed on it; but, should we call a rose a violet, would not even a blind man think its scent, if quite "as sweet," yet a little foreign and unexpected? Many lovely children of the composer's imagination are wandering over the world under the disguise of names that do not belong to them, although their rightful ones possess an equal claim to consideration.

Even the half-cultivated amateur now knows that the gentle little waltz of sixteen measures, No. 2 of the set "Les Viennoises," Opus 9, by Franz Schubert, is the composition of Franz Schubert; yet its soft melancholy is still misnamed "Le Désir," and refractory publishers, here and there, still persist in presenting it to the musical world, a poor solitary on the desert island of a "one-page sheet," as a daughter of Beethoven! Every pianist knows, too, that the little waltz still occasionally encountered under the title of "Weber's Last Waltz" is not by Weber, but by Reissiger, who has vainly remonstrated against the injustice of depriving him of the credit due to him as its composer. The list of works whose authorship is contested is a long one; among these Mozart's Twelfth Mass will be remembered, as the Ritter von Koechel and Otto Jahn, not to mention other authorities, have decided this to have been written by some other composer than Mozart.

If Schubert has been unjustly deprived of the credit of having composed his pensive "La Mélancholie," misnamed Beethoven's "Le Désir," a sort of compensation has been offered by destiny, or the publishers, in the song "L'Adieu" ("The Last Greeting"), printed as No. 3 in the Lanner (Paris) edition of forty songs by Schubert, with French text. This song was really composed by an amateur named Wegrauch, at Dorpat, in Livonia, in 1820, and entitled by him "Nach Osten." Another amateur, a Prince W—, was accustomed to sing it successfully at evening parties in Paris, announcing it as a Lied by Schubert (the only Lied composer then known in Paris), either from carelessness, or—as Lenz suggests—to spare Parisians the trouble of pronouncing another rough German name. And as a Schubert Lied, under the title "L'Adieu," it was afterwards published in Paris.

The claim of the fine sacred song, "Pietà, Signore, di me dolente," to be considered as the work of Stradella is disputed by some authorities; but as by far the greater number of these agree as to its genuineness, we are at liberty to take the side that pleases us best in this musical drawn battle.

But another fine aria has been, this time altogether erroneously, attributed of late to Stradella: I mean that entitled "O del mio dolce ardor," from Gluck's opera, Paris and Helen. Every student of musical literature is aware that this opera was composed by Gluck in 1769, two years after the composition of his Alceste; but it has been entirely dropped from the modern opera repertory, though the earlier produced Alceste is still occasionally represented, at least in part. Paride ed Elena; however, is so little known that few persons, even of some culture, are acquainted with the score (published in 1770), or its preface, replete, like all the (too little) literary work Gluck gave to the world, with the elevated thought, the fine critical insight, to be expected from so great an artist, interspersed with not a few passages of self-defense against the unjust judgments of some of his contemporary reviewers. Alas, that genius should ever be forced to waste its valuable time and powers on such self-defense! Gluck, however, as a reformer, could scarcely have hoped to escape the auto da fé altogether.

The aria, "O del mio dolce ardor," is the second number in the first act of Paris and Helen, and is sung by Paris, who, landing near Sparta with his sailors, thus expresses his emotion on first treading the earth trodden by Helen, and breathing the air she breathes. The melody is large and noble, and yet "elegiac as a soft Italian dream," as Marx beautifully says, and the instrumentation of the accompaniment is altogether admirable. The singing of Paris is interrupted by a sacrificial dance and offering at the shrine of Venus; then Paris continues, in the aria, "Dall' aurea sua stella;" then another dance intervenes; and, before the entrance of Amor, Paris concludes his fine scena d'entrata with the aria, "Spiagge amate," another powerful and charming melody, an appeal to nature—the meadows amid which Helen wanders, the fountains where she crowns her hair with roses—to disclose to him the spot where dwells the most beautiful among all women. The action of the opera then proceeds.

Mrs. Adelaide Sartoris, in her novelette, "A Week at a French Country House," has also erroneously attributed Gluck's aria to Stradella; and the error is continually repeated in concert programmes, when the song is performed. Not to speak of historical accuracy, what a singular error of taste to include the melodious sighs of Paris in a collection of "classical sacred songs," entitled "Sion," as has been done by Schlesinger's publishing house (attributing the air to Stradella)! And how audibly, notwithstanding, the melody, expression, declamation of Gluck, speak to us in every measure of the composition!

Then there is the exquisite motet by Anerio, "Adoramus te, Christe," the credit of which has been given to Palestrina (who needs no credit), etc., etc. My musically cultivated readers may recall many other examples of works whose authorship is either disputed or erroneously bestowed; it is, however, strange that such an example as that of Gluck's "O del mio dolce ardor" should hitherto have escaped remark.

FANNY RAYMOND RITTER.

NOTE.—Some years ago (April, 1869), we copied into this Journal the interesting programmes of some historical recitals given in New York by the writer of the above article, in one of which appears the aria, "O del mio dolce ardor," rightly attributed to Gluck. We believe that Mrs. Ritter was the first to introduce it to an American musical public.—ED.

THE SHORTCOMINGS OF THE OPERA.

BY WALTER B. LAWSON, B. MUS.

ADOPTING as a normal condition the justification of opera conveyed in the definition of Dr. Marx, who tells us that it is "a drama in which, in lieu of ordinary speech, an elevated utterance, the language of music and song, is introduced, with the same artistic rights and truth, as, in the higher drama, poetry supersedes the prose of common life," we are next led to inquire more closely into its nature as an art-work, which may be described as an endeavor to portray, for man's delectation and instruction, some of the countless phases of human existence,—not only the superficial existence which society sees around it, but also an inner life which we all know from experience to exist, and from which spring "fountains of joy and of sorrow." The drama is sometimes entirely based upon these secret emotions,—for instance, a so-called psychological drama of modern date entitled "The Bella." To this end, poetry, music, painting, and mimetics jointly contribute, and inasmuch as human existence is made up of moments of indifference and of passionate energy, of moments spent in self-communion or in the society of our fellow-creatures, so it became necessary to create in the opera forms of expression, which, while receiving additions and improvements at the hands of many generations of master-minds, were acknowledged by them to be justly suitable. These forms are recitative, aria, duet, ensemble, chorus, etc., all of which are susceptible of modification, according to the number, character, or length of the episodes of emotion. It was also found necessary to adopt the overture, interlude, postlude, as a means of preparing an audience for what was to follow, to allow time for the accomplishment of an act, for the purpose of commenting upon the same, or for other reasons.

It will at once appear that these forms require some sort of justification; for instance, it is quite contrary to the laws of nature that a person should speak, still less sing, his thoughts aloud, or that two or more persons should be guilty simultaneously of the same thing. Yet in the monologue of drama and the aria of opera, in the dialogue and duet, etc., such a proceeding occurs. This is a privilege of art without which it would be impossible to represent life as it really is, and it finds sufficient justification in the pithy remark of Goethe: "Art is so called simply because it is not Nature;" but, in addition to this, it may be observed that the audience while listening to an aria is perfectly aware that it involves a very irregular proceeding, but is quite content to be deceived with regard to the nature of monologue, as it is to be misled by a departure from the Aristotelian laws respecting the dramatic unities. "The fact is," says Dr. Johnson, "the spectators are always in their senses, and know that the stage is only a stage, and that the players are only players."

We have, then, a creation in which several arts work together according to certain laws, and subject to the restrictions imposed by form for the purpose of producing through the medium of various senses one and the same impression in an enhanced degree. In this combination the drama is not to be wholly sacrificed to the music, nor is the music slavishly to follow the drama, or act merely as commentator; its province is, rather, to render in all its psychological significance each phase of feeling or action which is involved in the drama; nay, more, it is to suggest and complete that which words would be unable to express (we do not agree with E. A. Poe, the American poet, who held that language could express everything); it is here the "inarticulate unfathomable speech" which lays bare the deeper emotions of the human breast.

A coöperation of arts after this manner naturally offers to the artist such a catalogue of difficulties that we can hardly wonder at not yet having attained to the ideal of opera. As it is, the weaknesses of the present style are evident in every score and every libretto; and moreover they are not such as admit of dispute, but stand there in all the abjectness of self-conviction. To point some of them out is the purpose of this essay, and I may perhaps be excused if in so doing I adopt an arrangement of topics which has no greater recommendation than that of being most convenient to myself. The following are a few of the "counts" on which opera may be indicted:—

- (1.) Non-accordance of musical expression with the expression of the text.
- (2.) Subordination of (a) orchestra to song; (b) song to orchestra.
- (3.) Chaotic accumulation of instrumental and vocal forces.
- (4.) Flimsy character or abhorrent nature of plot.
- (5.) Stereotyped character of recitative.
- (6.) Psychologically unjustifiable overtures.
- (7.) Mutilation involved in adapting a drama to a musical setting.

The following remarks, and references to well-known works may now support these charges:—

(1.) We have all heard of the disputes to which the union of music and drama has given rise. The wars between the Gluckists and Piccinists in the eighteenth, and between the Wagnerites and Anti-Wagnerites in the nineteenth century, have served to concentrate general attention upon the matter, but without affecting it permanently; for the idea of opera at the present day is much the same as it was a quarter of a century before Gluck's classical period; and, as far as can be foreseen, the opera as evolved by the genius of Mozart will not cease to hold the stage while that which is form, power, and beauty is appreciated by musical artists. This I say without venturing an opinion as to the respective merits of the rival systems, which would only lead me from the object which I have in view; nor, on the other hand, do I wish to suggest that Mozart's operas are free from faults in this respect, even if their type of construction be true. The affinity between words and music has not always been rightly understood or sufficiently respected, and many have unconsciously erred in their judgment with regard to the very nature of the combination,—which must be alike pleasing to the intellectual and to the sensuous perceptions.

Two of the most flagrant examples in classic opera of a total disregard for the sentiment of the text may be found in the Zauberflöte of Mozart, in the rôle of the "Queen of the Night." The first of these arie contains no less than thirteen bars of extremely florid writing upon the syllable ce of "mercede;" and the second, twice eight bars upon the word e, commencing after a rest with which we should be satisfied to conclude the phrase; also eleven further bars of mixed legato and staccato phrases upon the second syllable of "crudel," the whole being broken up by pauses of three quarters of a bar and less. Moreover, the voice compass extends in these arie to the F in alt. And for all this where is the justification?

The physical effect produced in the singer by such performances must be known to every one. Song which imposes such severe strain upon the vocal organs (evident in the fact that these arie are more often than not transposed into other keys to suit the singers, and are even then sung by them at the utmost limit of their voices) cannot but be detrimental to art. To those who may ask for proof of this, I strongly recommend an essay written by Herr Gloggnier, formerly professor of singing at the Conservatorium of Leipzig, which was published in several of the early numbers of the Musikalisches Wochenblatt.¹ Therein they may read, or get a German scholar to read for them, of the superb organs of vocalists who have passed away: of soprani possessing powers of voice unknown at the present day, of tenori who could for many seconds completely overtone the blast of a trumpet; therein they may study the causes which have led to the decline of vocal power which is thus rendered apparent. With this decline the name of Verdi is frequently associated.

¹ Translated in vol. xxxi. of this journal. Herr Gloggnier was for some time connected with the Boston Conservatory of Music.

But to return to the subject. In Donna Anna's arie in the second act of Don Juan, we find ten bars devoted to vocalizzi upon the last syllable of "sentirà," the broad vowel offering such a tempting opportunity for the display of the singer's technic. Here the text is certainly not suggestive of such tours de force; indeed, there is no psychological justification whatever. It is worthy of remark that in the first arie of Don Ottavio's affianced, which might with greater reason have been written in the florid style which characterizes that now under consideration, there is absolutely nothing of the kind; it is simply true.

As a concluding illustration of my meaning, I will quote the so-called "Jewel-Song," from Gounod's opera Faust. This is not wholly without justification; the shake (which Mozart has used to express cowardice) is here highly expressive of Margherita's excitement; but the succeeding phrases are open to the charge of being somewhat ordinary and unsuggestive.

The non-classical works of Donizetti, Bellini, and others offer innumerable instances of these faults, although worthy of study for finish in vocal writing; but the beautiful vocalization of Italian opera does not compensate us for the shallowness of composers, who, to quote Dr. Schlüter, "make their heroes encounter death to the tune of a lively waltz." But, as we have seen, there are faults almost as glaring in classic opera; and, amongst these the bravura arie is not the least prominent. Than this, no variety of the arie has met with more abuse. In most instances a direct concession to the vocalist, we may find it in our hearts to excuse the divergence from the strict rules of art, although in the studio we may feel necessitated to shake our heads over certain leaves in the scores of, for instance, Mozart and Rossini, knowing as we do that the vocal portion was adapted in the one case to the voice of a sister-in-law, in the other to the somewhat blasé organ of a wife. Why is it, O ye gods, that even those things which we are accustomed to regard as a means of raising us above the level of mere animal existence into an ideal world should be open to the suspicion conveyed by an astute lieutenant of police, in the words, "Où est la femme"? Why?

(2.) (a.) The subordination of orchestra to song is a well-known characteristic of Italian opera, and in some of them is carried to such an extreme that the usual demands upon an orchestra are reduced to little more than rhythmical accompaniment, so strongly marked as to be presumably a source of delight to individuals of terpsichorean proclivities. Those musicians whose patience has been exhausted by the sheer monotony induced by a performance of, for instance, La Traviata, with all its aggravation of beats, as regular and continuous as those of the human pulse, will bear me out in what I say. It is here that we feel the inestimable superiority of the opera of Mozart, or of the new school, in which the orchestra plays such an important part.

This same principle exists in another and better form. In the seventeenth century, Lully, in his endeavors to give due prominence to the words, adopted a style of art in which not only form was wanting, but melody—the very essence of music—was sacrificed. In the eighteenth century, Gluck brought these ideas to a higher stage of development; but it was left to Wagner in the nineteenth century to attain to what some are inclined to regard as the highest form of musical dramatic art. These three periods evidence enormous strides in the development of the orchestra, which, while being subordinated to the drama, shows itself, in contradistinction to the mere accompaniment of Italian opera, more in the light of commentator and enhancer. It is peculiarly instructive to consider the differences and resemblances which exist between the three-century-old recitative opera of Jacopo Peri and the musical drama of Wagner, minute in detail and colossal in proportions.

(b.) Beethoven's Fidelio instances faults of the opposite nature. A master of the orchestra, he gave to it an undue prominence over the vocal parts. It would seem, that the human voice did not offer him sufficient scope, for the same thing is noticeable in all his vocal works. A contributor to a musical lexicon says of him, "He has written more music that is sung than vocal music;" and Mensel, the author of an excellent volume upon his life and works, tells us: "Not seldom he gave way to the temptation of raising the declamatory element above the melodic, and the lyric above the dramatic, and of hiding the want of progress and activity by means of the orchestra."

(3.) The masters of the modern school, following the example set them by Hector Berlioz, who has developed to caricature the powerful orchestration of Beethoven, seek, by increasing the number of instruments in ordinary use, reviving those which have become obsolete, and adopting others newly invented, to increase the means of effect at their disposal; and this is perhaps necessary in some respects,—for instance, to restore the disturbed balance of wind and string, to accommodate the orchestra to the growing dimensions of concert-halls, opera-houses, etc.; but for all this, there has undoubtedly been an excess of zeal in this direction, and effects have been produced which may be catalogued with those reported during the leviathan festival held at Boston some years ago. The small orchestras of Mozart are regarded disdainfully by these gentlemen, who, however, are for the most part wholly unable to produce similarly powerful effects, even with all their additions and multiplications. Notably in the scores of Richard Wagner, we find a heaping together of vocal and instrumental forces; in fact, there are passages in Lohengrin which amount to little more than an inexpressive jumble. Take, for instance, the chorus "Ein Wunder ist geschehen," quoted by Lobe in his work on instrumentation, where, besides the string quartet, there are 3 flauti, 3 oboe, 3 clarionetti, 3 fagotti and tuba, 4 horns (in E and A), 3 trombones, and the timpani playing fortissimo against the chorus of mixed voices. "Who," asks Lobe, "amongst those who have heard the opera, can affirm that he received any other than a most hazy impression of the men's voices sounding out of the noisy orchestral tutti?" With respect to the phrase "Dank der Herr" of the females, he further says: "With the eye, one can see it in the partitur, but no mortal ear either of the present or of the remotest future will hear anything of it." The so-called "Prügelscene" in the Meistersinger offers a further instance of miscalculation. These are, of course, but occasional lapses, for, generally, Wagner's orchestration and instrumentation are blameless, and he is, moreover, like Liszt, a perfect master of orchestral color.

Meyerbeer also laid himself open to censure on the same score, as indeed upon almost every other, according to the opinions of eminent art critics and connoisseurs. — London Musical Standard.

(To be continued.)

THE Cincinnati Musical Association connected with the College of Music offer a prize of $1000 for the best choral and orchestral composition of about one hour in length.

Dwight's Journal of Music.

SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 1, 1879.

"ITALOPHOBIA."

WE have heard a good deal about this curious disease lately. If we were to credit some accounts, almost all of our resident musicians are afflicted with it, and are trying their best to inoculate the general musical public. The symptoms of this fell malady are described as a tendency to smile contemptuously, to exhibit signs of boredom, at times even to show disgust and horror, accompanied in extreme cases with gnashing of teeth and profane ejaculations, while listening to music written by any Italian composers, with the single exception of Luigi Cherubini. The disease is also said to attack musicians with various degrees of severity. For instance, a very severe case will be accompanied by all the above-mentioned symptoms; in a less violent one the person attacked with it will show no signs of discomfort, will even be pleasurably excited while listening to Spontini's operas, Boccherini's quartets, Rossini's Barbiere, or Bellini's Sonnambula; in very mild cases the diseased subject will be roused to fury only by Verdi, Donizetti, Mercadante, Gordigiani, Petrella, and a few others. One of the most remarkable characteristics of Italophobia is said to be that those persons who are subject to it, especially in its more malignant forms, are really pleased at their own morbid condition, and do all in their power to spread it among their friends; that they strive to become a sort of pathological propagandists, and even to establish a musical inquisition for the torture of healthy music-lovers who are not afflicted as they are. The effects of the disease upon its victims are described as most disastrous, generally inducing desiccation, or ossification of the heart, and an abnormal development of the brain, notably of the mathematical faculty; if allowed to run its course, unimpeded by powerful antidotes, it results in a species of semi-insanity, or monomania. We are told that this frightful disease was first brought to the United States by Teutonic emigrants, who evaded the quarantine laws, and thus gave it to the inhabitants of this country, among whom it spread rapidly; in the vicinity of Boston it has assumed all the dread proportions of a raging epidemic.

Just see what terrible things may be happening in the very midst of our community, without our having the faintest suspicion of it! For surely we should never have known anything about this insidious Italophobia, had not some public-spirited Italians discovered it, and kindly told us of it. Some curious remedies have been recently proposed. They are admirably fitted to combat a disease of such peculiar nature, one against which homœopathy, allopathy, electricity, and the water-cure have shown themselves to be utterly impotent. One's only doubt is whether these remedies are such as our people can take with safety, and whether they may not have some unhappy results, such as softening of the brain, and fatty degeneration of the heart. Let us see for a moment what medicaments this new Italian pharmacopœia has discovered. There seem to be only two.

The first is "that the patient should banish all prejudice in favor of any particular school of music." A most excellent tonic, and one that can be taken with equal benefit by both physician and patient.

The second is that the diseased subject should subscribe to the following articles of faith, and implicitly believe in them.

"(1.) An amateur is a better judge of art than an artist, for the latter has given up a great portion of his life to the study of art, has acquired an extended knowledge of the subject, has consequently certain fixed ideas and opinions, and looks at art through scholastic spectacles. The amateur's soul, on the contrary, is a tabula rasa, upon which art can inscribe what it pleases, unhindered.

"(2.) One work of art is not better in its way than another, except in so far as it appeals more or less strongly to the emotions. The sentimental emotions are the only trustworthy criterion of æsthetic value.

"(3.) The opera is the highest form of music, because it includes all other forms.

"(4.) The good and bad in art are merely a matter of individual taste."

When taken to be well shaken, and the cure is certain.

Ah, but good, kind doctors, what a dose you propose to us! How can we ever swallow it? What æsthetic cesophagus is large enough to admit it? Yours may be, but surely ours is not.

In the first place I, for one, wholly deny that an amateur is a better judge of music than a musician. To quote from Berlioz: "If the art of music is at once an art and a science; if, to have a thorough knowledge of it, one must go through complex and quite long studies; if, to feel the emotions it arouses, one must have a cultured intelligence and a practiced ear; if, to judge of the value of musical works, one must have a well-furnished memory, in order to be able to make comparisons, and, in fine, know many things of which one is necessarily ignorant when one has not learned them" (all of which suppositions I most potently believe to be true), then, I say, the musician has an incalculable advantage over the amateur. Then I also deny that any art should be judged on a purely emotional basis. A picture, poem, statue or musical composition which appeals strongly to the emotions, is not necessarily a fine work. One has to ask, whose emotions it appeals to? Tupper may affect a boor very much as Shakespeare affects a cultivated man. The æsthetic faculty is not simply emotional; some of the very grandest works of art are those which have no hold upon the emotional part of man whatever. Which produces, or attempts to produce, the more emotional effect upon the spectator, the Marcus Aurelius before the Capitol, or one of Canova's pugilists? And which is the greater work of art? The answer need not be given.

As for the opera being the highest form of music, because it includes all others, one must remember that the opera is, and ever will be, a compromise. No art can attain to its highest development by encroaching upon the domain of another art. No art can attain to its highest development by giving way to the encroachments of another. In so far as music reigns supreme in opera, it tends to weaken the dramatic truth and vigor of the form. In so far as the dramatic element predominates, it will tend to dwarf and disturb the musical part. And then, does the opera include all other forms? Who would ever venture to introduce a well-worked out string quartet into an opera? Where do we even find a vigorously elaborated fugued chorus in one? This is enough to prove our point that the opera does not include all other forms.

When it is said that the good and bad in art are only matters of individual taste, I, for one, can only say that, by nature and education, I am entirely unable to imagine how any one can uphold such a proposition. The good and bad in art, as in all things, are, to be sure, purely relative. But to deny the existence of certain eternal canons of art seems as wild as to deny the existence of natural laws.

But, after all, is this Italophobia a wholly morbid state? Is it the result of prejudice? I cannot think it to be so. If I may make so bold as to speak, not for myself alone, but as one of a class, I would say that there are many persons whose firm and matured conviction it is that modern Italian composers, in spite of their surpassing genius and natural gifts, have by no manner of means reached so high a degree of development in the art of musical composition as the Germans have. It is no one-sided question of nationality, it is simply a question of what is better and what is worse. And who shall blame us for keeping our strongest enthusiasm for what we honestly hold to be the better? We recognize as well as any one that the average Italian music appeals to the feelings in a very different way from the works of those men whom we reverence as classic masters. But we are firmly convinced that the classic German masters appeal to the feelings in a far higher way than the Italians, and appeal more strongly to them. W. F. A.

CONCERTS IN BOSTON.

THE EUTERPE. This is the name of a new association, which has been formed quite silently and privately, with just enough of mystery to pique curiosity, and just enough of exclusiveness to make the many wish to count among the few. That is to say: the purposes are indefinite, the membership is limited. Its object, as stated at the head of its by-laws, is "to promote the cause of Music;" but the document is non-committal as to special fields in musical art which the society designs to cultivate; all fields are open to it. But so far as its mission may be read by its first practical examples of activity, it is a most important one, and most desirable to have well represented, namely, the giving of classical chamber concerts (string quartets, etc.), in the best style practicable and with the best artists that can be obtained. Amid the crowd of concerts, great and small, the wilderness of programmes, pure and mixed, Boston has too long lacked this element. It was not always so! Twenty and thirty years ago the violin quartets, quintets, trios, with piano, etc., of Haydn, Mozart, Beethoven, Mendelssohn, Schubert, Schumann, and the rest, were of regular and frequent occurrence winter after winter. Those were the days when the Mendelssohn Quintette Club stayed at home and had not begun their "apostolic" circuits through the West.

Chamber music, in the nature of the case, is only for small audiences, not much more than a parlor circle, select, appreciative, quietly attentive, in a hall of moderate size. As the quartet for strings forms in itself the quintessence, as it were, of musical art, so its audience must in some sense correspond. The Euterpe, therefore, wisely (at least for the present) limits itself to 150 members, each paying an annual assessment of seven dollars, for which he receives two tickets for each of the four concerts to be given (until otherwise ordered) on the second Wednesday of December, January, February, and March. This leaves a small margin of room for a few more privileged listeners. The executive committee are bound to "provide the very best performances that the treasury of the association will allow." There is a special programme committee for each concert. The officers for 1878-79 are: President, Charles C. Perkins; Vice-President, B. J. Lang; Secretary, Arthur Reed; Treasurer, Wm. F. Apthorp; Directors, Julius Eichberg, W. S. Fenollosa, John Orth, George L. Osgood, Hamilton Osgood, John K. Paine, J. C. D. Parker, and H. G. Tucker.

The first concert was given on Wednesday evening, January 15, at Mechanics' Hall. The aspect of the room was agreeably social and artistic, the platform for the performers being raised upon the middle of the floor, surrounded by the listeners in hollow square. The artists engaged for the occasion were of the New York Philharmonic Club: Messrs. Richard Arnold, first violin; Julius Gantzberg, second violin; Emil Gramm, viola; and Carl Werner 'cello. But, Mr. Werner being ill, Mr. Henry Mollenhauer, also of New York, took his place. The programme was certainly most choice, consisting of two important quartets: Quartet in F major, Op. 59, No. 1; dedicated to Prince Rasoumofsky; composed in 1806, L. Van Beethoven. (Allegro. Allegretto vivace e sempre scherzando. Adagio molto e mesto. Thème Russe; allegro.) Quartet in A minor, Op. 41, No. 1; dedicated to Felix Mendelssohn Bartholdy; composed in 1842. Robert Schumann. (Introduzione; andante espressivo, allegro. Scherzo; presto. Adagio. Presto.)

There are few, if any, compositions in this form to which we can listen with more interest. They are such works as the most appreciative and most experienced music-lovers and musicians like to hear whenever they have a chance. Yet, considering that a generation has grown up here innocent of all acquaintance with the earlier quartets of Beethoven, or with those of Haydn and Mozart, so familiar once, and that already in this seventh quartet Beethoven enters his most profound and mystical period, as it were sounding new depths in advance of his contemporary compositions in other forms (the third, fourth, and fifth Symphonies, the Sonata Appassionata, Overture to Coriolanus, etc.), might it not have been wiser, from an educational point of view at least, to begin with some of the clearest and most readily appreciable models of the quartet form and genius? After such long privation we fancy we could listen with an appetite to all the six quartets of Beethoven's Op. 18, given seriatim, — say two of them each evening, with a third for contrast from another master; or say, one by Haydn or Mozart, one early one of Beethoven, and one more modern on a larger scale. In this way the younger generation might learn the form and structure of the quartet in simpler specimens, and thus lay the foundation for a right understanding of the later works. But we make no complaint, and we are well aware that for the carrying out of our suggestion there should be ten or twenty quartet concerts in a season, instead of only four. As it was, the concert was exceedingly enjoyable.

This Quartet in F is one of Beethoven's most imaginative creations, revealing him in all his moods. We cannot weary of the opening theme: it starts with the violoncello, broad and full of suggestion, grows to a triumphant climax in the first violin, then is answered by the curt staccato chords of an equally suggestive counter theme; then both flow on together gathering a wealth of fresh accessory ideas to swell the stream, developing into a complete, strange, fascinating whole. Then the Allegretto Scherzando is led off by a playful rhythmic figure of four bars on one note, a sort of mocking or coquettish challenge, by the 'cello, which is answered sotto voce by a most quaint and piquant theme in the second violin; then comes the working up, with truly magic art, the episodes, the modulations, and the sudden transformations into remote keys, keeping imagination on the qui vive with eager and delighted interest to the end of a very long movement. The scene and the mood change entirely with the lovely Adagio, one of the most wonderful revelations of the deepest tenderness, the most profound and spiritual experience of the master's inmost soul. It cannot be described, it must be heard and felt. But how strangely it passes, through a slight airy figure floating through several bars of fine divisions in the first violin, into a long trill which covers the almost surreptitious introduction of the seemingly frivolous Thème Russe (a compliment to his Russian patron), — again, for the third time, the 'cello leading off! The little theme, however, is so treated with all the marvelous resources of his imitative and contrapuntal art, and set in so many charming lights, presented under such Protean aspects, that you believe it full of meaning and importance before you are done with it. On the whole, the fantastic element predominates in this quartet; but it is such fine fantasy, so essentially poetic! and then the Adagio has seriousness enough to temper all.

The performance was well studied, accurate, smooth, finished, elegant, with few exceptions. All was distinct, the phrasing nice; yet it was rather a subdued and dreamlike impression which it gave us. It was delightful to read the score of it, hearing the notes translated into sounds in that way; yet it was more like recalling it in thought, in calm fireside contemplation, than like being moved and thrilled by the Beethoven fire and accent. We think it might have been played with more fire to advantage. Mr. Arnold's leading is sure and even, hardly strong and quickening. We were much struck by the beauty and power of tone, and the masterly execution on that important instrument, so seldom heard at its best, the viola, in the hands of Mr. Gramm.

The first of Schumann's three Quartets, Op. 41, is also a tone-poem of a deep and earnest spirit, imaginative, not at all commonplace, but of decided individuality. It is one of Schumann's most ideal, and yet clearest works. The A-minor key of the musing introduction (two-four measure) a single page, lasts only to the entrance of the Allegro, which is in F major, a delicate and subtle movement in six-eight rhythm. This was nicely rendered. The Scherzo (Presto) again in A minor, six-eight, nimble and fairy-like, with a brief Intermezzo in four-four time, is most original and charming; this was perhaps the most felicitous performance of the evening. The Adagio, in F, is a marvel of beauty, and deep, thoughtful feeling. There is nothing morbid or unclear about it. It will reveal new charm and meaning the oftener it is heard. There is great life and stir and vigor in the Presto Finale, mostly in A minor, but ending in the major, and it was well brought out.

For the second concert the two works selected are: the Sextet (for strings) by Brahms, and the good old B-flat Quintet by Mendelssohn.

"WUNDERKINDER." We have had within these last weeks two fresh revelations of undoubted musical genius. One was Etelka Gerster's singing; the other was the performance of those truly wonderful child pianists, Miles. Louisa and Jeanne Douste. Such things come once in an age. These children, born in London of French parents, — one a serious looking maiden of twelve and a half years, the other, a minute speck of humanity, who looks all eyes and merry smiles, only seven and a half, — came to this country with the Mapleson opera troupe. Their principal teacher in London has been M. Mortier de Fontaine, a distinguished player of Beethoven, and, if we remember rightly, one who was near to Chopin, if not for some time his pupil. The gift of the children seems to have been not recognized from the first, but properly respected. They have been made at home almost exclusively with good classical music, and they evidently love and feel it.

In response to a very general request, so glowing was the report of those who had been hearing them in private, they gave a concert at

Mechanics' Hall on Thursday, January 16. A severe snow-storm kept many away, yet there was an encouraging attendance on the part of our most refined and appreciative music-lovers. This was the remarkable programme of these little ones: —

Concerto No. 9, in G major (orchestra represented at a second piano-forte) Mozart.
Allegro — Andante — Allegretto.

(Cadenzas by Mortier de Fontaine.)

JEANNE DOUSTE.

Song without words, No. 1, in E Mendelssohn.
Arabesque, Op. 18 Schumann.

LOUISA DOUSTE.

Fugue Bach.
Gigue Mozart.

JEANNE DOUSTE.

Theme and Variations, for Four Hands Beethoven.

The little Jeanne mounted the piano stool with difficulty, looking laughingly round upon the audience as if conscious of the joke of it. The beautiful, refined mould of her head and forehead — and of the sister likewise — interested all. Mr. Lang, at a second piano, led off with the orchestral prelude of the Mozart Concerto, of which she played the three difficult movements, including the long, elaborate Cadenzas, not only with fine technical precision, excellent phrasing, with an amount of force astonishing for one so small, but with an expressive accent, a seemingly instinctive light and shade, which made it all as beautiful as it was wonderful. You were not only surprised, you enjoyed it as artistic interpretation. Though her fingers could not span an octave, yet she brought out every chord, and sequences of chords, with full significance. Though she could not reach the pedals, yet she contrived somehow to produce pedal effects. It was the instinct of genius, the inner sense of how it ought to sound, that put power into her fingers where it was required. Now and then she suddenly struck out a passage of two or three bars, putting it in so strong a light, that all were startled and amused and broke out into spontaneous applause. It was simply the child's own musical sense and feeling that did that, and nerves and muscles found themselves for the occasion. Her reception of the applause, and indeed her whole manner, throughout the concert, was perfectly simple and childlike.

The Bach Fugue (not one of the most interesting) was played with perfect distinctness and clear individualization of the parts, and with that vitality of touch and accent which is found only in those in whom musical feeling and perception are innate and positive. It was good, clear, solid, fugue playing. And the Mozart Gigue was all it was meant to be. In the four-hand Theme and Variations by Beethoven little Jeanne took the upper part, as well as in one of Brahms's Hungarian dances, where the child caught the real quaint Hungarian accent.

The sister seems of a serious nature, but has not parted with the sweet graces of childhood. Her face is full of sensibility, and she shows every sign of a fine organization. If there was, necessarily, now and then a weak place, or a betrayal of effort in the playing of the younger one, the older showed herself an artist, sure, intelligent, expressive, finished. We could hardly have a more satisfactory interpretation of that Song without Words, or of all the phases of that difficult Arabesque of Schumann. In a piece of Chopin which she offered for an encore, her memory failed her — for, be it understood, the entire programme was performed without notes, Mozart Concerto and all; she brought it to a graceful close, but seemed as much mortified by the accident as any mature artist would be.

Altogether, it was a most interesting and delightful exhibition. It was music, it was art; and the child artists none the less true children. There is no sign whatever of their having been forced or bound to task work; they play as if they loved it; and it is all wholesome, happy life with them, as much as if their life were all play in the literal sense. It is clearly genius, and much is to be expected of these children, provided they are not brought too much before the larger public, but suffered to remain as simple, unaffected, and spontaneous as they now are.

THE OPERA.

We had to leave the second week of the Mapleson troupe at Boston Theatre unchronicled; and now a few words only must suffice. Happily the task is lightened by our lack of opportunity to attend three of the six performances: the repetition of Carmen, Verdi's Rigoletto, and the repetition of Lucia on Saturday afternoon, when hundreds were unable to procure even standing room, and Mme. Gerster's triumphs reached their climax. Thursday evening offered a much finer opportunity for Miss Hauk, as Margaret in Gounod's Faust, and she improved it well. In singing and in action she fell not much short of any of her predecessors in the character. Into the "Jewel Scene," to be sure, she put more of girlish outright joy and vanity, no shadow of the evil influence in the background tingling her voice or look with sad foreboding. At the spinning-wheel, too, she flung aside the melancholy strains of the King of Thule ballad with singular freedom. In the garden scene there was hardly the tenderness, the innocent and beautiful abandon, that we have sometimes witnessed. But in the scene in the church her action rose to real tragic power and her vocal declamation was impressively dramatic. Mme. Frapolli (known as Pisani) was the Siebel; and her large and noble contralto voice, her artistic and expressive singing, her well conceived and easy action, made much of the little part. The Martha, too, was uncommonly clever. Sig. Campanini's Faust was excellent, and Sig. Del Puente's Mephistopheles, capably sung and acted, really appealed to the imagination. Mr. Carlton, who took the part of Valentine at an hour's notice, acquitted himself with great credit. Choruses and orchestra were quite up to the mark.

On Friday evening the house was crowded for Il Flauto Magico of Mozart, so delightful in its music, so humorous, so sublime and exquisitely absurd by turns, and thoroughly enjoyable when well performed, in spite of its absurd and unintelligible libretto. The cast was a strong one, although the shortcoming of one essential part, the Queen of Night, was fatal to completeness. Mlle. Lido, the Russian lady, who took this part, was ill, and sang very feebly, omitting altogether the second of her two great arias. No wonder that the delicious music of her Three Ladies suffered and was out of tune; and the infection, in a less degree, extended to the other trio, the three Genii, though excellent singers (Mme. Frapolli, Mme. Lablache, Mlle. Parodi, etc.) were cast in both sets. It was the one appearance in the season of Mme. Roze, who had been ill for some time, in the principal character of Pamina. Her beauty of person, tasteful Oriental splendor of costume, ease and grace of action, and expressive singing (although somewhat affected with the tremolo—not, however, to the extent that one of our Western correspondents had led us to anticipate), combined to make a very artistic and satisfactory presentation of the part. Sig. Frapolli's Tamino, the Moor Monostatos of M. Thierry, the Papageno and Papagena of Sig. Del Puente, were all excellent; but Sig. Poli surpassed himself in his superb presentation of the august part of Sarastro. His delivery of the great aria was magnificent.

There were two Gerster nights, besides the matinées already mentioned. In I Puritani, which contains some of Bellini's sweetest and most florid melody for her,—although the opera as a whole has little of the freshness of the Sonambula,—she still confirmed and deepened the impression that in her we have one of the purest revelations of genius, beautiful voice, and unstrained, perfect art in music of that kind. It was no doubt the same with her Gilda in Rigoletto, unnatural and horrible as the plot of that is. She still confines herself, and wisely, to her own true sphere,—to the innocent, pure, maidenly parts, and to the music which does not demand the great voice suited to majestic, intense tragic rôles. That may come in time. But what she does is well-nigh perfect of its kind, and a singer may be great in that kind as well as in the other. We think the clever Berlin feuilletonist, Paul Lindau, has described her truly in the article translated on our first page, in spite of his cool suggestion of appropriating her for Berlin. Since he wrote, she has become married, and has gone on in the discreet path which he pointed out. She does not sing in Grand Opera Huguenots and Tells, but keeps to her maidenly and graceful parts. There is sense in his suggestion that she ought to be par excellence the Mozart singer. We shall hail her return to us, and with her that of Her Majesty's Opera, whenever it may be, with joy.

MUSICAL CORRESPONDENCE.

CINCINNATI, JANUARY 25.—It is but a few years since Cincinnati succeeded in obtaining acknowledgment for her claim of advancing art and especially musical culture. The limits of this letter will not permit my giving even a cursory account of the manner in which progress was made. The faithful and thorough work of the resident teachers and artists prepared the way for the great achievements which unbiased and sober observers may safely predict. A short statement of the condition of musical matters at present, and of the immediate prospects which are daily being realized, will enable your readers to judge for themselves, perhaps with more coolness or rather coldness than is in the power of one who is subject to the influences at present at work in our city. After the remarkable pecuniary and satisfactory artistic success of the last May Musical Festival, the project of making Cincinnati the musical centre, let me modestly say of the West, could be more emphatically brought home to the skeptical and reflective few whose cooperation was indispensably necessary. The departure of Mr. Thomas from New York, and the loss or gain which would probably arise to that city in consequence are points which have been more than sufficiently ventilated. But, unless indications are entirely deceiving, the influence which his activity is exerting in his new field of labor has by no means been overrated. A Faculty was formed of such local teachers as had proven themselves thorough and efficient; in addition to these the services of Messrs. Jacobsohn, Baetens and Hartdegen, were secured to form with Mr. Thomas a string quartet. Mr. Whiting was engaged as organist, Sig. and Mme. La Villa as vocal instructors. A recent addition, in the person of Mr. Perring as teacher of oratorio, has swelled the number of the Faculty to thirty-two.

The success of the College of Music from a business point of view has exceeded all expectations. The number of students enrolled is rapidly passing three hundred. While the activity of the teachers therefore is reaching a large number of the musical element in our community, the most potent influence is exerted through the orchestral concerts, the chamber concerts, organ concerts, and last but not least, through the chorus classes which have been arranged and are daily growing. In these latter general elementary musical instruction is most thoroughly given, as well as instruction in sight-singing. One step suggested the other, or made it necessary; the college choir resulted from the success of the chorus classes. A thorough, impartial examination of each individual applicant has brought together the very best of our local singers, and a chorus which promises great things has thus been formed. The most rigid discipline is enforced in regard to the attendance of the rehearsals, the first half of which is given to training similar to that of the chorus classes, the second to the study at present of Cherubini's Requiem. Mr. Foley is the instructor and assistant director; the general plan of study adopted is that of Wullner, the Munich chorus director.

The series of orchestral concerts consists of twelve, that of the chamber concerts of the same number, while organ recitals are given on Wednesday and Saturday afternoons.

The programmes of the orchestral concerts comprised:—
Beethoven: Symphony No. 2, in D, Op. 36.

Overture, "Leonore," No. 4.

Violin Concerto, Op. 61, played by Herr Wilhelmj.

Bach: Air, adapted by Mr. Thomas.

Aria: "Erbarme," sung by Miss Rollewagen, violin obligato. Mr. Jacobsohn.

Haydn: Symphony in G, No. 13, Breitkopf & Haertel ed.

Schubert: "Der Doppelgänger," adapted for orchestra by Theo. Thomas. Sung by Miss Rollewagen.

Schumann: Fourth Symphony. Overture, "Genoveva."

Brahms: C minor Symphony.

Hungarian Dances.

Wagner: Vorspiel, "Die Meistersinger."

Overture, "Tannhäuser."

Berlioz: Ball scene from "Romeo and Juliet."

Reinecke. "In Memoriam;" Introduction and Fugue.

On Christmas night the Messiah was given; soloists, Miss Marie Van Thompson, Miss Emma Cranch, Mr. Hartley, and Mr. Myron W. Whitney.

In the Chamber Concerts we heard:

Beethoven: Quartet No. 9, Op. 59.

Quartet No. 10, Op. 74.

Quartet No. 11, Op. 95.

Trio in B, Op. 97 (Mr. Andrés, pianist).

Mozart: Quartet No. 1 in G.

Haydn: Quartet in G.

Schubert: Quartet D minor (posthumous).

Schumann: Piano quartet, Op. 47 (Mr. Schneider, pianist); Quartet, No. 3, Op. 41.

Brahms: Quintet, Op. 34 (Mr. Singer, pianist).

Saint-Saëns: Suite for cello and piano, Op. 16 (Mr. Doerner, pianist).

Mr. Whiting has drawn on his almost unlimited repertoire to such an extent that space will not permit even a short résumé of his programmes. Bach, Mendelssohn, Hesse, Thiele, Fink, Lemmens, Best, Smart,—in brief, all the celebrated organ composers of the old and new school, have been interpreted in a masterly manner. His own compositions, too, find favor with musicians and the public.

At the Wilhelmj concert on the 23d, almost every seat in the immense hall was occupied, and the conquest of this great virtuoso was complete.

ALPHA MU.

NEW YORK, JAN. 27.—The second concert of the Brooklyn Philharmonic Society took place Jan. 18, with the following programme:—

Symphony No. 3 ("Scotch") Mendelssohn.
"Slumber Song" from the Christmas Oratorio Bach.
MISS CARY.

Entre Acte, } "Ali Baba" (revived by Carl Rei-Ballet Music } necke) Cherubini.
(First time.)

Piano Concerto, No. 1, in E-flat Liszt.
MADAME RIVÉ-KING.

Aria: "Ah, Mon Fils," from "Le Prophète." Meyerbeer.
MISS CARY.

Overture, "Jesonda," Op. 63 Spohr.

The so-called Scottish Symphony is a noble and beautiful composition, always to be heard with pleasure, and to which praise seems more fitting than criticism; yet in the fourth movement the march at the close seems like an after-thought, and a thought quite foreign to the vein in which the symphony is composed. In other words, the symphony ends when the march begins. Query: Why the march? The performance of this work was all that could be desired. Theodore Thomas has excellent ideas; not only can he "call spirits from the vasty deep," but the spirits come at his call, and that is more than they will do for some conductors on this side of the river.

The Entre-Acte and Ballet from the forgotten opera of Cherubini were played with a precision and delicacy which were as delightful as the music itself is charming.

In the "Slumber Song," from Bach's Christmas Oratorio, the orchestral part is all important, and this work of the greatest of all composers was performed with true reverence and loving care. The vocal part was rendered by Miss Cary, in a manner deserving the highest praise. I have never heard her sing otherwise than well; but the music of Bach is a crucial test, and woe to the artist who brings to the performance anything short of honest merit. Her second selection might have been a better one, but she received an encore, to which she responded with some ordinary ballad,—something of an anti-climax after the Bach music in the beginning of the evening. But then she went from Bach to Meyerbeer, and, after that, facilis descensus, etc.

It is but a few years since Mme. Julia Rivé King—then at an age when usually the artist has in view only long years of toil and vexation, with perhaps success at the end—came to New York, unheralded, almost unknown, and established her reputation as a pianist of the first order by a performance of Liszt's Concerto, in E-flat, at one of the concerts of the Philharmonic Society. Her public appearances in this city since that time have not been numerous, but each one has served to confirm the critical judgment that pronounced in her favor on the occasion of her début.

The E-flat Concerto is not only a work of enormous mechanical difficulty, but it demands that the artist who undertakes to perform it brilliantly and effectively should be many-sided. In all works of this class much is left to the imagination of the performer, who must feel the life, the warmth, the passion, the splendor of conquest, the gloom of defeat, and see the profusion of changing hues with which the composition is colored. That Mme. Rivé-King is technically perfect in any work she undertakes may be taken for granted; it only remains to say that her phrasing was broad and intelligent, her expression full of fire and intensity; and this, added to the excellent support afforded by the orchestra, made the interpretation full and complete. For an encore the pianist gave her own arrangement of the Guilt-mant fugue.

Mr. G. Carlberg gave his third Symphony Concert at Chickering Hall, on Saturday evening, Jan. 25, with the following programme:—

Overture, "Ruy Blas" Mendelssohn.

Concerto for Piano, Op. 10 (new) Ignaz Brüll.

1. Allegro Moderato. 2. Andante. 3. Finale Presto.

MR. RICHARD HOFFMAN.

Aria from "Belmonte e Constanza" W. A. Mozart.

MRS. J. K. BARTON.

"Waldweben," from the Music Drama,

"Siegfried" Richard Wagner.

Gavotte, arranged for string instruments, and with an intermediate original movement, by FERDINAND DULCKEN (first time) Padre Martini.

STRING ORCHESTRA.

Symphony No. 4, in B-flat, Op. 60 Beethoven.

The material from which the list was made up is not bad, but the arrangement of the programme might be improved. The miscellaneous character of the selections in the first part, to which was added an encore for each solo artist, did not furnish the best kind of introduction to a Beethoven symphony. Many persons in the audience were doubtless wearied before the symphony began, and many more, I am sure, before it was finished.

The work of the orchestra in the lighter selections was better than in the symphony, in certain parts of which the first violins and a few other instruments appeared to be carrying out their own ideas instead of those of the conductor. The Gavotte by Padre Martini was originally written for the piano. It is very ingeniously adapted for string orchestra by Mr. Dulcken, and was beautifully played.

The Concerto by Ignaz Brüll, known to fame as the composer of the opera of The Golden Cross, is a fine piece of composition. The leading theme of the first movement is original and well worked out; but the work as a whole seems not designed to leave a deep or lasting impression. The Concerto was beautifully played by Mr. Hoffman, who deserves and receives unqualified praise whenever he appears in public. Being recalled, after the Concerto, he played one of Schumann's "Novelletten." The singing of Mrs. Barton was not conspicuous by any pronounced fault, nor remarkable by any great merit. It seemed to please the audience, and, as I believe singing is introduced in the programme of a symphony concert for that purpose alone (in any other sense it is certainly an innovation), nothing more was to be desired.

A. A. C.

BALTIMORE, JAN. 27. — The large attendance which greeted the concert of the Mendelssohn Quintette Club, of your city, given here on the 21st inst., may be accepted as an evidence that your taste for good old chamber music is developing. The audience was composed of the flower of our musical public, and showed by the discriminating manner in which the applause was bestowed, that it understood what it listened to. The concerted pieces were the "Oberon" Overture, Beethoven's Quartet in C minor, No. 4, a melody for quintet by Haydn, a minuetto for sextet by Mozart, and a Valse Caprice, composed for the piano by Rubinstein, and excellently adapted for the little orchestra, by Mr. R. Hennig, a musician whose evident knowledge of instrumentation is pleasing to note in connection with his masterly performance on the 'cello.

The power of tone and the precision and accuracy of shading with which all these selections were given, were received with the appreciation they deserved. Very agreeable is the addition of Mr. Ludwig Manoly's contrabasso to the club; the beautiful blending of its rich, sonorous tones with the other instruments, was decidedly effective. The solo selections were a fantasia for flute by Briccialdi, a characteristic piece by Jervais for 'cello, Ballade and Polonaise for violin by Vieuxtemps, and a fantasia for clarinet, of Mr. Ryan's own composition.

For the soloists, in "showing," as one of our leading musicians who is not quite up to the vernacular, expressed it on a certain occasion, "the skill of the instrument," one can have only praise; but in the selections we should like more music and less pyrotechnic display; and the manner in which the solo performances were received proved that by far the greater portion of the audience were of the same opinion.

The Quintette Club may have had some unpleasant experiences as to the quality of Baltimore audiences on former occasions, but the attendance on Tuesday evening was of a character well able to digest more solid musical food than that which was served up to them in the instrumental solo selections. Mr. Heindl and Mr. Listemann were both recalled, and we hoped to hear what else they would play beside floriture and bravura. They kindly responded with more floriture and more bravura. Mr. Ryan's clarinet playing is the best, in the recollection of your correspondent, that has ever been heard in Baltimore, but his part in the "Oberon" Overture gave us more pleasure than his entire fantasia with variations. The fine, well-cultured mezzo-soprano of Mrs. H. F. Knowles took the audience by storm. She sang a song by Benedict with Mr. Heindl's flute obligato, an encore piece, and the "Batti-Batti" air from Don Juan. Her rendering of the air, in style especially, reminds one forcibly of Miss Cary's charming Zerlina.

The Quintette Club should visit us occasionally in the "off" weeks, between the Peabody concerts, and assist in reviving our taste for good old chamber music.

An exceptionally large audience gathered to enjoy the first Peabody Concert on Saturday evening. The programme was as follows:

I. W. A. Mozart (1756-1791). (a.) Symphony G minor. No. 2. Work 45.

(b.) Recitative and Air from the opera "Magic Flute."

MISS JENNY BUSK.

II. L. van Beethoven (1770-1827). (a.) Eighth Symphony F major. Work 93.

(b.) Violin-Romance F major. Work 50.

MR. JOSEF KASPAR.

Air with Variations.

MISS JENNY BUSK.

August Söderman (1830-1873). Norse Folk-Songs and Folk-Dances. Adapted for orchestra.

The orchestra was in fair trim, the reeds and French horns especially so, the critic of the Baltimore American to the contrary notwithstanding. This distinguished authority, in conjunction with the erudite positivist of the Gazette, is again riding his ancient hobby of insisting that the orchestra should be seated according to the plan of Hector Berlioz, and, moreover, scarcely condescends to notice the violin solo of Mr. Kaspar because, forsooth, the young musician did not play the Beethoven Romance from memory, "according to the accepted custom among solo performers at the present day!" The orchestra is rather small, owing to the peculiar circumstances under which the concerts are given this season, but taking this fact into consideration, everything went as smoothly as could be expected at the first concert. The attentive care with which the Andante in the Mozart Symphony was given, and the precise shading in the second and third movements of Beethoven's "Kleine Symphonie," were particularly noticeable.

Miss Jenny Busk is an old Baltimore favorite, and, although she is fast passing into the period of the "ere and yellow leaf," one cannot help admiring the still lovely purity of her voice, and the excellence of her method.

Mr. Joseph Kaspar is the son of a member of our Peabody orchestra, and has the reputation of being a hardworking, ambitious young violinist. He played the F major Romance in the style of a violin student who has been thoroughly trained under good masters, and what slight imperfections there were in his performance, are to be ascribed entirely to the embarrassment incident to a first appearance in public. He needs a little more confidence in his own ability, and some experience; his talent and ambition will do the rest.

Söderman's Norse Folk-Songs and dances, with which the programme closed, are simple and quite pleasing, but rather out of place in a symphony concert. The dances continually awaken recollections of "right hands across," "ladies' chain," "swing your partners," etc., and the repetitions are tiresome.

Mr. Hamerik has left for New York, to direct the concert to be given there this week by the American composer, O. B. Boies, whose symphony was performed by our Peabody orchestra two years ago. Mrs. Falk-Auerbach accompanies him, and will perform a concerto for piano and orchestra, also by Mr. Boies.

MUSIKUS.

PHILADELPHIA, JAN. 12. — Mr. Charles H. Jarvis gave his fourth Soirée last evening to an appreciative audience in Natorium Hall, being assisted by Mr. Carl Gaertner, well known, I believe, in your city, of which he was formerly a resident. A sonata by Schubert, No. 9, A major, not heard here before, was the opening piece. The allegro and andantino did not prove so acceptable as the scherzo, and the rondo, the latter being specially full of beautiful and quaint thoughts. This was executed by Mr. Jarvis as if con amore and in perfect accord with the great composer, whose early death has caused continual regrets from all civilized nations.

A posthumous work by Mendelssohn, — Andante Cantabile, B minor, — which could not deny its creator, gave great satisfaction, and may be classed with his better piano-forte compositions. Quite a treat to some of us were Sterndale Bennett's three musical sketches, Op. 10, whose refined and fairy-like fancies commend them to all intelligent musical organizations; and the Ballade, Op. 20, by Heinecke, which procured a higher regard for freedom of treatment than has been previously ascribed to him. An Etude, Op. 1 No. 2, by Tausig, of no special merit; and Weber's "Invitation" as transcribed by Tausig, brilliantly closed the piano-forte solo portion of the programme.

Mr. Gaertner was well received upon this, his first appearance this season. This superior artist is entirely too modest, and should by all means permit himself to be heard more frequently. In his solo, the Capriccio by Vieuxtemps, his bowing, intonation, and expression were all that could be asked, but, in the Beethoven Sonata, Op. 30, No. 2, there was a flavor of intelligence and exaltation displayed which gave a special charm to a performance of rare beauty; indeed, I cannot recall a larger appreciation of any previously heard instrumental duo, for both performers were in excellent spirits, and worked together in closest sympathy.

AMERICUS.

NEW MUSICAL BOOKS.

[We take the following from the Crystal Palace Programme (London). It is evidently from the pen of the accomplished editor of the new "Dictionary of Music and Musicians," Mr. George Grove, whom some of us had the pleasure of meeting a few months since during his brief visit to this country in company with Dean Stanley.]

Three works have appeared within the last month that are important enough to claim a few words of notice here.

(1.) Die Familie Mendelssohn (1728-1847). — This, as its name implies, is a history of the Mendelssohn family, from Moses Mendelssohn, the great Jewish philosopher, down to the death of his still greater grandson, Felix Mendelssohn-Bartholdy. The book is by Sebastian Hensel, the only child of Felix's eldest sister, the well-known "Fanny" of the composer's too delightful letters, and himself the subject of more than one letter and allusion in the same charming collection. The work is in three volumes, compiled from family papers, and includes frequent unpublished letters and journals by Felix, his father, mother, and sisters, and his friend Klingemann, filling up many a gap in the fragmentary records which have hitherto given to the public with such sparing hand. As a specimen of the deeply interesting nature of its contents to musical people we will only mention the fac-simile of the first twenty bars of the Hebrides Overture as written down by Mendelssohn in a letter to his family immediately after his visit to the Cave of Staffa, which is known to have inspired him with that most fascinating work. Another very valuable feature of the work is a series of eight portraits from the pencil of W. Hensel (the husband of Fanny,) namely, the father and mother of Felix, Felix himself, Fanny, Rebecca, their husbands, Hensel and Dirichlet, and Cecilia, Felix's wife.

(2.) Correspondance inédite de Hector Berlioz, a small octavo volume, containing one hundred and fifty-six letters by one of the most original, witty, spirited writers to be found even among Frenchmen. They are addressed to men and women alike, and a few names taken almost at random from the index will give an idea of the intellectual rank of the correspondents of this eminent composer and critic, long acknowledged as the most brilliant feuilletonist of the Paris press: Liszt, Mme. Ernst, Ferdinand Hiller, D'Ortigue, Robert Schumann, Mme. Horace Vernet, Richard Wagner, General Lwoff, Mme. Massart, Hans von Bülow, etc. But no list of names can give an idea of the wit, grace, and force of the letters themselves. They range through half a century (1819-1868). The first is a humble note to old Pleyel — Haydn's contemporary — begging his subscription towards the publication of a pot-pourri on Italian opera airs for flute, horn, and strings. The last is a pathetic broken detail of the sufferings of a dying man, written a month or two before his departure, and ending, "Adieu! j'ai beaucoup de peine à écrire." "Je sens que je vais mourir." The price of this precious little volume is only three shillings.

(3.) The last on our list is the third volume of the Life of Beethoven by Alexander W. Thayer, an American amateur well known to lovers of music, who has left his pleasant New England home, and resided in Germany for a quarter of a century that he might collect the materials for a real thorough biography of the great composer. It is no compliment to Mr. Thayer to say that his work surpasses everything written upon Beethoven before it for nothing that came before it can compare with it at all. He has for the first time sifted every statement; seen every document for himself, left nothing to hearsay or inference where facts were obtainable; while from the columns of newspapers, from play-bills and concert programmes, from diaries of obscure travelers, and the recollections of those who were on the verge of the grave, and from the innumerable materials which Beethoven himself fortunately left behind him — sketch-books, conversation-books, memorandums on margins of his favorite authors, scraps of notes three lines long, which he would fire off by dozens a day to his intimate friends, in a hand more like the marks of a spider crawling over the paper than anything that a pen, guided by human fingers, could produce, — from all these he has, with unwearied patience and devotion, produced a work which exceeds not only the biography of other musicians, but is hardly surpassed by anything that has been written on the subject of Frederick the Great, Goethe, or Napoleon. Nor must it be supposed that the ultimate form of these researches is dry or repulsive. Quite the reverse. The first volume, occupied in great part with details of the Archbishop-Elector's Court at Cologne, and of society at Bonn — details necessary as the foundation for the statue of the vast figure which had its earliest station there — is perhaps more inviting to the archaeological musician than the general reader. But even before the close of the first volume Mr. Thayer launches his hero in full stream; and through the second and third volumes there is no impediment to his course. The result is a picture different in many respects to the ordinary portraits of Beethoven; and if the differences are not always in his favor, but tend to bring out into better colors men like Mälzel and Johann van Beethoven, — whom we have been in the habit of thinking all wrong, while Beethoven himself was all right, — the result can be nothing but a gain. The more a really great character can be studied exactly as he was, the more just will be the appreciation of him. He may not be what we imagined him, but he will be more real and more consistent, and on the whole, properly balanced and considered, not less great. We need not fear for the author of the Ninth Symphony. What Bettina says of him in one of the letters here quoted by Mr. Thayer will always be true: "If I could understand him as I feel him, I should know all about everything."

Mr. Thayer's volume begins with 1807 and ends with 1816. It thus embraces the great middle period of Beethoven's productive activity, the period which produced the 5th, 6th, 7th, and 8th symphonies, the 4th and 5th piano-forte concertos, two great quartets, the B-flat trio, the Egmont music, and many works hardly inferior to these masterpieces; and is cut off from that later epoch, — the splendid "Indian Summer" of his life, the epoch of the Mass in D, the Choral Symphony, and the so-called "Posthumous Quartets," — by the miserable interval of dependency and inaction caused by his difficulties with his nephew. Nor in other respects are these ten years less interesting in Beethoven's biography; they include the invasion of Bettina, the romantic intercourse with Amalie Sebald, the still more romantic and mysterious episode with an unknown lady, when Beethoven really seems to have been on the brink of marriage, — the dissipation of the Vienna Congress, and much more of moment in his personal life. We trust that we may look for the concluding volume or volumes of this important work before long, and that nothing may occur to interrupt Mr. Thayer's useful and honorable labors till he has brought his biography to a complete close. We might add, till he has published it in English; for at present it is in German, — a curious indication of the greater speed of musical literature in Germany than in this country. Meanwhile, however, the German is not difficult, and Beethoven's own letters are quite untranslatable.

BOSTON, FEBRUARY 15, 1879.

CONTENTS.

REAWAKENING. Stuart Sterne	25
GEORGE SAND AND FRÉDÉRIC CHOPIN. A Study. Fanny Raymond Ritter	25
THE SHORTCOMINGS OF THE OPERA. W. B. Lawson	27
MASON'S PIANO-FORTE CONCERN. C. B. Cadg	28
EDITORIAL: CONCERTS IN BOSTON	29
Fourth Symphony Concert. — W. H. Sherwood's Piano-Forte Recitals. — The Cecilia. — Mr. Eddy's Organ Recital.
LADY CONDUCTORS	30
MUSICAL CORRESPONDENCE	30
New York. — Philadelphia. — Cincinnati. — Chicago. — Milwaukee.
NOTES AND GLEANINGS.	32
San Francisco. — Cincinnati. — Pittsfield.

Published fortnightly by Houghton, Osgood and Company, 220 Devonshire Street, Boston. Price, 10 cents a number; $2.50 per year.

All the articles not credited to other publications were expressly written for this Journal.

REAWAKENING.

O FULLNESS of the earth and sea,
O splendors of the sky,
Have ye no power wherewith to stay
The voice whose music ebbs away,
The song whose accents die?

For, as in him whose days are done,
Whose sands of life run low,
Spirit and senses faint and fail,
And round about grow dim and pale
Starlight and sunset's glow,

To chilly ashes sinks and fades
The flame of all desire,
And mute, as though no feeblest strain
It evermore could sound again,
Hangs the long silent lyre,

Where love itself can wake no more
Its wonted tender lay;
For love but glimmers from afar,
E'en like some white, swift-dying star,
Through shifting shadows gray.

And, like a bird whose heavy wings
In vain would rise on high,
Unto dim earth my soul alone
Can cleave, nor reach God's sunlit throne,
Nor send to Him its cry.

Yet praise to Him, the dawn is near,
The hour of night is past,
Faint life revives and earth grows fair,
As on my lips this dumb despair
Bursts into song at last!

STUART STERNE.

GEORGE SAND AND FRÉDÉRIC CHOPIN.

A STUDY.

BY FANNY RAYMOND RITTER.

(Continued from page 10.)

I RETURN to M. Karasowski's observation, made, he asserts, by "a lady," on the occasion of that evening party at which George Sand and Chopin met for the last and only time after their separation, — the assertion that George Sand "begged Chopin to improvise at the piano while she wrote, and thus, inspired by his playing, she produced her best romances." With all due deference to the lady who displays such intimate familiarity (?) with the habits of George Sand and Chopin while engaged in artistic occupation, I doubt the possibility of successful literary labor under such a condition. As far as we may judge from their own accounts, and those of their friends, Chopin and Mme. Dudevant were accustomed, when residing under the same roof, to pursue their occupations apart from and independent of each other. She expressly says that when at Valdemosa she wrote "in solitude." Chopin, when residing in one of Mme. Sand's pavilions at Paris, was much engaged, during the day, in teaching, the intermittent, yet attention-compelling noise of which was not likely to prove especially inviting to her muse. If it occasionally happened that they pursued their avocations together, — if George Sand, the enthusiastic lover of all art, especially of music, sat within hearing of Chopin's improvisation while writing her romances, — we may be almost certain that she either paused to listen, or, if she continued to write, did not listen at all, and consequently was not "inspired by his playing while she wrote." For the music of Chopin demands, nay, commands, the closest, the most wrapt attention from an intellectual and musically constituted listener. How much more must it not have compelled this when enhanced by all the perfection of performance, the poetic grace, the fervor, that characterized its composer! This romance-writing of George Sand "to music" sounds too much like the magical invocations of witchcraft; and will the spirits rise "when you do call for them" under such circumstances? Apart from the question as to whether they were invoked, and did respond in this especial case, we may doubt the power of any artist to excite, by the exercise of his artistic powers, another artist to immediate activity in his; and although such a result is of occasional occurrence, it is the least powerful form in which the influence of one mind can manifest itself upon that of another. True influence, lasting inspiration, is more occult, penetrates more deeply, and displays itself less superficially. As George Sand herself has said: "The combination of the arts must be sought for within the depths of the soul; but, as they do not all speak the same language, they can only be affected by and explain themselves to each other through the most mysterious analogies, in which, after all, each one only expresses itself."

But by what of beautiful, by whom among the gifted that she knew, was George Sand, "the sonorous soul, the Æolian harp of his time," as Renan has called her, not inspired in some way? Generously glad to give honor where she fancied it to be due, she sometimes imagined that she derived inspiration from sources on which she really bestowed it, often overvaluing her friends, and projecting the rays of her own genius and warm feeling on unworthy objects. In one of his "Causeries," Sainte-Beuve writes: "Though people say of George Sand that when she speaks of her friends she becomes an echo that multiplies the voice, I say that far from merely multiplying the voices of her supposed inspirers, she absolutely renders them unrecognizable." And again, in another essay: "This illustrious author imagined for a time that Gustave Planche was a great critic, able to unveil all the mysteries of language to her; he certainly corrected her proofs with tolerable exactitude, but not without destroying some of the graces of her style." She lent the charm of her eloquence, in gratitude, to whatever caused her heart to beat in unison with the joys and sorrows of her fellows, their passions, politics, or philosophy, during her brave and continual search for truth, amid all her errors and illusions never losing her deep, instinctive faith in God, or her humanitarian optimism. Like all true artists and poets, she echoed or reflected all she felt or witnessed in the experience of others; and, next to love, beyond all things art, — and nature, the foundation, the life, the soul of art. Not by right of distinct, artistic genius, or by means of study, but through her intimate feeling for nature, she has often sounded profound psychological truths and æsthetic principles. Yet we should greatly err were we to apply to her the often misapplied title of "art-critic." Say, rather, that she knew exactly how to give prompt and correct expression to the warm and noble emotion with which all true art inspired her. Witness a few of her remarks on this subject: "There is only one truth in art, beauty; one in morality, goodness; one in politics, justice. But if any of us should attempt to restrict the frame, and exclude from it all that is not beautiful, good, and just, according to us, we should deface the image of the ideal, and be left alone with our own opinions. For the limits of truth are vaster than any of us suppose. . . . The only really important and useful works on art are those tending to excite admiration for great art-works, and consequently to enlarge and elevate the enthusiasm of the reader. All other criticism is cold, evil, puerile pedantry. . . . Art and poetry are the two wings of the soul. Let the notes they strike be terrible or delicious, these awaken within us an instinct of sublimity that lies slumbering or ignored by us, or renew it when they find it exhausted by suffering or fatigue." And again, when alluding to her artistic aspirations, in a letter to Victor Hugo: "I fear I was wrong in supposing myself predestined to artistic creativeness. I am too contemplative, too much like a child. I wish to seize, embrace, understand everything at once; and, after such little puffs of misplaced ambition, I often happen to fall with all my weight on a mere nothing, a blade of grass, a small insect that passionately delights me, and which suddenly, by what prestige I know not, seems to me as great and complete, as important in my emotional life, as the sea, volcanoes, empires and their sovereigns, the ruins of the Coliseum, the pope, the dome of St. Peter's, Raphael and all the masters, and the Medicean Venus into the bargain! Perhaps I love Nature too well to be able to interpret her reasonably; so call me 'artist' no more, but only 'friend,' as we term the weary and unfortunate who hesitate on the way, and whom we encourage to proceed, meanwhile pitying their sorrows."

Among those of her intimate friends in the world of art whom we may conjecture to have exerted some influence on the development and the works of George Sand, we find as many painters as musicians; for Chopin, Pauline Garcia, and Liszt, we have Calamatta, Clesinger, Delacroix, Fromentin, and others; her style is picturesque as well as musical, and her subjects are often borrowed from the art of painting. And if, on the other hand, we glance at the varied results of the inspiration that flowed from her, let us not forget the assertion of some of her admirers, that she created a revolution in the entire school of French landscape painting among her contemporaries. All unprejudiced observers of the progress of art and literature will so far agree with this as to admit that, but for the pen that brought French scenery, especially that of Berry, into fashion even in France itself, — but for George Sand's extraordinary truth of descriptive detail in conveying not only the large general impression, but also the inward individual expression of landscapes, — such men as Daubigny, Dupré, Theodore Rousseau, and their followers, would have sought to illustrate foreign scenes and subjects more often. It was this powerful literary influence that kept pictorial fancy busy at home. It is at least certain that George Sand's contemporaries were the first among French painters to abandon those classic models of imaginative design which they found in the landscapes of Rubens, Rembrandt, Watteau, and others, and to substitute, in place of noble but conventional embodiments of fantastic reverie, the actual aspects of Nature; and not merely her outward realism, but her picturesque accidents, her varied expressions, interpreted by their own lyric individuality; thus using a landscape site to express their emotions, as a poet interweaves his feelings with an event that occurs outside of his own experience. Before the appearance of this school of landscape art in France, we may look in vain for any exposition of such romantic moods of nature as we find translated by the large, breezy shades, the strange sunsets, the magnificent yet not dazzling color, of Theodore Rousseau, who has so fitly been termed "a naturalist continually seduced from nature by idealism;" or the sometimes cold, yet always harmonious twilight melancholy of Corot, whose wondrous tone of unity wins upon us by slow and sweet degrees. The school of to-day is also true to nature, but not in so profound a sense; realistic imitation has, for the time, discredited romanticism, in art as in literature, and many art-lovers lament, with Jardien, that "the woodland Muse of France is now in mourning for the loss of her grand school of landscape painters," the contemporaries of George Sand. We may question, however, whether the romantic movement in musical and pictorial art, which so closely followed that of literature, was not rather "in the air," than an intellectual epidemic which the mass of artists caught from the example of two or three leaders. Perhaps the so-called "impressionist" school of to-day directly descends from Jean Jacques Rousseau, the literary grandfather of the modern landscape! Such revolutions, though of apparently sudden appearance, are always really gradual in growth, progressive, historical.

1 Nouvelles Lettres d'un Voyageur. Par GEORGE SAND. Paris: L'évy. 1877.

George Sand passed through better training in design and painting than usually falls to the lot of those journalists or magazi-nists who make a specialty of reviewing works of pictorial art. Her first teacher in drawing was Mlle. Greuze, daughter of the celebrated painter. After her separation from her husband, before becoming aware that she possessed the necessary qualifications for a successful literary career, Mme. Dudevant attempted to add to her income by painting cigar boxes, fans, and other fancy articles, in which attempt she failed to meet with much success. At this time she made an earnest study of the masterworks of painting to be seen in Paris; and she thus describes her experience in endeavoring to explain to herself the varieties and the differences existing in schools, subjects, types, and methods: "I went alone, mysteriously, to the Louvre, as soon as it was open, and often remained until it was closed. As I had no one to tell me what was fine, my growing admiration had all the attraction of a discovery for me; I was surprised and delighted to find, in painting, enjoyment as great as that I had derived from music. I interrogated my own feelings in regard to the obstacles or affinities that existed between myself and these creations of genius. I contemplated, I was subdued, I was transported into a new world. In fine painting I felt all that life is; a splendid résumé of the forms and expressions of beings and things, the outward spectacle of nature and humanity seen through the mind of the painter who places it on view. I beheld the present and the past together; I became classic and romantic at the same time; I had conquered an infinite treasure, the existence of which had been hitherto unknown to me. I could not give a name to the feelings that seemed to crowd my heated and yet dilated mind; but I went away from the museum under such an influence that I often lost my way in the streets, forgetting that it was necessary to eat, and knowing not whither I was going, until I suddenly discovered that it was already time to prepare for the opera, to hear William Tell or Der Freischütz." Passages in the "Voyage en Italie," "Les Maitres Mosaistes," and others of her works, prove the extent of her studies in the art of painting, made during her tour through Italy, and testify to her keen powers of observation. Take, for example, these remarks on Benvenuto Cellini, in one of her letters: "We may observe in his works that he often undertook to execute a vase, and designed its form and proportions carefully; but, during the execution, he would become so strangely fond of a figure or festoon as to be led into enlarging one in order to poetize it, and displaying the other in order to give it a more graceful curve. Thus, carried away by the love of detail, he forgot the work for its ornament, and, perceiving too late the impossibility of returning to his first design, instead of the cup he had commenced, he produced a tripod; instead of a ewer, a lamp; in place of a crucifix, a sword-hilt. This, while satisfying himself, must certainly have dissatisfied those for whom his works were destined. While Cellini retained all the power of his genius, this enthusiasm was an additional quality, and every work of his hand was complete and irreproachable in its way; but after he had been tried by persecution, dissipation, imprisonment, and misery, we perceive that his hand became less prompt, his inspiration less firm, and he produced works of marvelous finish in detail, but of unconceivable awkwardness in their general effect. The goblet, the ewer, the tripod, the crucifix, and the sword-hilt met in his brain, fought, agreed again, and at last found a place together in compositions devoid of form or usefulness, logic, or unity."

But, if we concede the power of friendly influence on the progress of genius, we may be allowed to suppose that the friendship between Mme. Sand and the distinguished Italian artist, engraver, and designer, Calamatta, was not fruitless in artistic results to both parties. Calamatta had been requested by George Sand's publisher to execute a new portrait of the lady for a new edition of her romances, and a life-long intimacy between the artist and his sitter was the consequence of this incident. To Calamatta she accorded the praise of having been the most thoroughly trustworthy of all her friends. A sort of revival of the art of etching was at that time taking place among French artists, Delacroix and Daubigny foremost (though Jacques' earliest etching dates as far back as 1830), but no decline of interest in engraving had manifested itself. Calamatta lived in artist comradeship with another engraver, Mercuri, whose reproductions of Leopold Robert's delineations of the joy and beauty of Italian peasant life are so highly prized by amateurs. It would seem that little mental affinity existed between Mme. Sand and Mercuri; but Calamatta, to whose art we owe several remarkable portraits, and minute and patient reproductions of the creations of the ancient masters, taught her the processes of the art of engraving, and she, in return, aided him in various ways. One of her articles in the Revue des Deux Mondes, on Calamatta's copy (a masterpiece of engraving) of Leonardo da Vinci's picture, "La Joconde," — that type of mysterious beauty, with her fleeting smile of repressed emotion, — beginning, "Who is this woman, without eyebrows, with jaws heavily developed under their luxuriant roundness, with hair either very fine or very thin, with a somewhat dull, yet superhumanly limpid eye?" created a sensation in artistic Parisian circles of that day. George Sand's frequent intercourse with Calamatta enabled her thoroughly to comprehend the difficulties — similar to those that confront the reproductive musician in his performance of the masterworks of composition — with which the engraver contends. She truly says: "The engraver knows only the timid joys of genius, for his pleasure is constantly troubled by the fear that he may be led into becoming a creative artist himself. I would not venture to decide the difficult question as to whether an engraver should faithfully copy the defects and qualities of his model, or copy freely, giving scope to his own genius; but I think we apply the same principle to the translation of foreign books. In such a task I should prefer masterworks, and take pleasure in rendering them as servilely as possible, for even the defects of masters are amiable and respectable. Were I obliged to translate a useful but obscure and ill-written work, I should be tempted to write my best, in order to render its meaning as clear as possible. This accident of doing too well may happen to engravers who interpret rather than reproduce; and perhaps only a genius among painters would pardon his copyist for having had more talent than himself." The portrait of George Sand at the age of thirty-seven, designed and engraved by Calamatta, is perhaps the most satisfactory portrait of her that exists; if somewhat idealized, according to the testimony of her friends, who have nevertheless pronounced the likeness astonishingly true, it presents her as those who never saw her imagine she must have looked at her best, with one of her most characteristic expressions, — rich, glowing, in the fullness of complete mental and physical development. The whole woman speaks to us from that face, or, indeed, seems concentrated in the powerful yet soft, contemplative, almost ruminative, large, dark, deep eyes.¹

Amid the supposed influences that, apart from the promptings and inspiration of her own genius, may or may not have actuated George Sand, we cannot forget the collaboration in the romances, "The Prima Donna," and "Rose and Blanche," of George Sand and Jules Sandeau, the young author, whom, on his separation from his wife, Baron Dudevant introduced to her as a possibly useful guide and adviser in literary affairs. There is a fine page of narration in one of her "Lettres d'un Voyageur," in the concluding sentences of which we may fancy we trace an allusion to the days of her collaboration with Jules Sandeau. It refers, however, not to authorship, but to etching, that art in which the capacity for feeling and expressing passionate emotion is so desirable, and the possession of which capacity perhaps rendered the lovers of whom George Sand writes, such fine etchers. I give the passage: "I care little about growing old, but I care much about growing old in solitude; yet either I have never met the being with whom I could have been willing to live and die, or, if I have, I knew not how to retain his affection. There was once a good artist named Watelet, better skilled in etching than any man of his time, who loved Marguerite Lecomte, and taught her to become as good an etcher as himself. For him she abandoned husband, fortune, native land. The world condemned, and then, as they were poor and modest, forgot them. Forty years after, people discovered that in the neighborhood of Paris, in a little house called Moulin-Joly, there lived two artists, an old man and woman, who etched together, sitting at the same table. The first idler who found out this wonder announced it to others, and the fashionable world hastened to Moulin-Joly to behold the phenomenon. A grand passion of more than forty years' standing! Two fine twin talents, ever assiduously employed at a beloved task! Philemon and Baucis during the days of Mesdames Pompadour and Dubarry! A new era! This miraculous couple found friends, patrons, admirers, flatterers, poets. Fortunately old age carried them off soon after, or the world would have spoiled everything. Their last etching was one of Moulin-Joly, the little house of Marguerite, with this device, —

"Cur valle permittit Sabina Divitias operosiores?"
(Horace, Odes.)

It is framed and hung in my chamber, above a portrait, the original of which no one here has seen. For an entire year the person who gave me that portrait lived by a similar labor to that which partly supported me. Every morning we consulted each other about our work; every evening we supped at the same table, conversing on art, sentiment, and plans, and the future. The future broke its promise to us. Pray for me, O Marguerite Lecomte!"

(To be continued.)

THE SHORTCOMINGS OF THE OPERA.

BY WALTER B. LAWSON, B. MUS.

(Continued from page 20.)

(4.) NOTWITHSTANDING the large number of operatic works which find favor with the public, it would be difficult to select from amongst them a dozen libretti which meet the requirements of a healthy and educated mind. They are, for the most part, simply excrescences from the vigorous trunk of the drama, and typical of that which is puerile, abnormal, or horrid. The education of the people, which is obviously the primary object of every art, the drama not excepted, seems to have been almost wholly disregarded by the librettist, and their entertainment, which we must regard as the secondary object, is so associated with depressing influences and morbid ideas as to become problematic.

Let us regard a few opera texts. Here is a cheerful one by Wohlbrück: —

The Vampyre, to which Marschner has composed such exquisite and withal realistic music, illustrates a period in the existence of a disgusting and unreal creature, which (in the character of a nobleman), to save itself from the pangs of hell, is compelled within a limited time to suck the blood of three innocent maidens, which deed is actually perpetrated or attempted within the knowledge of the audience; but, failing to carry out on a third victim the condition imposed by the Evil One, its consignment to the infernal regions naturally follows. Whatever may be good and virtuous in the remaining dramatis personæ is swallowed up in the hideousness of this monster.

We read that at a performance, at Athens, of Æschylus's tragedy of the Eumenides, the audience was so appalled, on the appearance of the Furies, that women lost the fruit of their womb, and children expired in convulsions of terror. These effects doubtless resulted from the terrible associations which such an apparition would have for the Greeks. With such a record before us, we may safely say, and this without urging the possibility of such extreme effects being produced upon a modern audience, that the act of witnessing a performance of the Vampyre might lead to distressing mental and bodily effects upon persons superstitious enough to believe in the existence of such creatures (and there are those who do), or even upon more enlightened spectators. I do not speak idly; I myself have witnessed the result upon a person of peculiar temperament.

The plot of La Juive, by Halevy, is even more revolting. A Jewish maiden is betrayed by a young noble, who afterwards causes her to be tortured and eventually to be cast into a caldron of burning pitch. There is not a very wide step from a fable of this kind to the reality of employing criminals as actors and causing them to be burned, crucified, or otherwise done to death in the natural course of the drama, — a proceeding not unknown to history.

In La Traviata, female depravity is held up to the respect and pity of spectators, who, could they but see it in real life, would treat it with scorn and aversion. This sort of subject is somewhat freely run upon by French romancists, in whose particular province it seems that die Spitzbuben sind alle ehrlich, — all rogues are honorable.

Mozart's Zauberflöte carries us to another extreme, for notwithstanding all the endeavors which have been made to ascribe an importance to the libretto, it stands there an undeniable triviality. Even if there were any truth in the statement that it is illustrative of a certain period in the history of freemasonry, we should still fail to perceive its raison d'être, seeing that it is performed before others than freemasons, and that those of the brotherhood who witness its performance may be as ignorant of its meaning as those of the audience who have not been initiated into the mysteries.

In Rigoletto the dramatic action centres in a brutal murder and a body in a sack. La Sonnambula is a very harmless story written upon the moral-pointing and tale-adorning principle. Don Juan is stigmatized by Beethoven as a "scandalous subject," and so on.

We will now consider a text which both Beethoven and Goethe held to be one of the best, namely, that of Cherubini's masterpiece, Der Wasserträger, better known in this country, where it is so seldom performed, as Les deux Journées. Here we have no brutal murders, no torturing deaths, no fiddle-faddle about freemasonry which no one can understand, but a simple story which, from beginning to end, offers nothing that is ignoble or offensive to good taste, while it lays bare before us, in a manner that we can appreciate, some of the higher emotions of humanity. It is divided into three acts, each of which is short and decisive and pregnant with action, and but little change of scene is necessary: it is therefore easy of comprehension. Nothing further seems wanting than the exquisite music of Cherubini. As next in worth to this, Beethoven ranked the libretto of La Vestale of Spontini, and Goethe that of Il Matrimonio Segreto.

Simplicity of dramatic form is the first desideratum, and whatever may be said respecting the dramatic unities, as insisted on by Aristotle and carried out in the Grecian drama, one thing is certain, which is that the plot loses nothing in simplicity by their observance; and since dramatists have thought proper to allow themselves every license in this respect, we find a corresponding intricacy of action in their productions. It will almost invariably be found that the greatest interest is excited in such plays as show a proximate preservation of the unities.

In conclusion of this section a word on a well-worn topic. The subject-matter of the drama of Wagner has been ridiculed as "mythical rubbish." It no more deserves the name than does Milton's "Paradise Lost." If accepted in the Wagnerian spirit as depicting, in a condensed form, the struggles of humanity, it is far from being rubbish. The difficulty of regarding it in this light simply results from its want of association in our minds.

(5.) The want of originality in recitative is a fact patent to every musician. This hapless branch of musical art has been in danger of becoming little better than a means of perpetuating worn-out phrases, of which we can assure ourselves by referring to any opera or oratorio scores that may be at hand. But even well-seasoned recitative is perhaps more endurable than spoken dialogue, which causes a lull in the performance, although phrases such as sol, do, sol, mi, mi, fa, sol, sol, do, are well calculated to create "feelings unutterable" in the musician.

¹ In Lui et Elle, that vulgar book which Paul de Musset wrote with the mistaken intention of defending his brother, but between whose pages he has forever buried that brother's reputation as a man of honor, Edouard (Alfred de Musset) says of Olympe (Mme. Dudevant): "Dark, and of a pale olive complexion, with bronze reflections, she has immense eyes, like an Indian. I have never been able to look on such faces without emotion. Her expression, not very mobile, yet assumes an air of pride and independence when she becomes animated, while talking."

After a lapse of nearly three hundred years, opera, although very different in its character, has again become continuous recitative, and while we may decline to acknowledge the doctrine of a composer who imagines the possibility of dispensing with form, we must still give Wagner the credit for having introduced a little variety in recitative, disregardful of the fact that musical critics decry his efforts as "awkward skips of fifths and sixths." In this and in many other respects opera will derive much good from the efforts of the modern-school composers.

(6.) If we may regard as the ideal of an opera overture one which, while being quite independent of the contents of the opera itself, is still so conceived that it prepares the audience for that which follows, paints the dramatis personæ, and suggests the action, then we may refer to the overture to Mozart's Don Juan as being the nearest approach to this ideal, for it borrows nothing from the opera but the motive of the adagio, while it is pregnant with suggestion. Some of his other overtures, although more admired, and indeed of a higher degree of merit when regarded simply in the light of concert pieces (notably those to Figaro and Die Zauberflöte) lack this essential property.

Weber's overture to Der Freischütz, which is perhaps more favored than any other, is constructed on the "programme" principle. That this principle of construction is unjustifiable may be recognized in the fact that on a first-hearing the audience must necessarily be ignorant of the drift of pieces extracted from an opera which has not yet been heard. The requisite knowledge would, however, be brought to bear upon a second hearing, when the work receives some sort of justification. There are other kinds of overtures, amongst which may be mentioned a kind which, being originally intended to prelude an opera seria, is made to do duty for a comic opera, or vice versa. At this we need in nowise feel offended, for we are well acquainted with the school from which such ideas emanate.

The reader will call to mind modern instances in which the overture is replaced by a short prelude of independent construction.

(7.) On this head there is much to be complained of. The total want of justification in cutting and warping an epic or dramatic artwork for musical purposes does not require to be demonstrated; and when we find that the very flower of artistic conception is involved, we are naturally struck with the enormity of the proceeding. The argument that this is mainly owing to the scarcity of good libretti and librettists, offers no excuse for those purveyors of words who dare to lay their sacrilegious hands upon the classics. The only form of subject-matter justly suited to the opera proper is the libretto proper, and it must be reserved for some cunningly devised art-combination, perhaps after the manner of Wagner's musical drama, to represent the classics in their entirety,—the only form in which dramatic works may reasonably be represented.

For an illustration of my meaning, I turn to Goethe's immortal masterpiece. Goethe looked to Beethoven for a setting of Faust, and he, of all musicians, was the one who might have attempted the colossal task; but when spoken to on the subject he exclaimed, uplifting his hands, "Das wäre ein Stück Arbeit" ("that would be a piece of work"), and he knew his weakness. It would be instructive to know Goethe's ideas upon Faust as an opera libretto, and still more so to hear his opinions upon it as the libretto of M. Gounod's well-known opera.

It is quite possible to attend a performance of this at Covent Garden (Nilsson as Margherita), and bring away with one an insight which in some particulars may be broader and deeper than that acquired in the studio. Witness the canzonetta, "King of Thule," and the exquisite recitative passages which precede, interlard, and follow it, of the prison scene, and others; but for all this Faust ceases to be Faust, and Margherita is no longer Margherita. The wonderful and ineffable apparent in the drama no longer accompanies them; they simply become characters, in contradistinction to the beings which Goethe conjured up from the heaven-lit depths of his intellect. In fact we have a bare plot extracted from the work, and of course expressed in other language, and this language in a strange tongue; further, to meet the requirements of persons of various nationalities, the Italian libretto has been translated into most European languages. A libretto thus manufactured necessarily bears as much resemblance to Goethe's work as would a copy of the Apollo Belvedere, in which the muscular development had been roughly spoked, to the original sculpture. By the way, Gounod's opera offers the number of acts insisted on by the critical writers of Greece, namely, five, the mystic number of Plato, superseded in the Middle Ages by the number three,¹ and the result is tedium. Composers have yet to learn that a composition may be too long.

(Concluded in next number.)

MASON'S PIANO-FORTE TECHNICS.²

THE only arts which lie within reach of the masses are poetry and music. It will be a long time before public art galleries will furnish means for contact with painting and sculpture in their highest and best forms. To the fountains of poetry all may go, and their draughts be measured only by their capacity.

In this music is at a disadvantage, since there must be a medium for expression, and thus the majority receive it at second hand. Undoubtedly the piano combines the greatest number of qualifications as a medium for the interpretation of music to the masses, and hence a means for their musical culture. Any attempts, therefore, to better the instrument itself, or render those who use it as a means for expression better able so to do, will be of benefit to music and the people.

It is a most wofully abused instrument, and grievous charges have been laid at its door, but it is nevertheless growing steadily in popularity, and justly, for no single instrument can take its place in the home. But with all this in its favor, how few get any culture out of it! The land is full of practicers on the piano, but where are the students? We have many players, but where are those who can make it speak to the souls of their listeners?

I speak advisedly in saying that the greatest reason for this lies in a defective technical development, or rather, a total lack of proper technical development. We are met at the outset with this difficulty, that the technique of the instrument must be mastered before it can be a medium for intelligent musical expression. The popular idea of this, however, is such that the student revolts at the thought of technical work; and we cannot blame him, for it presents no intellectual or æsthetical allurements as ordinarily brought before his mind. It is related of a noted musician, that during his technical practice he always had a book or paper to read. This expresses the popular idea that a technique is to be acquired by going through so many exercises, the mind having nothing to do about it. The majority of teachers (not including those who are musically illiterate) could give no clear definition of technique, and how can they know what technical development means? Scores of technical works have been written, and exercises innumerable, but one looks in vain for the principles upon which these have been formed, or a hint as to the mental processes involved. Are there any principles? What relation does the mind sustain to this matter? Can new life be infused into the dry bones of technique? I believe it to be possible to make it, if not a real pleasure, at least a means for mental and, to a certain degree, æsthetical improvement. It is the purpose of this paper to bring before the readers of the JOURNAL work, from the pens of Win. Mason and W. S. B. Matthews, bearing directly upon these questions. It is a work based upon the physiology of mind and muscle, and their relations to one another, and is certainly a new departure in the right direction. One of the main objects of the work, and the key-note of the whole matter, is stated as follows: "The entire course of practice in this system is influenced very much by a desire to induce the mental habits on which good playing depends." Technique, in its essence, is the establishment of the proper relations between the mind as the seat of thought, and the mechanism by which that thought is to be expressed.

¹ "Alle gute Dinge sind drei" is a common expression in Germany at the present day. The English "luck in odd numbers" may have had a similar origin.

² A System of Technical Exercises for the Piano-Forte, etc., etc. By WILLIAM MASON, Mus. Doc. W. S. B. MATTHEWS, Associate Editor. Boston: Oliver Ditson & Co., 1878.

Technical development is therefore the growth of this relationship. This involves the idea of a mental and physical side, both of which, and their relations to one another must be understood by every teacher. These are the fundamental principles laid down in this work.

It begins with the physical mechanism, and considers "the bony frame-work, the flexor and extensor muscles, the interosseous muscles, and the thumb." Everything is clearly illustrated and explained, with the exception of the extensor muscles, which are not illustrated, and referred to only in a vague manner. The importance of these muscles, and the necessity for a careful study of the upward stroke of the finger, would have been impressed more fully upon the student's mind by illustrating and explaining them.

The important point, however, is not what muscles are used, but what are their functions and action, and their relations to the mind, for upon these depends the question of exercises and their treatment. Hence it makes a difference whether the following statement is true: "Each of these great flexor muscles (flexor digitorum profundus and flexor digitorum sublimis) acts on all the fingers, its action being determined into one finger or another by an act of will. In consequence of this it happens that the fourth and fifth fingers are able to strike as powerful a blow as the second or third, since all are acted upon by the same muscles." If this be true, why do we spend so much time trying to strengthen the fourth and fifth fingers?

The answer would be, because "the difficulty at first experienced in controlling these fingers arises almost entirely from their not having been previously accustomed to obey the will." That is: we have not been accustomed to determining the action of these great flexor muscles into those fingers.

But this does not suffice, because, after only a few attempts, one can determine the independent action of the fourth and fifth fingers, and when this is done, as great an effect should follow, if the whole muscle acts, as when we will it into the first or second fingers, since the fingers in that case are simply so many points of contact, between the key and muscle. The facts are however, that but few ever secure the same results absolutely, even after years of labor. But there is a still stronger argument derived from the physical structure of the muscle.

It follows from the statement of the work that the muscle could have but one tendon, which divides into four, and in that case it would be difficult to see how the muscle could act through one tendon upon one finger when the one tendon has four attachments.

According to all anatomical plates, however (Gray, Wilson, Pancoast, and Encyclopædia Britannica), these muscles are represented as dividing into four tendons. Gray (Anat. page 307), after describing the origin of digitorum sublimis, says: "The fibres pass vertically downwards, forming a broad and thick muscle, which divides into four tendons," etc. Of profundus digitorum he says (Anat. page 308): "The fibres form a fleshy belly of considerable size, which divides into four tendons." (Emphasis is mine.) There is no mention here of one tendon. Wilson says (Anat. page 236): "The sublimis digitorum arises, etc. . . . It divides into four tendons." Of profundus digitorum he says the same thing. If there be four tendons it follows that a certain part of each of these muscles acts independently upon one finger, and another part upon another finger, and equality of finger touch depends upon making each of these parts, by assiduous practice, equal to one another.

Development of the whole muscle will not necessarily result in an equal development of all the parts, but an independent development of the parts will not only conduce to equality, but strengthen the whole. This will be referred to again. I cannot agree with the writers in passing over the lumbricalis muscles with the simple remark that they are unimportant. These muscles, from their conformation, and attachment at the base of the first phalanx, give evidence of being those most concerned in velocity, and for this reason anatomists have dubbed them the "fiddlers' muscles."

The second chapter is devoted to the "Relations of the Mind to the Art of Playing," "Mental Automatism," and "Laws of Practice." It is a concise analysis of the physiology of the mind, so far as it refers to piano-playing and its relations to the muscles. Automatic or reflex action of the muscles is an established fact in physiological science. It is what every pianist strives or should strive to realize. He literally studies to forget about his fingers, as the mechanism by which he expresses his thoughts.

There is in the brain a centre for the cognition of sound, which controls the motor centres of the muscles of the voice. This has been termed the "phono-motor" centre, and "it is an unusual strength or activity of this centre that constitutes the physiological basis of 'an ear for music,' or the ability to spontaneously imitate sounds of a higher order than speech." "Piano-playing 'by ear' arises from such an activity of the sound receiving and registering apparatus as enables the phono-motor centre to extend its operations beyond the vocal organs (as originally intended), and to seize upon and use the motor centre from which the arms, hands, and fingers are controlled in their usual employments, and in this way to reproduce the sounds which gave delight."

There is not only an automatism of muscle, but of mind. The centre of tone-thought can be taught to think for itself automatically, and leave the mind free for other thoughts. "Among the purely automatic parts of piano-playing thought are the scales, arpeggios on various chords, and the disposition to complete the rhythm." Hence we ought to study to forget tones to a certain degree. The automatic action of the fingers ought to depend upon the automatic action of this centre of tone-thought. I say ought, because the fingers may be trained, and in fact generally are, to respond to the visual centre, while a tonal conception is totally wanting. This is the central thought of the whole work, and cannot be too strongly impressed upon the student's mind.

The laws of practice as deduced from these facts are: "First. The entire series of motions which it is attempted to render automatic—whether scale, arpeggio, cadenza, or what not—must be performed a considerable number of times without the slightest variation from the correct order or method."

"Second. After a considerable number of these performances, a more rapid performance of them is to be attempted.

"Third. When the passage can be played in the second degree of speed, then it is to be attempted in velocity."

"Fourth. Practice which includes mistakes is worthless, and worse than worthless, because in so far as it forms a habit, it is a habit of falsity."

It would have been more in keeping with the central thought of this chapter to have coupled the idea of motions with that of tones, since one object of technical development, and the more important one, is the establishment of automatic tone-thought. The term "practice" is so associated with that which the authors so much deplore, namely, slovenly work, that I wish they had substituted the term "study," thus making it read, Laws of Study. It will be seen that this is the most important chapter, since it is the basis of all that follows. And if there were nothing more in the work that is new and progressive, this alone would rank it beyond any work of its character. C. B. CADY.

(To be continued.)

Dwight's Journal of Music.

SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 15, 1879.

CONCERTS IN BOSTON.

HARVARD MUSICAL ASSOCIATION. — The fourth symphony concert (January 30) could not fail to be interesting with such a programme as here follows; and the interest was shown both in the unusual number of the audience and in the close attention and delight manifested from beginning to end.

Overture to "The Men of Prometheus" . . . Beethoven.
Concerto in D minor, for three pianos, with String Orchestra . . . J. S. Bach.
(Allegro maestoso. — Alla Siciliana. — Allegro.)

G. W. Sumner, J. A. Preston, and A. W. Foote.

Second Symphony, in C, Op. 61 . . . Schumann.
Introduction and Allegro. — Scherzo. —
Adagio. — Allegro vivace.

Overture to "Anacreon" . . . Cherubini.
Phaëton: Poème Symphonique, Op. 39 . . . Saint-Saëns.

Beethoven's Ballet Overture, of his youthful period, light, buoyant, Mozartish, yet with plenty of his own native fire in it, was played with crisp precision and great spirit. The triple piano-forte concerto of Bach, in D minor, was heard for the first time here in an orchestral concert. In a more private way, that is, in a chamber concert, it was played as long ago as 1853, and with all the string parts represented, by Otto Dresel, Alfred Jaell, and William Scharfenberg. Several times since then it has figured, in whole or in part, in a piano-forte concert, with a fourth piano to represent the string accompaniments. This time it made its first appearance in the great Music Hall, accompanied by all the strings of the orchestra. The first Allegro, in which all the instruments start off in unison, is perhaps not so exhilarating, nor so rich in interwoven independent melody of all the parts as that in C, which we heard last year; but it is strong, hearty, wholesome music, like the quickening hand-grasp of a strong, wise, genial friend. The Siciliana movement is a strain of heaven's own tenderest and sweetest melody, even more exquisite than that aria in the suite, of which the violinists make a solo. The finale has a sinewy syncopated motive, and rushes onward gathering force from all sides, like the mingling of many rills in the strong current of a brook. It was finely rendered by the three pianists, and such was the power and volume of the three noble grands, with all the string accompaniment, that the listener found himself fairly surrounded, — caught and held in the thousand arms of a resistless maelstrom of harmony. The flying spray or scud of light embellishments, cadenzas, etc., which the heaving mass gives out in the first piano toward the end of the several movements, was very delicately and distinctly done by Mr. Preston. Objection has been made to the placing of the pianos so far apart. It is true that they could not all be equally well heard, except from certain favored seats. On the other hand, if they had been brought together in the middle front of the stage, the sounds of the orchestral parts would have been practically shut out from the hall.

Schumann's great symphony in C has taken its turn with his three other symphonies, from year to year, since these concerts were begun. But never before has it made its mark so palpably as in this last performance. To many listeners it used to seem heavy, lengthy, morbid, and obscure. The biographers indeed refer the composition of the first movement to a sick and depressed period in Schumann's life. But what a wealth of musical invention and deep life experience there is in it! The ruminating, groping introduction is pregnant with germs which are wonderfully and beautifully developed in the intense and most imaginative Allegro, which now and then, to be sure, modulates into a most drooping, melancholy mood, but never ceases to be fascinating, while the unity of the whole is perfect. The Scherzo, with its two trios, is a most original and exquisite play of fancy; its form and humor haunt you after hearing it. The Adagio is of the tenderest and deepest that Schumann ever wrote; and the final Allegro has enough life and stir and vigor to sweep away all sickly vapors in the full career of manly deed and triumph. This symphony is extremely difficult, and very fully scored; yet it was remarkably well interpreted from first to last, and made a deep impression. We think there were very few persons in that audience who will henceforth call it tedious or obscure, although repeated hearings will reveal new beauties and new meaning. Mr. Zerrahn had reason to feel proud of his orchestra after that performance.

The graceful Cherubini Overture was keenly relished. The short introduction is somewhat formal and old-fashioned, but the Allegro is full of the delicate, fine fire of a genial, healthy, and poetic nature. It is anything but "programme music," yet the term Anacreontic may well describe its quality. It offers a fine opportunity for the violins, which was signally improved, for the men played it con amore. Nothing could be in greater contrast than the programme music which wound up the concert, the "Phaëton," by Saint-Saëns. It was first brought out here two years ago in one of these concerts, and made quite a sensation then. But it was found to contain qualities of a somewhat higher order than what we commonly call sensational. With all that it has of startling, it is not mere "effect." It is essentially musical, and shows the artist hand. The pervading motive, the urging of the fiery steeds across the skies, though persistently kept up, never grows monotonous; it is developed, growing more and more engrossing, pregnant with catastrophe. It is relieved, too, beautifully, by a sympathetic second subject, a strain of pity and condolence, as if the nymphs and goddesses were watching the doomed youth with fear and sorrow; and as the chariot plunges from its course, how powerfully it is all worked up to the crashing climax, and how touchingly the whole orchestra subsides when all is over. It is decidedly the cleverest of all these modern French effect pieces that we have yet heard.

MR. WILLIAM H. SHERWOOD's Ten Piano-forte Recitals at his rooms, on Friday afternoons (each repeated on the following Monday evening), came to a close on the 24th and 27th ult. The last was most remarkable in programme and interpretation:—

{ Fantaisie, C minor Bach.
 { Fugue, C major ("Well tempered Clavichord"),
 No. 1 Bach.
 Sonata, Op. 111 (Last Piano Sonata), C Minor Beethoven.
 Maestoso — Allegro con brio ed appassionata

— Arietta con Variazioni.
 "Isolden's Liebes-Tod," from "Tristan and Isolda" Liszt-Wagner.

Études Symphoniques, Op. 13 Schumann.

We must go to the great pianists, to the Rubinstains and Bilows, to find another who can master and commit to memory, and clearly, satisfactorily perform—in fact interpret—in one concert two such great works, and so immensely difficult, as the last Sonata of Beethoven and the great Variations by Schumann.

The Liszt-Wagner piece, too, was no trifle, one of the most impressive of transcriptions from that source; and the smaller things from Bach, with which, as usual, Mr. Sherwood happily commenced the concert, showed the true artist in the rendering. Hardly once or twice, if ever, have we heard these important compositions so clearly and expressively presented. The preceding recital (ninth), in which Mrs. Sherwood bore a large share of the burden, we were obliged to lose, and we can only give the programme:—

{ Prelude and Fugue, B-flat major, No. 21
 ("Well tempered Clavichord") Bach.
 { Sonata Appassionata, Op. 57 Beethoven.

Mrs. SHERWOOD.
 Songs without Words, No. 1, E major, No. 3 (Hunting Song) Mendelssohn.
 Moments Musicaux, No. 3, F minor, No. 4, C sharp minor Schubert.
 "In the Country," Op. 26 J. K. Paine.
 No. 9, "Farewell." No. 10, "Welcome Home."

Rondo in C ("Perpetual Motion"), arr. from Sonata, Op. 24, by Johannes Brahms, as a study for the left hand C. M. v. Weber.

MR. SHERWOOD.
 { Two Novelletten, Op. 21, No. 1 and No. 2 Schumann.
 { Impromptu, Op. 90, No. 2, E-flat Schubert.

Mrs. SHERWOOD.
 "Chorus of Dancing Dervishes," from Beethoven's
 "Ruins of Athens" (arranged for piano by) C. Saint-Saëns.

MR. SHERWOOD.
 A more rich and interesting series of Piano-forte Concerts than these by Mr. Sherwood it would be hard to recall. The mass, and the variety of compositions of the highest order, important works of all the greatest masters, was astonishing; and all given in the course of twelve weeks. Of Bach, some Prelude and Fugue, or Fantasia, etc., formed the wholesome introduction of almost every programme. A Beethoven Sonata was almost sure to follow. Schumann, Chopin, Schubert, Mendelssohn, as well as Wagner, Liszt, and other moderns, were largely represented. And the interpretations, both by Mr. and by Mrs. Sherwood, were, with hardly an exception, of the most satisfactory kind. Such a draft upon the mental and physical resources of one man can hardly be appreciated.

THE CECILIA, on Friday evening, February 7, gave at Tremont Temple the finest concert thus far in the course of its three seasons. The crowd of associate members and invited friends were all made happy by the excellent performance of two cantatas, in extreme contrast to each other, but each admirable of its kind. The first was the sacred cantata by Bach: "Ich hatte viel Bekümmernis,"—or rather one half of it,—which was given entire a few years since in one of the symphony concerts. The selections this time included the short orchestral symphony which introduces the whole work, and the four numbers of the second and more joyous part. An excellent orchestra was provided, with Mr. J. A. Preston at the organ, and the chorus of mixed voices was in fine condition. The beautiful recitative and duet, a dialogue between the Soul and Jesus, was sung with true expression by Mrs. G. A. Adams and Dr. E. C. Bullard. Every one must have felt the tender beauty and pathos of this music. Next came the quartet with chorus, in which a chorale in unison is so wonderfully interwoven: "O my soul, be content," etc., which grows and swells to a magnificent conclusion. Mrs. Jennie Noyes and D. Langmaid completed the quartet. Dr. Langmaid, in excellent voice, sang the tenor Aria: "Rejoice, O my Soul," to great acceptance; and then came the sublime concluding chorus: "The Lamb that was Slain" and "Amen, Hallelujah," which, though much shorter and more concise, is even grander than the final chorus of the Messiah.

Gade's romantic, highly colored "Crusaders" formed the second part—given for the first time here with orchestra, which put an entirely new life into it. Indeed, instrumentation is Gade's strong side always, and to leave out the orchestra in such a work is to leave out the soul of it. It was wonderfully descriptive and most fascinating in the enchantments of the middle part, entitled "Armida." The young lady who sang the part of Armida, Miss Annie Louise Gage, surprised all by the beauty of her voice (in which many recognized a strong resemblance in quality to that of Mrs. Harwood, who sang this part so finely when the "Crusaders" was first given by the Parker Club), and by her artistic and expressive style of singing. Dr. Langmaid was the Rinaldo, and was fully equal to the heroic tenor strains; and Dr. Bullard made the appeals and exhortations of Peter the Hermit very impressive. Altogether it was a complete and signally successful performance. The concert was repeated on Monday evening, but unfortunately without the orchestra, it being impossible to procure one on that evening; so that the accompaniments were represented on the piano-forte (Mr. Tucker) and the organ (Mr. Preston),—very creditably, it must be said.

We were unable to attend MR. EDDY'S ORGAN RECITAL several weeks ago, but a friend who did, and is competent to judge, writes us as follows:—

Mr. H. Clarence Eddy, director of the Hershey School of Musical Art, Chicago, Ill., the leading organist of the West, gave an organ recital in this city, before an audience of our best musical people, on Friday, Jan. 3, at the South Congregational Church, about which many of our best judges speak in unqualified terms of praise. It was certainly the most interesting organ recital given in Boston for years, both as to the quality of the selections and the manner of their presentation. Mr. Eddy's apparent ease, and absolute mastery of the work before him, no less than the dignified, strongly marked nobility of conception and the beautiful, harmonious taste displayed in phrasing and registration, made the organ speak with the eloquence of the human voice or violin, combined with the power and contrasts of a full orchestra. The Chopin Étude, a strong, quick movement, calling for great dexterity of execution, was less satisfactory, owing, apparently, to a lack of timbre in the organ, or to imperfect light and to a slight stiffness of mechanism in the instrument. The "Allegretto," by Guilmant, and the "Elevation," by Saint-Saëns, although characteristic of the modern French school, are hardly of sufficient musical value to stand beside the other numbers of the programme, whereas the Concert-Satz, by Thiele, is one of the most brilliant and at the same time solid and substantial examples of modern music yet heard. Below is the programme:—

1. Sonata in D minor, No. 5, op. 118 (new) Merkel.
 I. Allegro risoluto. — II. Andante. — III. Allegro risoluto. — Fuga.

2. Allegretto in B minor Guilmant.
 3. Grand Prelude and Fugue in C minor Bach.
 4. Sonata in G minor, No. 2, op. 77 Buck.

I. Allegro moderato ma energico. — II. Adagio molto espressivo. — III. Allegro vivace non troppo.

Dedicated to H. CLARENCE EDDY.
 5. Elevation in E minor Saint-Saëns.
 6. Grand Étude in C sharp minor Chopin.

(Arranged by Haupt.)
 7. "Marche Funèbre et Chant Serephique" Guilmant.
 8. Grand Fantasia in E minor ("The Storm") Lemmens.
 9. Concert-Satz in E flat minor Thiele.

We have yet to notice the interesting concerts of the present week, including those of the Handel and Haydn Society, the Euterpe, the Fifth Symphony Concert, etc. In the Sixth Harvard Concert (February 26) the Brahms Symphony in D will be repeated, and Mme. Julia Rivé-King will play.

LADY CONDUCTORS.

A FRIEND writes us from Worcester (Feb. 11) as follows: A wave of musical excitement passed over Brooklyn on the first appearance of Miss Selma Borg, at the head of the late Thomas Orchestra. A ripple has passed over Worcester, the occasion being the presentation of Haydn's Toy Symphony, by Miss Mabel Allen, daughter of Mr. B. D. Allen, who, wholly unaided, trained and brought out an amateur orchestra, exhibiting musical skill and ability, and the steadiness and self-possession of a veteran. The performers were decked with gray-colored sashes and caps, and presented an attractive picture aside from doing their work well. The performance was satisfactory in every respect. Miss Allen was made the recipient of a beautiful silver baton and a basket of flowers.

The young leader is barely out of her teens, and considering the difference of years and experience, it was as great a triumph for Miss Allen to lead these amateurs, to whom the experience was new, as for Miss Borg to take the stand before a band of artists, all of whom were an assistance to her.

Both are to be congratulated on their successful position. Truly, woman's sphere widens in this nineteenth century!

MUSICAL CORRESPONDENCE.

NEW YORK, FEB. 8.—A concert given by Mr. O. B. Boies, at Chickering Hall, on Thursday evening, January 30, commends itself to notice by the fact that the programme was entirely composed of the works of Mr. Boies. Every one knows that in these days, and particularly in our own country, it is very difficult for the composer of an orchestral work (unless he be already famous), to secure even a public hearing of his music, to say nothing of a recognition of any talent he may be fortunate enough to possess. Such being the case, the composer who imagines he has something to say must set aside all sensitiveness and boldly demand to be heard.

The action of Mr. Boies in thus taking time by the forelock was certainly commendable, and the composer had the ear of a large and very intelligent audience.

The concert began with a Symphony called "In Memoriam" and closed with a Festival Overture for orchestra and organ. The other selections were: "A Child's Requiem," for vocal quartet and organ; a Concerto for piano-forte and orchestra; and three songs entitled: "Good-night," "Cradle-Song," "There is fallen a splendid Tear."

The workmanship of the orchestral composition gave evidence of hard study on the part of the composer; and if his orchestral effects were not always entirely new and startling, it may be remembered that very few composers have reached greatness at a single bound, and that success is usually the result of cumulative efforts.

The best feature of the concert was the piano forte Concerto, which was charmingly played by Mme. Nanette Falk-Auerbach. The songs were effectively sung by Miss Emily Winant. Mr. S. P. Warren was the organist, and the vocal quartet consisted of Miss Helen Cary, Miss Mary C. Husa, Mr. C. M. Plerson and Mr. Geo. Martin Husa.

Dr. Danroech gave his fourth Symphony Concert at Steinway Hall, on Saturday evening, Feb. 1, with the following selections:—

Symphony, No. 2, A minor (new) C. Saint-Saëns.
 Concerto for violin (Allegro) Beethoven.

HERR AUGUST WILHELMJ.
 Overture to "Euryanthe" Weber.
 Serenade, No. 3, D minor Robt. Volkmann.

String Orchestra.

Chaconne J. S. Bach.

HERR AUGUST WILHELMJ.

Les Preludes: Symphonie Poem Liszt.

The symphony, by Saint-Saëns, is a highly colored, imaginative work, thoroughly French in style and abounding in really beautiful effects. The instrumentation is masterly, and the composition is characterized by elegance and refinement rather than by strength. It is pleasant to notice a gradual improvement in the orchestra with each concert. Dr. Danroech has his men well in hand; much that was at first wanting in smoothness of tone and unity of purpose is now supplied, and their playing, on this occasion, was unquestionably excellent. The symphony did not go quite smoothly, in all parts, but the familiar and lovely Euryanthe overture, the "Serenade" for string orchestra, with "cello-obbligato" by Mr. Fred. Berguer, and the splendid tone-picture by Liszt, were most vividly presented. The nervous energy of the conductor seemed to be conveyed to the players, thus giving to the performance of the music the life and character which are necessary to every good interpretation.

The great violinist, Wilhelmj, is now no stranger here, but the wonder and admiration which he excites seem to increase each time he appears in public. It is admiration compelled, not sought for. The marvellous breadth, fullness, and purity of his intonation, the absolute accuracy of his stopping, the perfect ease with which all difficulties were overcome, and the noble spirit which animated the artist, were indeed enough to hold the audience breathless, during the performance of the concerto and the Bach Chaconne. At the conclusion of each, the silence was profound for an instant, and then the hearers, many of them rising, actually shouted with delight. As a consequence they had the pleasure of hearing Wilhelmj four times, instead of twice; the two additional selections being a remarkably fine transcription of Walther's "Prize Song" from Die Meistersinger, for violin and orchestra (transcribed by Wilhelmj), and a Romanza of his own composition.

If anything is lacking in the playing of so fearless an artist as Wilhelmj, the want may be defined in one word, precision. Given this, the result would be absolute perfection,—something not to be expected this side of Utopia.

A. A. C.

PHILADELPHIA, JAN. 26.—Mr. Jarvis's fifth soirée was given last night. His opening piece was a Suite, Op. 91, by Raff, the one so frequently played by Mad. Schiller.

Its great difficulties vanished before the immense virtuosity of the executant, and afforded a fine contrast to the Chopin Notturmo, Op. 27, No. 2,—the same that the great violinist Wilhelmj has transcribed with such admirable effect and taste. In this delicate and tender morceau Mr. Jarvis displayed a neatness and clearness of execution truly admirable, and threw into it a degree of intelligent and refined expression to occupy our thoughts and feelings to the exclusion from memory of the remainder of this the most imposing programme he has yet performed in public.

Mad. K. Seiler gives monthly private concerts of her pupils at her school, 1104 Walnut Street, which are attended mostly by the parents, guardians, and friends of the young ladies pursuing their studies there, thus affording an opportunity of watching their progress and efficiency.

Your correspondent "assisted" at a recent pupils' entertainment, but was prevented by indisposition and the great heat of the room from hearing the whole programme; in fact he missed some of the more ambitious numbers. The company was large, and contained some of the élite of Philadelphia society, who seemed much pleased with the singing of the young ladies, and applauded heartily. The "American Lady's Quartette," a close imitation of the "Swedish Lady's Quartette" in manner and style of music, even to minor details, sang with a delightful intelligence and expression. They were recalled amidst great enthusiasm. The voices were well balanced, and showed the advantages of continuous singing together, which produces a sympathetic blending not to be heard under ordinary circumstances.

FEB. 7.—A short season of Italian Opera by Kellogg, Cary, Adams, Lazzarini, Pantaloni, Conly, Kaufman, and Gottschalk, under the direction of Belrens, and management of Strakosch, gives me no opportunity of saying anything new, save to notice a new aspirant to public honors in the person of Miss von Elser, from Springfield, Illinois, who is known on the stage as Maria Litta. As a vocalist she is very, very promising, and has made a most favorable impression upon our cognoscenti. Her voice is pure soprano in timbre and compass; her volume is not great, but sufficient; her execution is neat, clean, and brilliant; her trill is most facile and beautiful. The young lady is not as yet entitled to praise as an actress, nor would she be likely to supplant Helen in the affections of any modern Paris, but she has rare musical intelligence in addition to the qualities already enumerated, and that is much more valuable in the estimation of AMERICUS.

CINCINNATI, FEB. 8.—To give your readers a more definite idea of the heightened musical activity of which Cincinnati can now be proud, it will be necessary to supplement the hasty letter in your last by a more detailed account of the work of the College of Music, and of the organizations connected with it. A simple, accurate statement of the present status quo is all I now propose. The large outlay needed to call into life at once an institution like the Cincinnati College of Music naturally compelled the business managers to advertise very extensively. If now and then, in doing this, good taste was made subservient to the policy considered necessary in view of the tone to which the public has become accustomed in all such matters, the circumstance that no complaints have been entered sufficiently establishes the fact that in no instance has the slightest deception or even exaggeration been practiced.

Among the many discriminating friends whom Mr. Thomas made as an orchestral director, there were not a few who hesitated to form or express an opinion as to his fitness for the directorship of an educational institution. If all doubts in that regard have not yet been dispelled, they bid fair soon to vanish altogether. Scarcely a week has passed in which a new feature has not been introduced, an additional link inserted into the chain of instruction, which it is intended shall become as complete as possible for diffusing a broad and thorough knowledge of the art of music. As soon as emergencies peculiar to our country, and especially to our section, have arisen, they have been met, and thus far successfully and with the best judgment.

In the instrumental and vocal departments the system in vogue in European conservatories is in general adhered to, with perhaps the exception that class instruction is less liberally employed, and more attention given to the individual. The authority which an institution of such dimensions gives to the individual teacher enables him to proceed rigidly, and without making any concessions, in employing a thorough and strict method, and, above all, in giving only the very best of music to the student. Not that for years this course has been indifferently pursued by the prominent teachers of our city; but the large quota of students furnished by the smaller towns of this and the neighboring States makes it possible to reach circles heretofore beyond the influence of conscientious instructors. One of the most noticeable and praiseworthy features of the course of instruction, however, is the effort on the part of the musical director, as well as of the teachers, to impress on the mind of the student the necessity of obtaining a good general knowledge of music, and cultivating the taste for good music, all of which can be done by attending the chorus classes, the private and public orchestra rehearsals, and the organ concerts, facilities which are offered to the pupils without extra charge.

The chorus classes are deserving of especial mention. The members of these are instructed in musical notation, sight singing, etc.; concise and clear definitions are given of time in music, measure, bar, the construction of scales, the system of intervals, etc.,—all this according to approved and thoroughly digested methods. Hand in hand with these the theory classes progress. It will be evident to every one that by thus distributing the subjects more thoroughness, with concessions to the less talented, is made possible. The attendance on these classes is strictly controlled by carefully kept registers. The influence of these phases of instruction can scarcely be overestimated. Even the College Chorus, of which mention was made in the last letter, is subjected to this course; failure to attend on the chorus class arranged for the members brings with it forfeiture of membership of the College Chorus. These few remarks may give an idea of the high aim which the musical director has in view. The fruits are beginning to appear. But it would not be wise to anticipate too much.

As the programmes of the chamber and orchestra concerts given so far have been published in your journal, a few words concerning the organizations which execute them may not be amiss. For six years past we have had a standing orchestra, which was under the direction of Mr. Michael Brand, a musician of unusual talent and ability. Mr. Balenborg, who had undertaken the management of the organization, found himself restricted during the first few years to drawing on the resident musicians only, as the orchestra, on account of want of permanent employment, was necessarily disbanded during the summer months. As soon as the hill-top resorts sprang into existence, however, he was enabled to keep the organization intact during the whole year, and immediately began to procure the services of the best musicians obtainable in other cities, until the orchestra during the last season, in its nucleus, consisted of very good musicians, some of them excellent. Mr. Thomas, on his arrival, secured the members of the Cincinnati Orchestra, as it was called, and supplemented it with such other musicians as he deemed fit. The progress made by this new organization, as Concertmeister of which Mr. Jacobsohn exerts an excellent influence, together with his quartet associates, Messrs. Baetens and Hartdegen, is really astonishing, and redounds to the credit of Mr. Thomas, who is proving himself more than ever before a most excellent director, and no less successful a drill-master of orchestral bodies. The string orchestra has improved remarkably in fullness of tone, precision, and intonation, while the unity and balance of the whole organization is becoming more and more satisfactory with every public performance. The pecuniary resources placed at the disposal of the director are such as enable him to have as many rehearsals as he thinks necessary, a decided advantage over similar bodies elsewhere. The programmes already published serve to prove that the works essayed at the different concerts are among the most difficult of orchestral scores. In the last concert a novelty was presented: Symphony No. 1, in D, of C. Ph. Emanuel Bach, a work of remarkable freshness and originality when the date of its composition (1776) is considered. The other numbers of the programme were triple concerto, D minor, J. S. Bach, performed by Messrs. Andres, Schneider, and Singer; Overture to Magic Flute; and the Pastoral Symphony.

In the last chamber concert Mr. Thomas made his final appearance as member of the string quartet. His duties have become so manifold and so engrossing as to make it impossible for him to devote enough time to the rehearsals for a good ensemble. His place will be filled by Mr. Eich, who for years has been considered one of the best of our resident violinists. Mr. Jacobsohn's extraordinary abilities as a violinist and musician are acknowledged throughout the country. Mr. Hartdegen, too, is so well known that he can forego any mention of his excellence as a cello player. Mr. Baetens combines with a perfect mastery of his instrument, the viola, a very extensive experience in England and on the Continent as a quartet player, while Mr. Thomas in former years gave the public frequent opportunity to judge of his qualifications as a violinist. With every succeeding concert the ensemble has improved noticeably; especially in the last two a warmth of tone color, produced by a more perfect balance of the different instruments, was apparent, giving promise of unusual excellence. The programme consisted of Quartet in E-flat, Mozart; Rondo Brillante, Op. 70, Schubert (Messrs. Andres and Jacobsohn); Quintet in C, Op. 29, Beethoven (with the assistance of Mr. Brookhoven). In the last number, especially, Mr. Jacobsohn displayed his wonderful technique, and, above all, his excellent musical taste and moderation in ensemble playing. The enthusiasm created was genuine and unaffected.—Mr. Whiting's activity continues with the most gratifying results, as is shown by the attendance on his organ recitals. The public is gradually coming to an appreciation of their artistic and pedagogical value. Among other numbers his programmes during the past week contained: Fugues, Bach; Prelude and Fugue in D minor, Mendelssohn; Andante and Finale from Fourth Organ Symphony, C. M. Widor; Causona in A minor, Gullmunt; Organ Study on Pleyel's Hymn, J. Baptist Calkin; Four Interludes to the "Magnificat" (plain chant), Whiting; Overture to "The Siege of Rochelle," Balfe.

ALPHA MU.

CHICAGO, JAN. 24.—On Thursday evening, January 9, the "Abt Society" gave its first concert. This society consists of a male chorus of twenty-four persons, embracing the leading voices of the city, and is to devote itself to the performance of four-part music. While its aim is but to produce music of a limited order (for all the part songs that are usually given by societies of this character have about them a certain sameness), it will fill a place in our concert season, and do much to interest a large class of persons who admire music of this kind. It is very fortunate in regard to its active membership, for I have never heard better voices in a chorus of this kind. The balance of the parts is good, and the leading tenors are particularly strong, while the second basses possess voices of much power, voices which harmonize nicely, and furnish a good foundation of pure tone for the other parts to rest upon. Of course, as this was a first concert of a new society, after but some three months' practice, one can hardly expect more than a suggestion of possibilities. The programme consisted of the following numbers:—

"The Village Blacksmith"	Hatton.
"Evening"	Kuwa.
"How came Love"	M. Frei.
"He's the Man to know"	Zöllner.
"Serenade"	Storch.
"Blest Pair of Sirens"	Mosenthal.
"Good Night"	Kirschner.
Pilgrim Chorus from Taubhäuser	Wagner.

They were assisted by Mr. Max Pinner, of New York, pianist, who played the following pieces, and the Tarantelle from Venezia e Napoli of Liast. Also by a home vocalist, Miss Fannie Whitney, who sang "Nobil Signor" from The Huguenots of Meyerbeer, and a song of Blumenthal's. Mr. Pinner was very well received, being twice recalled. He seems to be a truly intelligent player, possessing much refinement of taste, and is able to bring out a pure quality of tone from his instrument, without forcing it beyond its limit into the confines of noise. His interpretation of the gentle Nocturne of Chopin was particularly pleasing, and indicated that he had made a close study of the poetical nature of this composer, and that he was able to reproduce the dreamy sentiment of longing (which seems to be the idea in this Nocturne) with so much fidelity that the Chopin spirit was at least made plain to us. In the Liast selection he was also very happy, and manifested the pleasing faculty of producing beautiful tone effects from the piano. His effort seemed to be, in all his playing, to interpret the works of the composers, rather than to astonish by any brilliant effect; and in thus placing self subordinate in the representation of the musical intentions of others, he manifested an honesty of purpose highly commendable in these days of superficial show. Miss Whitney is a young singer who has yet much to learn, particularly in regard to the formation of pure tone. Like many young singers she forces her voice, hoping to gain volume, and loses thereby quality, which is surely a most necessary element in all musical tone.

(a.) Allegro	Scrattini.
(b.) Nocturne	Chopin.
(c.) Polonaise, Op. 53	Chopin.

On Monday evening, January 13, Her Majesty's Opera Company began a season of two weeks at Haverly's Theatre. As this company has been so recently in Boston it is hardly necessary to do more than record a few impressions. The first week we had Carmen (twice), La Sonnambula, (twice), Nazze di Figaro, Lucia di Lammermoor, and the old stand-by, Il Truatore. Indeed, taken as a whole, we have never had opera given as perfectly in the West, and for two weeks the enthusiasm of our musical people and the daily press has had very little limitation. The most perfect performances have been Sonnambula, Lucia di Lammermoor, and Carmen. The Figaro of Mozart suffered very badly, owing to a foolish quarrel between Madame Rose and Miss Hawk in regard to dressing rooms; in consequence of this childish difficulty the lovely opera was so badly mutilated as to be hardly recognizable; and the whole performance just escaped being a complete failure.

The "Gerster nights" have called out the largest numbers of people, and "standing room" has often been at a premium at the operas in which this gifted lady has sung. Indeed, gallantry may excuse me for passing by the splendid chorus, and the fine band, and the most worthy support furnished this charming singer, to notice more particularly the talent of the lady herself. I can remember no operatic experience that was more interesting than the performance of Lucia di Lammermoor, in which Mme. Gerster took the title rôle. From the moment she sang her first aria, "Regnava nel silenzio," until the closing note of the "mad scene" in the third act, she held the audience spellbound. As we remember the gentle presence of this charming singer, and listen for the reëcho of those pure, melting tones, it is difficult to recall any vocalist who has made a more marked impression upon us than this lady. A number of singers have had as great flexibility and vocal technique, but no one has sung Lucia in my hearing who could so completely represent the idea of the character, even amid all the brilliancy of the music. In the "mad scene," where other singers have made the music a vocal display of execution, she undertakes the more difficult task of representing the heart-broken girl, maddened by her grief. The brilliant cadenzas with the flute seem to have a higher art in them than ever before. She renders the florid passages as if her attention had just been called to the music of the flute, and her madness took the form of mimicry; she imitated intuitively. The wonderful sympathy of her high notes is remarkable, for she is able to impress on them such coloring of tone that nothing seems unfitting the character she is representing. The very identity of the spirit is felt there, manifesting the pure emotions of a noble soul. The careful manner in which she never allows a note to increase in volume at the expense of purity and sweetness is a lesson to all our young singers. Her Amina in Sonnambula is also a very perfect creation. In the "Ah, non credea" the delicate purity of her tones, breathing a simple sadness that was most touching, gave such a lovely picture of the simple and pure maiden that the audience was hushed to perfect silence through deep sympathy with the character, as well as calmed by delight.

There is something greater in such singing than mere art. It is as if the spirit of song, mistress of all forms and powers, was manifesting her own pure thoughts in the most perfect and lovely manner. Splendid voices have sung to us before, larger and grander tones have been given, but for simplicity, purity, sweetness, and real feeling, Mme. Gerster stands alone. She makes a little home for herself in every musical heart, and we shall love to remember her there with honest devotion.

In Rigoletto her powers have not so fine an opportunity to manifest themselves.

Miss Minnie Hawk had little to do the first week except to sing the part of Carmen and half of a part in Figaro. Her acting of the Spanish Gypsy was very fine, and she lent to the character power and dramatic consistency of which it is hardly worthy. We believe it is in no way a favorite rôle with her, and indeed it gives her but little opportunity to display her real ability and musical culture. In other parts she does herself much more justice. Madame Rose has been singing quite well, and had it not been for the "Gerster fever" would have attracted much attention for her honest efforts. As it was she had a warm reception. She sang in Figaro and Il Trovatore.

Sig. Campanini comes back to us a fine artist, and has met with an enthusiastic reception. Signori Galassi and Foli have made themselves favorites, and Sig. Frapolli has proved himself to be a careful singer; indeed the whole troupe have now a firm place in our esteem. C. H. B.

MILWAUKEE, FEB. 5. — Since I wrote you last there have been five local concerts worthy of record. Four were chamber concerts by four young people, two brothers and two sisters named, Heine. They range in age from fourteen to twenty-one years, and have been trained by their father to play the piano-forte, violin, viola, and cello. Their playing, if not that of mature artists, is interesting and musician-like, and worthy of the name of genuine interpretation. They are thoroughly at home in the whole range of chamber music, classical and modern, and read everything at sight. The programmes speak for themselves. The only mistake was in opening each with an overture.

(1.) BEETHOVEN. Overture: "Egmont;" String Quartet, Op. 18, No. 5; "Kreutzer" Sonata, Op. 47 (2d and 3d movement); Quartet, for piano, violin, etc., Op. 18.

(2.) SCHUBERT. Overture: "Rosamunde;" Duo for piano and violin, Op. 162, in four movements; String Quartet, posthumous, in G; Adagio and Rondo, posthumous, for piano, violin, alto, and cello.

(3.) MENDELSSOHN. Overture: "Midsummer Night's Dream;" Trio for piano, violin, and cello, Op. 66 (last three movements); Violin Concerto (2d and 3d movement); String Quartet, in E flat, Op. 12.

(4.) Overture: "Preciosa;" Weber; Trio for piano, violin, and cello, (2d and 3d movement), Op. 54, Festa; String Quartet, Op. 136, Allegro, Riff; Quartet, piano, violin, etc., Op. 47, Schumann.

The fifth concert was the 260th of the Musical Society, under the leadership of Prof. Mickler. This was the programme:

Overture: "Midsummer Night's Dream." Mendelssohn. Chorus, with Tenor Solo, "The Young Cavalier."

F. Möhring.

J. Oestreicher and Maennerchor.

Aria from "Jessonda." Spöhr. Frans Remmerts.

Songs for Mixed Chorus Abt.

(a.) "I Must Sing Again."

(b.) "Come Gang with Me."

(c.) "Wanderer's Joy."

Unfinished Symphony (in B minor) Schubert.

"Past!" F. Möhring.

Maennerchor, with Baritone and Tenor Solos.

Messa. Frans Remmerts and J. Oestreicher.

Songs for Baritone: —

(a.) "By the Sea" Schubert.

(b.) "The Two Grenadiers." Schumann.

Gypsy Life (Poem by Em. Geibel) for Mixed Chorus. Schumann.

(With Orchestral Accompaniment, by . . . C. Grädener.)

The orchestra seemed to be in rather better condition than at the previous concerts of this season. The whole concert was well done, the choruses especially showing improvement in precision and shading. Mr. Remmerts's noble baritone voice was at its best in Schumann's "Two Grenadiers," as exciting and inspiring a song as he could possibly have selected. We are to be so fortunate as to hear him again soon.

Perhaps I ought to mention among our local concerts the Sunday concerts at Turner Hall by Chr. Bach's orchestra. These are primarily intended for amusement and recreation, rather than for culture; but the programmes not infrequently include such overtures as Mozart's Magic Flute, Weber's Freischütz and Oberon, movements from Haydn's and Beethoven's symphonies, Saint-Saëns's Phaëton, etc. They are reasonably well done.

Wilhelaj has been here again and played the Beethoven concerto in D most superbly. He grew on us all the time as virtuoso and artist. He had with him this time Mr. Emil Liebling as pianist. Mr. Liebling has a very sure and clear technique, and played Liszt's transcription of Bach's great G-minor organ fugue in a way that left little to be desired. I was not so much inspired by his rendering of the Chopin Scherzo.

I have further to chronicle a concert by the Mrs. H. M. Smith concert company, with a light but pleasing and creditable programme. Mrs. Smith herself seemed to be in her best voice, and sang with rare purity, precision, and beauty of expression. The whole company deserves favorable mention. J. C. F.

NOTES AND GLEANINGS.

SAN FRANCISCO. — Good music is not without its faithful, able representatives in the farthest Western city of this continent. One of the most devoted and most influential for good, particularly in the fields of organ and piano music, was the lamented Joseph Trenkle, whose spirit and whose influence still live. He is well remembered and esteemed in Boston. Another Bostonian, a more recent emigrant, is doing a good work there. An important member of our Apollo Club, he has carried the good seed with him to his new home, where he inspires, teaches, and conducts the Loring Club, of which he is the father. It is composed of some fifty male voices, and its tasteful miniature quarto books of words and programmes, which we occasionally receive, are much after the model of the Apollo books; while its repertoire includes very many of the best part-songs given by the Boston clubs, confining itself thus far to this more modest sphere, and not yet undertaking such grand tasks as the Antigone music of Mendelssohn. Mr. Loring is endeavoring to gather a chorus of ladies, so that the Club may bring out music for mixed voices, including now and then a chorale, or other short work, by Bach.

Better still, San Francisco has its regular series of classical chamber concerts, string quartets, quintets, etc., all from its own local resources. These are given by the Schmidt Quintette, composed of Miss Alice Schmidt (Leipzig pupil), piano-forte; Louis Schmidt, Jr. (do.), violin; Clifford Schmidt, violin; Louis Schmidt, viola; Ernst Schmidt (Leipzig graduate), violoncello. All of the Schmidt family! So the consensus should be perfect. One of the local critics, honest and outspoken and a cultivated musician, writes of the fourth concert, December 6: "The keynote to the entire evening was struck in the string quartet of Haydn, with which the concert opened — Mr. Clifford Schmidt leading — of which the Menuetto was given with the most charming grace and humor. Mr. Clifford also placed a new feather in his cap — and a still larger one, I think, in that of his teacher, his elder brother, Louis, Jr. — by his really admirable playing of the Andante and Finale from Mendelssohn's Violin Concerto; the Andante, although beautifully played, suffered somewhat from the rather rapid tempo in which it has become the fashion of late years to play it (entirely uncalculated for and mistaken, I think), but the Finale was a delightful performance in many respects. So was also that of the Variations Sérieuses, by Miss Schmidt, who certainly showed great courage in attempting this most difficult and profound of Mendelssohn's piano-forte compositions, but who proved herself to be as nearly equal to the task of playing it as it is possible to be at her age. The enthusiasm of youth is rarely tempered with artistic reticence; young blood must be permitted its moments of gush. But I prefer it in mild doses, especially in Mendelssohn's music. The String Quartet of Schubert — the posthumous Allegro molto in C minor — a work of indescribable beauty, and one that made a truly profound impression on the audience, was one of the most perfect quartet performances I ever heard anywhere. Aware, as I was, of the great difficulty of this movement, both for each individual player and in the ensemble, I had prepared myself to be satisfied with a moderately good performance of it, and, indeed, should have considered this quite an achievement. But I was delightfully disappointed. Mrs. Tippet, who did not seem to be in her best voice, sang with the true musical intelligence and sympathetic style that characterizes everything she does. The first song, by Raff, was not well chosen, for her, since it should be given with a dramatic force for which her voice is entirely inadequate; the songs of Reinecke, with violin, he sings beautifully."

The fifth and last programme (December 29) included the piano-forte Quintet of Schumann, clarinet Quintet of Mozart, Gavotte of Bassini for strings, Aria for violin by Bach, a Ciaconne for violin, by Vitali, Romanza for cello, by Bargiel, and the brilliant Capriccio in B minor of Mendelssohn (with quintet accompaniment) for piano-forte. Mrs. Mariner-Campbell sang an Aria from "Pré aux clercs" with obligato violin, and a "Slumber Song" by Oscar Weil.

Then again, still more important, San Francisco has, and has had for a quarter of a century, its own orchestra, which plays symphonies, etc., — a larger orchestra than we can command just now in Boston, and a very good one, as Mr. Zerrahn will testify, who conducted in the festival there last June. The silver anniversary of the presentation of a baton to the conductor of this Philharmonic Society, Mr. Rudolph Herold, was to take place on the 22d ult. We have before us programmes of eight Orchestral Matinees given in two months (September 18 to November 20). They include, Beethoven: Leonore Overture, numbers 1, 2, and 3; Eighth Symphony. Mozart: Concerto in E flat for two pianos; Concerto for French horn. Haydn: Symphony in D. Schubert: unfinished Symphony in B minor. Schumann: Symphony in D minor (twice). F. Lachner: Suite No. 2, in E minor. Gade: Fourth Symphony, B-flat. Rubinstein: Ocean Symphony. Besides many smaller pieces.

CINCINNATI. — The President of the College of Music, in his statement to the directors, declares that the result so far exceeds his most sanguine expectations; that the school has already 233 pupils, with ample accommodations for from 500 to 1,000. It is complained that the weekly organ concerts are too much of a drain upon the treasury of the College.

The new College Choir will take up the following interesting works for practice with a view to public performance: Handel's "Hercules," composed in 1744, and originally styled an Oratorio (never yet given in this country); Schubert's Mass in E-flat; Verdi's "Requiem;" selections from Beethoven's "Ruins of Athens," and Bach's Cantata, "Ein feste Burg."

"The Musical Club" is the title of a Cincinnati institution of two or three years' standing, composed of most of the leading musicians of the city, who meet together in a friendly way on Sunday afternoons. They have usually a printed programme, but sometimes any one who feels like it plays. It has done much to promote a kindly feeling among the members. Occasionally a member submits a new composition to the criticism of the Club, and we are told that some very creditable efforts have been made in this direction. This Club paid a graceful tribute to the memory of Beethoven on the 108th anniversary of his birth (December 17, 1878), when the following programme was presented: —

(1.) Trio for piano-forte, violin and cello. Op. 70. No. 1.

Geo. Schneider, S. E. Jacobssohn, A. Hartdegen.

(2.) Sonata, for piano-forte. C major. Op. 63.

Arnim Doerner.

(3.) Elegiac Song, for four voices and accompaniment of strings. Op. 118.

Misses Ruth Jones and Emma Cranch; Messrs. Geo. A. Fitch and Chas. J. Davis.

(4.) Quartet, for two violins, viola, and cello. Op. 95.

Theodore Thomas, S. E. Jacobssohn, C. Baetens, A. Hartdegen.

It is the Board of Directors of the Cincinnati Musical Festival Association who offer the prize referred to in our last. We quote from their announcement: —

"This association was organized for the purpose of elevating the standard of music. In the three festivals already given, it is believed that this object has in good measure been attained. The choral and orchestral works of the great masters have been worthily represented, and honest, healthy musical influences have been exerted upon large numbers of people. New works have been given upon these occasions. The directors of the association are, however, now convinced that with the resources of soloists, chorus, and orchestra available for the festivals, there is the proper field in this country for the display and encouragement of native musical talent.

"The association, therefore, offers a prize of one thousand dollars ($1,000) for the most meritorious work for chorus and orchestra, the competition for which is to be open only to native-born citizens of the United States. This work will be performed at the fourth festival in the month of May, 1880.

"Five judges will be appointed to decide upon the merits of the compositions presented for competition. Three of these judges, one of whom will be Mr. Theodore Thomas, will be nominated by the Musical Festival Association. The other two judges will be selected by the three whose appointment is already provided for. Mr. Thomas will be president of the board of judges. The works offered for competition must not occupy more than sixty minutes in the performance.

"The full score and a piano score of all works must be placed in the hands of the president of the board of judges in Cincinnati, on or before October 1, 1879.

"The author of the prize composition shall own the copyright of his work.

"The association will pay the cost of its publication, having direction over the same, making its own arrangement with the publisher for such numbers of the work as it may require, which shall be free from copyright. The association shall have the right of performance at any and all times."

PITTSFIELD, MASS. — Mendelssohn's Elijah was performed in the First Church January 27, by the Oratorio Class of Mr. Blodgett's Music School, assisted by Mrs. H. M. Smith, soprano; Miss Florence E. Holmes, contralto; Mr. W. H. Fessenden, tenor; Mr. J. F. Winch, basso, and an orchestra from Boston; conductor, B. C. Blodgett; organist, E. B. Story.

BOSTON, MARCH 1, 1879.

CONTENTS.

TO PUBLIUS VIRGILIUS MARO. Translation from Horace. C. P. Cranch	38
GEORGE SAND AND FRÉDÉRIC CHOPIN. A Study. Fanny Raymond Ritter	38
MASON'S PIANO-FORTE TECHNIQUE. C. B. Cady	36
THE SHORTCOMINGS OF THE OPERA. W. B. Lawson	36
EDITORIAL: BACH-BITING. W. F. A.	36
CONCERTS	37
Handel and Haydn Society. — Euterpe. — Harvard Musical Association. — Mr. Arthur W. Foote's Concert.
MUSICAL CORRESPONDENCE	38
New York. — Philadelphia. — Baltimore. — Chicago.
NOTES AND GLEANINGS	40
Leipzig. — Paris. — London. — Baden-Baden. — Stuttgart. — Wiesbaden. — Oxford, O. — Chicago.

Published fortnightly by HODGKINSON, OSGOOD AND COMPANY, 220 Devonshire Street, Boston. Price, 10 cents a number; $2.50
per year.

All the articles not credited to other publications were expressly written for this Journal.

TO PUBLIUS VIRGILIUS MARO.

TRANSLATION FROM HORACE, BY C. P. CRANCH.

WHAT measure, what restraint, to fond regret
For one who was so dear, can e'er be set?
Melpomene, to whom thy father gave
Thy liquid voice and harp, teach me thy grave,
Sad songs! Must then perpetual sleep of death
Fall on Quinctilius? When, for modest worth,
For uncorrupted faith —
Sister of justice — truth unveiled and clear,
Say when upon this earth
Shall we e'er find his peer?
He is bemoaned by many good and true;
Bemoaned by none, O Virgil, more than you.
You supplicate the gods, alas, in vain,
To give Quinctilius back again;
Though sought by you with pious prayer,
Not thus was he entrusted to their care.

What though you touch the lyre with harmonies
Sweeter than Orpheus mid the listening trees,
The life-blood never will retrace its course,
That empty shade to penetrate,
Which Mercury, relentless to enforce
Against all prayers the stern decrees of fate,
Drives with his dreadful wand along
To join the dusky throng.
Hard lot! Yet ills we're powerless to repair,
Become through patience easier to bear.

GEORGE SAND AND FRÉDÉRIC CHOPIN.

A STUDY.

BY FANNY RAYMOND RITTER.

(Continued from page 27.)

WITH almost as much apparent right as the friends of Chopin, the friends of Delacroix might assert that George Sand wrote some of her finest pages under his "inspiration." He was for years her intimate friend (their acquaintance dated from her first residence in Paris), and the instructor of her son Maurice, who afterwards displayed varied talent as an artist in his genial designs, and as a littérateur in romances of greater erudition than spontaneity. We should not, indeed, do her great injustice were we to term her, in a certain limited æsthetic sense, the pupil of Delacroix. But what a pupil! How many painters, art-critics, or reviewers, among her contemporaries, could have held their own with such depth of thought, such precision of expression, as she did, whether in agreement with, or in opposition to, the views of her distinguished friend? — a friend, too, who, in addition to his remarkable genius as a painter, displayed uncommon talent in criticism, to the literature of which he contributed many valuable articles, reviews, and letters, which were collected and published after his death. Mme. Dudevant has devoted as many appreciative pages to the genius and character of Delacroix as to those of Chopin, — two artists between whom there existed many resemblances and points of contact, in respect to personality and character. Both were radical in artistic principle, original in artistic manifestation, elegant and fastidious in personal habits, exclusive in society and in friendship, warmly enamored of the ideal. The chief tendency of each artist was the same: a patient study and passionate revelation of the inmost mysteries of pictorial or musical color. But Delacroix, though generous and disinterested as Chopin, was more combative; equally indifferent to pecuniary considerations, he was more so to those of fame and friendship, and he shrank from no trial that would enable him to carry out his artistic convictions. He was one of the most assiduous frequenters of Chopin's salon, and delighted in his compositions, which, he said, in their involved, melting, chromatic harmonies, their soft unity or startling variety of tone, threw him into profound reveries that often suggested to him new combinations of color. It is singular to observe how often Delacroix's admirers have written of the impression produced by his pictures as a "quasi-musical" one, an expression not inapplicable to works in which, from the perfect harmony that exists between subject and sombre yet luminous color, the painting seems magnetically to project its thought to a distance, and to involve us in its own atmosphere, as all great music does. We often find twenty or thirty different tones of color in a single head by Delacroix; the same trait may be observed in the compositions of Chopin, who seems to have needed a musical system more finely divided than our present European one, in order to express his infinitesimal shades of thought. One of Delacroix's contemporaries wrote of his "Sultan of Morocco:" "When has a finer piece of musical coquetry been displayed on canvas? What painter has sung such capricious melodies as this painter has done? What a prodigious chord of novel, hitherto unused, yet delicate and charming tones!" And that admirable writer on art, Théophile Sylvestre, in writing of Delacroix, observes: "This painter not only infinitely exalts the physiognomy of his heroes, but, by what magic I know not, he enables us to look at them through the medium of colors, each one of which recalls, at the same time, a natural feature, and an aspiration of the soul; through blue and green he pursues the immensity of ocean and sky, causes red to sound like the clang of warlike trumpets, and draws sombre complaints from violet. Thus, in colors, he reinvents the melodies of Mozart, Beethoven, Weber." Still better has Charles Baudelaire described the haunting, indelible impression, the ideas, similar to those evoked by romantic music, which are awakened by Delacroix's pictures, in those lines that speak of the painter's woods and lakes,

"Où, sous un ciel chagrin, des fanfares étranges Passent, comme un soupir étouffé de Weber."

The enemies of Delacroix complained that in order to startle, he gave nothing but continual successions of dissonances, like some great composer, predetermined to split his listeners' ears; the same complaint that is uttered to-day by the opponents of Wagner.

But, although Chopin and Delacroix displayed more than one similar trait in their characters and works, there is another composer, between whom and Delacroix so many more points of resemblance exist, — according to my belief, at least, — that I wonder that the comparison has not yet been made. I mean Hector Berlioz. This composer has been compared to Rembrandt, yet that resemblance is only a slight and superficial one. The likeness between Berlioz and Delacroix was in no way derived from the influence of such intimate intercourse as existed between Chopin and the painter, and if in part owing to the same nationality, and to the spirit of the time, — the revolutionary intellectual movement that affected, more or less, all great minds at that epoch, no matter in what art they expressed themselves, — it arose principally from strikingly original, innate qualities. There was also some resemblance between their artistic development and careers. Delacroix abandoned the antique theatrical style of his master, Guérin, to follow the dictates of his own bold genius; Berlioz forsook the teachings of the Conservatoire (horridifying the orthodox Cherubini by his radical tendencies), in order to carry out his own artistic belief; Delacroix's pictures, "Dante and Virgil crossing the Styx" (1822), and his "Massacre of Scio" (1824), were regarded as the confession of faith of the new school of French painting, and excited a war that is not yet, perhaps, at an end; Berlioz's symphony, the fine "Episode de la Vie d'un Artiste," played in public for the first time only a few years (four or five) after the first public exposition of Delacroix's great paintings, became the war-cry of the new romantic musical school; the same storm of derision, anger, envy, abuse, surprise, mingled with glowing admiration and enthusiasm, greeted both great artists from the outset, as it usually happens on those rare occasions when some novel and sublime creation shakes mediocrity to its centre, strikes rapturous terror into the heart of the world of art, and gives the signal for another intellectual revolution; unless, indeed, such works are wholly misunderstood, and for a time ignored, as it also happens occasionally. But originality invariably creates its own — a new — standard, and is therefore misunderstood at first, save by a few rare spirits, in exact proportion to its originality. Few people care to climb the novel, rugged paths instead of the smooth and well-beaten ways they have been long accustomed to. They ask, Why will the new mind work in this new fashion? Why not express itself in writing, painting, composing, in the same manner as its predecessors? The new men found a few ardent admirers, however, men of too much breadth and depth of mind themselves not to appreciate a different order of genius, and too noble and generous to fear to express that appreciation openly; thus we know how bravely Robert Schumann took the field in defense of Berlioz (although Schumann somewhat modified his approbation subsequently), and among the defenders of Delacroix it is pleasant to find M. Thiers, — who, as an art critic, was much in advance of his time, — finely expressing his admiration of the "Dante and Virgil," in an article written for the Constitutionnel as early as 1822. The choice of subjects with Berlioz and Delacroix was often similar, sometimes identical. They have illustrated Romeo and Juliet, Hamlet; Faust, Ivanhoe, Waverley; Sardanapalus, the Odaïques; the Captive, etc., etc. But the most real resemblance lay deeper than any mere outside one. Both men were characterized by the same determined striving towards the most unfettered expression of inward feeling; a striving so resolute, that I will venture to assert that their aspiration was not so much towards pure beauty, or, "la grace, plus belle que la beauté," as towards expression, and that they regarded this as more desirable than either beauty or grace. Both displayed the same apparent — but only apparent — audacious exaggeration of details, the same grandiose conception and explosive opulence of coloring, the same general tone of dramatic melancholy, the same occasional harshness, with an occasional surprisingly exquisite, sylph-like, flower-like delicacy and fancifulness of idea and execution. But, as music is an art less generally understood than painting, Berlioz, though only three years younger than Delacroix, passed through a far longer and more painful ordeal in his struggle for recognition, than did the more immediately successful painter; indeed, Berlioz remained one of art's martyrs all his life, and is only now — too late, alas! — beginning to be recognized as all he really was. Nor can we say that, strictly speaking, Berlioz has founded a school with numerous disciples, like Delacroix; though his influence on subsequent composers, especially Liszt and Wagner, has been great, it is somewhat occult. Yet it cannot be said of any composer that he has founded a school, though he may have inaugurated a new stage of musical progress; for music is so thoroughly subjective an art that the greatest composers, as soon as they have thrown off the fetters of conventionality, are always the most original and consequently the most inimitable. In Germany, for twenty years, the muse of Berlioz was slandered as a Menad, himself as a lunatic, his works as the result of hashish visions, the creations of a Hell-Breughel enlarged to the colossal dimensions of a Michael Angelo.¹ Delacroix, too, was often made the object of comparisons drawn from the vocabulary of the Inferno; the academical Ingres, on leaving the room where Delacroix's pictures were exhibited at the first universal Parisian exposition, so far forgot himself as to exclaim aloud, "Bah! it smells of sulphur!" Even Berlioz's sharp-cut, noble face and his kindly blue eyes were described as those of an ogre; the music-dealer Hofmann, in Prague, kept a plaster cast of the bust of Caracalla from the Capitoline Museum in his window, and coolly pointed it out to his customers as "the bust of the famous Berlioz!" If a phenomenon, however, he was no monster, though blood seems more often to flow through his scores, — as across the canvases of Delacroix, — than any weak counterfeit of vitality.

In endeavoring to judge of the influence which the circle of artists surrounding George Sand may or may not have exerted on the tendency of her works, it is agreeable to observe that Charles Baudelaire, fine and subtle critic, though so imbued with the spirit of pessimism, believed, with George Sand, an optimist in her judgment of her friends, that the character of Delacroix was as entirely noble as his genius was sublime. In Baudelaire's study of the life and works of Eugène Delacroix, he speaks as follows: "At first sight Delacroix simply struck us as a courteous gentleman, one of rare cultivation, unprejudiced and unimpassioned. He only permitted old acquaintances to penetrate the varnish and to divine the abstruse recesses of his soul. Prosper Mérimée was the man with whom, outwardly, he could alone legitimately be compared; both displayed the same somewhat affected apparent coldness, the same icy cloak covering exquisite sensibility and ardent adoration of the good and beautiful; the same deep devotion to a few friends and convictions, under the pretense of egotism. All in Delacroix was energy, but the energy of will and nervous vivacity; for physically he was frail and delicate. The tiger on the watch for his prey displays less fire in his eyes, less spasmodic impatience of his muscles, than did our great painter when his whole soul was possessed by one idea, or striving to possess itself of a vision. The very character of his physiognomy, — his Peruvian complexion, and large black eyes, somewhat marred and sunken, indeed, by the continual exercise of their powers of observation, yet seeming almost to swallow the light; his lustrous, abundant black hair; his fine, thin lips, which had acquired an expression almost bordering on cruelty from continued tension of the will, — his entire person, indeed, conveyed the idea of an exotic origin. He might have been compared to the crater of a volcano, artistically concealed by tufts of flowers. Delacroix was warmly in love with passion, and coldly resolved to seek every means of expressing passion in the most unmistakable manner. These are the two traits most observable in all extreme genius, the genius that Heaven did not create merely to please cowardly and easily satisfied natures, those that find nourishment enough in mild, timid, imperfect works. Immense passion, backed by formidable will, — such was Delacroix as an artist. In his eyes passionate imagination was the most precious of divine gifts, the most important of human faculties, but sterile and powerless unless sustained by sure and rapid technical ability, capable of seconding that imperial and despotic faculty in its most impatient caprices. He never found it necessary to excite the always incandescent fire of his own imagination, but he complained that the day was too short for the study and practice of every means of giving voice to that imagination. To this incessant preoccupation we must attribute his perpetual researches into the mysteries of color, his inquiries into the science of chemistry, and his long interviews with color manufacturers. In these studies he resembled Leonardo da Vinci. Yet Delacroix, in spite of his love for all the brilliant, ardent phenomena of vitality, will never be confounded with the vulgar crowd of artists and littérati, whose narrow, near-sighted intelligence, and rough, rationalistic materialism strives to conceal itself behind the vague and obscure name of realism." The manner in which George Sand has written of Delacroix, as of Chopin, and others of her friends, should be enough to convince us that she would be the last to conceal any source from which she might possibly have drawn any of her supposed outside "inspiration;" had she been a practical plastic artist, she would certainly have shared the noble, reverent feeling of Washington Allston, who said, "I would not be the first painter in the world, even if I could; but, if possible, the second, for then I should still have some one to look up to." I extract a few passages from her remarks, so utterly opposed, in their critical spirit, to the satanic spirit, — that of cold, cynical denial, — on the character and genius of Delacroix: "Eugène Delacroix was one of my first friends in the artist world, and I am also fortunate enough to count him among my old friends now. Old, it must be understood, is the word that refers to the age of our relations toward each other, but not to the person. Delacroix is not, never can be old, for he is a genius, and therefore always young. To name him is to name one of those pure men, of whom the world fancies it has said enough in declaring them to be honorable, since the world does not know how difficult it is to be so for the laborer who bends under the weight of his task, or for the artist who wrestles with his own genius. The history of our intercourse may be related in these few words: friendship without a cloud. A history as rare as it is delightful! but with us it is the absolute truth. I do not know whether the character of Delacroix has its imperfections or not; but while living near him, in continuous social relations, or in the country, I failed to discover even a small fault in it. And yet who can be more simple, affectionate, trustful, confiding in friendship, than he is? I certainly owe to him, besides, the happiest hours of pure delight that I ever tasted as an artist. If other great minds have initiated me into their discoveries and delights in the sphere of an ideal common to us all, I can say that no artistic individuality was ever more sympathetic to me than his, or more intelligible in its vivifying expansion. In music, and in poetic appreciation, too, Delacroix is equal to what we should expect from one whose standard in his own art is so exalted; and in conversation, when he fully reveals himself, he is charming, or sublime, and both with perfect unconsciousness. He is great, too, not only in his art, but in his artistic life. I shall not speak of his private virtues, his tenderness toward his suffering friends, his devotion to his family, or of the solid qualities of his character, for these are mere individual merits which appertain to all honorable private life, and which friendship has no right to publish to the world, since they do not concern it; but the integrity of his artistic conduct, his indifference to popularity, his disdain of money, his refusal to yield a single artistic principle, in spite of loss, and in the face of persecution,—all this, like every noble example of public life and character, belongs to the public, and must be placed before the public, for its profit, admiration, and, if possible, for imitation as well as appreciation. Many of his own admirable letters would paint him as he is better than I could do it; but may we unveil the character of living friends in such a manner, even though we believe the revelation may result in their glorification? No; friendship, like love, possesses its own modest discretion and timidity.”¹

¹ Pieter Breughel the younger, the Dutch painter, was nicknamed "Hell-Breughel," from his fondness for subjects treating of devilry, witchcraft, robbery, etc., and permitting sharp contrasts of light and shade and color. One of his most famous pictures, in the Florence gallery, is his "Orpheus playing to the Infernal Gods."

(To be continued.)

MASON'S PIANO-FORTE TECHINICS.

(Concluded from page 29.)

FROM this review of the two factors, mind and muscle, it is at once plain that exercises must be chosen which have a twofold object: the training of muscles as such from a gymnast's point of view, and the training of them for the expression of thought. This is true of the exercises found in this work. Of course some of these exercises should have a more direct bearing upon muscular development; and the same, or others, because of the method of treatment, should furnish the most arduous mental discipline. Among the former should be classed the two-finger exercise, since it has for its main object the bringing into action of all the muscles of the fingers, both singly and combined. Before this is presented “touch” is explained (Chapter VI.). (Owing to lack of space I must refer the reader to the work itself for illustrations and definitions.)

In general it is divided into finger, hand, and arm touch. There are four forms of finger touch: (1) “Clinging touch;” (2) “Plain legato;” (3) “Mild staccato,” and (4) “Elastic touch.” “In the clinging touch the pressure always exceeds the natural power of the fingers.” “In the plain legato the pressure does not exceed the natural force of the finger.” The two-finger exercise is applied to the diatonic and chromatic scale, broken major thirds, broken chromatic major and minor thirds, double thirds and sixths, diminished seventh chord and black keys. There are four forms or methods of practice depending upon the touches used: First. “Exercise for the clinging touch.” In this the first key is struck with a free blow “from the wrist,” and is held down with a heavy pressure till the “next key is struck by the next finger, which must be raised high for that purpose.” This second key is held down with a heavy pressure, and the second finger is changed for the first, and “the third key is struck in the same manner as the second, and so on.”

Second. “Exercise for the elastic touch.” In this the first key is struck down as in the former case, but the second tone is produced by extending the finger, and then spitefully shutting the hand.

Third. “Exercise for light and rapid playing.” In this the “plain legato” and light staccato are used.

Fourth. “Exercise for velocity, lightness, and brilliancy.” This “is the summing up of the other three with something peculiar to itself,” namely velocity, which has a more direct bearing upon the mental side.

Because of its simplicity of form and bringing into action all the muscles of the fingers, this exercise is certainly the most effective means for muscular development. The novelty here is its application to so many different tonal forms, diatonic scale, broken thirds, etc., and the methods of practice, as just explained. Valuing this exercise as much as the authors, I still must, in part, dissent from the method of treatment. In the chapter on “How to use this System” (Chapter XIII.), it says, “This (the two-finger exercise) is the first technical exercise to be given to beginners, since if they cannot play two tones successively it is of no use to ask them to play more.” And children are to “receive each one of the elementary forms,” that is, the first and second methods of treatment. To give this exercise in the manner described would be like requiring a beginner in vocal culture to sing as loudly as possible, in order to give flexibility and strength to the vocal chords. Mere gripping muscular strength is not what is first wanted. Each finger has its nerve centre or motor centre, and the great object of technical development, as regards the fingers, is to teach each one of these motor centres to respond independently of all others, as far as possible, to the slightest volition and its reflex action. Hence, concentration of nerve force is the first essential, and generally this cannot be done at first in connection with the use of much muscular power. And right here the bearing of the criticism upon the action of the flexor muscles is plain. It is this ability to send the nervous current through the proper motor centre into any given muscle (which I have termed concentration of nervous force), which constitutes that “independence” and “flexibility” so much talked about by teachers, and as little understood as the way to the north pole. Concentration of nervous force and inner muscular power is as essential in piano as in vocal training; and which, we ask, should come first, concentration or great strength? Will not strength grow with the growth of concentrated effort? This can have but one answer, and that in the affirmative.

The application of the two-finger exercise to the diatonic scale is given as the simplest form. It might be asked why the trill is not a simpler form, since it allows of a more quiet position of the hand, and avoids all that tendency to use the hand which arises in the attempt, on the part of a beginner, to strike the same tone with two successive fingers. It admits also of continuous treatment, and the application of all those devices suggested in this work for mental training. It is a matter of note that the trill finds no place in this system. Another two-finger exercise I should like to have seen incorporated with the others, and that is, an exercise for the development of the independent action of the adductor of the thumb. The under-stroke of the thumb is too important to be relegated to scale and arpeggio practice alone.

Another important set of exercises, having a strong bearing upon muscular development, are those for the hand stroke. This is secured in this work by the octave exercises. Aside from the application of the velocity idea, there is nothing essentially novel. It is a concise and complete treatment of a subject that is generally let alone till met with in some composition, and then some awful octave étude is brought out to mend matters. The early development of the hand stroke is not dwelt upon, not even mentioned. This should be one of the first, and rather precede than follow finger exercises, since it conduces to looseness of wrist in finger practice. No one need wait till he can reach an octave before putting into practice all the principles laid down in this chapter. Any one can reach a sixth, and this admits of a great variety of treatment for acquiring flexibility of wrist and scale movement.

It remains for us to notice some points in this system which have a bearing upon the mental side. These are rhythm, as applied to technical exercises, and the velocity idea. In the chapter on rhythm there is some ambiguity in the meaning of that term. At least it is made to do duty for two distinct ideas.

“Any rhythmical succession becomes a rhythm when it consists of a symmetrical number of measures and ends with an accent.” “Thus it plainly appears that all musical rhythms consist finally of twos or threes, or combinations of both. In this book rhythms are distinguished as rhythms of threes, fours, sixes, eights, nines, . . . and so on, according to the number of tones in the measures of which the rhythm is composed.” In the first quotation we have the idea of the union or grouping of measures as constituting rhythm. In the second quotation, this idea is again expressed, and also the definition of rhythm as being the subdivision of the units of the measure. With this exception this chapter is very complete and systematic. The tables and illustrations are all that could be desired.

The importance of this is seen, however, in its application to technical exercises. The idea of using rhythm in this direction is not new, but its systematic application as here developed is certainly novel and exhaustive, and leaves no room for additions. The advantages as they are enumerated are: (1) discipline in time; (2) accentuation conduces to discrimination in touch and emphasis; (3) the attempt to complete the rhythm cultivates endurance; and this latter requires (4) concentration of mind, and hence is an effective means for mental discipline. If I were to give the order of these,—the discipline in concentration of mind, and tone,—thought should come first, as this is essential to a comprehension of all the rest. There is another advantage which might be urged here, and that is that this conduces to a study of tone and tone combinations from an æsthetical stand-point.

The velocity idea, as applied to technics, is new, although found in the studies of Czerny, Bertini, and others. It is based upon the principle of automatic thought, and automatic relations between the thinking centre and mechanism of expression, as explained in the chapter on the mind. When one reads a sentence rapidly, but little of the tonal elements enters into the conscious thought. So in playing rapidly the mind cannot consciously take cognizance of all the tones, but thinks from point to point, ordering the performance of large groups of tones. This “velocity exercise” thus consists, in general, of any passage (rendered familiar by previous practice) played in the manner following: Taking its first tone firmly, we hold it for a little over two counts; thus fixing the mind on the final tone of the passage, we pass lightly over the intervening tones, alighting on the final key at the third count.

This exercise is at first taken in short distances, which are progressively enlarged, the rate of counting remaining unchanged, whereby the speed of the velocity passage is augmented by degrees. It will be seen that velocity is narrowed down to the idea of a “spurt;” but musicians who have written études for velocity had that idea of velocity which is illustrated by Weber's “Perpetual Motion,” as well as this, which is illustrated by the embellishments of some adagio movements and in Chopin's works; and they wrote for both, so that while “it may be noticed that this manner of attaining velocity is different from that advocated in the principal velocity études in common use" may be true in a certain sense, because more systematically worked up, it is not true in this most important sense that the velocity études referred to were written to cultivate a different kind of velocity, one which involves the idea of endurance. I do not wish to undervalue this exercise in the least; on the contrary, I think it a very important one; but I do wish to guard against the idea that this can take the place of that velocity which requires clearness and conscious control of thought and muscle (nerve force), or that it will lead to it.

¹ Those among my readers who closely follow the periodical art-literature of the day will remember the article by Guiffrey, in L'Art, vol. iii., 1877, entitled “Lettres inédites d'Eugène Delacroix” (and containing a fac-simile of Delacroix's first sketch for his “Hamlet”), which article urged the publication of a more complete collection of Delacroix's letters than that previously given to the world. This wish has found its realization in the collection that has recently appeared in Paris. (Lettres d'Eugène Delacroix, recueillies et publiées par M. Burts. Paris: Quantin. 1878.)

The work as a whole is one of great importance, and marks, I hope, a new era in technical development. I cannot do better, in summing up the good qualities of the work, than to quote from the preface the novelties and the claims made for the work, simply stating that they are modestly made and fully realized.

"The points of novelty in this system are: (1) The direction in regard to touch and the two-finger exercise; (2) The systematic application of rhythm; (3) The full and complete scale and arpeggio treatment; (4) The method of velocity; and (5) The school of octaves."

"We do not offer this system as the only combination of exercises adopted to make players. But what we do claim is: First. That the exercises in this system have a more direct relation to the wants of players, and a more systematic and exhaustive application to the muscles of the hand than any other collection of exercises known to us. Second. That the application of rhythmic treatment familiarizes the pupil with all kinds of time, and a habit of mental concentration indispensable to good playing. And third. That the practice of mechanical exercises in rhythmical forms with accentuation, and without notes, brings the fingers more quickly into the habit of obedience to the phono-motor centre, and so cultivates the ear and renders the playing more musical." There is a novelty not mentioned here and which is too important to pass over, and that is the chapter on the mental physiology and mental operations in playing. It seems to me that the authors would confer a favor and render the book of more value, because of a readier sale, if they would get out a cheap pocket edition, a practicable thing, since it is but a work of reference.

C. B. CADY.

OBERLIN, O., Jan. 28, 1879.

THE SHORTCOMINGS OF THE OPERA.

BY WALTER B. LAWSON, B. MUS.

(Concluded from page 28.)

So much for the treatment of dramatic works; it would appear inconsistent to expect better for the epic.

It is well known that Lord Byron experienced a considerable dread of having his works dramatized, and the difficulties which would beset any attempt at a stage representation of his "Manfred" afforded him no little consolation. At the present day, some fifty years after the death of the author, this work is thoroughly well known to theatre habitués.

Aspiring composers may still look to the legacy of Byron's genius for several opera libretti. For instance, what might not be expected in the way of effect from the "Corsair," torn from its sequel, "Lara," and cut up into acts and scenes somewhat after the following manner?—

Act I. Pirates' Isle—Apartments of Conrad and Melora.

Act II. Bay of Coron—Palace of Pacha—Burning Fleet, and Conflict.

Act III. Dungeon Scene, Gulnare and Conrad—Assassination of Pacha.

Act IV. Pirates' Isle—Death of Medora, etc. Provided with a proper proportion of arie, ensembles, and choruses, for which the poem offers such charming opportunities, it might worthily succeed the grand opera of Meyerbeer. Alas, poor Byron! ¹

A few words on an allied topic. We have, we will assume, an opera before us, in which the musical setting vies with the libretto in realizing that perfection of the whole which is the acme of artistic endeavor. Suddenly there appears upon the scene a so-called "adapter," who—ever on the qui vive for opportunities of earning honest pence—undertakes a translation of the text, which he ultimately effects by mangling the sense, altering the accentuation—grammatical, oratoric, and pathetic—inserting syllables where none are necessary, and removing them where they are, causing roulades to fall upon unimportant syllables, etc., etc., and the result is offered to the public as an artistic rendering of the libretto in the familiar tongue.

It is only when a translation is undertaken by responsible and conscientious men, such as the German, Bernhard von Gugler, Dr. W. Viol, and others, that any benefit accrues to art. In most cases, the translations are of no value, beyond that of mere reference, to the opera-going mass.

Music cannot fully exist but as an independent art, and the only possible combination of verbal and tone language which shall be truly suggestive is, perhaps, that known as programme music. We must either content ourselves with this, or with opera proper, whatever its faults. It cannot be expected that an art which admits of beautiful form in addition to exquisite melody should be made to sacrifice both, even when the form and substance of the drama, and distinct enunciation of words, is involved. The clear comprehension of the drama, which is supposed to result from a truthful association à la Wagner, is partly lost by the non-observance of form, which divides a plot into appreciable episodes and portions of episodes. In programme music, which many hold to be unworthy of the artist, may be associated the highest poetical with the highest musical form. This we can instance with symphonic works of modern date. Why this should be regarded as a lower branch of musical art is a matter for the reader's consideration. It may, however, be mentioned that J. C. Lobe, who is conservative in principle, advises young composers to imagine their various and contrasting ideas (in pure instrumental music) as representing personalities, which in itself is the germ of programme music.

Liszt, one of the greatest modern writers in this style, recognizes the extraordinary suggestiveness of music. It is with him a tone language: the orchestra is the passionate human heart, the instruments individually are the chords within it which vibrate to the yearnings, the fears, to all the secret feelings of humanity. Timbre, which is beautifully described as the color of tone, yields to him an unlimited source for the development of these feelings. But form, such as we are wont to expect, is wanting in his works. Form does not exist for the heart. It is the soul which yearns for form, and for the reason that we are not angels we love his music. In the "Lament of Tasso," a so-called poème symphonique, programme music has attained to an elevation previously unimagined. On hearing it we are constrained to observe, ¹ At the time when the above was written, Mr. Francillon's adaptation of Byron's poem (lately set by Mr. Cowen) had not been made public, and was quite unknown to me.

"Tasso! Tasso! thy woes are ours, and in thy triumph we exult!"

A short summary, written after a manner much approved of, of late years, by musicians of the "higher development" species, will read thus:—

Beethoven gave too great prominence to instrumental parts.

Mozart, in the Zauberflöte and elsewhere, approached the ridiculous in his roulades for the prime donne.

Meyerbeer committed two faults: his prime donne scream, and his orchestra raves.

Rossini's aim was to please the public.

Verdi, Donizetti, and other Italians, wrote vocal pieces with orchestral accompaniments.

Balfe the same.

Offenbach is a composer of can cans.

Wagner is——?

A friend of mine, who informs me that he belongs to the "new school," bids me add:—Italian opera is fudge.

English opera would be fudge if it existed.

French opera is almost fudge.

German opera is becoming fudge, through the birth of musical drama, of which Wagner is the exponent.

It may be as well to mention that this gentleman has very prominent eyes, and a conical head.—Lond. Mus. Standard.

Dwight's Journal of Music.

SATURDAY, MARCH 1, 1879.

BACH-BITING.

CERTAIN expressions of public sentiment through the medium of the daily and weekly press have greatly astonished me of late, and the more so that they seem to show an unfortunate and entirely unnecessary phase of what must otherwise be hailed as a decided change for the better in the attitude of our press and public toward the art of music. We are plainly outgrowing the servile respect for hearsay authority in musical matters which, some years ago, might have been thrown in our teeth as a reproach, with considerable justice. We are beginning to listen with our own ears, to think for ourselves, and to establish our own standards of criticism. Yet in thus freeing ourselves from what was, after all, a self-imposed intellectual bondage, it seems to me that we often exhibit a too childish recklessness, and, worst of all, a too flippant disrespect for that which is eternally venerable in art. Some of us, anxious to assure ourselves of our perfect intellectual independence, are a little too prone to indulge in petulant or frivolously sarcastic flings at august names which have hitherto been thought to have earned the right of claiming reverent treatment. Johann Sebastian Bach is the one who is at present most frequently made the butt of what some persons call wit, but which seems to others (in this connection, at least), far more akin to something to which dictionaries give a less honorable name.

It is by no means surprising that Bach's music in general should be slow in working its way into popular favor. One may even reasonably doubt whether it have the elements of popularity in it, or at least whether certain profound qualities in it do not so veil its (so-called) "popular" characteristics that it can never appeal to the uncultivated masses of music-lovers. Certain it is that Bach has never been a popular man in the concert-going sense of the term, even in his own country. Indeed, the average Bostonian or New Yorker, with no marked predilection for Bach's music, would probably be somewhat surprised to find how much the average Berliner, Dresdener, or Viennese, sympathized with him, if their respective tastes could but be put to the test. Yet one would think that the attitude which eminent composers and musical thinkers since Bach's time have almost without exception maintained toward that great master must have some power to convince any person who takes music in earnest that, even if he cannot personally enjoy Bach's music in an æsthetic way, there is something in it which eludes his comprehension, and which is entitled to respect rather than easy-going contempt.

Passing over those music-lovers who are prevented from feeling the essential beauty of Bach's works by an unconquerable repugnance to the musical forms of his day, and who cannot recognize a master in a man who happens to wear a pig-tail, I would like to say a word or two concerning those who take upon themselves to deny, implicitly or explicitly, that there is in Bach the perennial beauty of form, charm of melody, and sentimental or passionate quality of expression which can meet the æsthetic demands of a musician of the present time. Let us cast a glance over the composers whose music they do admire and enjoy without stint. Take men like Mendelssohn, Schumann, Brahms, Raff, Rubinstein, Saint-Saëns, Liszt, Wagner, or Verdi. Which one of these men — composers of very various schools — looks upon Bach otherwise than with the most enthusiastic and passionate admiration? Nay, more than this, many of them have been ardent fighters in the cause of his music. Mendelssohn devoted a large share of the labor of his life to what was no more nor less than a Bach-propaganda; Schumann wrote a piano-forte accompaniment to the violin chaconne; Raff has arranged the same work for full orchestra; Saint-Saëns has made piano-forte transcriptions of many movements in his cantatas; Liszt has done the same for his great organ fugues and toccatas. "The Well-Tempered Clavichord" has as honored a place on Verdi's study-table as any work by a more recent composer. Remember, I am mentioning no timid eclectics, no simply respectable musical scribblers whose reputation has the taint of pedantry, no easy-going pedagogues with antiquarian proclivities, but the veriest modern come-outers among composers, men who in their writings do and dare all that the most intense passion, the most extravagant aiming after brilliant effects, can prompt them to. Can any one imagine that these men are willing to waste their precious enthusiasm upon an old composer whom they merely look upon as a model contrapuntist, or a skillful expert in the craft of stringing notes together? No; artists and men of genius may have a certain respect for such an one, but they keep their admiration and their enthusiasm for a man of nobler stamp. What, then, can explain the singular unanimity with which these men almost adore Bach, if it is not that they discern in him a quality of genius that is as perennial as it is mighty? Think you that these composers are not as fully imbued with the spirit of their own compositions as their most ardent and exclusive admirers can be? It seems hardly likely. Yet, penetrated as they are with the musical spirit of their time, — and as they must be to write as they do, — this fact has not lessened their love and admiration for Bach's music one jot. You see I am not putting forth my own personal opinions of Bach; I am merely showing the opinions of others, and of such others as must have most weight — if any opinions have weight — with the class of anti-Bachites for whose benefit this article is specially written. Remember that I am very far from saying, as I am very far from believing, that any man is bound to like, enjoy, or love Bach's music merely because Raff, Brahms, Verdi, or any other of his musical gods or heroes admires and loves it. But quod non licet Jovi most assuredly non licet bovi, and when we see the leading minds in the world of music in our present era unite in regarding Bach with the most profound admiration and heart-felt veneration, it seems as if the merely every-day person who takes upon himself the responsibility of decrying his compositions, and of standing in the way of their public appreciation, assumes a responsibility for which he is in no way fitted. When it comes to such utterly childish side-flings as calling a Bach concerto a "series of difficult piano-forte exercises," or saying that such and such a work has about as much sentiment in it as "the least inspired" of the pieces in "The Well-Tempered Clavichord," what can we do but blush in sheer shame? When Mark Twain, in his "Innocents Abroad," wrote his little pool-poohing quips about the frescoes of the old Italian painters, he was exuberantly and legitimately funny. He avowedly assumed the position of a perfect savage in art matters, and his buffoonery was supremely good. But one can hardly assume that those persons who write in very much the same vein about Bach's music would be willing to claim the immunities of Mark Twain's position. — W. F. A.

CONCERTS.

HANDEL AND HAYDN SOCIETY. — The programme of Sunday evening, February 9, instead of a single oratorio, was made up of an attractive variety of shorter works. The Music Hall was crowded, and few left their places until the end. First came Luther's Choral: "Ein feste Burg," harmonized, and coarsely too, by Otto Nicolai, — as if Bach had not done it better! But it was grandly sung by the great solid mass of chorus. Next, Mr. J. C. D. Parker's "Redemption Hymn" confirmed the good impression which it made at the last Festival, as a graceful and expressive piece of contrapuntal writing; the fugue, "Art thou not it that hast cut Rahab," being both clear and interesting, and really masterly in treatment. The only fault we have to find is with the text, which brings the chief accent of the oft recurring theme so awkwardly upon the little pronoun "it," which might easily be changed with no harm to the meaning. The contralto solo was beautifully sung by Miss Annie Cary, and both the chorus portions and the fine instrumentation were admirably rendered. Mr. Parker's work wears well.

The principal novelty of the concert was the "Flight into Egypt" from the trilogy L'Enfance du Christ by Hector Berlioz, whose compositions are much more highly appreciated now in Paris than they were while the eccentric composer was alive. We might have enjoyed this quaint and curious music more, could we have heard it in its connection with the whole work. It opens with a little pastoral, one might say rustic, and antique sounding overture, mainly of reed instruments, the Corno Inglese predominating, — a vague and idle sort of warbling, innocent and pretty enough in its intention, but to our feeling rather artificial. Then comes a chorus: "Farewell of the Shepherds," very naïve and melodious, but for a certain ugly turn which disturbs the smooth flow of the harmony several times. It is said that Berlioz "originally wrote it for organ on a loose slip of paper at the corner of an écarté table at the house of Duc the architect, and then fooled all musical Paris by introducing it on a concert programme as composed by Pierre Ducré, a chapel master of the seventeenth century." There is also a narrative tenor solo, sweet and simple, which was sung by Mr. C. R. Adams, not in his best voice, and not too familiar with the music. On the whole, we doubt whether we were in the right mood, or sufficiently en rapport with Berlioz that evening, fairly to appreciate this singular, though delicate and quiet, fragment of his music. Thinking of the far more spontaneous and natural pastorale, etc., of Bach, we could not overcome the feeling that there was something artificial and affected, at least dilettanteish about it. The Sanctus from Gounod's "St. Cecilia Mass" was of the grandiose kind, an immense piece of sensational effect, overwhelming by its massive weight of harmony, with all of brilliancy that brass could add, and with the bass drum imitating cannon. Mr. Adams led off impressively in the tenor solo, and the great chorus, orchestra, and organ answered, swelling to a climax of most irresistible sonority. It created such enthusiasm that it had to be repeated, yet we suspect its charm would wear out with familiarity.

Mendelssohn's ever welcome "Hymn of Praise" formed the second part of the concert. The three movements of the introductory orchestral symphony, and the accompaniments throughout, were played with remarkable spirit by a more complete and capable orchestra than we often have for oratorio performances. Mr. Zerrahn conducted with inspiring energy, and all the choruses went finely. Miss Clara Louise Kellogg sang the soprano solos like an artist, though she seemed fatigued and out of health. Miss Cary was altogether admirable; and Mr. Adams sang the tenor solos very finely; his rich manly voice, though somewhat husky, served him well in parts; and his artistic method, his intelligent conception, and admirably distinct enunciation and declamation, are always to be watched with profit by those who seek a model.

And now, in preparation for the two performances of Good Friday (April 11), the Society devotes itself to the study of a great work, every moment spent in learning which is a step of musical progress in the truest sense; we mean the St. Matthew Passion Music of Bach, which this time will be given entire, the first part in the afternoon, the second in the evening. On Easter Sunday Judas Maccabæus.

EUTERPE. — The second chamber concert of the new club was given at Mechanics' Hall on Wednesday evening, February 12. The matter for interpretation and discussion consisted of a Sestet, Op. 18, by Brahms, entirely new here, and the delightful old B-flat Quintet, Op. 87, by Mendelssohn, which carries us back to the very first days of the Quintette Club which still bears his name in Boston, — and throughout the land. There could not be a greater contrast in the two halves of a concert. The Sestet, in the first place, is for a strange combination of instruments, — first and second violin (Messrs. Arnold and Gantzberg), first and second viola (Gramm and Hermann), first and second violoncello (Carl Werner and W. Reineccius), — an unpromising experiment, plainly prompted more by the conceit of originality than by any inward musical necessity. The violins were overborne and the ensemble rendered dull and opaque by such thickness of the bass and middle parts. All were early in their seats, mindful of the rule which bars out late comers until the end of the first part. And so all ears were on the alert, and all listened intently, with patience to the end. But very few, we fancy, felt rewarded, but rather glad when the Sestet was over. The Allegro was a puzzler from the beginning, — the same vagueness and intangibility of theme, that was experienced in the same composer's C-minor symphony, a sense all through of something labored, learned, overstrained and lacking inspiration, lacking any raison d'être. Now and then a few charming measures, a striking effect, a promise of something genuine at last, but every promise unfulfilled! Then too there were cruel discords, passages which it is no slander to call ugly. The Andante moderato began in an impressive hymn-like style, and proceeded—hardly can we say developed—through a great variety of phases, some of them charming, others startling; certainly there were captivating ideas started in the course of it, and much that seemed original; yet we could not feel it a consistent whole, nor did we find it edifying; but we have met one or two who have studied it and who think otherwise. The Scherzo, and the Rondo (poco allegretto e grazioso) brought little that we care to recall, even were we able; the most that we remember is the constraint and fatigue. The performance was hardly more than respectable, and here and there decidedly rough.

After this nightmare what "a change came o'er the spirit of our dream," and over the faces of the audience! The Mendelssohn Quintet was welcomed with sincere delight; and not because it was familiar merely, but because it is intrinsically musical and there is no resisting its enchantment. The Allegro, soaring like a lark, with motive irrepressible and full of fire, both in the main theme and in the persistent triplets which offset it and seem to fan it into flame; the Andante scherzando, quaint and ballad-like, an exquisite fancy; the Adagio, profoundly tender and pathetic, out of the inmost heart and genius of the master, one of his truest inspirations; and the Finale, answering the challenge of the first Allegro, and even exceeding it in brilliancy and power, — all these had not to be listened to by virtue of the will; they took possession of you and kept you happy to the end. We think the artists of the New York Philharmonic Club, on their part too, felt happier, and certainly were more successful in this last half of the evening's task. And so the concert, by its contrast, taught a lesson.

The next programme (for March 12), is of the choicest: Mozart's G-minor Quintet, and the second of Beethoven's Rasumofsky Quartets, in E-minor.

HARVARD MUSICAL ASSOCIATION.—The fifth Symphony Concert (Feb. 13) had the largest audience of the season. The programme, while offering nothing out of the common, was all of sterling excellence, composed of genial, graceful, ever fresh and charming music, — compositions with which nearly every listener has agreeable associations.

Overture "Reminiscences of Ossian" . . . Gade.
Cradle Song, from the Christmas Oratorio . . . Bach.
Second Symphony, in D, Op. 36 . . . Beethoven.
Nocturne and Scherzo, from "A Midsummer Night's Dream" . . . Mendelssohn.
Songs, with Piano-forte:—
(a) Ave Maria . . . Hauptmann.
(b) The Fisher Maiden . . . Meyerbeer.
Overture to "Egmont" . . . Beethoven.

Gade's romantic "Ossian" Overture was so well played as to prove highly enjoyable, and almost as good as new. The same may be said of the early Beethoven Symphony in D, which is too seldom heard; a work full of fresh, buoyant life and cheerfulness, though the introductory Adagio is majestic enough to be the prelude to a great solemn festival. What a stride from this to the next Symphony, the "Eroica," which, by the way, will be given in the eighth and last concert of the season! The lovely Nocturne and Scherzo from the "Midsummer Night's Dream" music have lost nothing of their enchantment: the delicious strains were drunk in with delight, and the fairy Scherzo was so finely played that the call for a repetition was imperative. All was most clearly, delicately outlined; and the long flute passage near the end, — the very hum and flutter of light fairy wings, — was so neatly done, so well sustained, by Mr. Rietzel, as to merit special notice. — The strongest feature of the programme was the Egmont Overture. It never can grow too familiar. What other master could compress so much of meaning and dramatic fire, so much of musical marrow, and the very poetry of music, into the short space of seven minutes!

Miss Ita Welsh was the vocalist. Her fresh, sympathetic, maidenly quality of voice is well suited to the "Cradle Song" of Bach, in which, though not the kind of music in which she is most at home, she made a very good impression. The two songs, in which she had the advantage of Mr. Lang's tasteful accompaniment, were given with more freedom, and indeed with fine expression. Meyerbeer's "Fischer-Mädchen" was the most original and interesting of the two.

MR. ARTHUR W. FOOTE'S Concert in Mechanics' Hall, on Saturday evening, Feb. 1, offered so thoroughly musical a programme that we were particularly disappointed to be compelled (by illness) to lose it. Moreover we know the earnestness, the well directed and persistent study, and the solid progress of the young musician, — one of the few who have taken a Master's degree at Harvard on the strength of special studies in music. As we wish these columns to preserve a record of the concert, we borrow from the Traveller a notice we can trust, from the pen of one of our own collaborateurs. — But first the programme:—

Suite in D minor Handel.
Prelude — Fugue — Air and variations — Capriccio.
Aria. — "Love sounds the Alarm" ("Acis and Galatea") Handel.
Sonata in A-flat major Weber.
Variations Sérieuses. (Op. 54) Mendelssohn.
Songs. — "Gold rolls here beneath me." (Op. 34) Rubinstein.
"Ach, ihr Lieben Aeuglein." (Op. 21) Jensen.
Prelude in B-flat major Mendelssohn.
Overture to the 29th Cantata Bach — Saint Saëns.

To begin with a Handel suite, or some composition of its period, is usual enough, but we think it is something new to our public to see Sebastian Bach brought in as the climax of a programme. And Saint-Saëns' transcription of the overture to Bach's 29th Cantata was in every sense of the word a climax. The sterling vigor, the joyous strength of the music, made the more palpable to the physical sense by the arranger's larger treatment of the piano-forte, sent the audience home in a more jubilant frame of mind than the most tearing piece of modern virtuosity could. Another novelty was Von Weber's Sonata in A-flat major. We have decidedly heard too little of Von Weber's piano-forte music. Time was when we could afford to lay more stress upon this writer's want of sustained power in developing a motive into a stoutly-built composition in the sonata form, than upon the spontaneity of his invention and the brilliancy of his genius. But now that we have heard so much music in which striving after dramatic effect and furious intensity of passion almost blinds the aesthetic sense to purity of form, so genial and withal so unique a personality as Von Weber's comes to us like a refreshing breeze in the dog-days. True, Von Weber was a sort of musical spendthrift; it often seems as if his inexhaustible wealth of invention made him lazy and luxurious. The way in which he sometimes approaches a point in his more serious compositions where an elaborate and skillful working out of the themes seems an artistic necessity, and then coolly shirks the hard work and merely calls upon his fertile invention for another entrancing melody to take its place, is rather like that of a lecturer who should call together an audience, read them half his lecture, and then say to them, "Ladies and gentlemen, I find that the effort of delivering this discourse fatigues me too much; but I have a very large bank account, and will give every one of you a hundred dollars to let me off now." Thus if Von Weber's piano-forte music often balks the expectations that it raises in us, we can be pretty sure that the composer will put his hand in his melodic pocket and pay us for our disappointment in some pleasant way.

Mr. Foote's performance was good throughout. In the opening numbers of the Handel suite in D minor a touch of excusable nervousness somewhat shackled him, but this soon wore off, and his playing of the sonata and of Mendelssohn's Variations Sérieuses was that of a true artist, and an artist with brains, too. His technique showed itself to be equal to the often severe demands of the music: yet it was by his musical feeling, intelligent comprehension, and sustained power of vigorously carrying through long rhythmic periods without danger of an anti-climax and with noble breadth of phrasing that he shone most brilliantly. He plays the most trying phrases with a security that prevents all fear of collapse. This does not sound like very high praise as everyday criticism goes; yet, when we say of a man that he has crossed Niagara on a tight rope without any trembling in his knees and with steadily easy grace of movement, we think that praise enough has been given him. This is a coarse simile, but let it pass.

Mr. W. H. Fessenden sang Handel's "Love sounds the Alarm" and a brace of songs by Rubinstein and Jensen in his accustomed refined and finished style; perhaps a thought too delicately and with a too great fondness for pianissimo effects. If he could only appreciate how absolutely and entrancingly beautiful his stronger tones are, he might use them more frequently and to excellent advantage.

Several concerts of peculiar interest have occurred here during the past ten days, including remarkably fine ones by the Apollo and the Boylston Clubs, that of Miss Cappiani and her pupils, the Harvard Symphony on Thursday of this week, and Mr. John A. Preston's piano-forte concert on Wednesday. Of all these further notice must be deferred until our next number.

MUSICAL CORRESPONDENCE.

NEW YORK, FEB. 24. — Mr. William Courtney gave a concert of English ballads and glees, Feb. 11, at Chickering Hall, with the assistance of Miss Beebe, Mrs. Courtney, Mrs. Robertson, and Mr. Jameson. Mrs. Howard was the pianist. The writer of this notice was prevented from attending the concert, but is informed that the audience was large and appreciative.

For the same reason he can give no detailed account of the third concert of the Brooklyn Philharmonic Society, which took place on Saturday evening, Feb. 15, with the following programme:—

Symphony in C minor, Op. 5 Gade.
"O mio Fernando" Donizetti.
Violoncello Solo — Serenade Volkmann.
"Bilder aus Oesten." Op. 86 Schumann.
Cavatina, "Di tanti palpiti" Rossini.
"Bacchante" Wagner.
"Huldigung's March" Wagner.

The "Violoncello Solo" was neither more nor less than the Serenade No. 3, in D minor, for string orchestra with 'cello obligato. The concert is generally regarded as the weakest of the series.

The Oratorio Society gave a performance of Mendelssohn's St. Paul, at Steinway Hall, on Wednesday evening, Feb. 19, under the direction of Dr. Damrasch. The soloists were Mrs. Mary L. Swift, soprano; Miss Anna Drasdil, contralto; Mr. M. W. Whitney, bass; and Mr. Geo. Simpson, tenor. This noble work is too seldom heard in New York. The chorus is uniformly spirited and literally radiant with genius, while its effect is heightened by the frequent introduction of choral passages, and many of the solos are of wonderful pathos and beauty. The chorus singing, without being remarkable for absolute precision of attack or perfection in crescendo and diminuendo, was uniformly excellent, and could only result from long and careful drilling by a competent conductor, such as we have in the person of Dr. Damrasch. Mrs. Swift has a sweet but not a powerful voice: her upper notes are not entirely agreeable, being thin and reedy. She sang with feeling and good taste. Miss Drasdil, whose voice is like a violoncello, won the first encore in the Arioso: "But the Lord is mindful of his own." Mr. Whitney, although suffering from hoarseness, sang magnificently, — as, indeed, he always does. Mr. Simpson failed to make any marked impression until he sang the Aria: "Be thou faithful unto death," which he rendered with so much feeling that a well deserved encore followed.

Mr. G. Carlberg gave his fourth Symphony Concert, at Chickering Hall, on Saturday evening, February 22, with the following programme:—

Symphony im Walde, No. 3, Op. 153 Riff.
Concerto for Piano, Op. 54 Schumann.
Overture, "Egmont" Beethoven.
Hungarian Fantasia for Piano (with Orchestra) . . . Liszt.
Norwegian Rhapsody, No. 4. Op. 22 (new) Svendsen.

Nothing could be more welcome than the "Im Walde" Symphony, as fresh and spontaneous in its loveliness as sunshine after rain, and filled with the mysterious sounds heard in the heart of the forest. It is descriptive music in the best sense, but not "programme music." The performance of the Orchestra was the best I have heard at any of Mr. Carlberg's Concerts, and calls for nothing but praise.

Mr. Franz Rummel, whose public appearances have been frequent of late, and whose praise the newspapers "loudly chant," is, in many respects, an extraordinary pianist. He has great power of execution: his runs, trills, and chords are marvels of rapidity, evenness, and force, — and joined to a really magnificent technique, there is a certain vim and dash in his performance which excites wonder as well as admiration. Now for the other side of the medal. His touch is hard, — unsympathetic. It has not the singing quality inseparable from true legato playing. As to his reading of Schumann's Concerto, it seemed to the writer that in certain passages the sentiment was forced or exaggerated rather than spontaneous; a subjective style of playing, which is never entirely agreeable, and which only a great artist can make even tolerable.

The Hungarian Dances were performed with much skill and delicacy. In these the performer was in his element, and his superb finger-power was manifested to such an extent that the audience was electrified. For encore he played the last movement of Weber's Concert-Stück. A. A. C.

PHILADELPHIA, FEB. 22. — Her Majesty's Opera, represented by Col. Mapleson's fine company, has monopolized the attention of the musical public for the past two weeks. The nine performances were highly successful, the Academy of Music on the Gerster nights being crowded to suffocation, — no figure of speech, I can assure you, and many being turned away from the doors, for there was not even standing room. Our best people came out in force, and the dress and show contradicted the existence of hard times.

After the exhaustive critiques in the JOURNAL it would be superfluous to attempt anything in that line, but the experience of a properly appointed orchestra and chorus has given confirmation to the oft-repeated advocacy in our local papers of the policy of permanently establishing a large and efficient chorus and orchestra to be attached to our (miscalled) Academy of Music. The observation and experience of every traveler in Europe have shown that a single great artist, or even a quartet of superior vocalists, cannot satisfy the demands of an educated public in the performance of modern opera. The orchestra is a potent factor, and scarcely less so is the chorus; in the writing of the present day they are indispensable. We would not depreciate the value of the artists; far from it. We certainly could not be satisfied with the mediocre talent so often heard in the theatres of Germany. There they have perhaps gone to the other extreme. There is little danger of that happening in our country, where the star system will probably flourish for many years to come. But the spirit of speculation in which opera is given in America is disposed to take advantage of the want of culture in the general public rather than to supply means of educating it to a proper estimate of what a musical drama should be. The late William K. Fry tried to show us the way many years ago, and his efforts have not been excelled even by Col. Mapleson's troupe, but the speculators — the old-clothes men of art — threw every obstacle in his way when living, and have not imitated his example since his death. The chorus and orchestra of the present company have preached a powerful sermon in their own defense, and, we trust, have opened the way for a permanent establishment to be attached to our beautiful opera-house, — a consummation for which your correspondent has labored long but in vain.

The Cecilian Society gave a concert on the 19th in Musical Fund Hall, assisted by Miss Fanny Kellogg, of your city, and Mad. Auerbach. Mr. S. T. Strang continues his interesting organ recitals in Grace Church. Mr. C. H. Jarvis will give the seventh of his series of ten concerts this evening. The Mendelssohn Club, under Mr. W. Gilchrist, gave Gade's "Erl-King's Daughter," in Germantown last week. Mad. Seiler's pupils are studying Kreutzer's "Night in Granada." The Cecilian has abandoned the project of giving the "Creation," which is to be regretted. Sullivan's little opera, H. M. S. Pinafore, is being sung (?) in five different theatres. Sullivan and Gilbert are said to be on their way to this country to arrange for the production of a new opera. AMERICUS.

BALTIMORE, FEB. 24. — The first three Peabody Symphony Concerts this winter have all been so well attended that one is justified in looking for full houses during the remainder of the season. As an evidence of progress this speaks well for our musical public. It is gratifying to note the unusual number of new faces this year: people who have seldom, if ever before, sat through a Symphony Concert, listening with marked attention, and with a certain amount of correct appreciation.

The programmes of the last two concerts were as follows: —

Second Concert, February 8: —
Overture to "Alceste" Gluck.
Symphony in G, No. 13 Haydn.
Cavatina from "Semiramide" Rossini.
Miss Elisa Baraldi.
Piano-Concerto, G minor O. B. Boiss.
Allegro — Andante con moto — Allegro.
Mme. Nannette Falk-Auerbach.
Songs, with piano, "The Valley" — Serenade Gounod.
Overture to "Princess Ise" Max Erdmannsdörfer.
A legend of the Harz Mountains.
Third Concert, February 15: —
Third Symphony, "Eroica" Beethoven.
Cavatina from "The Martyrs" Donizetti.
Miss H. A. Hunt.
Nocturne E minor. Work 34 C. C. Mueller.

Scotch Folk-Songs, with piano.

"Dinna ye forget, Laddie" — "Down the burn, Davie Love."

(a.) Overture to "My Life for the Czar" M. J. Glinka.
(b.) Komarinskaja. Russian Scherzo — Wedding song — Dance song.

None of the above selections were new to the orchestra except the difficult Erdmannsdörfer Overture, and Beethoven's Eroica. We can hardly mention in the same category with these the Nocturne by Mr. C. C. Mueller, of New York. This was also new to the orchestra and to your correspondent, and is likely to remain so.

The Eroica, though never before performed at the Peabody, and with fewer rehearsals than might have been wished, was very acceptably interpreted by the orchestra. Just in this connection I would call attention to the adverse criticisms on the Peabody Orchestra which have appeared this season in two of our daily papers, — the American and the Gazette. It gives your correspondent pleasure to say that the ideas of that portion of our musical community which takes the more intelligent interest in the Symphony Concerts, and in music of a higher order generally, are not represented by the remarks of the two learned gentlemen who perpetrate the musical criticisms for the above-named papers. Moreover, the more these two critics exercise themselves about lack of instruments, false seating of the orchestra, peculiarities of the director, and what not, the larger the attendance becomes. The only evil that may result is that some influential paper elsewhere may publish one of these articles (unconscious that they are the result solely of personal prejudice, an undisputed fact in musical circles here) as affording a correct idea of our Symphony performances; for the garb of profound musical erudition in which they are clothed is calculated to deceive.

Miss Hunt, whose name appears on the programme of the third concert, was greeted as an old acquaintance. Her appearance awakened in many of the audience agreeable recollections of the days of Mr. L. H. Southard, well known in your city, formerly director of our Peabody Conservatory.

Her Majesty's (!) Opera closed here on Saturday afternoon with Lucia, to a house the like of which for numbers has not been seen here for many a day. At the performance of Sonnambula, also, there was not an empty seat in the house. Carmen and Figaro were not quite so largely attended, — a decided tribute to Gerster. At the performance of Sonnambula and Lucia the audience actually rose and shouted, so great was the enthusiasm called forth by the "Hungarian Nightingale."

The Peabody Orchestra gave an afternoon and an evening concert on the 22d, at Lincoln Hall, Washington, under the auspices of the Athenæum Club of that city, which turned out so satisfactorily from a musical point of view that the club has expressed its intention to repeat the experiment. The programmes were as follows: —

MATINEE.
Overture to "My Life for the Czar" Glinka.
Symphony in G, No. 13 Haydn.
Rec. and Air from the "Magic Flute" Mozart.
Miss Jenny Busk.
Prelude to the 4th act of the Opera Troville.
Work 12. (Summer Night in the Woods.
Love scene) Asger Hamerik.
(a.) Barcarolle, F-sharp major. Work 60.
(b.) Fantasia-Improvisu, C-sharp minor. Work 66.
(c.) Valse, A-flat major. Work 42 F. Chopin.
Mme. Nannette Falk-Auerbach.

Air with Variations. Miss Jenny Busk.
Norwegian Folk Songs and Folk-Dances August Söderman.
EVENING.
Eighth Symphony Beethoven.
Rec. and Air from "Magic Flute" Mozart.
Miss Jenny Busk.
Prelude to 4th act of Troville Asger Hamerik.
Piano-Concerto, G minor. No. 1. Work 25.
Mendelssohn.
Mme. Nannette Falk-Auerbach.

Air with Variations. Miss Jenny Busk.
Norwegian Folk-Songs and Folk-Dances A. Söderman.
MUSIK U.

CHICAGO, FEB. 19. — On Thursday evening, February 13, the "Apollo Musical Club," assisted by the "Arion Club" of Milwaukee, gave a concert in this city, with the following programme:

{ a "Cavalry Song" Möhring
{ b "The Forsaken" Koschat.
Chorus.
{ a Night Song Lens.
{ b Night Song Abt.
Arion Society.
"Revenge, Timotheus cries" Handel.
Mr. Franz Remmert.
{ a "Calm Sea" Rubinstein.
{ b "Spring Song" Franke.
{ c "Three Fishers" Goldbeck.
Apollo Club.
Overture to "Aladdin" Hornemann.
Double chorus, from "Edipus" Mendelssohn.
Cantata of "Fridthjof" Max Bruch.

The union of the two societies made a male chorus of nearly 150 voices, the largest Maennerchor we have ever had here. In the first part, the most notable numbers were Goldbeck's "Three Fishers" and the Mendelssohn double chorus. These were splendidly sung. The most important feature of the concert was the performance, by both clubs, of Max Bruch's "Scenes from the Fridthjof's Saga" of Bishop Tegnér, with Mrs. Emma Thurston and Mr. Franz Remmert as soloists, and a full orchestra. Dramatically, the work lacks consistency, for from the scenes used as a text for the music but little idea of this celebrated poem could be obtained. The work only embraces parts of Cantos XII., XIII., XIV., and XV. of the poem, or "Fridthjof's Return," "Ingeborg's Bridal," "Balder's Funeral Pile," "Fridthjof's Exile," and "The Viking Code." Between these last two scenes comes "Ingeborg's Lament," which in the poem is directly after the parting of the lovers in the earlier part of the Saga, and is not quite logically consistent here. Musically the work is very strong; the interest never weakens, and there is a rich climax at the close which is very satisfactory. Yet one can but wish that the composer had taken a larger portion of the poem, which is so dramatic, of such beauty and strength, that it should be made the text for a more extended musical work. Max Bruch would have been able to accomplish this in a most satisfactory manner; for the musical setting to the few scenes forming his Cantata is dramatic in form, rich in harmonic design, and manifests a sympathy with the characters and incidents of the poem, in keeping with the mystical embodiments of the Norse mythology.

"Fridthjof's Farewell to the North" was grandly given by Mr. Remmert, who took the title rôle. His powerful voice and his interpretation were in keeping with the idea of the character, and in this number with the chorus reached a dramatic climax of power and intensity of feeling that is pleasing to remember. "Ingeborg's Lament" is a sweet and tender piece of melodic writing; and her pleading to the Falcon to stay with her, even while "Fridthjof is far o'er the seas," is quite touching in its plaintive character. It was sung with feeling and taste by Mrs. Thurston. The last scene in the Cantata, "The Viking's Code," is a number of great power, and is trying in its demands upon the singers, being fortissimo all through; yet there is a fascination in the dramatic character of the music, so that the chorus is led up to the climax at the end impelled both by the wonderful spirit of the words and by the grandeur of the composition. It is a work that a Maennerchor may well be proud to produce. The whole performance reflected credit upon the two clubs; the few shortcomings were not of any great magnitude; and the chorus, orchestra, and conductor should be congratulated upon the success of their labor in bringing out the work.

On the 18th, the Beethoven Society gave the "Odysseus" or "Scenes from the Odyssey," a cantata for solo voices, chorus, and orchestra, by Max Bruch, thus giving us the pleasure of hearing two important works by the same composer within a week. The soloists were: Penelope, Mrs. O. K. Johnson; Nausikaa, Miss Kittie E. J. Ward; Pallas Athena, Miss Lizzie Hoyne; Antikleia, Arete, Mrs. Frank T. Hall; Odysseus, Mr. George Werrenrath; Hermes, Mr. Edward Dexter; Teiresias, Alcinoos, Helmsman, Mr. F. L. Koss; Conductor and Musical Director, Carl Wolfsohn.

In the treatment of this old Grecian story, the composer manifested a greater consistency of dramatic design, than in his Fridthjof. The cantata follows the adventures of Ulysses with a quite faithful consideration of the Homeric idea; and thus we have a unity of purpose that becomes at once interesting. The ten scenes of the work are as follows: 1. "Odysseus on the island of Calypso," which introduces a chorus — of Nymphs — and solos for Odysseus and Hermes. 2. "Odysseus in Hades," with solo and chorus, both of a most varied character. 3. "Odysseus and the Sirens," a number of great beauty, containing lovely music, vocal and orchestral. 4. "The Tempest at Sea." 5. "Penelope Mourning." 6. "Nausikaa, and chorus of maidens." 7. "The Banquet with the Phaiakes." 8. "Penelope weaving a garment." 9. "The Return." 10. "Feast in Ithaca," closing with a grand chorus of the people.

The work has unity of design, but unfortunately for a public performance in one evening, it is too long. Some of the choruses, as well as many of the recitatives, are so long as to be a little monotonous, and a slight cutting in a few places in the first part of the cantata would add to its effectiveness. The instrumental score contains many striking beauties. The accompaniments are generally pure and graceful in style. The second part was performed much better than the beginning. The chorus did some splendid work. The orchestra was uneven at times, owing to excess of enthusiasm on the part of the brass instruments, who seemed to consider themselves the whole band. The most successful of the soloists was Mrs. Johnson, our favorite contralto, who sang the trying music of her part with a beauty of delivery and an intensity of dramatic passion that were very gratifying. Her success was universally recognized by the large audience. Mr. Werrenrath, who came to us from New York, was suffering from the effect of a recent severe illness, and while his style was that of a cultivated singer, he was unable to meet the requirements of his part; we regret that he was forced to make his debut in this city under such distressing circumstances. Miss Ward and Miss Hoyne deserve praise for the highly creditable manner in which they sang the music of their respective solos. Mr. Carl Wolfsohn and the Beethoven Society richly merit the commendation of our musical public, for their earnest devotion to the cause of good music. We have much to thank them for.

C. H. B.

NOTES AND GLEANINGS.

LEIPZIG. — The programme of the fourteenth Gewandhaus Concert, Jan. 23, included: the Coriolanus overture of Beethoven; Aria from "Acis and Galatea," sung by Joseph Standigl; Concerto for violoncello, by Schumann, played by Robert Hausmann, of Berlin; songs by Schubert ("Fuhr zum Hades," and "Aufenthalt"); Arioso, Garotte, and Soberzo for 'cello, by Carl Reinecke; and the Symphonic Dramatique by Rubinstein.

PARIS. — From letters of Mr. James Huneker (Jan. 17 and 31) to the Philadelphia Bulletin, we glean the following items: —

— A good concert was that given by Mr. Frederic Boscovitz, at the Salle Erard, that perfection of a music hall. The programme was made up almost entirely of the new works of Mr. Boscovitz, with the exception of some Chopin numbers and a Liszt-Schubert Valse. For his own compositions I can only say they are decidedly original, recalling at times, though faintly, Chopin, in an exquisite Berceuse and an odd Minuet, for which Mr. Boscovitz has taken the old Mozart form and filled it with new life. In a Danse Hongroise of his own, Mr. Boscovitz displayed that immense technique which justly places him foremost [?] among our living pianists.

— On Sunday I also heard another fine concert at the Théâtre du Châtelet. These concerts are given once a week under the auspices of the Association Artistique, whose roll of members includes, among others, the distinguished names of St.-Saëns, De Beriot, Duvernoy, Gounod, Jäell, Massenet, and Viëuxtemps. They played at this concert the Italian Symphony of Mendelssohn, Schumann's Manfred, the Leonore Overture of Beethoven, and a Funeral March of Hamlet, by Faocio, the leader of the orchestra in La Scala, Milan. It was nothing but Wagner from beginning to end. Mme. Marie Jäell, the wife of the celebrated pianist, played a concerto of St.-Saëns for piano, in her usual frigid style, for, while she showed great skill in fingering, she has not a particle of expression. A decided novelty, and one worth hearing, was a trio, by Beriot, for two flutes and a harp. It is a dirge, and abounds in beautiful passages. These concerts are very satisfactory. The orchestra, if it is smaller, plays as well as the Pasdeloup, while I think the acoustics are better than in the vast winter circus.

— The Opéra Comique, this week, revived Gounod's charming opera, Romeo and Juliet. While the cast is not so well filled as at the first representation in 1887, with Mliouan-Carvalho and Duchesne in the principal rôles, still it is excellent. Talazac has a fine tenor, and if Mlle. Isaac is not the ideal of Juliet, yet she possesses a vibrating, well-cultivated voice, that tells. The opera is well mounted, with a capital chorus.

Although it was generally supposed that Sivori, the great violinist, would not play this season in Paris, he nevertheless delighted a large audience, last Sunday, at the Concert Populaire, with his lovely music. He is no longer a young man, but the vigor and fire of his playing are immense. He gave with orchestral accompaniment a Berceuse, of his own composition, with a delicacy unapproachable. It was played with the mute, and the bow never left the strings once. It was so piano that many of the audience were, I am sure, unable to hear it. In startling contrast came a Mouvement Perpetuel, also with orchestra, and by the same composer. This was as presto and forte as possible. Sivori's tone is not so masculine as that of his great rivals, Joachim and Wilhelmj, but it is exquisitely sweet; he lacks the generous breadth of the German school. He plays nearer to the bridge than any one I have ever heard, without the suspicion of a screech. It reminds one of gold being drawn to cobweb fineness. He played for an encore the well-known, alas, too well known, "Carnival of Venice." Whether it was given us in the style of his illustrious master, Paganini, I cannot say; only that it was amazing, painful, and finally tiresome. It was a most astonishing tour de force, and I believe would drive most violin players crazy. Sivori is a great violinist, though I think that there are others equally as great; but comparisons are odious, and I will make none.

— Mr. Frederic Boscovitz gave a second piano recital at the Salle Erard, which was as successful as the former one. Mr. Boscovitz, after playing among other things some new works of his own, gave a sonata by Nielschman, a composer who flourished about 1740. It was extremely interesting, and reminds one of Bach or Handel. Mr. Boscovitz also played some selections from Field, Handel, and Chopin. The color and life he infuses into everything he touches make one feel that the Hungarians are horn pianists. His playing is never tame, and while always giving the composer as he is, he nevertheless plays with an individuality that raises him above the level of most pianists. A Madame White gave some selections from De Beriot and Lalo for the violin in good style, but with rather a thin tone. I could not help thinking of the number of female violinists who appear before the public now. A short time ago the idea of a woman playing on that instrument was laughed at, pronounced ungraceful, etc. Now not a season passes but a half dozen violinists of the gentler sex prove to us that the true instrument for woman is, par excellence, the violin.

LONDON. — The Musical Directory for 1879 contains some remarkable statistics of the present condition of musical art in England. In London during the past year there were not fewer than four hundred grand orchestral and oratorio concerts, besides some two hundred and fifty piano-forte matinees, benefit and miscellaneous concerts. Add to this over two hundred performances of Italian and English Operas, and we have, without including operettas and musical farces, a sum total of eight hundred and fifty important musical performances, an average of about three per day. London counts about forty amateur societies, which give private concerts; twenty-nine Protestant and fifteen Catholic churches in which sacred musical performances take place; and one hundred and seven concert halls (exclusive of the Cryfes-Chantants and "music halls"). On a superficial estimate there are in the British metropolis two thousand music teachers, who earn their bread by giving lessons, and about five thousand in the provinces; while one hundred and twenty provincial towns possess one or more (often six or seven) musical societies. In London during the past year there appeared thirty-five hundred new compositions, among them about one thousand songs and ballads, two hundred vocal duets, etc., twelve hundred piano pieces, two hundred and fifty dance pieces, one hundred sacred pieces, one hundred sacred duets. The rest consists of pieces for organ, orchestra, harp, harmonium, guitar, violin, flute, etc.

— Carl Rosa, with his English Opera Company, at Her Majesty's Theatre (he having formed an alliance with Mapleson) seems chiefly to occupy musical attention in London just now. Recently they have brought out Wagner's Rienzi and Ernest Guiraud's Piccolino with very great success.

— The chamber compositions of the lamented Hermann Goetz, composer of the admired opera "The Taming of the Shrew," and of the Symphony in F, which lately made a mark in London, are now exciting interest. At the popular concert of Saturday, Feb. 8, his piano trio in G minor was to be performed by Mlle. Marie Krebs, Mme. Norman-Neruda, and Sig. Piatti; the programme also including: Quartet in C minor, Op. 18, Beethoven; Sonata in D, Mozart (Mlle. Krebs); and "Liebeslieder Wälzer," Op. 52, for four hands, with voice parts ad lib. (!), by Brahms. — On Monday (10th), Joachim "the magnificent" was to make his first appearance for the season, to play (with Mlle. Ries, Zerbini, and Piatti) Mendelssohn's Quartet in D, and Haydn's in G major, Op. 64; also, as solo, the Adagio from a concerto by Viotti. Mlle. Krebs was down for a sonata, in C minor, by Schubert; and Herr Henschel for an Aria from Handel's Siroe, and Schubert's song "An die Leyer."

BADEN-BADEN. — Adolf Jensen, a gifted composer, who has lived here for several years in still retirement, died on the 23d of January. His songs and piano-forte pieces (not a few of which have been made known here in Boston in the concerts of Ernst Perabo and others) are highly esteemed in Germany. He was born at Königsberg, and had but recently completed his forty-second year. His productive activity continued to the last days of his life. The Signale says: "Jensen ranks among the most graceful and most finely sensitive of the romantic tone-poets who have proceeded from the Schumann school, and yet have developed into an independent artistic individuality."

STUTTGART. — A new four-act opera, Conradin von Schwaben, has been produced at the Theatre Royal, with signs of more than ordinary success. The plot was suggested by the Grand Princess Vera of Russia, the young widow of Duke Eugen of Wurtemberg, and the libretto written on this plot by Herr Ernst Pasqué. The music is by Herr Gottfried Linder, a master in the Conservatory, who was called on at the end of each act, and several times after the fall of the curtain, on the first night. Last autumn, 162 pupils were admitted into the Conservatory, where the whole number now amounts to 678, showing an increase of 13 on last year. Of these 676, 224 (4 more than last year), intend devoting themselves to music professionally, namely: 82 males and 140 females, 168 not being natives of Wurtemberg. Stuttgart furnishes 365 pupils; the remainder of Wurtemberg, 42; Baden, 25; Bavaria, 4; Hesse, 4; Prussia, 26; the Reichslande, 2; Bremen, 1; Hamburg, 2; Mecklenburg, 1; Oldenburg, 1; Austria, 4; Roumania, 2; Switzerland, 23; France, 1; Great Britain, 84; Russia, 13; Norway, 1; Greece, 1; Spain, 1; North America, 64; Australia, 2; and India, 7. During the winter session of six months, 863 lessons are given every week, by 35 regular masters, 2 assistant masters, and 4 female teachers.

WELL TAKEN IN. — Most of our newspapers have innocently swallowed the canard about Robert Franz's wonderful recovery of lost scores of Bach, — "120 violin sonatas!" Ye gods! The hundred or more American musical journals are yet ringing with the stupendous news, not having seen Franz's public statement that there is not one word of truth in the story. But it is a very pretty story for all that, and doubtless the invention of some wag-gish Wagnerite or envious "Bach-biter;" here it is as told in the Pall Mall Gazette: —

"German papers announce a discovery of much interest to the musical world. The treasure-trove consists of a large portion of the missing works of Johann Sebastian Bach. The discovery was made by Herr Robert Franz. Convinced that the long-lost Passion Music and Christmas oratorios might yet be brought to light, Herr Franz commenced a systematic research in every place where the great master had been known to reside. After much fruitless labor he arrived at the seat of the Witzlun family, and passing one day down an alley in the garden, noticed that the young trees where they were tied to their supports were bound round with strips of paper to prevent the bark from being scored. A closer inspection showed that the paper bore the beautiful handwriting of Bach, and, turning to the gardener, Herr Franz besought him to say whence the precious MS. had come. The reply was to the effect that in the loft there had been several chests full of the paper covered with old notes, and as it was of no use to any one he had made it serve instead of leather for binding up the saplings, adding that he had done so for some time and found the result highly satisfactory. Herr Franz hastened to the loft, when he was rewarded by finding a chest yet untouched and filled to the brim with MSS., which on inspection proved to contain no fewer than 120 violin sonatas. His joy was dashed, however, by the certainty that the precious music had long ago gone to bind up the trees and had irreversibly perished through exposure to the weather. It is probable that the works now discovered will not be received with such favor by the general musical public as was accorded to the symphonies of Schubert unearthed by Mr. Grove and produced at the Crystal Palace Concerts by Mr. Manns. Herr Joachim, however, will find in them 'fresh fields and pastures new;' while every one who has the least pretense to a love of music must admit the discovery to be one of exceeding interest."

WELLESLEY COLLEGE, MASS. — The forty-first concert (fourth series) was given at this institution on the last evening of January. The performers were C. N. Allen, Wulf Fries, C. H. Morse (musical professor of the college), pianist, and the junior class "Glee Club." The programme was as follows: —

Trio in G Haydn.
(a.) Andante. (b.) Poco Adagio. (c.) Rondo all' Ongarese.
Vocal Trio, "Evening" Goldbeck.
Variations Concertante in D. Op. 17. (Piano and 'cello) Mendelssohn.
Vocal Duet, "The Angel" Rubinstein.
Suite in E. Op. 11. (Piano and violin). C. Goldmark.
(First time in this country.)
Vocal Trio, "Sweet May" Barnby.
Trio in C minor. Op. 1. No. 8 Beethoven.

OXFORD (O.) FEMALE COLLEGE. — A Beethoven entertainment was given in the chapel, Jan. 31, with the following programme: —

1. Lecture: Subject, "Beethoven" Karl Marx.
2. Andante con moto, from Symphony Op. 67. Beethoven.
Misses Susie Rittenhouse, Rhoda Gray, Jennie Harrison, Anna Dumont.
3. In questa Tomba. Vocal Solo Beethoven.
Miss Sadie Elliott.
4. Adelaide. Vocal Solo Beethoven.
Miss Mary Colmery.
5. Symphony, Op. 36. Beethoven.
Misses Mary Colmery, Fannie McClellan, Leila Cox, Alice Ballenger.

CHICAGO. — Mr. Charles H. Brittan delivered a lecture on "The Development of Vocal Music from the 16th Century," at Park Institute, Feb. 7, with musical illustrations by Mrs. Oliver K. Johnson. These were the musical numbers: —

1 { (a.) Aria — "Pieta Signore" Stradella.
(b.) Song — "Nina" Pergolesi.
2 { (a.) Aria — "My Heart ever Faithful" J. S. Bach.
(b.) Aria — "He was Despised" (Messiah) Handel.
3 { (a.) Song — "In questa Tomba" Beethoven.
(b.) Song — "Thine is my Heart" Schubert.
(c.) Duet — Abtlenid Mendelssohn.
4 { Mrs. Johnson and Mr. Brittan.
(b.) Song — "Thou Art Like unto a Flower." Schumann.
5 { (a.) Song — Hungarian Song Franz.
(b.) Song — "Blinkt der Thau" Rubinstein.

— Sebastian Hensel's book upon the Mendelssohn family, of which he is a member, is rich in anecdotes. One of the best is the story of the original courtship of Moses Mendelssohn, — an episode which will be new to English readers. In Prussia, during the last century, every Jew was compelled at his marriage to purchase a fixed quantity of goods from the newly-founded Royal Porcelain Manufactory at Berlin. This was certainly an odd way of encouraging art and manufacture; but, worst of all, the Jew, not allowed to choose what he liked, must be content with the "recommendation" of the authorities of the royal factory, who thought Prussia ought to be rewarded for her tolerance by a considerable subsidy from the purses of rich Jews. Moses Mendelssohn, on his wedding-day, had to purchase twenty massive porcelain apes as large as life, some of which are still preserved by various branches of the family. This was under the rule of Mr. Carlyle's hero, — Frederick the Great, — and at a time, too, when Moses Mendelssohn had attained wide renown as a philosophical thinker.

BOSTON, MARCH 15, 1879.

CONTENTS.

SONNET. Stuart Sterne	41
GEORGE SAND AND FRÉDÉRIC CHOPIN. A Study. Fanny Raymond Ritter	41
THE PATRIOTIC FALLACY. T. G. A.	43
HENRY JAMES'S NEW BOOK. C. P. C.	44
TALES ON ART. SECOND SERIES. From Instructions of Mr. William M. Hunt to his Pupils	44
CONCERTS IN BOSTON	45
Apollo and Boylston Clubs. — Mme. Cappiani. — Mr. John A. Preston. — Sixth Symphony Concert.
MUSICAL CORRESPONDENCE	47
Paris. — New York. — Chicago. — Milwaukee.
NOTES AND GLEANINGS	48
Cambridge. — London. — Leipzig.

Published fortnightly by HOUGHTON, OSGOOD AND COMPANY,
220 Devonshire Street, Boston. Price, 10 cents a number; $2.50
per year.

All the articles not credited to other publications were expressly written for this Journal.

SONNET.

LOVE, when thou com'st — too rare and far between! —
In dreams to me that with night's stars must set,
Canst thou, like him who finds at morn not yet
His friend awake, and should not call, but lean
Tenderly o'er him, then steal out unseen,
But leave for greeting on the coverlet
A starry branch of fragrant blossoms, wet
With early dew, — thou too not let me glean
A brief, bright joy from thy fleet visiting?
And not for my sole portion leave the slow,
Undying throb of grief, sharp as the sting
Of pricking thorns? O Love, yet be it so, — Come even thus! That bitterness untold
Is sweeter than all else the earth may hold!

STUART STERNE.

GEORGE SAND AND FRÉDÉRIC
CHOPIN.

A STUDY.

BY FANNY RAYMOND RITTER.

(Continued from page 35.)

THERE is a passage in the "Impressions et Souvenirs" which places these three great artists, Chopin, Sand, and Delacroix, in an interesting light before us. Delacroix, fine conversationalist as he could be, and expansive as he appears in the passage I allude to, was only so among those few intimate and proven friends who had a right to be considered his intellectual equals. Exclusive and fastidious; believing, if ever artist did, that "the painter who courts popularity closes the door on his own genius;" averse to society, save in those elegant circles where feminine tact exercises its divine right of melting all rebellious and discordant elements into an atmosphere of harmony and grace, or among his compeers in the artist world, Delacroix, in ordinary general society, appeared, when he did appear there at all, taciturn and reserved. He discouraged conversation in the studio, apart from that necessary to instruction, as a species of dissipation. "Conversation on art, or on subjects that most seriously concern artists," said he, "save among equals, when mind kindles mind with electric friction, is a giving away of one's self to unworthy receivers, or an exhaustive mental debauchery and loss of concentration, leading to nothing; to shake hands too often lowers the character." This exclusionist was evidently of Robert Schumann's opinion: "The artist should be cheerful as a Grecian god, in his intercourse with life and men; but when these dare to approach too near, he should disappear, leaving nothing but clouds behind him." Chopin, charming, fanciful, witty as he could be at times, was by nature little of a conversationalist; few composers are. Why should they be so? Does not their speech begin where ordinary language ends? On the occasion described by Madame Devant, she and Delacroix had previously discussed the teachings of M. Ingres and the opinions of his disciples, repeated in our day by the Cabanellists and the Académie, the eternal subject of rule and exception, classic and romantic, tradition and originality; both friends, however, being on one side of the question, as we might expect from their characters.

"Delacroix said: 'M. Ingres thinks that light was made to embellish; he does not perceive that it was intended to animate. He has studied, with very delicate precision, the smallest effects of light on marbles, gold, drapery; he has only forgotten one thing, — reflection. He does not seem to suspect that everything in nature is reflection, and that all color is an exchange of this. He has scattered over all the objects that have posed before him little compartments of sunshine that seem to have been daguerreotyped, but there is neither sun, light, nor air in any of them. The livid and tarnished tones of an old wall by Rembrandt are rich in a very different manner from this prodigality of tones, pasted on objects that he never succeeds in uniting by means of the necessary reflections, and which consequently remain cold, isolated, and harsh. Observe that what is harsh is always cold!' Chopin joined us at my door, and we ascended the stairs disputing about the 'Stratonice' of Ingres. Chopin does not like that picture, because its figures are affected and devoid of genuine emotion; but the finish of the painting pleases him. Chopin and Delacroix love each other, I may say, tenderly. They possess many affinities of character and the same grand qualities of mind and heart. But in their respective arts, Delacroix understands and adores Chopin, but Chopin does not understand Delacroix. He respects, esteems, cherishes, the man, but detests him as a painter. Delacroix, whose faculties are more varied, appreciates and understands music, in which art his taste is just and exquisite. He is never tired of listening to Chopin; he enjoys him, knows him by heart. Chopin accepts and is touched by this homage, but when he looks at one of his friend's pictures he suffers, and has not a word to say. Infinite are his wit, finesse, sarcasm, yet he cares not for painting or sculpture; Michael Angelo frightens him, Rubens makes his flesh creep. All that is eccentric scandalizes him, and he shuts himself up in the narrowest proprieties. Strange anomaly! for his own genius is the most original and individual existing. But he does not like to be told so. It is true that the revolutionary Delacroix's literary taste is also as classic and formal as can be imagined! It is useless to dispute with them; I listen; but at dessert Maurice breaks the ice. He begs Delacroix to explain the mysteries of reflection, and Chopin listens, his eyes enlarged by surprise. The master establishes a comparison between the tones of painting and those of music. 'Harmony in music, we know, does not merely consist of the existence of chords, but in their relations, connections, logical successions, all that I may be allowed to term their auditory reflections. Painting cannot proceed otherwise. Let us take this blue cushion and this red cover. Place them side by side. You see that where the two tones touch, they borrow from each other; red is tinted with blue, blue is flushed with red, and between them they produce violet. Crowd the most violent tones into a picture, but if you give them the reflections that unite them, you will never appear loud. Is Nature sober in color? Does she not overflow with glaring, audacious, ferocious oppositions, that yet never destroy her harmony? It is because she enchains everything by means of reflections. You may pretend to suppress these in painting, but the result is somewhat inconvenient; you suppress painting itself.' Maurice observes that the science of reflections is the most difficult in the world. 'No,' replies the master, 'it is as simple as good-day, and can be explained like two and two make four. The reflection of one given color on another invariably produces a third.' 'But how about the re-reflection?' demands the scholar. 'Diable, Maurice, how you run on! You ask too much for one day!' The re-reflection launches us into infinity, as Delacroix knows, yet he cannot explain what he is still in search of, and which he has owned to me he has sometimes found rather through inspiration than by means of science. He can teach the grammar of his art, but genius is not to be communicated to others, and there are unsounded mysteries in color, tones produced by relation, which are nameless, and do not exist on any palette. Chopin has ceased to listen, has seated himself at the piano-forte, and now does not perceive that we are listening to him. He improvises at random, and then pauses. 'Well,' asks Delacroix, 'surely you have not finished?' 'I had not yet commenced. Nothing will come, — nothing but shadows, reliefs, reflections that I cannot fix. I seek the color; I cannot even find the design.' Delacroix replies, 'You cannot find one without the other, consequently you will find them together.' 'But suppose I should find nothing but moonlight?' 'Ah, then,' exclaims Maurice, 'you will have found the re-reflection!' This fancy pleases our divine composer. He takes up his idea again without appearing to recommence, so uncertain and vague is his first sketch. Our eyes seem to behold the soft tints corresponding to the bland modulations which are received by our ears. Blue! we float in the transparent azure of night. Light clouds assume every form of fancy; they fill the sky; they close round the moon; she throws out great opaline disks, and awakens the softly sleeping colors. We dream of a summer night; we await the nightingale."

But the lady of M. Karasowski's biography certainly meant to say that the spirit of music, rather than that "the spirit of Chopin, breathes from the best of George Sand's romances." For it would be difficult to discover anything of Chopin's peculiar characteristics in the works of George Sand, so different, so opposite, appear the natures of these two artists as displayed in the tendency and effect of their works. The question, Which of George Sand's romances may be considered her best in a purely literary sense?

is one foreign to our present inquiry; let us, then, endeavor to ascertain how much of the musical spirit may be found in her works, and what share of that may reasonably be attributed to the "inspiration" of Chopin.

Unfortunately for this latter assumption, however, it is known that George Sand's love and taste for music dated from childhood, and her musical talent was more an inherited than an acquired one. The father, whom in her filial pride she has characterized as, in accomplishments and courage, "a personification of the chivalrous phase of the last wars of the republic and the first wars of the empire," possessed the temperament of an artist as well as the valor of a soldier. He was well versed in literature, languages, and design, but above all in music; his voice was a fine one, and his violin playing must have been superior to that of many amateurs, for he was able to perform a part at sight in symphonies and quartets. He attempted, rather late in life, to acquire the knowledge of composition which he needed in order to carry out his talent for that science. Madame Sand says: "M. de Vitrolles has related to me the odd result of this tardy scientific study. Previous to it, my father's imagination had appeared to overflow with charming melodies and musical ideas. But, after acquiring the science necessary to express these, his imagination became cold, and his natural genius for musical creativeness deserted him without his becoming aware of it himself." Possibly the creative musical talent of Captain Dupin was not strong enough to survive the robust discipline of scientific training, — an experience not infrequently that of students of composition! When engaged in the campaigns of Napoleon, the first thought of the young officer, on arriving in a city new to him, was to visit the musical celebrities of the place; he wrote letters, evincing much taste, judgment, and enthusiasm, to his mother about these visits and his attendance at great musical and operatic performances, from which his daughter quotes in her autobiography. Throughout her childhood and convent life Madame Sand was deeply impressed by music; the singing of Tyrolean national songs by the prisoners of war who passed through Berry, the chapel music, the voice of her grandmother, all delighted her. Her general musical education would have been no better and no worse than that of most ladies of her social position, but for the fact that her grandmother was a lady of uncommon musical talent and knowledge. She taught the principles of music to little Aurora Dupin with such soundness and completeness that everything seemed easy to her; much more so than when, in after years, masters of greater pretensions only succeeded in disgusting the young student with her own endeavors. At the age of sixty-five Madame Dudevant's grandmother remained, in spite of years and infirmities, so accomplished a singer that she was able to move her hearers to tears by her noble style and expression when performing the masterpieces of the old Italian school, listening to which, seated under the old spinet, in company with her favorite dog, Madame Sand then thought she would gladly have spent her whole life. Her grandmother had known Gluck and Piccinni, and loved the music of both, saying that comparison was a bad rule in art, as it was better to appreciate than to compare different individualities. Madame Sand says: "I have heard much singing since those days, many magnificent voices; but if I have heard more, I cannot say that I have heard anything better." May not the recollection of her grandmother's noble style of singing noble music have had its share in "inspiring" George Sand in her invention of the character of Consuelo, the high-minded pupil of the old Italian master Porpora, — as great a share as the large, expressive singing of her friend, Madame Pauline Garcia, the great artiste who is said to have been depicted in the heroine of "Consuelo" and "The Countess of Rudolstadt"? Although these novels were written at the time when Chopin was an inmate of Madame Sand's house, they are two of her most objective books; and although many of the characters are musicians, the aim and tendency of the works are more religious and revolutionary than musical. And the musical subjects chiefly treated of are Italian vocal music and lives of opera singers, branches of the art in which Chopin was comparatively uninterested, though Bellini was one of his intimate friends.

But George Sand wrote as beautifully of music (more eloquently than any other woman) before her acquaintance with Chopin as during the continuance of their friendship. Exquisite passages on the subject of music abound in her letters to Liszt, Meyerbeer, Gerard, Rollinat, and others, written from Italy and Switzerland in 1834, 1835, and 1836. Some of these are finer than anything she wrote on the same theme afterwards, in their rare combination of warm feeling for nature and appreciation of art. If George Sand ever errs in writing of music, it is not when she depicts the inmost meaning, the æsthetic significance, the soul-moving effect, of that art, but when she dilates on technicalities, schools, methods, and compositions, where her incomplete training for the task becomes occasionally apparent; and we rather wonder that she, far from seeking the "inspiration" of the musicians who surrounded her, did not take more advantage of their superior knowledge, in order to render her delineations of musical art blamelessly correct from a scientific point of view. How fine is that eulogy of music to be found in the opening of one of her letters to Liszt! as true, too, as it is poetical, for the modern art of music almost originated in the chants of the first Christians. "Music is the art of association, friendship, prayer, and faith. Christ told his apostles, at parting, that He would be with them where only one or two were gathered together in his name. The apostles, condemned to wander, labor, and suffer, soon dispersed. But when the disciples met, between imprisonment and martyrdom, the chains of Caiaphas and the stones of the synagogue, if they knelt together, no matter whether on the roadside, in some olive wood, or in the neighborhood of towns in a 'high chamber,' when they had conversed about their master and friend, the desire each felt of invoking his spiritual presence inspired them with the power of song, and the Holy Spirit, whose fiery tongues had invested them with the gift of language, also shed upon them the gift of the sacred voice of music, which can only be worthily spoken or understood by the purest and most elect of all human organizations." And here is one sentence descriptive of Beethoven's Pastoral Symphony, which is more to the point than long pages of mere analytical criticism: "Beethoven's Pastoral Symphony opens enchanted perspectives to the imagination, a valley of Engadine or Mismia, a terrestrial paradise, through which the soul takes flight, leaving limitless horizons behind her, and ceaselessly flying towards new ones, in which the bruised heart heals, the oppressed bosom expands, the mind and brain become renewed, and, identifying ourselves with nature, we sink into a delicious repose." Beautiful is her account of the effect of music on the water, where, after describing a moonlight night in Venice, she speaks of meeting a gondola conveying the orchestra that had been engaged by some English nobleman to perform a serenade: "Unexpected pleasures are the only genuine ones in the world. Yesterday I went to see the moon rise over the Adriatic, and opposite La Salute I met a boat slowly moving towards the Grand Canal, scattering round her, like fragrance, the sound of a delicious serenade. 'Turn the prow,' said I to old Catullo. Another boat followed my example, then a second, then another, then all on the canallazzo; even several empty ones, whose gondoliers rowed towards us, crying, 'Musica, musica!' with the hungry tone of Israelites calling for manna in the desert. In ten minutes the dilettanti were surrounded by a flotilla; all oars were silent, and the boats floated at the will of the water. Harmony glided softly on the breeze as the oboe gently sighed, and we held our breath lest that should interrupt its complaint of love. Two or three harmonious harp passages fell as if from heaven, a promise of angelic consolation to suffering souls. Then the horn rang as if from the depth of the woods, and the lover fancied he beheld his first love advancing towards him from the forest of Frioul. The violin exhaled a thrill of melodious joy; the four instruments united their voices as happy souls might do, embracing ere they depart for Paradise. Even when their accents ceased, my imagination still heard them, for their passage had left a magical warmth in the atmosphere, as though Love had waved his wings through it. There was a moment of silence which no one dared to break. The melodious bark began to hasten as though she would escape us, but we sprang upon her wake like a flock of petrels disputing for the possession of a dorado. The fugitive escaped as Orpheus might have done; a few chords from the harp restored silence and order. It was like the realization of some beautiful dream: the file of silent gondolas wafted by the wind along the magnificent Canal of Venice, while, to the sound of suave motives from Oberon and William Tell, every undulation of the waves, every light bound of the oars, seemed to respond to the sentiment of every musical phrase. The gondoliers, in bold attitudes on their poops, stood out against the deep blue air like thin, black spectres, behind the groups of friends and lovers whom they were conducting. The slowly rising moon seemed to listen to and love the music."

"Spiridon," one of the most mystic of romances, a novel without a woman, was written during the sojourn of the friends at Valdemosa, in the ruined cloisters of that chartreuse, under the influence of the romantic, picturesque, natural scenes and sounds of the island of Majorca. But though, in that theological novel, we may fancy we detect the echoes of the stormy winds, clamorous seas, and rushing torrents that echoed through sonorous galleries and broke upon the ear of its writer while fashioning her large and fluent pages, where shall we find the traces of Chopin's "inspiration"? If I remember rightly, she makes only one mention of music in the entire book. It is the passage in which Alexis describes how he first became aware of the meaning of music, when listening to a fisherman singing to the stars of the mystery of night and the softness of the breeze, in a melody as large, sad, and monotonous as the music of the sea, with a deep, powerful, melancholy voice.

But of all George Sand's writings on music, the most interesting, to those of us who are musicians, at least, are her references to Chopin's manner of composing and playing when at Majorca, where, inspired by the sea, the wind, the complaints of sea-birds borne away by the tempest, but inspired above all by his own genius, love, and grief, he wrote many of his exquisite "Préludes," whose vague or restless rhythms respond to the most despondent, capricious, or passionate of our dreams, while he was suffering from the depression of gloomy superstition or tragic spleen, or agitated by the exaltation of noble, tempestuous, tender, imaginative, emotion. I need not apologize to the music lover for the length of the following extracts, translated from her observations on this subject:—

"To the imagination of Chopin, even when he felt comparatively well, the cloisters seemed peopled with terrors and phantoms. He did not say so, but I saw it. On returning from my nocturnal explorations among the ruins with my children, I often found him, as late as ten o'clock at night, still studying at the piano-forte, pale, his eyes sunken, his hair disordered. He would scarcely recognize us for several minutes, and then, making an effort to smile at himself, would play to us the sublime works he had just been composing,—or rather, I should say, the terrible, or beautiful, or harrowing ideas that had taken possession of his mind in this hour of solitude. It was at such times that he composed those brief and beautiful pages so modestly entitled 'Préludes' by him. Some of these master-works present to us a vision of deceased monks and funeral chants; others, more soft and melancholy, suggested themselves to him in hours of sunshine and comparative health, amid the laughter of children under his windows, the distant sound of guitars, the singing of birds amid the dewy leaves and the small, pale roses that budded under the light snow; and some are filled with a gloomy sadness that pierces the heart while it charms the ear. There is one that he wrote on a lowering, rainy evening,—one that plunges the soul in frightful depression. My son Maurice and I had left him almost well, on one of those mornings when we were accustomed to visit Palma in order to purchase articles necessary for our housekeeping.

Heavy rains came on while we were away; the torrents overflowed. We had traveled three leagues in six hours, only to get back in the midst of an inundation; we arrived late at night, through many dangers, having been deserted by our driver and having lost our shoes. We hurried at once to our invalid, foreseeing his anxiety. It had been excessive, indeed, but it had frozen into a sort of tranquil despair, and we found him playing an admirable prelude, while tears ran down his cheeks. He rose with a loud cry on seeing us enter, and exclaimed in a strange tone, with an absent-minded manner, 'Ah, I was sure you were dead!' When he recovered himself and saw the condition in which we were, the retrospective idea of our danger again made him almost ill; he afterwards told me that he had seen our adventures as one in a somnambulistic trance might have done, and, unable to assist us, or, indeed, to distinguish the vision from the reality, he had lulled his anxiety by the effort of composition, until it had seemed to him that he was dead, as he fancied that we also were. He beheld himself as though drowned in a lake; heavy, icy drops of water fell rhythmically on his heart; and when I called his attention to the rain-drops that were then falling rhythmically on the roof, he, protesting against the puerility of audible imitation, and opposing what I termed imitative harmony, insisted that he had not been aware of the sound. He was right, for his genius overflowed with the mysterious harmony of nature, which he translated into musical thought by means of sublime equivalents, not by a servile repetition of outward sounds. His composition of that evening was really filled with the rain-drops that rang on the sonorous tiles of the chartreuse, but in its melody, as in his imagination, these took the form of tears, falling from heaven on his heart. . . . In regard to inward sentiment and emotion, I consider the musical genius of Chopin to have been the most sublime that ever existed. He has caused one instrument to speak the language of the infinite; in ten lines, easy enough for a child to play, he has often condensed poems of immense elevation, dramas of tremendous energy. And he understood his own weakness perfectly. This consisted in an uncontrollable excess of power. Therefore he could not, like Mozart, create a masterpiece of art in one uniform tint. His music is full of shadows and surprises; sometimes, though seldom, it is mysterious, eccentric, tormented. Though he had a perfect horror of formless obscurity in art, the exaltation of extreme emotion often carried him into regions unknown to any but himself. A friend and judge less able than I was to understand his character, or to become identified with every fibre of his intellect, one less familiar with his modes of feeling, thinking, and working, would have forced him to render himself more intelligible to the world in general. Yet, in early youth, as well as in some of his later compositions, he embodied a few cloudlessly happy ideas, crystal springs in which an undimmed sun is shining, while some of his unpublished romances and Polish songs are charming in their simplicity, and adorable in their sweetness. But how brief, how few, are these tranquil ecstasies of poetic contemplation! The song of the lark in heaven, the floating movement of the swan on stirless waters, are, with him, but momentary flashes of serene beauty. He was more deeply saddened, and for a longer time, by the plaintive cry of the hungry eagle on the rocks of Majorca, the bitter hiss of the north wind, and the gloomy desolation of the snow-covered yew-trees, than he was delighted by the perfume of the orange-blossoms, the capricious grace of the wild vines, or the original beauty of the Moorish melodies which he heard the field laborers singing at their work."

George Sand did not abandon music as a subject after her parting from, or after the death of, Chopin; then, as before her acquaintance with him, many beautiful passages on musical themes may be found in her novels or letters. For instance, in one of her later stories of country life, "Les Maîtres Sonneurs," full of pleasing descriptions of rural music, and of music's effect on uncultivated minds, an exquisite passage occurs, unrivaled in a certain thrilling supernatural charm, where Tiennet is described as trembling at the sound of the mysterious concert of bells and cornemuse in the forest at night; and how poetically Brulette relates her reverie while listening to Joset's playing! Madame Sand retained her love of music to the last; she has been described as a grandmother of sixty, playing—at her daughter's request, for the gratification of some visitor who had been admitted to the intimacy of family life at the Chateau of Nohant for the first time that evening—some of Chopin's nocturnes by heart, with a power and expression seldom met with among young amateurs, but scarcely ever in a lady of her age.

On examining those of her works in which she has written of music, with the hope of discovering how much of "the spirit of Chopin" is to be found in them, it is difficult to arrive at any other conclusion than the belief that, though Chopin, her musical friends, and music undoubtedly suggested many ideas to George Sand, as other persons and subjects probably also did, yet, as her genius was of spontaneous growth, a flame springing from an inward source, that of a nature extraordinarily gifted in itself, her works were of course almost entirely nourished and vivified by the same interior fire. That this power was very little dependent on outward influences is sufficiently proven by the fact that she preserved the grace and force of her faculties throughout a literary career of nearly fifty years to the end; her last works convince us of the truth of what Ch. de Mazade has said, that "she underwent no decline, but age only brought to her a pacification of her remarkable genius that was not unfavorable to its effect on her readers."

(To be continued.)

THE PATHETIC FALLACY.

MR. RUSKIN, in one of his books, uses the term "pathetic fallacy" to express in Art the mistake of transferring the habits of thought and feeling of our day to an anterior age. In one sense this mistake is universal, and almost inevitable. The religious painter of the time of Titian, or the Dutch painter of the time of Rembrandt, imagined for their sacred pieces that the people about them were sufficiently suitable for apostles and martyrs. So little was known, then, of the manners of the East, even of its costumes, that there were few critics to object to seeing Abraham as a Rotterdam burgomaster, or Saint John as a handsome Florentine. Oddly enough, almost the first Bible picture that had the real flavor of the East was painted by Horace Vernet, who, making, at the well, Rebecca support on her arm the jar of water, gave to the extended neck and the impatient lips of Jacob something of that thirst which only the East knows. Since then, however, Holman Hunt has studied on the spot the venerable heads of Judea and its landscape; and, in his "Shadow of the Cross," copies the ancientest tools he could find of the carpenter's trade. And Jerome and Alma Tadema instruct while they please us by a familiarity, half imaginative and half realistic, with ancient expression and costume. Their learning sits easily upon them, and by their help the world takes long strides towards the realization of the perished past.

In our history, our two hundred years cannot go back so far as they carry us; but how common is it for critics, not of New England, to repeat one cuckoo cry of criticism when the brave Puritans are mentioned. They indulge in the "pathetic fallacy" to shield themselves from an honest admiration which is their due. We hear forever of their burning of the witches (which they did not do) and of their persecution of the Quakers. These critics seem wholly to forget that the Puritan fathers did not come here either with a sentimental liberality toward those opinions which were repugnant to them, or with those modern ideas of liberty and the rights of man by which they are now condemned. If they had been people of that sort, they could have stayed at home and temporized with the powers that were. It was the very bitter energy of their belief which forced them from home ties into a solitude they hoped to make their own. And when they found that solitude invaded by sectarians, however honest, repugnant to their conscience and belief, they felt cruelly that their desert was a divided one, and that they must share with others its mastery.

We are judging them by the softer convictions of our time, if so strong a word suits the emasculated indifference which we call liberality.

And, as to the treatment of the witches, the blunder of the Puritans was an epidemic of the time, which ran the world over, and by chance only was it at Salem that the last flicker showed itself before expiring. The decision of Sir Matthew Hale is said to have cut short, as with a blow, what certainly good sense should never have protracted so long. But these epidemics of the human race are never guided by good sense. From the mad Neapolitan dance, surviving in the Tarantella, to the religious maniacs of the French mountains and at the tomb of the Abbé de Paris, good sense is the one thing absolutely not there. It is a pity, indeed, that good sense is not as catching as these follies and horrors. And have we not had in our own time the foolish crowd of Millerites, with whom reason abdicated as the childish whim ran like wild-fire? We have said that these cuckoo notes of criticism usually come from beyond New England. Its headquarters is at New York; and we do not like to believe that it is any envy of so noble an ancestry as the Puritan fathers that prompts it. It is true that the worthy burghers of Holland who founded New York were not liable to any such severity of judgment. We think that fanaticism was neither their strength nor their weakness, and still less should we like to believe that the partiality of that established English church which drove the Puritans to exile still prompted in its American representative any injustice of opinion towards a body of men whom all should revere. And if they must be disliked, let us hear no more of the misuse of that pathetic fallacy, which, incapable of sympathy with their lofty endurance, judges them by the judgment of our day, and incurs their iron souls by a weakness no longer capable of such a strain of heroism.

T. G. A.

HENRY JAMES'S NEW BOOK.¹

MR. EDITOR, — You have been reading, I see, Henry James's last book ("Society the Redeemed Form of Man"), as I have; and I doubt not with great interest. To me it seems a remarkable work for its elevated thought and its earnest and profound convictions, and is the most satisfactory statement the author has given to the public of his readings of Swedenborg passed through the alembic of his mind. At any rate, it is his spiciest work. Being in the form of letters to a friend, he allows himself a freer swing; and while he is very earnest in endeavoring to state his ideas clearly and concisely, and to this end states and restates and recapitulates, he is always fresh and without monotony. True, he often writes from deep feeling, which manifests itself in unlooked-for sarcasms and homely phrases and epithets. But these flashes show at what a white heat and with what a depth and intensity of conviction his thoughts run.

To me his book has been very stimulating and suggestive in the region of those profound truths he discusses, and I think must be so to all who are seeking for solid ground for their faith in the unseen. And this, however we may differ from him in many of his affirmations.

But I did not set out to write a review of this book (for it would be hardly in the line of your journal), but intended to ask if it did not strike you as having a resemblance in its style (including matter and manner) to certain forms in music. To be sure, there is nothing exactly poetical or designedly artistic in the form or spirit of it. Yet one can't help admiring his sonorously rhetorical style, and might not be over-fanciful in calling the book a grand symphonic poem with endless modern and original variations, sometimes with most unexpected harmonies, upon the severely simple and archaic themes of Swedenborg. Or, better still, call it a long, full fugue, like one of Bach's, teeming with those never-ending, still-beginning thoughts, — the same thought never repeated in exactly the same phrase, but always fresh in its repetition; running into majors and minors, now dropping an idea and now taking it up, now mingling in others; and then all spinning their course along in one braided and interwoven yarn, I might say, if it were one of his gifted son's stories; call it rather theologic strand of many harmonious colors and gradations of light and dark.

Somehow I am reminded of old Bach's fullness and earnestness when Mr. James tells us that he began with intending to write ten letters, or about 100 pages, but finds he can't possibly finish under twenty-eight letters, of 480 pages.

I don't know how it is with professed musicians, but I know we outsiders often think Bach is about making an end on't, when he has n't the least idea of so doing. Not that I, for one, want him to end, for I revel in him; but the hunt does sometimes seem to be about up, when lo and behold, the fox is hardly in sight, and the view-halloo just beginning. •Such are the mistakes of outsiders. How is it possible for them to predict just where and when the riders come in at the death, and whether there may not be, after all, a da capo for the whole performance?

¹ Society the Redeemed Form of Man, etc. Affirmed in Letters to a Friend. By HENRY JAMES. Boston: Houghton, Osgood & Co. 1879.

I have a great admiration for those men who are so full of their subject that they don't know when to stop. Only, let it be seen that they are so full (and of something worth telling) that they must overflow and keep running. What a perennially fresh-running brook is Bach, down to his very ultimates, as Swedenborg might say, that is, to his very name! But Heaven preserve us from men or women who think they have a mission to talk, or preach, or make poetry or music, ad infinitum, when all but they themselves know them to be unmitigated bores! C. P. C.

CAMBRIDGE, MASS.

TALKS ON ART. — SECOND SERIES.¹

FROM INSTRUCTIONS OF MR. WILLIAM M. HUNT TO HIS PUPILS.

I.

ALL that makes anything live is expression. Look through form for expression. The essence of form is a great deal finer than form. Look at some of the French figure-painters of to-day! Bouguereau, for instance. We find knowledge of form and skill in representing it; but in order to work like that you've got to flatten out every impressionable form in your constitution.

You work to express what you feel; and some one who never feels anything says, "When that is done it will be beautiful!" "When it is as bad as my things," they ought to say.

The thing, and the appearance of the thing, are two different affairs. If you are looking with the eye you are taking down facts; and a million of them won't make a conundrum. Your eyes are windows through which you receive impressions, keeping yourself as passive as warm wax, instead of being active. The talk of your friends makes you savagely active to get hold of things and to do them. You have more than you need of that. If I am looking I don't see! You must be lazy, and say, "Let me see a thing, and I'll paint it." Pretty soon you'll see something that will be reflected on your perception. That is a jewel!

For this reason I want you to make memory-sketches. They are the only essence; the only things you really feel. They won't say much to you. No matter. You work for the pleasure of doing. People say, "Don't you get attached to your sketches?" Attached! I should think not, after they're done. You might as well be attached to the dinner that you've eaten.

It was meant that everybody should express some plan in creation. A mosquito means something; an idiot means something. But if the mosquito tries to be a gnat, or the idiot a Daniel Webster, they have a hard time.

People are too much given to swapping themselves off for something better than themselves. The minute you give the reins to your ambition to excel, to get the start of Jimmy, to go to the head of the class, you fall into those mean motives which are the aim of our Christian community, whose prayer is, "O Lord, let me go to the head of the class, and let all the other boys go down!" We're always trying to get ahead of somebody else.

Here you all are together. You ought to help one another, ought to be delighted when another excels, for you can learn something of that one. We go to church on Sunday and talk about doing to others as we would be done by, and on Monday we do nothing of the kind. I don't believe that the men who joined Moody and Sankey's church are any more honest than they were the day before they joined. They don't confess that they've been in the habit of doing mean things. They say, "Have you joined Moody and Sankey's church? If you had you'd be a great deal better man than you are." If they would say less and do more! If they'd come down town and say, "Let's put our religion on our counters! Let's use no poor cotton instead of good!" They don't learn something in order to use it. Whatever you put into your pocket and don't use is worse than useless. The pirate who runs up a black flag is honest in comparison with pretenders. Don't misunderstand me! I exaggerate, and I intend to. In painting you have to exaggerate.

¹ Copyright, 1879, by Helen M. Knowlton.

It has been said that "genius consists in the power of taking a hint." Genius is nothing but love. If you love to paint, if you love to sing, if you love to black boots, you are a genius. The reverse is hatred.

Genius is like a seed in the florist's drawer. It longs to get out. It says, "For God's sake let me get out; let me be planted! Let me go somewhere! Let me grow! Let me decay, even!" If we would only let ourselves swing along, and not take so much trouble! I say that; and yet nobody takes more trouble and gets more discouraged.

You can't grow if you look at a thing so high that it makes your stomach go down, — injures your diaphragm. You hear Essipoff, and go home to try to play Chopin as she does. It makes you sick to remember her runs as you try your own. You forget the tremendous training she has had.

People like Essipoff are not spoiled by some fond parent who thinks her child the wonder of the world. No, such an artist was early taught to try, try a little more each day, always with an ideal a little ahead, and by and by she opens the window and sees the whole world. The sickening part of it all is when she must meet the world. "I don't think she is this; and I don't think she's that!" Nothing of what she is. Let her make a mistake in a Chopin nocturne, and the critics howl with delight.

The world can't see good things. The oak does n't have to yield to the beech, nor does it say, "I am greater than the beech!" It's all narrowness. It's the way we are taught. A parent would give a half-a-dozen pair of gloves if her young one could paint better than anybody else. A greater love would be to have you pass for what you are.

Children don't learn from love of what they are learning. They love to beat some one.

To return to Form. You must know form to get expression. People think that the representation of form is reached by correct drawing. Look at Rembrandt's figures; some of them five heads high! The fact is, we are all too smart. We try too much. I do; and I know the world is about alike.

Oh, it's no joke — painting! But it's awfully amusing. You'd rather cry over painting than laugh over anything else, except perhaps music. An art is no joke. Just think! You may put your hand down on paper, and you may do something that will be as lasting as the Parthenon. Art is all that remains. The fellows who are only filling their pockets with dollars, what are they going to leave?

CRITICS generally find fault with the artist or the composer. The fact that audiences also deserve blame seems not to enter into their minds. The public often forces artists to yield to their corrupt taste, and there are few who can effectually resist this pressure. Many yield. Some do so reluctantly, others give way readily. In such a struggle it is the solemn duty of the press to stand by the man who aims at pure taste. — Beinard's Musical World.

Dwight's Journal of Music.

SATURDAY, MARCH 15, 1879.

CONCERTS.

SINCE March came in, the public musical performances in Boston have been comparatively few; but to complete our record we have to go back and pick up half a dozen concerts which occurred in the last ten days of February. We begin with the vocal clubs: —

The concert of the APOLLO CLUB (February 19, and again with the same programme February 24) was one of the most interesting it has ever given. The singing was in all respects most admirable, — an improvement even on the best efforts of the past. The pure, sweet, manly quality of voices; the sonorous, perfectly musical ensemble; the prompt and sure attack; the precision; the fine phrasing, delicate light and shade, distinct enunciation; and the pervading fire and spirit, seemed to leave nothing to be desired in respect to execution and interpretation. The selections, too, though mainly part-songs, were uncommonly interesting. The least so, perhaps, was the opening piece, of more pretension than the rest, the "Hymn to Music," by Lachner, although that is musicianly and has its beauties. The most important was Schubert's wonderful setting of Goethe's emblematical poem, "Song of the Spirits over the Waters," with the low, mysterious murmur of its rich accompaniment of two violas, two violoncellos, and bass (Messrs. C. and J. Eichler, Wulf Fries, Carl Behr, and Aug. Stein). Only a composer of Schubert's imaginative genius could keep up the interest of so long a work, all in so low a tone of color. The poetic images are musically reproduced with an exquisite truth to nature: the brooding silence over the still water, the rush and roar of the torrent, the creeping over level meadows, the planets "gazing at their fair faces in the glassy sea," — ever a new phase of enchantment! Rheinberger's playfully romantic ballad, "Säntlein von Isenberg," was singularly original and charming. The "Drinking Song" by Lux and Hatton's very sweet and tranquil "Evening's Twilight" were as welcome as ever, and justly so.

The monotony of strict male part-song was agreeably relieved by a masterly English prize glee, by Evans (1811), for five voices, "Beauties, have you seen a toy called Love?" by the duet "Non fuggir," from William Tell, finely sung by Mr. Wilkie and Dr. Bullard, the former showing great improvement both in the sweetness and purity of his high tenor voice and in graceful ease of execution; and finally by closing the concert with Bishop's good old glee of "Meinbeer van Dunck," which it was a pleasure to hear revived by so fine a chorus. But for a still greater element of variety three of the movements (Allegro, Andante with variations, and Scherzo) from Hummel's master-work, the Septet, were interspersed between the vocal numbers, and very artistically played by Messrs. Sumner, pianist, Carl Eichler, viola, Wulf Fries, cello, A. Stein, bass, Wm. Rietzel, flute, C. Faulwasser, oboe, and Edw. Schumann, horn. The hall was too large for the full intensity of effect from these few instruments, yet the performance gave great pleasure, and the Scherzo had to be repeated. Mr. Lang has certainly the choicest of materials for a male chorus under his control, and he has trained them to a rare perfection of ensemble. There is no need of saying that the Music Hall was crowded.

BOYLSTON CLUB. — Right upon the heels of the Apollo (the next evening, Tuesday, February 25), came the second concert of this younger and very vigorous, enthusiastic club, with the advantage of having united with itself a choir of female voices. Its conductor, Mr. George L. Osgood, full of zeal and fondness for high tasks in music, familiar with what is best in music, old and new, and continually growing in his mastery of all the resources of his art, has wonderfully succeeded in inspiring his large body of singers with his own tastes and ideals. They take up an elaborate old work, which at first seems strange, repulsive, and impracticable to them, but he makes them learn it till they sing it con amore. Such was the case that evening with the opening pièce de resistance of the programme, the singularly beautiful, expressive, and uplifting, as well as wonderfully learned and ingenious, Motet in B-flat, by Bach, "Sing to the Lord a new-made song." It is for double chorus (eight real parts), and seems to exhaust all the resources of counterpoint, yet all is naturally flowing and melodious; each part follows its own melody, as if it had nothing else to think of, and yet all combines in one expressive whole. Often the two choruses are strongly contrasted: while one sings on in running figurative phrases, the other exclaims, "Sing ye," etc.; then they alternate; then all the eight parts become involved in most melodious complication, yet each part so marked that you lose nothing of it; there is a continual crescendo of mutually exciting ardor and activity, till the commingling phrases seem like a busy swarm of bees, all growing to a climax in a splendid, glorious song of praise. This is Allegro moderato. Then comes a second movement, Andante sostenuto. Here we meet our most familiar chorale (essentially that), "Old Hundred," given out by single lines by one chorus, with Bach's inimitable harmony, the other chorus filling the intervals between the lines with a more contrapuntal four-part subject of its own. This is a form to which Bach is partial (witness the Passion Music), one chorus representing, as it were, the prayer of humanity, the other the consoling church, with the serene and peaceful harmony of the chorale. Omitting a few pages, the performance passed on to the rapid and exciting Hallelujah fugue, with which the Motet ends, and in which the two choruses are consolidated into one. The work was remarkably well sung, considering its great difficulty, and the utterly unusual character of the music for nearly all the singers. It was all clear, well sustained, and rendered with fair light and shade and good general expression. It would be a wonder indeed if such a work pleased all the critics, some of whom were doubtless strangely out of their proper element in it; or if it took hold of half the audience with a tithe of the power it might do, upon frequent repetition; or even if the careful and industrious rehearsal of it had quite converted all the singers to a realizing sense of its intrinsic power and beauty. There are innate differences in the musical natures of people, in their depth and sensitiveness, in their capacity of sympathizing with what is deepest, best, and holiest in art. Perhaps the popular sort of admiration which clings to Trovatores, Carmens, and the like, might, if it only could get hold of one of these great works of Bach, prove fatal to its freshness, dim its celestial purity, and drag it down into the category of things commonplace and hackneyed. Such things demand real, interior, sincere appreciation, and not the furor and clapping of hands of each new nine-days' wonder. We are tempted here to apply to Bach's music what the philosophic Henry James, in his last book ("Society the Redeemed Form of Man"), says of the unattractive style to common readers of the writings of Swedenborg: "They would seem to have been mercifully constructed on the plan of barring out idle acquaintance, and disgusting a voluptuous literary curiosity; "but to deep religious natures, "to the aching heart, they will be sure to bring," he thinks, "infinite balm and contentment." To enter truly into the spirit, into the divine rest and beauty, of Bach's music, one must have known some deep experience. It would be well to repeat the Motet once or twice; then more people would begin to appreciate it. But if Bach's music bars out idle acquaintance, and disgusts voluptuous, pampered, artificial taste and curiosity, it often wins the simple listener. Many such, without understanding, love it; so that it may be said, "Except ye become as little children, ye cannot enter [this] kingdom of heaven." How many musical amateurs, professors, critics, curiosity hunters, are simple enough to respond to the child-like spirit that pervades and sanctifies the learned harmony of Bach, of which they see only the outward form?

The Motet was followed by a Choral Hymn, by Brahms, for mixed chorus, with organ accompaniment. This seemed to us the clearest, least sophisticated, least overwrought, and most expressive composition we have yet heard from Brahms. It is noble and uplifting music, growing to a climax which we may almost call sublime; and it was sung superbly.

In the second part we had "King Eric," a sweet and graceful setting by Reinberger of Reinick's sentimental and romantic ballad, beautifully sung; "The Little Bird," from the Swedish, for tenor solo, tenderly and sweetly sung by Mr. Osgood, with exquisite accompaniment of female chorus; Mr. Osgood's beautiful male part-song, "Thou'rt like unto a flower;" "Sunset," by Gade; "O world, thou art so wondrous fair" (male chorus), by Storch; the "Presage of Spring," by Holländer, in which the fresh, pure female voices were quite in harmony with the "balmy air" and "violets" of which they sang; a lovely "Slumber Song," by Kücken; Schubert's beautiful "Forest Hymn" (Nachtgesang im Walde), full of fine effects of echo, sounds approaching and receding, which suffered from the impossibility of procuring the four horns so essential as accompaniment; and, finally, the hearty, delightful old Italian madrigal, composed by Constantius Festa, in 1541, for mixed chorus. All the singing showed most thorough and judicious training. The piano-forte accompaniments were effectively and tastefully played by Mr. Peter-silea. The third concert will be on Wednesday evening, April 16.

MME. CAPPANI's second annual benefit concert was remarkably good for a concert mostly of singing pupils. The chief fault was its too great length. But the programme was far from monotonous. This accomplished prima donna of Italian and German opera has been doing a good work in our city as a teacher; her pupils of both sexes are numerous, and quite a number of them bore striking testimony on this occasion to the excellence of her instruction. Some of them were a little nervous, to be sure, and won all the more sympathy for that, but for the most part they had pleasing voices, well developed, gave their tones out in frank, honest style, and sang with good taste and expression. The teacher sang an Ave Maria of her own composition; a recitative and aria, with unseen female chorus, from L'Africaine, and in Costa's Quartet (canon), "Ecco quel fiero istante," — all in excellent voice, and in the large and noble style of an artist. Of the young lady pupils, Miss Annie Wentz appeared the most advanced, and sang a recitative and aria from Spohr's Jessonda in tones of great beauty and with good dramatic style and fervor. Miss Ida Kleber showed rare facility and sunny brilliancy in a florid "Waltz per Sempre," composed for Mme. di Murska, and had to repeat it. Mendelssohn's "Zuleika," by Miss Alice Potter, and Thomas's "Mignon" air, by Mrs. T. Buxton, were sung with feeling and expression. The Trio of maskers from Don Giovanni was fairly sung by Miss Sybilla Bailey, Dr. Albion Dudley, and Mme. Cappiani. Mr. Martial Wood gave a refined rendering of Adam's Noël and Gounod's "Salve dimora;" and Mr. Theodore Castellhuhn made a favorable impression with Schubert's "Wanderer."

The aid from without was furnished partly by Mr. M. W. Whitney, who has found a fine addition to his concert repertoire in an Aria from Righini's "Selva incantata," which he sang in his best style to general admiration, and who also gave "A mariner's home's the sea" by Randegger; partly by Mr. and Mrs. Sherwood, who gave a superb rendering (Mrs. S. taking the orchestral accompaniments on a second piano) of Schubert's "Wanderer" Fantasia, Op. 15, Mr. S. having already played the Concert Toccata by Dupont; besides an Offertoire upon the organ by Mr. J. Frank Donahoe, and a successful rendering of Ernst's Otello Fantaisie for violin by Mr. Van Raalte.

MR. JOHN A. PRESTON, one of the most talented of our young pianists who have come forward under the tuition of Mr. Lang, gave a concert at Mechanics' Hall on Wednesday evening, February 26, which was alike remarkable for the ambitious tasks which he essayed and for the success with which he acquitted himself in them. Here is his programme:—

Prelude and Fugue (Op. 35), Mendelssohn; Aria, "Dove Sono" (Figaro), Mozart; Sonata in F minor (Op. 14), Schumann (Allegro—Scherzo—Quasi Variazioni—Prestissimo possibile). Four Preludes (from Op. 28): A major, F major, A-flat major, G-sharp minor, Chopin. Songs: "Marie at the Lattice," Franz; "Der Lindenbaum," Schubert. Fantaisie in F minor (Op. 49), Chopin.

It was Mr. Preston's second public appearance only before a Boston audience as solo pianist; his first was in a Symphony Concert last year, when he made his mark in a Concerto by Saint-Saëns. Schumann's F minor Sonata (first published under the title of "Concerto without Orchestra"), was a bold undertaking for the most accomplished virtuoso; Von Bülow is the only one who has ever played it here in public, and it is said that even he did it not without some misgiving. Its various movements combine all the peculiarities and all the difficulties of Schumann's young, original, audacious style. It is full of his breath-catching, nervous syncopations, his bold modulations, his intricate and finger-twisting figures and phrases, as it is full of fire and passion, original conceptions and ideal strivings. We can hardly imagine anything more difficult to bring out evenly and clearly than the first and last movements, the last at a rate of speed indicated by prestissimo possibile! The Scherzo is an exciting, fascinating movement, with a grand broad sweep carrying all before it. The dirge-like theme of the third movement was the invention of Clara Wieck, who became Schumann's wife, and some of the Variations are very striking. The young interpreter proved himself equal to all the technical exactions of his task, and accomplished every difficulty not only with a firm, sure mastery, but with an ease that left him free to think and feel the music, and throw a great deal of his own native fire into it. His look and manner are those of a very serious artist; he takes all in earnest, and never trifles with his work.

After this exceptional and trying composition, none of the easiest to appreciate without several hearings, it was a new sort of pleasure and a relief to hear his graceful, refined and poetic renderings of the four Chopin Preludes; and it was a happy thought in him, an instinct of artistic symmetry, which led him to repeat the short and perfect little one in A major at the end of the four, making that the key-note, as it were, of the whole group. The Chopin Fantaisie was another arduous undertaking, which he mastered with all ease. The singing by Miss Annie Louise Gage made a most pleasing feature of the concert; her voice and style are full of sensibility, and she did justice to the Mozart and the charming songs.

SIXTH SYMPHONY CONCERT. — A large audience listened, at Boston Music Hall, on Thursday afternoon, February 27, to a very satisfactory rendering of an interesting programme, which included: Part I. Overture to "The Return from Abroad," Mendelssohn; Romance (largo) and Rondo vivace from the Concerto in E minor, Chopin; Incantation of the Witch of the Alps, and Entr'acte, from music by Byron's "Manfred," Schumann. Part II. Piano solos: a. Prelude and Fugue, Haberbier-Guilmant; b. Tarantella from "Venezia e Napoli," Liszt; Symphony No. 2, in D, Op. 73 (second time), Brahms.

The pianist was Mme. Julia Rivé-King, who has wonderfully improved in power, finish, and expression since she first appeared in Boston, in the twelfth season of these concerts. Her technique is consummate. The Chopin Romance was given with the utmost delicacy and refinement of phrasing and of light and shade; and all the piquancy and brilliancy of the Rondo finale were exhibited in a manner that showed a plenty of reserved power. She understands remarkably well how to bring out the full tone of the instrument, and in an easy way. Her touch is exquisite, and there is no affectation about it at all. Yet we should not say that fine poetic feeling was her strong point. The Prelude by Haberbier, and the Fugue by Guilmant, originally written for the organ, were transcribed by herself, and with true conception of their meaning and effect. The Prelude, a melody with airy arpeggio accompaniment, had a rich and full sonority; the Fugue is a clear and strong one, and was made very effective in the rendering, although we should think the lady less domesticated in fugue music than in other freer forms. The Tarantella by Liszt was admirably done. The impression which she made throughout was very positive, and held the general attention closely to the end of each interpretation.

The orchestra won new recognition by the precision and the delicacy and the fine spirit with which they played Mendelssohn's youthful overture, which seemed to us more fresh and buoyant, as well as having more artistic substance, than it ever did before, when we have heard it only outlined as it were by less complete orchestras. So, too, the daintily imaginative morceaux from the "Manfred" music were delightfully presented.

We do not find ourselves at all alone in saying that the second Symphony of Brahms does not improve upon acquaintance. Indeed, to our feeling, it is a less successful effort than his first one, in C minor. And we even make bold to suggest, at the risk of shocking some of the admirers, that we can conceive of a Sterndale Bennett writing a much better symphony than this of Brahms in D. In spite of a certain pastoral softness and repose with which it opens, and the sweet infusion of horn tones continually, you soon feel a cloying fullness in the Allegro non troppo. There is a certain feebleness, a sugar-and-water character, in the subject matter of the themes; and when it comes to the working up after the repeat, it is done with an unstinted use of contrapuntal means, such as the real matter of the movement does not seem to call for. And near the end of the movement there are some obscure, unsatisfactory periods which suggest the fancy whether all this super-refined contrapuntal distillment has produced anything better than a bad quality of spirit, which shows its effects upon the brain in the uncomfortable, distracting headache (Wellschmerz. — Katzenjammer, — what you will) of the Adagio which follows. For verily that Adagio, after several hearings in concert and rehearsal, still refuses to reveal its meaning, and leaves us with the sense of having listened to something ugly and ungenial, which we would fain avoid hereafter. Yet there is no denying the earnestness of all, so far, which makes us half ashamed of speaking so lightly of it as we have done.

In the third movement (Allegretto grazioso) our tone-poet seems to have slept off the beclouding influence, and to go forth with buoyant step and feeling into the wholesome air and light of nature; for its principal theme is cheerful and graceful, indeed fascinating; but even this, taking the whole piece together, is fragmentary and disjointed; the rhythm and the tempo and the thoughts themselves are continually changing without warning and apparently without reason; there is nothing like development or continuity. Thus the first graceful Allegretto subject, in 3-4 measure, suddenly changes to Prosto, in 2-4; then, as suddenly, you have a reminder of the "Orgy" motive in the Huguenots for a few bars; then a few bars pianissimo for the violins, which recall the rain-drops in the storm scene of the Pastoral Symphony, and so on. It is all pretty, but it hardly seems to hold together, — the giddy fancies of a wayward humor. The Finale (Allegro con spirito) is all rush and brilliancy, and its strong impulse is so well sustained to the end that we think it on the whole the best part of the symphony. In spite of its earnestness, of the contrapuntal skill and learning displayed in it, of the remarkable instrumentation, and the many single passages of power and beauty (including one or two reminders of Beethoven), we feel, as most have felt, the lack of genuine creative inspiration in this large and labored work. All agree that Mr. Zerrahn had brought his orchestra up to a high mark of excellence in the execution.

The concert of this week is entirely orchestral. Of the eighth and last (March 27) the programme will be found among our advertisements.

MUSICAL CORRESPONDENCE.

PARIS, FEB. 21, 1879. — The musical season is at its height. Concerts, operas, chamber recitals, and benefit soirées are being given so rapidly that I find it impossible to report even one third of them, although, entre nous, a glance at some of their programmes is sufficient and one prudently stays away. A mutual admiration society for the audition of the works of the members is in operation now, and though it may be interesting to the friends of the composers, a stranger will hardly find it the same. A notable exception to this class of things was the second concert given at the Salle Erard by Mr. Frederick Boscovitz, previous to his departure for the United States. The programme was excellent, Mr. Boscovitz playing first a sonata by Nichelmann, whose name is unfortunately disappearing from our concert programmes. A descriptive tone-piece in three movements followed next, entitled "Contes de Forêt Noire;" it brought Mr. Boscovitz before us as a composer with a strongly marked individuality; leaning decidedly toward the romantic, although he showed in a bright menuet, reminding one of Mozart, that he is not a bigot in any school. A Field Nocturne, an air from Handel, and a Chopin Valse, proved his varied talents. As a Chopin player he certainly ranks high; that divine coquetry which is the life and soul of the valse by that composer was visible in Mr. Boscovitz's interpretation. The recital closed with the Tannhäuser Marche, rendered in his usual vigorous style.

Another exceptional concert was given by Miss Anna Bock of New York, who is a pupil of Lebert of Stuttgart. Miss Bock, though young, is on the high road to fame, and is developing rapidly into an artist of the first order. She is distinguished not alone by her virtuosity (which is remarkable), but by her poetic touch and deep feeling, as exemplified in her rendering of several Beethoven, Schumann, and Chopin numbers; and what music is a better test for those qualities? Liszt has said some very flattering things about Miss Bock's playing, and I don't think his Lordship has erred.

We have been regaled the past three weeks by Berlioz's "Romeo and Juliet" at the Concert du Chatelet. A fair chorus and good soloists have made the performances a success. If Germany has her Wagner, France proudly points to the great Hector; although some one wittily says: "The music of the future is the natural daughter of Berlioz," to which remark I take no exceptions. The Pasdeloup concert on Sunday last was capital. Beginning with the sublime C-minor symphony of Beethoven, it ran down the gamut with the names of Mendelssohn, Berlioz, Paganini, Glinka, Saint-Saëns, and Rossini, — a musical ragout, without doubt. The symphony was played well. The "Marche Hongroise" by Berlioz, with its strong national coloring, could not be found fault with. Paganini's "Mouvement Perpetuel," arranged for all the first violins, was a piece of virtuosity; they played as one man. An aria from Saint-Saëns's new opera, "Etienne Marcel," was a failure. It was sweet, pretty, feeble, etc.; and that leads me to remark that Saint-Saëns is too prolific a composer to do anything great. The quantity of notes he turns out every year must be immense; but I am afraid these influences are hardening me into a musical-Philistine, and I will stop. J. H.

NEW YORK, MARCH 8. — The fifth concert of the Symphony Society took place at Steinway Hall, on Saturday evening, March 1st. The list began with Cherubini's stately Anacreon overture, which was very finely performed. This was followed by a concerto, Op. 32, for piano-forte and orchestra, by Xavier Scharwenka, a brilliant and effective work, although not strikingly original. Mr. Bernhard Bockelmann, who undertook to play the concerto, enjoys the reputation of an excellent musician and a successful teacher of piano-forte music; but he has few qualifications for a concert-player, his performance being labored and monotonous.

Next came Grieg's mournful and rather dull cantata, "At the Cloister Gate," with Miss Henne (soprano), and Miss Winant (alto), as soloists, and chorus by singers from the Oratorio Society. The singers, chorus, and orchestra did full justice to the music, and it was probably their excellent work which gained the honor of an encore, to which Dr. Damrosch promptly but not wisely responded by repeating the entire piece.

The "Symphonie Fantastique," by H. Berlioz, which brought the concert to a close, was heard, complete, for the first time in New York, although parts of it have been played here before. It may be called a study of instrumentation, and as such it is a work of unusual interest. No one knew better than Berlioz the requirements and the capabilities of each instrument of the orchestra, and, given certain effects, no one could produce them more skillfully than he. Every one who hears the "Symphonie Fantastique" must acknowledge this to be true. Add to the knowledge and talent of Berlioz melodic invention, which he lacked, and the result is a great composer (which we now have in Joachim Raff).

In the "Symphonie Fantastique," as in the "Harold Symphony," there is a "fixed idea," but it is a melody, not an instrument, as in the work last named. This melody (being almost the only one which the symphony contains) represents the "beloved one" as she appears to the artist in a delirious dream, the result of an overdose of — opium, says the programme, whiskey, it is to be suspected, — and runs through the five movements, changing in character somewhat with each. In the "Ball-room" it is adapted to the measures of the dance and one thinks of "Maud" set to music. The third movement is a pastoral, beginning with the "Ranz des Vaches," and ending with some terribly realistic thunder.

The fourth movement is a triumph of the art of scoring. The march to execution, the steady tramp, tramp of the guards, the tolling of bells, the reappearance of the melody at the fatal moment when it is cut short by the headman's stroke (another terribly realistic piece of business), all is magnificently worked up.

In the fifth movement the composer has cast all convention to the winds. Thanks to the kind offices of Monsieur de Paris, the artist in his dream has reached the place not to be mentioned to ears polite. He is greeted with demonic yells by all the fiends therein assembled. Suddenly the beloved one appears limping and jumping! — a melody on crutches! It is the same, but oh, how changed! From a noble, dignified, and altogether well-conducted melody it is now degraded to a trivial and inexpressibly vulgar jig.

"Shrine of the mighty! can it be
That this is all remains of thee."

Grand finale. Burlesque of the "Dies Ira" by demons in chorus. Jim-jams!

If any one is in the least shocked by the foregoing paragraph, let him be assured that it is no worse than the programme. In fact I think I have toned it down considerably.

I feel bound to say that the performance of the symphony, which is as difficult as it is grotesque, was highly creditable to Dr. Damrosch and his orchestra. The men are thoroughly in sympathy with their conductor, and his interpretation of the music was both vigorous and clear.

At the fifth concert of the New York Philharmonic Society (March 8th), Mozart's "Jupiter" Symphony, Fuchs's Serenade in D, for string orchestra, and Liszt's "Tasso" were performed. Mr. Richard Hoffman played Brüll's Concerto, Op. 10, for piano and orchestra (the same which he recently performed at one of Mr. Carlberg's symphony concerts, at Chickering Hall).

Mr. Carlberg has in rehearsal a Nocturne for orchestra (new) by C. F. Daniels, one of our rising composers. It will be played at the next symphony concert, March 22. A. A. C.

CHICAGO, MARCH 5. — The Chicago Orchestra, under the direction of Mr. A. Rosenbecker, gave its second concert on the evening of February 21, offering the following programme: —

Overture, "Midsummer Night's Dream." Mendelssohn.
Concerto, Op. 16, with orchestra Henselt.
Mr. Emil Liebling.
Aria, From opera "Sosarme" Handel.
Mr. George Werrenrath.
Symphony, Op. 11 Norbert Burgmüller.
Allegro Moderato; Andante; Scherzo.
"The Two Grenadiers" Schumann.
Mr. George Werrenrath.
Serenade Volkmann.
String Orchestra.
Cello Solo by Mr. Eichheim.
Rhapsodie, Hongroise, No. 3 Liszt.
Orchestra.

We were prevented from attending the evening performance, but listened to the "public rehearsal" in the morning, and heard the programme simply played through without interruption. In our "symphony concerts," we are unfortunately laboring under many disadvantages, and there are drawbacks that seem to prevent, at least for the present, an adequate performance of large orchestral works. The first great difficulty is that our orchestra is not careful enough in the matter of tuning, and there is often a sad disregard of a positive pitch on the part of the instrumentalists who compose the band. For this surely the conductor is responsible. Another drawback to a good performance is too few rehearsals. It is hardly supposable that a number of men can come together and, after from two to three short rehearsals, interpret difficult classical works with even a moderate degree of finish. For this the public is in part to blame. They do not give the management sufficient financial support to enable them to hire the musicians for a greater number of rehearsals. To expect the members of the band, who are forced to resort to all kinds of measures to obtain a simple livelihood, to give their time (which to them means money, at least in a limited degree), without payment, to rehearsals of music for the public's pleasure is to ask the weak and struggling to support the rich and powerful. There must be a better realization of the duty of the public in this regard before our orchestra can even have the opportunity for improvement.

In interpretation, tone-coloring, the phrasing of the small figures of a composition, the proper control of the instruments in a long crescendo that a climax of pure tone may be reached, instead of an intricate noise, in the subjection of the accompanying parts to the theme, our orchestra has much to learn. Before these, however, tune and a correct reading seem primarily necessary. Yet our material in individual ability is good, and we are not without the hope of a development to better things. Let the musician learn that the cultivation of the public's musical taste by the means of truly good performance will bring him a fuller return in a more adequate support.

Mr. Emil Liebling played two movements of the Henselt Concerto with much power and brilliancy. The composition, however, seems hardly worthy of the practice it takes to master its difficulties. It seems to us that the study of a Beethoven, a Chopin, or the Schumann Concerto would be more compensating, and would give greater pleasure to a really musical listener. Our young pianists have yet to learn that true music is above the common plane of mere display. To manifest dexterity of fingering, or to master all the difficulties of technique in octave playing, scales, broken and extended chords, until all the possible feats of mechanical agility are accomplished, will not in itself make a player. These are but the externals. When the master-spirit shall touch the keys, a sweet melody will sing to us in beautiful tones, our natures will be awakened to the realization of a pure and gentle influence, and we shall be hushed to silence and made willing captives to the wonderful power of real music. There is much need of a singing (legato) style with many of our new school of pianists.

We have in mind, as we write, the delicate and most artistic playing of Mr. Otto Dreesel, as an example of this. The words of Bach, from his autobiography, come like holy counsels from the past, and should be regarded as "golden words" by our young pianists. We transcribe them: "I have taken the trouble," he says, "to compose singing music for the piano-forte, for I think such music ought to touch the heart. The piano player who merely thrums and drums, with no regard to feeling, cannot succeed in this, according to my ideas." And the cultivated musical mind of to-day thinks, "Amen."

Within the last week Mr. George Werrenrath has given four Song Recitals, singing songs by Beethoven, Schubert, Schumann, Gounod, Robert Franz, Liszt, Jensen, Rubinstein, Brahms, Wagner, etc., Mr. Carl Wolfsohn acting as pianist and accompanist.

Monday evening, the Hersey Hall Monthly Concert, under the direction of Mr. H. Clarence Eddy, took place. The programme was excellent. Miss Minnie Sherwood, Mr. Liebling, and Mr. Gill assisted.

Mr. Eddy gave his eighty-fourth organ recital on Saturday last. He has played ninety-seven selections from Bach alone at these concerts, and greatly aided in making more general the appreciation of this master. C. H. B.

MILWAUKEE, WIS., FEB. 22. — We have heard Remenyi. I shall not attempt to give a comprehensive or detailed estimate of him, nor a comparison of him with Wilhelm, but only to record the impressions of one evening's performance. And I will say first of all, that before he was through with his first piece, Ernst's "Othello Fantaisie," I found myself wondering why none of his critics had mentioned the humorous element in his character, behavior, and performance. Remenyi is not ridiculous; on the contrary he is self-possessed, dignified, and plays with perfect poise and as great a mastery of himself as of his instrument; but his first appearance provoked a smile on every face, which broadened and broadened continually with every phrase until it grew into a mild ripple of delighted laughter. This mirth, which may seem somewhat disrespectful in the writing, had in it no element of contempt. We did not laugh at Remenyi, but with him; for it was impossible not to feel that, however serious, pathetic, or sentimental the composition he might be playing, it was invariably colored by the fun-loving, comical side of a strongly-marked individuality. Besides the "Othello Fantaisie," he played some of his own Chopin transcriptions, some original compositions of his own, one by M. Dulcken, and Capriccios, Nos. 21 and 24, by Paganini. In all these there was the same genuine Remenyi flavor, and the same mirth-provoking vein which I have described.

It was extremely interesting, certainly, to see how he had taken up the exquisite Chopin Mazurkas and Nocturnes for the piano and made them over into violin pieces, adding embellishments and cadenzas enough to double their length. Whatever one may think about this performance being duly reverent to Chopin, the result is very difficult to be displeased with. In fact, though disposed to be a purist in such matters, I found these transcriptions as played by M. Remenyi very charming and delightful.

But how would Remenyi play Bach or Beethoven? Would he bring himself to be a real interpreter of a great author? Could he possibly merge his own individuality in that of even the greatest of composers, and give himself up to interpreting his conceptions with conscientious fidelity? The impressions left by this evening's performance point toward a negative answer. But however that may be, Remenyi's playing of his own compositions, and of other works which are or may be adapted to the peculiarities of his genius, is so charming, so masterly in its way, so productive of real delight, that we can pardon him if he leaves interpretation to other, if perhaps greater men. We are glad to accept and enjoy him as he is.

Mme. Rivé-King, who was to have filled an important part in this programme, was ill, and only attempted a single piece, a prelude by Haberer, followed by an organ fugue by Guilmant, transcribed by herself. Her work in this transcription is thoroughly musician-like, and has resulted in making a very interesting and desirable addition to her repertoire. As regards her playing, it was, in spite of her illness, so full of fire and vigor, so conscientious in interpretation, so clear, and sure, and reposeful, that it cannot be thought of with anything but perfect satisfaction. She is by far the finest American pianist it has been my fortune to hear.

The vocalists were Mr. Remmert and Miss Gertrude Franklin. Of the former I spoke in my last letter, and have nothing to add to the praise therein expressed. He is every way a noble and praiseworthy singer. Miss Franklin has a light, but sweet and pure voice, well suited to ballad singing, and sufficiently flexible and well-trained to make her performance of florid Italian floriture very enjoyable.

I think I mentioned in my last the Turner Hall concerts of Chr. Bach's orchestra. I ought to mention two of its wind instrument players, Mr. Allner, an excellent oboist, a new-comer here, and Mr. H. N. Hutchins, a cornet-player, who seems to me to be surely on his way to distinction.

The Arion Club has given its second concert, with the assistance of the Apollo Club of Chicago. Both clubs are directed by Mr. Wm. L. Tomlins, of whose excellent qualities as a director I have written before. I hardly know where to look for his equal in efficiency. He has the faculty of inspiring his men with the utmost enthusiasm, and gets out of them all they are capable of. This resulted in a performance which I have nothing but praise.

The first part of the concert was filled up with four-part songs, sung partly by the two clubs combined, and partly by each separately, with one aria, "Revenge, Timotheus cries," from Handel's Alexander's Feast, sung by Mr. Remmert, and closed with a double chorus from Mendelssohn's Edipus in Colonus.

The second part was occupied with Max Bruch's "Six Scenes from the Frithjof Saga," Mr. Franz Hennerts and Mrs. Emma Thurston being the soloists.

Scene I. describes Frithjof's return from a successful enterprise, full of joyful anticipations of meeting Ingeborg, his betrothed, and his own family. But during his absence Ingeborg's brother, Hjelge, Frithjof's enemy, had destroyed the latter's family, burned his house, and forced Ingeborg to wed King Hring. Scene II. is devoted to Ingeborg's sorrowful bridal procession, her terrible grief, and proud resignation, disdaining pity. Scene III. depicts Frithjof's revenge on Hjelge, his desecration of the temple of Balder, his curse and exile. He finds Ingeborg's ring on the arm of the god, and pulls it forcibly off. The god falls into the flames, the temple blazes up, the priests pronounce maledictions and sentence of banishment upon him. In Scene IV. he takes his farewell of the mighty Northland in a noble solo, responded to by the chorus of his followers. Scene V. is devoted to Ingeborg's Lament; and lastly, Scene VI. shows Frithjof and his men at sea, on their way southward.

It will be seen that the situations are admirably adapted for musical treatment, and a pretty thorough study of the work has given me a very high opinion of its excellence. It is difficult to deny genius to a composer who has succeeded so well in depicting emotions of such depth and intensity as those suggested in the text. Certainly we must admit talent and musicianship of a very high order.

I am happy to record that the public received the work most enthusiastically, and seemed to enjoy it more than the lighter first part of the programme. This goes to show, what I have often asserted as my belief, that the best music makes its way, even with the general public, whenever it is worthily presented. J. C. F.

NOTES AND GLEANINGS.

CAMBRIDGE, MASS. — Old Harvard and its neighborhood have been enjoying some good music lately. Under the management of Professor Paine a series of Chamber Concerts by the New York Philharmonic Club is in progress at Boylston Hall. The programmes, as well as the performing artists, are for the most part the same as those of the Euterpe in this city. The second concert was on Thursday evening of this week.

Then, too, there have been in the latter half of February four amateur performances of an original and very pleasing operetta called "The Goblet of Salobreña," — the plot, the poetry of the airs and concerted pieces, the spoken dialogue and the music, all composed by a citizen of Cambridge, a graduate of Harvard, Mr. William Abbott Everett, who for many years has been too deaf to be able to hear even his own music. Musically it is not a work of much pretension, — the occupation and the solace of his enforced leisure. Yet all who have heard it — four crowded houses of the best Cambridge society, in the little Arsenal Theatre of the Cambridge Dramatic Club — have pronounced it clever and enjoyable. Certainly the melodies are fresh and graceful, and do not sound flat or hackneyed; they are no mere echoes of tunes floating about in the common air. The duets, trios, quartets, and male choruses, too, are musical and well constructed. The accompaniments are for piano-forte only, mostly expressive and effective in design, though sometimes a little lame in composition, showing the want of a professional training. But the music had undergone the critical revision of the gentleman who so happily played the accompaniment and conducted the rehearsals and performance with so much savoir faire. — Mr. W. A. Locke, who after graduating at the college, has been studying music for a number of years in Germany, and has settled down as a teacher in Cambridge. Both the singing and the acting of the ladies and gentlemen who took part won great favor. The scenery, costumes, and stage appointments, too, all produced out of the club's own resources, were excellent. The plot, purely fanciful, even to the names, is a romantic extravaganza, half humorous, half sentimental, about "Castle in Spain," of which this was printed as the argument:

"Duke Almanzor and his daughter Inez are driven by a storm into a haunted and deserted castle. His retinue bring in a prisoner, the Lady Cristina. Inez, with the aid of Diego, her lover, disguised as steward, takes advantage of the duke's belief in an old legend, and by personating a ghost decoys him away in search of a magic goblet, by rubbing which spirits are forced to restore a lost treasure. Rolando, in an attempt to rescue his captive bride, is taken prisoner. He promises Almanzor that the ghost, Berenguela, shall restore his daughter and the lost treasure on condition of a general pardon. Inez, the lost treasure, reveals herself."

THE Cincinnati Musical Festival Association announces the following programme of the principal works to be performed at the festival in May, 1880: First night: Cantata, "Ein feste Burg," Bach, solo quartet, chorus, orchestra, and organ; symphony, C major (Jupiter), Mozart; Utrecht Te Deum and Jubilate, Handel, solo quartet, chorus, orchestra, and organ. Second night: "Missa Solemnis," D major, Op. 123, Beethoven, solo quartet, chorus, orchestra, and organ; symphony, D minor, Op. 120, Schumann. Third night: Overture, "The Water-carrier," Cherubini; Stabat Mater, Palestrina (motet for two choirs a capella); symphony, No. 8, F major, Op. 93, Beethoven; "The Tower of Babel," Rubinstein (sacred opera in one act, Op. 80), soloists — tenor, baritone, bass, — three choirs, orchestra, etc. Fourth night: Prize composition. This will be the work which will receive the prize of one thousand dollars offered by the association for the most meritorious work for chorus and orchestra, the competition for which is to be open only to native-born citizens of the United States. A Faust overture, Wagner; "Song of Spirits over the Waters," Op. 167, Schubert, eight-part chorus for male voices and string orchestra; symphonic poem ("Mazeppa"), Liszt; "Zadok the Priest," coronation anthem, Handel, chorus, orchestra, and organ.

LONDON. — Figaro (March 1) is disappointed with the new Violin Concerto by Johannes Brahms, which was performed at the Crystal Palace by Joachim. It says: "Since the production of the new concerto, with Joachim at the fiddle, and Brahms himself at the conductor's desk, at the Gewandhaus concert on New Year's Eve, we have been kept in a state of excitement about the new work. . . . The first movement of the new concerto is not of that complex sort which foreign critics led us to expect. The balance between the orchestra and the solo violin is well preserved, and here alone in the work can it be said that Herr Brahms has sought the basis of his violin concerto in the symphony. But there is little that is new and a good deal which is decidedly weak in this movement; a respectable piece of musical workmanship, but devoid of all individuality. Herr Joachim's cadenza, too, though a marvel of executive difficulty, did not strike the audience as being particularly appropriate. It is, however, in the second or slow movement that Brahms is heard at his best. The first theme given out by the hautboys is truly beautiful, and its simplicity and delicacy of treatment are maintained throughout. The last movement in the rondo form is a mere piece of ad captandum display, calculated to tickle the ear of the populace by the brilliancy and difficulty of the solo violin part, but that is all. That Brahms could have written such stuff is not a little astonishing, and when we are told that, being composed by a man who was unacquainted with the technicalities of the violin, it had to be considerably modified by Herr Joachim, we are forced to confess it is not at all like Brahms. The last movement fell flat, and although there was a recall, the honor was indisputably intended for the violinist rather than the work."

LEIPZIG. — Mr. J. F. Himmelsbach writes (Feb. 4) to the Philadelphia Bulletin: The fourteenth Gewandhaus Concert witnessed the successful performance of an exceedingly interesting orchestral novelty, namely, a "Symphonie Dramatique" written by Anton Rubinstein. This composer is perhaps one of the most prolific writers of the present day, but not all of his creations, by far, are so developed and finished as could justly be expected from one so bountifully gifted; some of them are not worthy of a very inferior talent, and others wholly unenjoyable, particularly those of a larger form, in which his wild fancy, getting the better of his musical judgment, would necessarily lead him into chaos and confusion. Were he more discriminating in the choice of his ideas, and did he take more care to use these in accordance with certain laws, — not arbitrary laws, but such as even a Schumann could not disregard with impunity, — he would certainly rank very much higher as a composer. In point of talent he is equal to the best, — a talent from which wonderful things may yet spring, and will, the moment he concludes to be more conscientious and less careless and negligent. Measuring the symphony by the very highest standard, it falls short, and for reasons just alluded to. It has many advantages, however, and not the least of these is the fact that, notwithstanding its proportions and extreme length, it is never tedious. With moments of great force and singular beauty, and others that must have originated when in a whimsical mood, it is always striking and original. He is a thorough master of the modern orchestra, in itself an advantage that will never fail to make his orchestral music at least interesting. If the applause that followed the performance of the symphony is an indication of its success, it was successful beyond a doubt; but possibly, and not improbably, it was more in appreciation of the distinguished efforts on the part of the orchestra and its conductor, Carl Reinecke.

The "Coriolan" Overture was the other orchestral number on the programme. The remaining numbers were the Violoncello Concerto of Schumann and solos of Reinecke, admirably played by the violoncellist, Hausmann, from Berlin. Schubert's "Fahrt zum Hades," and "Aufenthalt," and an Aria of Handel, were enjoyably sung by Josef Standigl, from Carlsruhe.

Robert Schumann's "Das Paradies und die Peri," so seldom heard, was certainly appreciated by all fortunate enough to be present on the occasion of the fifteenth Gewandhaus Concert.

Only Mozart operas have been sung during the last week: Zauberflöte, Don Juan, Figaro's Marriage, and Entführung aus dem Serail. The revival of the latter was, musically, a very happy and successful experiment. The text-book, to be sure, is ridiculously absurd, but one can well afford to accept it in company with music possessing all those beautiful qualities so characteristic of the immortal master.

A bit of news, that will also cause some surprise among your readers, is going the rounds in this city, to the effect that Richard Wagner has become hopelessly insane.

BOSTON, MARCH 29, 1879.

CONTENTS.

FOUND. FROM GOETHE. M. E. Harmon	49
MOZART AS A DRAMATIC COMPOSER. Frédéric Louis Ritter	49
HERMANN GOETZ: HIS SYMPHONY IN F	49
CHAMBER MUSIC IN PROVIDENCE, R. I. A. G. L.	50
THE OPERA IN BERLIN	51
TALKS ON ART. SECOND SERIES. FROM INSTRUCTIONS OF Mr. William M. Hunt to his Pupils. II.	52
SOME PECULIAR PHASES OF VIRTUOSITY. W. F. A.	53
CONCERTS	53
The Harvard Musical Association. — Mr. J. B. Lang's two Concerts. — The Muterpe Concert in Boston and in Cambridge. — Announcements of Concerts to be given.
A CORRECTION FROM THE MENDELSSOHN QUINTETTE CLUB	55
MUSICAL CORRESPONDENCE Philadelphia. — Cincinnati. — Chicago. — Baltimore. — Milwaukee.	55

Published fortnightly by Houghton, Osgood and Company
220 Devonshire Street, Boston. Price, 10 cents a number; $2.50 per year.

All the articles not credited to other publications were expressly written for this Journal.

FOUND.

FROM GOETHE: BY M. E. HARMON.

INTO the wood
Alone I went,
Though naught to seek
Was my intent.

But in the shade
A flow'et stood:
It seemed to light
The dusky wood,

As stars illumine
A murky sky:
Or like the beam
Of Beauty's eye.

To break its stem
Was my desire:
So down I stooped,
And, bending nigher,

I seemed to hear
A gentle sigh:
"Must I be plucked
To pine and die?"

"No, no," I cried,
"That shall not be!
Thy roots, dear flow'r,
I'll take with thee."

Thus I took home
The lovely flow'r,
And bore it to
My garden-bow'r.

There, planted new
In quiet place,
Once more it blooms
With wildwood grace.

OSHKOSH, WIS.

Chicago Tribune.

MOZART AS A DRAMATIC COMPOSER.

To set Mozart down as a mere instinctive musical genius, lacking intellectual consciousness of his artistic intentions, as so many have done, is to do him an unpardonable wrong. Any one who will take the trouble of looking a little deeper into Mozart's workshop will certainly not fail to admire the wonderful harmony and the logical proceedings that reign within its walls. Yet in spite of all our admiration for the great composer, it cannot be denied that in some of his opera arias portions find a place which, considered from a strictly dramatic point of view, are merely a tribute paid to the taste of his time. He could not always resist the temptation of giving to a great singer a favorable opportunity to exhibit his or her powers as a vocalist, though such kind consideration was sometimes bought too dearly, and at the expense of dramatic truth. But we know also what intrigues and neglect the great man had all his life long to contend with; kind and genial as he was, he readily sympathized with his artists, and often gave way to their wishes when the imperative duties of the dramatic composer should have taught him to be less accommodating in what he must have known to be contrary to the requirements of truthful scenic action.

He was not egotistic enough to put his views forward as the only true ones, which, from his stand-point, he would have been perfectly justified in doing. But as his musical genius knew no bounds, he ventured willingly into all regions, and often gave lavishly where a wise economy of musical means would have served the dramatic purpose better. Such moments are, however, few and far between. The less musically gifted, philosophizing Gluck avoided those breakers. When he composed an opera, he endeavored to forget "that he was a musician," while Mozart was so much of a musician that the dramatist came sometimes in danger of being lost to sight. One of these purely musical freaks is to be found in the Allegro movement of Donna Anna's aria, "Non mi dir, bell' idol." Upon the syllable à of the word "sentirà," roulades occur, filling eight measures. In a merely musical sense, and when executed by a great artist, this passage is a very effective vocalization. It is absolute music, and being absolute music it is here entirely out of keeping with dramatic expression and truth; it should not have found a place here. It was, on the part of the immortal master, a moment of weakness that led him to make a concession to a pleasant singer.

Now let us turn our attention to another number of the same opera. I mean Leporello's "Catalogo" Aria; and here we shall find the master in one of his best moods. Don Giovanni, seeing himself suddenly brought face to face with Donna Elvira, whom he had shamefully deserted, effects his retreat surreptitiously, and leaves Elvira with his valet. Leporello, though the type of a cowardly buffoon, is, however, always ready to indulge con amore in any tricks of his master's, if the occasion proves safe from immediate danger. To console Donna Elvira for Don Giovanni's desertion, he ironically produces a long register or "catalogo" of his master's amorous adventures. Mozart divided the aria into two parts: the first part (Allegro) is composed in a mere parlando style, in which the composer endeavored to do justice not alone to the declamatory meaning of the different words, but also to the dramatic expression of the talkative valet. Leporello, watching the effect of his barefaced imposition and impertinence on poor Donna Elvira, is now and then on the point of bursting out into malicious laughter. (Listen to the orchestra! it tells us all the humorous mood Leporello feels within himself; how it chatters, how it chuckles, how it laughs!) Leporello, the rogue, after all this braggadocio, finally affects (Andante) to enter into a more touching sympathy with his victim, and strikes a tender strain; he cannot remain, however, in that affected temper; he soon forgets himself. In an imposing manner he mentions "e la grande maestosa" to break out, immediately afterwards, into "la piccina, la piccina, la piccina," etc., chattering away according to his humorous nature, which is at once stronger than himself. He takes up the first sentimental period, and at last finishes by making downright fun of the poor deluded lady; he sings the "voi sapete quel che fà" with such a sneering, satirical leer as to leave not the least doubt that his tender sentiments were all affected for mischief's sake. This aria has no logical musical meaning without the words and the action; it cannot even be translated without becoming distorted in its general dramatic effect. To praise it as a fine musical composition is to utter a platitude. But it is unsurpassed as a psychological delineation of the characteristics of a certain kind of dramatic expression, — here done, by the composer, by means of the inseparable union of poetry, music, and mimic art. Let any actor declaim the words, and however experienced and talented he may be, he will fall far behind the lyrico-dramatic interpreter of the impersonation Mozart had in view when he created the incomparable scene.

Thus every page of Mozart's operas gives ample proof of his deep knowledge of the human heart, and of the means which lay within his art for reaching his ideal aim; for he too was under the faithful belief that the composer was able to express decided emotions by means of music intimately connected with words, both arts, poetry and music, concurring to express thought, sentiment, and feeling at the same time. Nay, we even find, as in Leporello's aria, that this union of the two arts is often so close that either will lose when separated from the other. I will quote here a passage from one of Mozart's letters to fortify the central point of my position regarding the great composer's consummate knowledge of the dramatic means he had to make use of in order to do justice to his impersonations. At the time of his composing "Die Entführung aus dem Serail," he writes to his father, giving him an account of the opera, and says with regard to Osmín's aria: "The 'Drum beim Barte des Propheten' is still in the same tempo (that of the first part of the aria), but in quicker notes; and as his [Osmín's] anger is increasing, this Allegro assai, taken in a different key and more accelerated tempo, must produce the finest effect, especially as one is under the impression that the aria is finished. A man who is in a violent fit of anger exceeds all order, measure, and aim; he loses all control over himself, and so music must lose all control over itself."

FRÉDÉRIC LOUIS RITTER.

HERMANN GOETZ: HIS SYMPHONY IN F.

MR. GEORGE GROVE, in his "Dictionary of Musicians," gives the following brief biographical sketch of the lamented young composer whose Shakespeare opera has excited so much attention in Germany, and whose Symphony, twice performed during the past season in Mme. Viardot Louis's concerts in London, excited general admiration: —

"Goetz, Hermann, born at Königsberg Dec. 17, 1840, died at Hottingen, Zürich, Dec. 3, 1876, a composer of some performance and of greater promise. Though evidencing great musical ability at an early age, he did not receive any regular instruction till he was seventeen. After passing some time at the University of Königsberg, he at length decided on a musical career, and placed himself at the school of Stein, at Berlin, where he was the pupil of Bülow in playing and Ulrich in composition. In 1863 he succeeded Kirchner as organist at Winterthur, supporting himself also by teaching, and embracing any musical work that fell in his way. Meantime he was engaged in the composition of an opera adapted by J. V. Widmann from "The Taming of the Shrew," and entitled Der Widerspänstigen Zähmung. It was, after much delay and many disappointments (not unnatural with the first work of an unknown composer), produced at Mannheim Oct. 11, 1874. Its success, however, was great and rapid; it was played at Vienna (Feb. 1875), Leipzig, Berlin, and a dozen other towns in Germany, and has recently (1878) been published in English (Augener). For a full analysis of the work see the Mus. Record for 1878). It was followed by a Symphony in F, also successful, and by a second opera, Francesca di Rimini (Mannheim, Sept. 30, 1877). This, however, was not finished when its author, long a prey to ill health, died, as already stated. The first two acts were finished, and the third fully sketched; it has been completed, in compliance with Goetz's last request, by his friend Franck, and produced at Mannheim, Sept. 30, 1877. Besides the above works Goetz has published a P. F. trio, a quartet, and various piano-forte pieces."

Speaking of the Symphony in F, a writer in the London Musical World says:—

"Fancy this great artist and true poet—for such we now know him to have been—actually unable, when starting on his career, to find the means of earning bread; glad to compete for, and delighted to win, a poor organist's place at Winterthur; and doomed to spend the last and best years of his short life drudging as a teacher in Zürich. No wonder that, albeit he flashed into fame when surprised Germany heard the "Taming of the Shrew," Goetz died at thirty-six or that, like Schubert, he infused into all his utterances more or less of a melancholy that appeals to us as a lament. Justice, however, has been quick to avenge him. Unlike Schubert, his genius had not to wait through weary years for full recognition, nor, even in this country, to slowly force its way, as besiegers, by sap and trench, creep up to the ramparts of a fortress. It may be said that Goetz's early fame in England is due to the chance production of his opera at Drury Lane by Herr Carl Meyder. Let us call the fact an accident if we will, and what then? Accident plays as brilliant a part in the world's history as design, and if, in the drama of English music, Goetz became known through Herr Meyder's 'aside,' so much the more credit to us that his name fell upon acute ears and stirred inquiring minds. This is certain, at any rate,—we have added him to our list of masters, and mean to keep him there. For our resolve we have ample reason, not found solely in his opera and his symphony. Looking at the posthumous works of Goetz, now in course of publication, it is impossible to deny the man's surpassing genius. His psalm, 'By the waters of Babylon;' his piano-forte quintet, in C minor; his Frühling's overture, in A; and his piano-forte sonata, in G minor, for four hands, are all hors ligte, bearing the sign-manual of one who wears the crown of artistic royalty. Upon this, however, we need not at present insist. The symphony played last Tuesday, in London, under the direction of Mr. Weist Hill, and in Liverpool under that of Signor Randegger (in the absence of Sir Julius Benedict), more than suffices for the purpose of vindicating the claims of the composer, and to it our remarks may be limited. We have already characterized it as the noblest, most beautiful, and most artistic work of recent years, and we deliberately claim this high award on the ground that all the conditions are fully satisfied. What, in the case of an orchestral symphony, are those conditions? The answer is, melodic beauty, lively and pleasing fancy, constructive skill, and wealth of varied color, each and all of which are found in the work under notice. But, looking at the motto from Schiller, which prefaces it, 'In des Herzens heilig stille Räume musst du fliehen aus des Lebens Drang,' some one may ask how far it justifies this avowed poetic basis. Such a question must always be difficult when the composer has given no key to his meaning in detail, and here we can put forward nothing but conjecture. That, however, is easy, and we do not hesitate to say that the application of the motto should be limited to the slow movement. But we go further, and assume that the Adagio was originally a separate piece, written to illustrate Schiller's lines. Goetz was fond of thus preaching from a text, and wonderfully happy in his sermons, as those are able to assert who know his six charming and poetical "Genrebilder" for the piano-forte. On the assumption put forward the relevancy of the motto is undeniable, for if ever music declared that men should take refuge from the storms of the world in the holy quietude of their own hearts, the strains of Goetz's Adagio, now passionate, now reposeful, do so 'with most miraculous organ.' But we can afford to ignore the question of poetic basis in presence of the more positive qualities asserted by this chef-d'œuvre. As to melody, the symphony is one continuous stream. We may not, perhaps, speak of it as Denham did of the Thames, 'strong without rage, without o'erflowing full,' for here and there Goetz becomes a little obscure through the very wealth of his ideas. But this is a fault on the right side, and one the blame of which the composer shares with many an illustrious master. As to fancy, we need only cite the Intermezzo,—a dainty and suggestive piece of work, worthy of Mendelssohn in his most imaginative mood, while in point of constructive skill it would be hard to find anything outside the productions of the greatest musicians equal to the opening Allegro. Here Goetz manifests a power of developing his ideas not unworthy to be compared with that of Beethoven. Every scrap of his chief themes is utilized and made the source from which spring beautiful and varied sprays of fancy subordinated to a rigid sense of orthodox form. Best of all, the symphony, especially the Adagio, comes to us as a genuine utterance of feeling rather than a mere scholastic exercise. We know that the composer speaks to us through it from the depths of his nature, impelled by the 'unconscious necessity' of which Wagner makes so great a parade. Hence arises the originality of the music. Any man so moved must needs be distinctive, for minds and souls differ as greatly as faces, and no two are exactly alike. This may account, perhaps, for the occasional strangeness of the master's harmonic progressions, some of which we should not care to defend from an orthodox point of view. But here, also, Goetz is supported by illustrious precedents, and we well know that the heterodoxy of genius in one generation becomes a common standard of faith in the next. To sum up, this symphony is a great work and a rich possession. Adding it to our artistic treasures, let us not forget the obligation to be just to its dead composer, and to raise to his memory whatever monument a knowledge of all his music may decide upon as worthy."

CHAMBER MUSIC IN PROVIDENCE, R. I.

As it may interest your readers to know what is doing musically in Providence, I send you a notice of the first two of a series of four concerts given by the "Cecilia" of that city, an organization similar to the "Euterpe" of Boston. The aims and standard of the society are indicated by the following programmes:—

I. February 14. Artists: Miss Fanny Kellogg, and the New York Philharmonic Club (Messrs. Richard Arnold, first violin; Julius Gantzberg, second violin; Emil Gramm, viola; Charles Werner, violoncello). Programme:—

Quartet in D minor (Posthumous), Schubert; Aria, "As when the Dove," from "Acis and Galatea," Handel; Selections from Quartet in D, No. 7 ("The Miller's Beautiful Daughter"), Raff; The Proposal; The Mill. Songs: a. Widmung, Schumann; b. Im Herbst, Op. 17, No. 6, Franz; Trio for violin, viola and cello, Serenade, Op. 8, Beethoven; Song, "Bride Bella," Roedel; Violin Solo, Gypsy Melodies, Sarasate; Mr. Richard Arnold; Selections from Quartet in G minor, No. 2, Adagio, Gavotte, Bazzini.

II. February 25. Artists: Mrs. W. H. Sherwood, pianist; Mr. W. H. Fessenden, tenor, and the new Beethoven Quartette Club (Messrs. Charles N. Allen, violin; Julius Ackeroyd, second violin; Henry Heindl, viola; and Wulf Fries, cello). Programme:—

Piano Quintet, Op. 44, E-flat, Schumann; Song, "Adelaide," Op. 46, Beethoven; Piano Solo, Mährchen, Op. 162, Raff; Songs: Rubinstein. a. "Yearnings," Op. 8, No. 5; b. "Gold rolls here beneath me," Op. 34, No. 9; Quartet, Op. 12, E-flat, Mendelssohn; Song, "The Rhine Maiden," Smart; Polonaise, piano and cello, Op. 3, Chopin; Selection from "Hornpipe" Quartet (Haydn), Allegro vivace.

The society deserve great praise for the spirit manifested in the selection of the Schubert D minor Quartet as the opening piece in their series of concerts. It was an auspicious beginning, a true harbinger of what was to follow. The quartet is one of the finest compositions of its class. The first movement needs study for its full appreciation, though there are charming bits of melody scattered here and there which must appeal to any sympathetic listener. Of the Theme and Variations (Andante) nothing need be said. It is well known as one of the most masterly pieces of writing in all musical literature. You will hardly find a more perfect set of variations on any theme. It is the gem of the work. The Scherzo is very decided and effective, and the Trio simply exquisite,—just such as Schubert only could write. The Finale presto is full of suppressed fire, and carries you on irresistibly in its rapid movement. In the main the quartet was well played, the Tema con Variazioni and Scherzo especially well. The work is long and difficult, and was prepared at very short notice. This probably accounts for whatever short-comings were apparent in the rendering, and may also account, alas, for the fact that about one third of the last movement was cut out bodily. This proceeding is to be earnestly deprecated as unwarrantable for any reason. The extreme length of the quartet cannot be pleaded as an excuse, for, at the rate it goes, it would not have taken two minutes more to have played the omitted portion. Nay, more, it shows a want of respect for the composer, who, in this case, revised his work with great care, and is entitled to have it played intact as he finally left it. In the "Life of Schubert," by Kreissle Hellborn, translated by A. D. Coleridge (vol. ii. p. 77), I find the following: The D minor quartet "was given under the direction of Schubert himself, who made the alterations and curtailments he judged necessary on the freshly copied parts." This was on January 29, 1826. On February 1, "it was rehearsed again, and played as a new work."

The Quartet by Raff belongs to the romantic school, and, judging from the two movements given, seems to be a fine composition. The "Proposal" — a dialogue between the 'cello and first violin, — is happily conceived and finely written; and "The Mill" is intensely expressive of the reality. The movements were beautifully rendered and heartily enjoyed.

The Trio by Beethoven was a rare treat and a great success. The playing was altogether as fine as any during the evening.

The selections from the quartet by Bazzini, of Milan, were also interesting. The entire work was given at a recent concert of the Philharmonic Club in New York, and the Tribune critic wrote: "It is an excellent work, classical in form as in spirit, and treated in a thoroughly masterly manner. Two of the movements were peculiarly attractive: an Andante, and a dainty Gavotte (these were the two given here), the latter of which might have been written by Padre Martini, or Gluck himself." And his remarks seem just. Whether the work will live and take its place among what the musical world is pleased to call "the classics" is doubtful, but it certainly is a fine composition.

The songs were splendidly given. We like Miss Kellogg's singing very much. She seems to enter so thoroughly and heartily into the spirit of the composer. Her rendering of Schumann's "Widmung" could hardly be improved, and the meaning of the Franz "Im Herbst" was made very palpable to all who heard it. Mr. Bonner accompanied, to the great satisfaction of all.

The violin solo was interesting as an exhibition of Mr. Arnold's really fine playing, but in itself not exceptionally enjoyable.

The second concert was even finer than the first. Of the brilliant Piano Quintet of Schumann little need be said. It is well known, and is one of the really great works that will never die. Its meaning and beauty grow upon one with every hearing. We cannot hear it too often. There is no work of its kind of superior merit in the range of musical composition.

As a whole, the rendering was spirited and musical. The difficult Agitato in the Marcia was given with splendid effect by all the artists. Mrs. Sherwood's staccato playing in this portion of the quintet was superb. She failed, however, to consult her fellow-artists in beginning one of the trios in the Scherzo, thus causing a slight confusion for a bar or two; but this was immediately remedied. This very difficult movement was otherwise splendidly given. Indeed, the artists in general seem to have caught the composer's idea, and to have satisfactorily interpreted it to the hearers. When there were so few blemishes, one hardly likes to mention them.

I beg leave to differ, in the artists' favor, with the critic of the Providence Journal of February 26, who says: "The rhythm," in the slow movement, "was not always kept perfectly distinct, as it sometimes seemed like a 6-8 movement instead of a 4-4." This is a criticism often made, — possibly sometimes with justice, but not in this case. Having the score before me, and giving special attention to this point, I was particularly impressed with the distinctness with which the 4-4 rhythm was marked, and this, too, without interfering with the needed delicacy in the rendering. It surely must be difficult to play this movement without giving the effect of a 6-8 rhythm; but in the present instance the 4-4 rhythm was certainly most successfully maintained.

Mrs. Sherwood's solo was beautifully done. In response to a hearty encore, she gave an Etude of Thalberg's. In her performance of the Chopin Polonaise with Mr. Fries she was also very successful. Mr. Fries played, as he always does, delightfully, and both artists seemed to have caught the spirit of the work.

The songs were in perfect harmony with the rest of the programme. Of course Beethoven's "Adelaide" was the greatest of all, and Mr. Fessenden sang it with much fervor and expression. As an encore, he sang "Nina," by Pergolese. We must thank him for the two delightful songs of Rubinstein, — a selection, we believe, made by himself. The words and music in each are fitly joined the one to the other, making a complete unit, — an absolute necessity in every true song.

A critic in the last number of the JOURNAL (March 1) spoke of Mr. Fessenden's style as very "refined and finished," perhaps a trifle too delicate, "and with a too great fondness for pianissimo effects;" adding, "If he could only appreciate how absolutely and entrancingly beautiful his stronger tones are, he might use them more frequently and to excellent advantage." With this we agree, and would say he did use them with splendid effect at the words, "Oh, would this were ever abiding!" in the second song. To a persistent encore of Smart's "Rhine Maiden," he responded with a "Volkslied," by Heller. The accompaniments were played by Mr. Kelly.

The Mendelssohn Quartet at the time of its composition appeared as the first for stringed instruments. It was written in 1828, in Berlin, (Rietz: Catalogue of Mendelssohn's works). It is a very fine work, thoroughly characteristic of its author, full of charming and delicious melody, and is worked up with great skill and effect. The several movements are integral parts of one whole; near the close of the last movement a portion of the first is introduced. The same theme binds the whole into an organic unity.

The rendering was generally very good; once or twice a slight confusion, quickly remedied and hardly noticeable, unless one had the score and was following very closely. We think the ensemble playing was rather better than that of the New York Club, though the playing, as a whole, was not so delicate. There was more breadth and body of tone in the Beethoven Club, and in many respects this is to be preferred. It was a truthful slip of the printer when in the announcement of the formation of the club, he said, "Mr. Allen has organized a strong quartette," instead of a "string quartette."

The happy music of Father Haydn sent us home in a thoroughly satisfied mood.

Altogether, the two concerts were about as fine as we hear nowadays. We only wish we could hear one like them every week, and that every city and town in the country could have a like privilege. What an elevating and refining influence such music has; how inspiring in the sometimes hard and wearisome struggle of life; how constantly it brings new gifts of rest, peace, and joy!

A. G. L.

NEWPORT, R. I., March 14.

THE OPERA IN BERLIN.

A WRITER in the London Pall Mall Gazette says: —

Most students of history are aware that Napoleon drew up the regulations for carrying on the Théâtre Français amid the flames of Moscow. History in this instance but repeated itself, Frederick the Great having supervised from afar the planning and building of the Berlin Opera House during the turmoil of the first Silesian campaign; and within five months of the signing of the Treaty of Berlin he was present on its formal opening on the 7th of December, 1742, on which occasion Graun's Cæsar and Cleopatra was produced. Voltaire, the following year, saw Titus written by Frederick himself, — "with the important aid of Graun," notes Mr. Carlyle, who, whilst mentioning that this operatic hobby cost the monarch heavy sums, and that "a select public, and that only," was admitted to the performances gratuitously, does not mention that the Potsdam grenadiers formed part of the public in question, standing as stiff as if on parade, at the back of the pit. The ballet also engrossed much of Frederick's attention, and we find him prudently noting down that he wanted "something that would amuse and at the same time would not cost much;" protesting, too, that he would spend nothing on the ballets, and ordering a dancer and his wife, "not worth six sous," to be sent off at once. Frederick ruled singers and dancers with a rod of iron, routing one out of bed with his crutch; and, after having brought her to the theatre by an escort of hussars, placed a couple of sentries behind the scenes, till she opened her mouth and sang in tears, which moved the house to raptures. He paid them fairly, but regulated their applause like a fugleman; and he, the hero of Rosbach, descended into such detail as to decide that "Thisbe should be dressed as a pastoral nymph, in flesh-colored satin and silver gauze with flowers."

The Opera House was erected under Frederick's special directions by Baron von Knobelsdorf, after the model of the Pantheon at Athens; the inscription "Fredericus Rex Apollini et Musis," on the main front, revealing the idea that had inspired the king. On the stage of this somewhat gloomy building all the celebrities of their day were seen and heard in turn. From it the victories of Frederick II. and the birth of Frederick William II. were announced. Here was celebrated the splendid festival instituted in honor of Queen Louisa by Prince Ferdinand and Prince Augustus. From this stage the Russians were welcomed as the deliverers of Berlin, and the victories of the Allies were read out to the audience; and here a brilliant fête was held after the ceremony of homage on the accession of Frederick William IV., in 1840. The first Opera House was burned down on the 19th of August, 1843, after the ballet "The Deserter through Love" had been given. A new edifice rose from its ashes within fourteen months; for the old walls, within which the great captain of his age, wearied with work and victory, was wont to take his pleasure, now listening with ravished ears to the notes of a Mara, now watching the twinkling feet of the charming Barberina, and now jesting beneath his mask and domino at one of the masquerades, were still left standing. It is true that the old solid internal magnificence of marble, bronze, and Gobelins tapestry was replaced by pasteboard and canvas; yet for all this the internal aspect of the house is far gayer and brighter than it was of old. Although the decorations of the building are tasteful and rich, and the interior arrangements admirable, the seats are uncomfortably narrow; the temperature, too, by the time the first act is over, is very like that of the heated chamber of a Turkish bath, and odors by no means those of Araby the Blest are apt to prevail. As the native portion of the audience do not go so much for enjoyment as to be advanced in the cultivation of a musical taste, any such considerations as personal comfort are not allowed to prevail. The ladies, it may be noted, appear indifferently in evening or walking dress; while with the gentlemen white ties and swallow-tails are altogether in the minority. Despite the presence of royalty and the court, of the foreign ambassadors and numerous other dignitaries, for the most part in uniform, the scene in front of the stage is scarcely brilliant. It may be mentioned that at the Berlin royal theatres officers are not allowed to show themselves in the pit, but are relegated to the second tier of boxes; the pit being mostly abandoned to the richer middle classes, the representatives of commerce and finance.

THE PERSONNEL OF THE BERLIN OPERA HOUSE

is open to serious criticism. The companies of the court theatres are regular state officials, having titular prefixes, rights to retiring pensions, and all sorts of privileges that induce them to cling to their profession to extreme old age. The Opera House is provided with plenty of singers, some of whom do nothing for half the year. Whether they have any voice left is not much considered: they have been at one time first-rate singers; but usually just as they have lost the last remnant of their voices they get engaged for life at the Opera House, and have no need to trouble themselves about the future. The audience, musically speaking, is a highly educated one; yet, possibly on the presumption that it is powerless to effect any change for the better, it shows itself philosophically indulgent not alone to singers with impaired voices, but to artistes whose voices are perfect enough, but who sing systematically out of tune. At the Berlin Opera the orchestration is, with occasional exceptions, perfect, the costumes good, and the mise en scène irreproachable; so that the strongest possible contrast is afforded by the singing. Wagner is an especial favorite with the Berline; and his Lohengrin is generally given on state occasions, while Tannhäuser, Rienzi, and the other compositions of the author of Das Judentum in der Musik are so many stock operas. The other composers for whose works a predilection exists are likewise German, and include Meyerbeer, Weber, Mozart, and Beethoven with his solitary opera. Cherubini is also an especial favorite with the Berline, with whom Der Wasserträger is the most popular of his productions. Verdi's operas are occasionally performed on off nights, but Donizetti's are scarcely ever heard.

Despite all drawbacks, the opera at Berlin enjoys a popularity that is fully exemplified by the great difficulty in obtaining tickets without bespeaking them some time before, even under ordinary circumstances. When a favorite opera is announced, and a favorite singer is cast for a good part, all the tickets are snapped up by speculators, and retailed at two or three times their original cost. Under such circumstances, a decent place for any opera worth hearing cannot be had for less than four or five thalers.

Passing down the Linden, on a summer evening, you are often assailed by eager Israelites proffering opera tickets at 300 per cent. premium. There are, in fact, a number of "seedy" men always hanging about the building, who make a living by buying up these tickets and disposing of them at an enhanced price. The office for the sale of tickets opens at eight in the morning, and the strictest impartiality is observed in the disposal of places. First come first served is the rule. He who arrives earliest gets the pick of the places; for, as the entry to the office is through a long passage so narrow that two people cannot stand in it abreast, positions are secured according to the order of arrival. When Lohengrin and other popular operas are performed, people commence to gather round the office door at three o'clock in the morning; and by the time reasonable men are thinking of getting up all the best places are gone, and fabulous prices have to be paid by those who require them. A six-shilling ticket for a representation of Lohengrin has been known to fetch as much as thirty-six shillings. This was something exceptional; but it is a common thing for tickets to fetch thrice their original cost. The practice is not only connived at by the authorities, but the men are licensed, it being otherwise illegal to buy and sell opera tickets at Berlin. The ranks of the agents are mainly recruited from old actors, valets out of place, guides, etc. Since the Bourse "crash" opera tickets have been obtainable at less exorbitant prices than they formerly commanded.

THE BALLET.

If the lyrical performances at the Opera are often mediocre, they are more than compensated (in the eyes of the Berline) by the perfection and splendor of the ballets. What is lacking in lungs is made up in legs, and a large stage and superb mounting enable the finest ballets in Europe to be here produced. Yet in this branch of art there is the same general complaint that veterans lag superfluous on the stage; for, like the singers, the figurantes are also engaged for life. Listen to a Berliner's lament upon this subject: "Twenty years ago," observes he, "when I was still going to the gymnasium, these houris had just the same bewitching smile, just the same pearly teeth (perhaps they have recently got a new set), just the same black, sunken eyes, and just the same fairy legs. They had the same names they bear now; and it is my fault, not theirs, if I have grown older meanwhile. I will engage to present a quartet whose combined ages amount to over two hundred years. Whole generations may pass away without our ballet suffering any change in its immortal sylphs. There are premières danseuses who have seen three managers depart; and if I compare a play-bill fifteen or twenty years old with one of to-day, I find in both the names of those who were all in the bloom of youth and beauty when the old Opera House was burned down. We have a new ballet every year, with new decorations and costumes; but the old groups never vary. Pity always rises in my breast when I see how some of these ladies try to call attention from the stiffness of their limbs; I seem to hear rheumatism crying out for mercy. Poor creatures! necessity forces them to go on charming us; for some of them possess nothing beyond fifty or a hundred thousand thalers, on which, of course, they cannot live. They have been assured of the right to die in this place by a former love passage with a whilom cadet, who now sits unmoved in his box, with a gray moustache and covered with orders." The old opera habitués are called "ballet uncles." The Berlin corps de ballet are known colloquially as the "Old Guard," and the military precision of their steps justifies the appellation from a technical point of view. But though its members may sometimes surrender, they appear never to make up their minds to die.

TALKS ON ART. — SECOND SERIES.¹

FROM INSTRUCTIONS OF MR. WILLIAM M. HUNT TO HIS PUPILS.

II.

THE Chinese say, "Economy is saving and spending at the same time." The Yankee thinks that economy is saving. If I don't tell what I know, what a pig I am! I might easily hide my knowledge from you, lest you —

"Flood the market with pictures?"

Yes, or I might selfishly fear that you would do something better than I; when you know that I've always said that I would n't teach if I did n't think that some of you were going some day to do better work than I can do. How many men are there down town who are hoping that some clerk is going to be smarter than they are? It is only in art that the worker help each other.

"But all artists would not do it."

Then they are not true artists. If a man is so selfish as to wish to keep what he knows to himself, that man has n't any soul to put on canvas.

But we easily see where others don't do right. When I go about, growling about Boston and her ideas of art, it is because I am not painting. When I'm hard at work, I'm helping Boston to love art.

"Emerson says, 'It is better to write a poor poem than a good criticism.'"

True. And I had rather paint a poor picture than write a good criticism. It is the critics that make us so timid. You don't quite dare to paint as you see and feel. You can't get rid of the thought of what people will say of your work. That's why you struggle so hard for form. But you must not work for that alone. That is what the academies, the world over, are striving for; and when they get it, what is it worth?

Do what you can do without fear. There's fear enough in love. Let yourself express yourself! Thunder! You'd wake up some morning and paint the whole thing in at once. What does Flandrin say? "He who does n't receive from his model an impression can never hope, in imitating that model, to give to those seeing his work any impression but that of a thing dumb and dead. But he who renders what he sees will, in spite of all its faults, make something interesting."

Don't take advice unless you know where it comes from. If a person comes into your studio, it is n't best to turn round too many canvases. You don't see what he does. Why show your work? If he says, "I'd do so and so to that picture," you might reply, "So you would!" If any one can improve on Rubinstein or Michael Angelo, let him do it, and we'll respect his work.

"Judges of art in Boston!" What is their judgment worth? Not fifty cents. "Essipoff does n't touch me!" No, but spruce gum might!

Once in a while look into my little book, and read on until you come to something that meets your case. Keep a little book for your own "symptoms," so to speak. Whenever you see anything that hits your case, write it down. Don't take what you don't need. Don't lug along things that you can't use. Neglect of that rule has caused the French army to be always licked to death. The miser gets drowned at sea with the weight of his dollars. Having! It has tied up more souls than we've any idea of. If the thing is what you need, take it, and say, "I thank you."

¹ Copyright, 1879, by Helen M. Knowlton.

Dwight's Journal of Music.

SATURDAY, MARCH 29, 1879.

SOME PECULIAR PHASES OF VIRTUOSITY.

WHETHER it is true or not that we now live in a musical age which may be justly termed an age of virtuosity, we will by no means take upon ourselves to determine. Virtuosity, in a good sense, is a purely relative term, and the fact that most of the higher class of new music published to-day makes very exorbitant demands upon the executive ability of even the most brilliant performers is no proof that compositions of previous periods did not make relatively as great demands upon the executive technique of contemporary players. The progress in technical executive power that artists have made in the last seventy-five or one hundred years is something immense. Even those persons who regard the peculiar developments of modern music as belonging wholly to the domain of progress must admit that, whatever advance the art of composition has made, it sinks into insignificance when compared with the huge strides that have been made in the art of performing.

One of the most noteworthy characteristics of this advance in technique has been that its most prominent promoters have been unable to hold anything like a monopoly of their innovations. The rule that "what man has done, that can man do," holds especially good here. Such and such a player may astonish the world with some unprecedented flight of virtuosity; the key-board is still warm from his touch when his new feat is echoed back by the hands of an army of other players, who are already able to perform it as well as he, and in five or ten years he has brought nearly the whole performing world up to his own level. Paganini is hailed as a magician for his left-hand pizzicatos and his double-stopping in artificial harmonics. But what violinist of any eminence to-day cannot do the same? Liszt's whilom "impossibilities" are very possible now, and have taken a position among the commonplaces of the concert-room. It is Columbus's egg over again. Every man who makes important discoveries in the technical part of the art of performing (for such things belong more properly to the domain of discovery than to that of original invention) does the world unspeakable service; but the sole supremacy he wins thereby over his fellows is very short-lived.

The imitable nature of innovations in technique is a thing of which we rarely find a counterpart in the art of composition. Even such tricks in writing as are commonly called "effects" are not always easy of imitation. To be sure, when Rossini astounded all theatre-going Europe with his famous crescendos on two chords, it was soon found that other men could reproduce the effect to very good purpose. But such successful taking a leaf out of another composer's book is, upon the whole, rare. What a composer does remains, in general, his own property, and his right to it is hardly to be invaded, save by direct plagiarism; but what a performer does soon becomes the common property of the world, and the ease and rapidity with which it is transferred are at times surprising.

Were the mere mastery over the technique of this or that instrument the only element constituting a fine performance, the number of great artists would be immense; but every one knows that this is not so, and that, although the most brilliant player cannot long hold his head above his fellows by dint of his technical prowess, there are other qualities by virtue of which he can shine forth unapproached and unrivaled. It seems to us to be a mistake to rank all these finer qualities in the performer under the general head of inspiration and æsthetic genius. There is a certain element in the art of playing, which, albeit of transcendent importance, is of no higher nature than what we call cleverness, or savoir faire. The prominent place this quality holds in piano-forte playing is especially noteworthy, and as the piano-forte may be fairly considered to be the concert instrument, par excellence, of our day, we shall allow ourselves to consider the proper application of this peculiar savoir faire to piano-forte playing in particular, without regard for its applicability to other instruments.

It is a singular circumstance that, while the piano-forte now enjoys a popularity greater than ever before, the general tendency of the musical spirit of our time is rather away from it than towards it. Composers are, in general, more or less influenced by the executive material they employ in their compositions, by the nature and capabilities of the instruments they write for. An orchestral writer who has all the modern instrumental means at command will not hesitate long as to whether he shall give a solo phrase to the oboe or to the clarinet; the nature of the phrase itself will indicate the proper instrument easily enough. But when composers write for the piano-forte, nowadays, they often seem to consider it an instrument capable of doing anything. It is sufficiently well known that the tendency of our day is in the direction of intense dynamic musical effects. This tendency, whether deplorable or not, is assuredly natural and rational; the overwhelming volume of tone which modern orchestral works give us is not a purely conventional or merely adventitious circumstance in the music of the period. It is absolutely functional; the very intrinsic character of the compositions themselves, of their fundamental themes, of their methods of development, demands it.

The time has gone by when instrumentation was an element of secondary importance in the art of composition, a mere flavoring ingredient in music. To-day instrumentation goes hand in hand with the other parts of the art. You can play a Haydn symphony on a piano-forte, or arrange it for four or five stringed instruments, and it will not lose so very much of its zest. Try to do the same thing with a Liszt symphonic poem, a Wagner march, or even with a Raff or a Brahms symphony, and you will pierce the composition to the very heart. Now the difference between the modern piano-forte and the modern orchestra is vastly greater than that between the piano-forte and orchestra of Mozart's time. And yet, when modern composers write for the piano-forte, they often treat it as if it were an orchestra. When they do keep themselves within the natural limits of the instrument, one cannot at times help feeling that they are laboring under an irksome restraint; one can almost hear them saying to themselves "Que diable aussi viens je faire dans cette maudite galère?" For be it remembered that the piano-forte is hardly worthy the name of musical instrument; it has no real tone, or, at most, only the beginning of a tone. A pianist is to a great extent an illusionist; his business is to make his listeners believe they hear what they do not really hear. When we speak of legato-playing on the piano-forte, we use a conventional term for something that does not really exist; a melody — especially a slow melody — played on the piano-forte is not a series of smoothly flowing, connected notes, but a series of more or less distinctly marked sforzandos. The pianist, by a species of clever jugglery with accents and rhythmic devices, can cheat us into thinking that we hear a sustained melody, but it is nothing but a make-believe, after all. This power of illusion is, to be sure, inborn in some pianists, yet it is to a great extent susceptible of being acquired by study and practice, and its presence is more a sign of savoir faire than of anything else. Its complete acquirement is the most difficult feat that is open to modern virtuosity. The piano-forte music of our day bristles with passages in which this illusion is physically impossible. Take, for example, Liszt's formidable transcription of the march in Tannhäuser; the right-hand passages at the third recurrence of the leading theme cannot possibly be played. They can be hinted at, so that the listener can, with a powerful effort, hear them in his mind's ear, but really hear them he cannot. Such passages are common in the piano-forte compositions of our time, and are the rock on which the pianist inevitably comes to grief; for he is always, as I have said, an illusionist, and they unmask him with pitiless brutality. In this phase of piano-forte playing, virtuosity has long since reached its limit. In attacking much of our contemporary music, the virtuoso is but toying with the impossible, and the best he can do is to make his failure less glaring than that of his rivals. And yet pianists (for most of the prominent composers are pianists) continue writing such things, and expect them to have a musical effect upon the human ear. If this state of things goes on as it has been going on for some time past, the pianist-virtuoso will soon become little else than a living musical solecism.

W. F. A.

CONCERTS.

HARVARD MUSICAL ASSOCIATION. — The seventh Symphony Concert (Thursday afternoon, March 13) had for once a programme of orchestral pieces only; yet the large attendance and the general pleasure manifested showed that such an audience does not always need the personal attraction of a solo artist to make good music palatable. The selections were the following: —

Overture to "The Magic Flute" Mozart.
Siegfried Idyl (second time) Wagner.
Symphony, in D (Breitkopf and Härtel, No. 14). Haydn.
Adagio; Allegro. — Andante. — Menuetto.
— Vivace.
Adagio and Andante (Nos. 4 and 5), from the Ballet: "The Men of Prometheus," Op. 43 Beethoven.
Suite, for Orchestra, in C, Op. 101 (second time) Raff.
Introd. and Fugue. — Minuet. — Adagietto.
— Scherzo. — March.

Mozart's Zauberflöte Overture, a perfect model of its kind, and a fit initiation into any feast of the ideal, was played with spirit, delicacy, and precision, the quick fugue theme being taken at just the right tempo for clearness and facility of execution, without awkward hurry, and with no loss of verve. Wagner's "Siegfried Idyl" — a very gentle specimen of tone-color for him — was enjoyable in just that way, as an agreeable commingling and flow of sounds, pervaded by a certain mildly melancholy, longing sentiment, and suggestive of the voices of the woods and winds; pleasing, but vague, and moving in a circle, giving you no sense of progress, like a sweet sort of nightmare. The second hearing only confirmed this impression of the first, though it was delicately rendered by the instruments. The happy little Symphony by Haydn, which may have been heard in Boston by an older generation, but not within our memory, was sure to please by its spontaneous beauty and simplicity, the cheerfulness and brightness of its theme, and that consummate grace and symmetry of form which make the art of Haydn like a second nature. The movements are all light and pretty, to be sure, and quite unpretentious; but the magic of the Haydn genius is in them, and this is more and more refreshing nowadays to many whose curiosity about the newest compositions is already somewhat sated. The Andante has a light-hearted, airy, careless, almost sketchy character; but there is a vigorous fortissimo of basses in the middle of it, which lends it deeper background and bold contrast. The Minuet is charming, especially the Trio, in which the oboe stands out in a captivating solo, very nicely played by Mr. de Ribas. The Finale seems to end too soon, — one evidence that it is good.

The pieces from Beethoven's Ballet Music — his earliest extensive work for orchestra, with the exception of the First Symphony, composed in 1800, at the age of thirty, when, as Thayer says, all his work tells of the "sound mind in sound body" — were very popular here some six or seven years ago, both in the Thomas and the Harvard concerts. It is sweet, melodious music, needing the tableaux of the ballet, of course, for its full interpretation, particularly the rather ceremonious monotony of the slow and stately introduction. But with the sudden flood of harp tones you seem to see a statue waking into life; and the bright flute passages which follow, with the exquisite violoncello melody, are ever welcome. The Suite, by Raff, had been played twice before in Boston, — first by Theodore Thomas, and then in the sixth season of these concerts. We think it made a much better impression this time than it did then. We must confess to finding it more fresh and genial, more felicitous in its ideas, and with less that is overstrained and far-fetched than many of Raff's more recent works. The Introduction is stately, and ornate, after the older models, and it is a good, sound, well-rounded Fugue that springs from it. The three middle movements are quite original and graceful, particularly the Scherzo (Presto), a dainty, fairy bit of fancy. The Adagietto, too, with its tender cantabile, was warmly appreciated. The March is bold and strong, but somewhat coarse; marches are a hobby with this voluminous composer, — an easy habit he falls back upon, apparently, when other invention flags.

The eighth and last concert of this fourteenth series took place last Thursday, beginning and ending with a great work of Beethoven, — the Eroica and the third Leonore Overture. The special attraction was the piano-forte playing of M. Franz Rummel (Schumann Concerto, and Liszt's Fantasia on Hungarian Airs, with orchestra); between these, Weber's Preciosa Overture. Comments hereafter.

Mr. B. J. LANG's two concerts at Mechanics' Hall, on Thursday afternoons, March 6 and 20, were choice and somewhat unique in character. Both were very fully attended, especially the last, and by the most refined, appreciative sort of audience. The programme of the first concert was as follows: —

Sonata, Op. 81 Beethoven.
Adagio (Das Lebewohl), Allegro.
Andante espressivo (Die Abwesenheit).
Vivacissimamente (Das Wiedersehen).
Miss Jessie Cochrane.
Songs: "Si, t'amo, o cara." (Arranged by Robert Franz) Handel.
"Unter blühenden Mandel-bäumen" Weber.
"Das ist ein Brausen und Heulen" Franz.
"Treibt der Sommer seinen Rosen" Franz.
"The Erl-King" Schubert.
"Ach wenn ich doch ein Lämchen wär" Franz.
"The Two Roses" Lang.
"Would it were ever abiding" Rubinstein.
Mr. W. J. Winch.

Concerto No. 3, Op. 45 Rubinstein.
Allegro moderato. — Andante. — Allegro risoluto.
Mr. B. J. Lang.

The glowing, half love-sick, half rapturous, impetuous Beethoven Sonata in E-flat, commonly named "Les Adieux, L'Absence, et La Retour," is one all steeped in finest sentiment and burning fire; it is as poetic and imaginative as it is heartfelt, — a most exquisite creation. The interpreter, Miss Cochrane, a young lady of evident musical feeling and enthusiasm, is a pupil of Mr. Lang, and has also studied in Europe with Von Bülow. She has a sensitive, clear, brilliant touch, a well-developed technique, phrases intelligently and carefully, and shows a true respect for the composer and his work. All that was wanting was more fire and intensity, and somewhat greater breadth of style for concert playing. For the rather quiet, unassuming manner of a maiden effort we liked it all the better. The tempi were all such as we have long been accustomed to feel to be the right ones; and all the intentions of the work, as well as its spirit as a whole, seemed to us rightly conceived and intelligently, expressively reproduced.

The Rubinstein Concerto in G is the one which Mr. Lang played with orchestra in a symphony concert seven years ago. This time the accompaniment was ably supplied at a second piano-forte by Mr. W. S. Fenollosa. It gave full scope for all the vigor, fire, and finished, brilliant virtuosity of Mr. Lang, who, we are sure, brought out all the soul and all the interesting detail of it. The work is impetuous and somewhat willful and eccentric, as one might expect of Rubinstein. We liked the first Allegro rather better than we did before, and the Andante, by its pensive fragments of recitative, suggesting distantly the Adagio in Beethoven's G major Concerto, has depth and beauty. There is a wonderful impetus and verve in the Finale (Allegro risoluto), which is kept up to too great a length, though it is extremely exciting; Mr. Lang's mastery of its exacting difficulties was supreme.

The half hour of songs, finely chosen and grouped, and exquisitely sung, made a refreshing flowery interval, between the two serious instrumental works. Mr. Winch has marvelously gained in the sweetness and the delicate modulation of his voice, and in the fine, poetic, varied quality of his interpretation, rendering the individuality, the spirit, of each song feelingly and truly. That by Handel, which has hitherto been heard here as a soprano aria, suited him well, and was given in all the charm of its quaintness. This and the beautiful Romanza from Weber's Euryanthe, simple, yet sustained and ever growing to a climax, were among his happiest reproductions. The "Erl King" was admirably sung, as well as accompanied, and the songs of Franz were altogether satisfactory. Mr. Lang's "Two Roses," a graceful, dainty fancy, was heartily appreciated; and the song by Rubinstein, commonly called by its first line "Gold rolls here beneath me" (from a Persian poem, we believe), is something quite original and charming, though not without a certain Schumann mannerism. Every song owed much of its charm to Mr. Lang's fine rendering of the accompaniment.

Here is the second programme: —
Grand Trio in G minor Hans von Bronsart.
Allegro molto. — Vivace.

Adagio ma non troppo. — Allegro agitato.
Mr. Lang, Mr. Allen, and Mr. Fries.
Songs: "Mio caro bene." (Arranged by Robert Franz) Handel.
"Reiselied" Mendelssohn.
"Die Lotosblume" Franz.
"I arise from dreams of thee" J. Bradlee.
"Adelaide" Beethoven.
"Ich frage keine Blume" Schubert.
"Absence" Lang.
"Herre I love" Lang.

Mr. W. J. Winch.
Grand Trio. Op. 97, in B-flat major Beethoven.

The Trio by Von Bronsart — conductor of the Euterpe concerts in Leipzig, which represent the newer tendencies in contrast to the more conservative Gewandhaus institution — was a novelty of note. The work and the composer were entirely new to Boston. It is full of dramatic fire and passion, while its movements are kept in the usual form. It is also full of beauty and originality. The opening Allegro is intense and stormy, and gives a sense of power. The Adagio is deep and sombre, almost too suggestive of Chopin's funeral march, but grand and noble. The Finale is strong, but rather more conventional. The Vivace, a sort of Scherzo, though not in triple time, pleased more than any portion of the work, both by its quaint and frolic humor and by its two melodious trios; yet it seemed to us that twenty other composers might have written it. As a whole, however, no work of the kind by any of the newer composers has impressed us more favorably than this Trio by Von Bronsart. Mr. Lang was at his best in it, and it was admirably played by all three artists.

Mr. Winch offered another very choice bouquet of songs, and sang each one of them to a charm. Instead of the one set down for Schubert, he sang a beautiful song by Jensen, "Murmeldes Lüftchen" (Murmuring Breeze). The setting of Shelley's "I arise from dreams of thee," by Mr. Bradlee, showed decided musical sense and faculty for an amateur. It is intensely dramatic, recitative-like, in its style, and contrasts to good advantage with the well-known setting of the same words by Saloman.

The great Beethoven Trio — greatest of trios — was superbly played, and made the noblest sort of ending to the concert.

EUTERPE. — The third concert (Wednesday evening, March 12) was an altogether delightful one. The two selections were such as every hearer could at once appreciate, and such as never lose their charm. Beethoven's Quartet in A, from the six of Op. 18, a fresh, spontaneous, bright creation of his healthiest period, though once so familiar, seemed like a thing that had just sprung into life. Those well-worn variations of the Andante brought each its fresh surprise. And it was all remarkably well played, — by the New York Philharmonic Club, as before. The variation in which the bass part becomes so excited and so active, caused a general smile of sympathy.

Then that perfect model of its kind, the G minor Quintet by Mozart, as perfect a model, — in pregnant themes, easy, natural development, strictest symmetry of form, and yet the happiest spontaneous flow from first to last, as well as in every grace and eloquent enforcement of expression, — as his Symphony in the same key. The Minuet is simply exquisite, and the Adagio wonderful in its depth of feeling and its reach of imaginative conception. The Quintet, also, was very clearly, very finely played. Indeed, Mr. Arnold and his brother artists gave us the best evidences of their skill in quartet and quintet playing that evening.

CAMBRIDGE. — On the following evening the same artists gave a similar Chamber Concert in Boylston Hall, — a small amphitheatrical lecture room, but excellent for sound. It was well filled with a most intelligent audience, who listened with sincere interest to the Mozart Quintet, of which we have just spoken, and to Schumann's Quartet in A minor, which was given in the first Euterpe concert. Between the instrumental pieces an agreeable variety was introduced by Mr. George L. Osgood's beautiful singing of several songs, accompanied by Professor Paine. These were: "Im Mai," by Franz; "Nähe des Geliebten," and the "Frühlingsglaube," both by Schubert. Being warmly recalled, Mr. Osgood also sang the beautiful Siciliano from Handel's L'Allegro.

We have several other interesting concerts on our list awaiting room for notice, — notably those of Mr. Liebling, and of Miss Josephine E. Ware, a very young and gifted pupil of Mr. Sherwood.

The great musical event of the year will be the performance by the Handel and Haydn Society of Bach's St. Matthew Passion Music on Good Friday, April 11. For the first time in this country the great work will be given entire, the first part in the afternoon and the second part in the evening; with this division it was originally intended to be given. In many a church in Germany, and probably in Westminster Abbey and other London churches or cathedrals, it will be heard that day. Here the solo singers will be: Miss Henrietta Beebe, Miss Edith Abell (her first appearance since her return from Europe), Mr. W. Courtney, the English tenor, who is said to have recovered the clearness of his voice, Mr. J. F. Winch, and Mr. M. W. Whitney. Mr. Edward Remenyi has been engaged as leading and solo violinist.

This will be fitly followed on Easter Sunday (13th), by Handel's Judas Macanabius, the solos by Miss Fanny Kellogg, Mr. Courtney, and others.

Then, to crown the season's work, — or rather to crown the able and faithful conductor, CARL ZERRAHN, on the twenty-fifth anniversary (May 2) of his first assuming the baton in the old Society, Mendelssohn's Elijah will be given as it was then, — only better, — in compliment to this long-tried and successful leader.

MR. A. P. PECK's annual benefit concert is announced for April 23. The list of artists is imposing, including Miss Clara Louise Kellogg, Miss Anna Drasdil, Mrs. Louise Grace Courtney, Herr August Wilhelmj, Mrs. L. S. Frohock, Signor Tagliapietra, Mr. A. Neusendorff, and a grand orchestra.

MESSRS. W. H. SHERWOOD, C. N. ALLEN, and WULF FRIES, will give a series of three classical concerts in Mechanics' Hall, on Tuesday evenings, April 15, 22, and 29. They will have the assistance of Messrs Julius Akeroyd and Henry Heindl (who, with Messrs. Allen and Fries, constitute the Beethoven Quartette), Mrs. W. H. Sherwood, Messrs. E. B. Story, and Henry G. Hanchett, pianists; Messrs. Alexander Heindl, contra basso; Ernest Weber, clarinet; Paul Eltz, bassoon; Edward Schorman, horn. Also, Mme. Louise Cappiani, Miss Mary Turner, N. Y., Mrs. E. Humphrey-Allen, and Mr. W. H. Fessenden, vocalists.

Among the important works presented will be Beethoven's Septet; a Concerto in C minor for two pianos and string quartet, Bach; Quintet in E-flat, Op. 44, for piano and strings, Schumann; Clarinet Quintet, Mozart; String Quartet by Mendelssohn (in E-flat), and Rubinstein (in F); Sonata for violin and piano (in E-flat), Beethoven; Polonaise for cello and piano, Chopin; Rondo for two pianos, Chopin; Piano Solos by Moszkowski, Chopin, and Schumann.

Such a series will be welcome, surely, to all true lovers of good music.

A CORRECTION FROM THE MENDELSSOHN QUINTETTE CLUB.

MR. EDITOR, — I trust you will kindly allow me space in your columns to make correction of the statement that the Sextet, Op. 18, by Brahms "was entirely new to Boston" when played at the second Euterpe concert, Feb. 13. If you will examine your files of programmes, you will find that our [Mendelssohn Quintette] club played both Sextets by Brahms six or seven years ago, in the series of concerts given in the Meloson, when the programmes, you will remember, were made up mostly of music new to Boston, including the two last Quartets of Beethoven. If I were at my home, I could readily indicate both day and date. Now, whilst I do not think it a matter of vital importance to the world to know who brings out works of this character, statements like the above, and others which have appeared in the dailies within a couple of years, giving to other artists the meed of praise which was justly due us, have, in the words of Mark Twain, become "alightly monotonous."

For instance, a reporter for one of Boston's respectable daily papers hears for the first time at a Cambridge concert Beethoven's Septet, Op. 20; discovers charms, etc.; hopes Boston will soon have the opportunity, and so on. Shortly following this, another reporter of another daily hears Spohr's Nonet, Op. 84, discovers beauties, and hopes that Boston may soon have the pleasure of hearing this charming work; returns thanks to the artists, etc. These reports are made, of course, by gentlemen who mean well, but are in blissful ignorance of what has been done in this line twenty or even thirty years ago. Our club have certainly played both works often enough to have worn them threadbare, if works of that calibre will ever reach that condition.

For many years I kept a record of the number of times we played all important concerted works, until increase of business cares caused me to give up such detail, but I remember that all the best works reached into the "twenties."

I would like, therefore, to make this statement for the guidance of all future reporters: that there is scarcely a work worth playing within the province of chamber music, embracing compositions for three up to nine instruments, which we have not many times played. I will mention two works, however, of sterling merit, which we have not played, namely, the Octet by Gade, and the Quintet for piano and wind instruments by Mozart. This record covers the works by the acknowledged masters up to and including those of Robert Schumann. We have also dipped bravely and perhaps rashly into the newer styles in the works of Brahms, Rubinstein, Raff, Goldmark, Max Bruch, Fuchs, and a few others needless to mention.

There is this very discouraging remark to be made about the bringing out of new music by new masters, — and I think all artists have passed through the same experience, — namely: We take up a new work, study it thoroughly and with enthusiasm, perhaps, play it to an audience, the best we can collect, and the work generally falls dead the first time, because the listeners are not in sympathy with it. It does not even sound the same when played to a few hundred pairs of ears that it did when played to four or five pairs. I suppose many reasons can be given. Now regarding the Brahms Sextets, we were so much pleased with the music that throughout one entire Western tour, when we wished to give a treat of new music, we played the Andante with variations from one of these works, or the Scherzo from the other. That is what we thought of Brahms. We have done the same for Rubinstein, playing frequently that exceedingly interesting movement in five-eight time from one of his quartets. Allow me to add here that whenever an opportunity presents itself, where we think we have an audience who will enjoy the best, we always play some of it, although it may not be on the programme, and certainly is at the risk always of being carriere to many of the listeners. I do not think that the new music at first hearing is calculated to please, but people say they hear so much about it they would like to hear some of it; we therefore play it.

Allow me, in conclusion, to express my delight at the interest reawakened for chamber music in Boston; I give my heartfelt thanks to the promoters of the Euterpe organization. Long may it live in active operation! It has been to those of our club who worked together with me so many years in this choice vein of musical wealth a most discouraging matter to believe that the love for chamber music had entirely died out in our people. It is now, therefore, a fit subject for rejoicing that the reflux of taste has in Boston brought people back again to their first love. That musical person, so called, who does not get enjoyment from a string quartet is poorly prepared to enjoy a symphony.

Respectfully, THOMAS RYAN.
GRAND RAPIDS, MICH., March 15, 1879.

MUSICAL CORRESPONDENCE.

PHILADELPHIA, MARCH 22. — Yesterday was the anniversary of the birthday of the great and glorious composer, JOHN SEBASTIAN BACH, and was duly celebrated by Mr. S. T. Strang's closing Organ Recital, the programme of which I submit for your readers' examination: —

Prelude and Fugue, in B minor.

Peters' Ed., Book 2, No. 10.

Choral Prelude.

"We all believe in one true God" (5 voci.), Book 7, No. 62.

Chaconne, D minor, for Violin Solo.

Mr. William Stoll.

Pastorale, in F.

"My Heart, ever faithful."

Miss Edith Lane.

Violin obligato, by Mr. Stoll.

Toccata, in F.

As you may see, the works of the great contrapuntist alone occupied the attention of the public which, despite the very bad weather, turned out in goodly numbers. The performance gave general satisfaction. Miss Lane is always heard with pleasure, and sang the flowing melody of the "Heart ever faithful," with excellent expression. This young lady, having recovered from her throat ailment, returns to her former position as Soprano in the choir of St. Stephen's P. E. church to-morrow. Mr. William Stoll gave the Chaconne with a winning grace of execution and expression, which exhibited some familiarity with Bach's music; the bowing and intonation showed the master's command of his instrument. Mr. Strang developed the qualities of a bold executant and hard student. His registration in the Pastorale was particularly effective by the happy contrasts of timbre and his pedaling throughout was exact, neat, and clean.

Among the many "Pinafore" companies, now and then, there is brought to light some new star whose twinkling was evidently for a large and appreciative public, other than that of the drawing-room circle of friends, or even of the church choir. At the North Broad Street Theatre, a cosy little box of a place up town, a soprano, well known in musical and church circles, has developed into a successful prima donna, in a small work, it is true, but she promises to rise in her profession, and will, without doubt, with her fine presence and excellent voice, if studious and careful, ultimately reach a high position. I allude to Mlle. Ella Montejó, who, although with some minor shortcomings, such as might be expected in a novice to the stage, is nightly crowding this little theatre with her admirers. AMERICUS.

CINCINNATI, O., MARCH 14. — On Feb. 27 the Seventh Orchestra Concert took place after the following programme: —

Symphony, C major Schubert.
Scena and Aria, "Non temer, amato bene!" Mozart.
(Violin Obligato, Mr. E. Jacobsohn).

Miss Maria Van.
Overture, "Coriolanus," Op. 62 Beethoven.
Scena and Aria, "Tu che le vanità" (Don Carlos) Verdi.
Miss Marie Van.

Ride of the Valkyries Wagner.

The symphony was very finely interpreted. Everywhere the careful and thorough-going training of the director was evident, and a more perfect rendering was only prevented by the want of greater virtuosity on the part of the individual players. The rhythmic as well as harmonic transparency of this beautiful work demand the most complete unity in accent and phrasing, and the constant thematic imitations which are given to almost every instrument, without regard to the difficulties which they often present, make any unevenness or want of precision very plain. In these particulars the rendering of the symphony was frequently deficient, especially in the Andante con moto and Scherzo, which latter is a most difficult task for any orchestra to essay, especially when a very rapid tempo is chosen. The scena and aria by Mozart gave Miss Van an opportunity to show her capabilities in the sphere of classic opera music. (The aria was composed as an interpolation for the opera Idomeneo.) Since her first appearance in concert, Miss Van has been a favorite with the public on account of the evident earnestness and conscientiousness which mark everything she undertakes. Her successful début in opera, as Gilda, in Rigoletto, with the Strakosch Company, brought her into still greater prominence. She possesses a voice of pleasing timbre and considerable volume, with fair training and facile vocalization. The Mozart aria, however, demands a style totally different from that of the Italian opera, and it was evident that while a conscientious effort to do justice to the technical and æsthetic requirements of the composition was not wanting, the means to meet them were not adequate. In the aria from Don Carlos she was quite at home, and created great enthusiasm. The pompous Coriolanus overture and the Ride of the Valkyries formed a most interesting contrast. To the latter Beethoven's words: "mehr Ausdruck der Empfindung als Malerei" are certainly not applicable.

In the Sixth Chamber Concert the following programme was followed: —

Quartet No. 3 in D, Op. 18 Beethoven.
Märchenbilder, Op. 113, for Piano and Viola Schumann.

Mr. Mees, pianist.

Quartet No. 2, A minor, Op. 13 Mendelssohn.

In this concert, Mr. Eich, of whom I made mention in my last letter, temporarily supplied the place of Mr. Thomas. There was a certain restlessness and frequently a lack of purity in intonation noticeable in the quartets, owing doubtless to the want of more perfect acquaintance of the players with each other. A good ensemble cannot be secured without prolonged and constant practice. In the "Märchenbilder," Mr. Baetens had opportunity to display his uncommon virtuosity and excellent taste as a viola player.

The programme of the Seventh Chamber Concert was:—
Trio for Strings, C minor, Op. 9 Beethoven.
Sonata, D major, Op. 18 Rubinstein.
Mr. Schneider, pianist.

Quartet No. 1, A minor, Op. 41 Schumann.

The trio for strings (No. 3 of Op. 9) was rendered in a most perfect manner, and it is safe to say that in unity, as well as in bringing out the details of this beautiful composition, the performance was the most finished of any so far given in the Chamber Concerts. The Rubinstein Sonata received a most excellent interpretation at the hands of Mr. Schneider and Mr. Hartdegen. The themes, some of which are a little commonplace, are so cleverly and beautifully introduced that they gain a dignity and interest during the progress of the sonata. In the Schumann Quartet Mr. Thomas again made his appearance, playing the first violin. The first two movements, by far the most transparent and fresh of the four, were finely rendered. The Scherzo and Presto were too much hurried and somewhat nervously played. At the next orchestra concert the college choir will be heard for the first time in public in Romini's Stabat Mater and Schubert's Twenty-third Psalm for female voices.

A new department has recently been added to the curriculum of the college, under the direction of Mr. Whiting. It is to furnish means for instruction in church music, both instrumental and vocal. A reform in church music is certainly needed, and probably more in our city than anywhere else, for not at any time has this branch of the art been so completely neglected as it is now. The literature which our church choirs and quartets cultivate is of the very poorest and most unfitting kind. Opera melodies which have been put into metrical straight-jackets to suit certain words, the attempts at composition of book-makers who have an eye only to the profits they realize from their "collection," even melodies which are heard at every street corner, are employed to serve at divine service. In the new department instruction is to be given in the elementary principles of church music; the Gregorian tones and their influence on the true church style; the various methods of performing divine service in different countries; analyses of the best known works of the Latin, English, and Lutheran churches; in short, a complete historical and theoretical exposition of church music, together with practical instruction in chorus singing and accompanying. The task is one which certainly requires a thorough and comprehensive knowledge of the subject, together with extensive experience,—demands which Mr. Whiting will doubtless be able to satisfy fully. It is sincerely to be hoped that the advantages offered in this department will be extensively made use of. An announcement which is added to the prospectus has caused considerable comment amongst resident musicians and singers. It reads as follows: "The extensive resources of the college afford the opportunity to furnish to churches choir leaders, organ and other instrument performers, with solo and chorus singers. It is able to assist in this way both churches and singers." In accordance with this notice, two churches which have until now engaged quartet choirs of prominent local singers, have decided to disband them after Easter, and to substitute in their stead chorus singers from the college. The semi-weekly organ concerts given by Mr. Whiting continue, bringing new and varied programmes, in which the strictly classic as well as the modern schools of organ playing are represented. The influence of these recitals cannot be overestimated. It is noticeable that the audiences consist in a great measure of persons directly interested in church music, and connected with the organist and choir positions in the different churches.

A complimentary benefit tendered to Mr. Ballenberg, the organizer of the Cincinnati Orchestra, to whose energy is due largely the possibility of obtaining such material as now composes the Thomas Orchestra, was well attended. The Thomas Orchestra took part, and as soloists, Miss Emma Cranch, Miss Marie Van, Mr. Jacobsohn, and Mr. Brand, the former director of the orchestra.

BALTIMORE, MARCH 22. — Selections at the fourth and fifth Peabody concerts of the season, both of which were largely attended, despite inclemency of weather and other adverse circumstances, were:—

- IV.
Jupiter Symphony C major. No. 4 Mozart.
Cavatina from The Barber of Seville Rossini.
Miss Elisa Baraldi.
Melodrama from 3d act of the French drama,
The Maid of Arles G. Bizet.
Italian songs with piano:—
(a) Santissima virgine. (b) Mandolinata.
Miss Elisa Baraldi.
(a) Piano-concerto in E-flat. No. 5 Beethoven.
Mme. Nannette Falk-Auerbach.
(b) Overture to Egmont.
V.
Symphony in B-flat ("Queen of France") Haydn.
A Movement from a Symphony. Work 12. H. W. Nicholl.
Adagio con passione.
Air and Variations with piano.
Miss Jenny Busk.
(a) Symphony, D minor. No. 2. Work 49. L. Spohr.
(b) Romance from the opera Zemire and Azor.
Miss Jenny Busk.
(c) Overture to the opera Jessonda. Work 63.

Since my last there have been several accessions to the orchestra, which now numbers thirty-six performers. The manner in which the above programmes were received is another evidence of the fact that pure old classical music always calls forth decided appreciation on the part of general audiences, and that a limited orchestra can in most cases effect more good in the way of musical culture by a careful performance of Mozart, Beethoven, Haydn, Spohr, etc., than can a large orchestra of some sixty or more performers with labored interpretation of the music of the new school. Our general audiences are not ready for the music of the future, and it is very doubtful when they will be. What they need now is the good old music of the past.

Wilhelmj visited us again for one night only, supported by Mme. Carreño and Walter Damrosch. Wilhelmj, Carreño, and Walter Damrosch! It was like a delightful chamber concert.

Ole Bull called on us the evening previous to Wilhelmj with another "farewell" concert. He was accompanied by a prodigious array of talent: a prima donna, a tenor, a basso (who could not sing because "my voice so very sick"), a cornetist, and accompanist. The tenor and the accompanist were the only ones who appeared to know much about their business.

Something unusual happened to us about three weeks ago. We have had some public lectures on music! Dr. J. Austen Pearce, of Columbia College, and musical critic of the New York Evening Post, I believe, delivered five short lectures: four on music in general, and one an exegetical lecture on the orchestral selections of our fourth Peabody concert.

Your correspondent hopes the rather meagre attendance will not discourage the doctor, and prevent him or other able musical scholars from repeating the experiment. I am sure that, if persisted in, the attendance at such lectures would increase, slowly but surely. Their benefit in pointing out the way to a better understanding of orchestral music is evident.

MUSIKUS.

CHICAGO, MARCH 19. — The little lull in our concert season was most pleasantly interrupted on Saturday evening by one of the "Musical Reunions" of the Beethoven Society. The programme was one of interest:—

- Sonata in D (Piano and 'Cello) Rubinstein.
Messrs. Wolfsohn and Eichheim.
Aria, from the "Prophet" Meyerbeer.
Mrs. Scheppers.
Piano-Forte: "Ricordanza," Etude Liszt.
Mr. Emil Liebling.
Romance: "Absence" Berlioz.
Mrs. C. D. Stacy.
Violin Solo: "Legende" Wieniawski.
Miss Zelina Mantel.
Duets: { (a) "Schifferlied," } Sachs.
(b) "Lieslied," }
Miss Hoyno and Mrs. Hall.

Trio in C minor (Piano, Violin, and 'Cello) Raff.
Messrs. Wolfsohn, Rosenbecker, and Eichheim.

The Beethoven Society, by these monthly reunions, does a good work in promoting the growth of our musical culture, for it furnishes to its members the opportunity of hearing a large number of important compositions during the year. For this our thanks are largely due to Mr. Wolfsohn, its conductor.

On Monday evening, March 17, the Strakosch Opera Company began a season of one week, opening with Les Huguenots of Meyerbeer. The cast presented Miss Kellogg as Valentine, Miss Litta as the Queen, Miss Cary as Urbano (the page), Mr. Charles Adams as Raoul, Mr. Conly as Marcel. That our musical people were hungry for the opera, was evident from the overflowing house. After so many fine representations from "Her Majesty's Troupe," it was with some curiosity that we observed the effect produced by this company. Admitting that the Mapleson Troupe won its greatest success in the strictly Italian operas, particularly those of a light character, yet in regard to the orchestra, chorus, and general unity of the representation a comparison would present itself to the mind, in spite of the effort to meet the subject upon its own merits. To begin with, the band was badly balanced, and gave evidence of a want of adequate rehearsals. There cannot be much expected of an orchestra that is mostly composed of members who are simply engaged for a limited number of nights; yet such a procedure does interfere seriously with a finished performance, and the public will hold the management responsible for it. We can but think a more careful rehearsal of the chorus would have enabled them to sing their music with more precision and idea, and with some suggestion of light and shade, even if it was composed of a small number of singers. The last act was omitted, and the performance closed with the grand duet between Valentine and Raoul, and thus the dramatic unity was destroyed, and a great injustice done to Meyerbeer's work.

We can but deprecate the attempt of Miss Kellogg to transform herself into a singer of intensely dramatic roles. Her greatest success has been in characters of a light order, like Filina in Mignon; and we question if she has the power of voice, or the fitness of organization ever to enable her to win any extended fame in such operas as the Huguenots and Lohengrin. Her want of power was notably felt in the trying duet in the third act; for, in her effort to lend dramatic force to the high notes, she strained her voice beyond its limit, and the result was the loss of musical quality, while at times the middle and close of the note would be too sharp to be in tune. Then, too, her lower notes are too weak to cope with dramatic music of this trying kind. In every composition that a singer interprets, she must remember that the idea of music is to delight the ear, and give gratification to the musical mind; and when a passion is forced beyond the limit of pure and sweet tone, it becomes a something so unmusical as to pass into the confines of noise. A voice, when supported by a right conception and a reasoning control, can color each note of a song, until it adequately represents the emotion which the composer intended to illustrate musically, and that, too, without robbing the tone of its beauty and purity. We can think of Parepa, Lucca, and more lately Gerster, as singers who never forgot to temper passion by judgment, and who realized that their art was one that was always to delight even the most sensitive and delicate musical organization. Miss Cary sang the music of the page with her usual honesty of purpose, and her rich voice gave intense satisfaction. We are glad to do this artist honor, and New England should be proud of her own daughter. Miss Litta was called to fill the ungracious part of the Queen, and while she sang the music fairly, was sadly awkward in her acting. Mr. Adams, accomplished singer and actor that he is, gave the music of his role with much finish and in the "grand duet," sang with an intensity of power and dramatic design that was most gratifying. It is unfortunate that his voice will not always serve him as fully as on Monday evening, for he is a true artist. Mr. Conly's Marcel was not an ideal representation by any means. The rest of the parts were very weak.

Tuesday evening gave us Faust, or at least, portions of it, for a number of scenes were cut. Miss Litta was the Margherita, and it is no great discredit to the young singer to say she did not fill out the picture that Goethe so wonderfully painted. We have had few singers who could do justice to this part. No one who so adequately filled in the delicate shades of feeling, and brought the listener so near to the suffering, heart-broken, yet loving maiden, as Lucca! The innocent delight of her joyous tones, as she almost laughed out her pleasure, in the jewel song, while she ran up the opening notes of the number, reaches through the mind still, as a cherished memory. Litta was not even the suggestion of that Margherita. Will she ever be? We fear not. She does not show the intensity of feeling, or manifest the elements of greatness necessary to reach the height of the ideal in art. Miss Cary sang Siebel's music splendidly. The rest of the cast were so weak as not even to merit a record. In the Mephisto of Mr. Gottschalk we had direct evidence that "the Devil is dead," and that there was no one left to even take his part.

The remainder of the week will give us Rigoletto, Mignon, Martha, and Carmen. Then to Miss Kellogg adieu for some years!

Sometimes the spirit of invention will step into the realm of art and do it a great service. It is so, we think, in the present case. Mr. George W. Lyon, of the firm of Lyon & Healy, has invented a music rack for upright piano-fortes, which will be of practical benefit to all musicians who play this instrument. It lifts the music into a position comfortable for the eye, and besides is an ornament to the piano-forte. C. H. B.

MILWAUKEE, WIS., MARCH 20. — The following was the programme of the 261st concert of the Musical Society, March 10:—

- Symphony (C major) Frans Schubert.
"Becalmed at Sea, and Prosperous Voyage" (Goethe) A. Rubinstein.
Maennerchor.
Recitative and Aria for Soprano, from "The Seasons" Jos. Haydn.
Miss Lizzie Murphy.
"The Storm," Cantata for mixed chorus, with orchestra Jos. Haydn.
"Impatience," Song for Soprano Frans Schubert.
Miss Lizzie Murphy.
"God, Fatherland, Love" Wm. Tschirch.
Maennerchor, with Orchestra.

The orchestra had only six first violins this time, and other strings in proportion, — somewhat weaker than usual. The result of this was that, in the fortissimo passages, the blare of the trombones and of the cornets, which do duty as trumpets, completely drowned out the strings. It seems to me that it must be entirely possible to tone down this brass, even with the few rehearsals which the finances of the society allow. It ought to be possible also to secure better shading and a much better piano and pianissimo. But in spite of these defects, I found the symphony very inspiring.

The choruses were very well sung, perhaps quite as well as this chorus usually sings; but I noticed no improvement. There is great need of an influx of good material.

Miss Murphy, a young pupil of Professor Miekler, the conductor, has a moderately powerful soprano voice, and training enough to do the tasks laid upon her on this occasion very creditably. She was well received, and recalled.

The concert, on the whole, was up to the mark of the society; but it looks as if the old organization were barely holding its ground, without making much, if any, progress. J. C. F.

BOSTON, APRIL 12, 1879.

CONTENTS.

STEPHEN HELLER ON HECTOR BERLIOZ	57
JOSEPH JOACHIM. Max Schütz	59
LORENZO SALVI	60
TALKS ON ART. SECOND SERIES. FROM INSTRUCTIONS OF Mr. WILLIAM M. HUNT to his PUPILS. III.	60
AUGUST KARSCHMANN: OBITUARY	61
PALESTRINA: MONUMENTAL EDITION OF HIS WORKS	61
CONCERTS IN BOSTON	61
Messrs. Orth, Allen, and Fries. — Mr. S. Liebling. — Miss Josephine E. Ware. — Mr. H. G. Hanchett. — Harvard Symphony Concerts: End of Season.
FASHION WEEK: BACK IN BOSTON	63
MUSIC NEXT WEEK	63
MUSICAL CORRESPONDENCE	63
New York. — Chicago. — Milwaukee.
NOTES AND GLEANINGS	64

All the articles not credited to other publications were expressly written for this Journal.

Published fortnightly by HOUGHTON, OSGOOD AND COMPANY, 230 Devonshire Street, Boston. Price, 10 cents a number; $2.50 per year.

For sale in Boston by CARL PRUTER, 30 West Street, A. WILLIAMS & Co., 283 Washington Street, A. K. LORINE, 369 Washington Street, and by the Publishers; in New York by A. BARNARD, JR., 39 Union Square, and HOUGHTON, OSGOOD & Co., 31 Astor Place; in Philadelphia by W. H. BOWEN & Co., 1102 Chestnut Street; in Chicago by the CHICAGO MUSIC COMPANY, 162 State Street.

STEPHEN HELLER ON HECTOR BERLIOZ.¹

I CANNOT resist the pleasure of having a chat with you about Berlioz. You have been writing on the Paris Exhibition, and an article in which you speak a great deal of this highly gifted man has caused me to take the step I do. People in Germany appear to believe that in Paris Berlioz's music was everywhere misunderstood, misappreciated, and actually laughed to scorn. The majority of the public, many artists, and a portion of the press were, I certainly must admit, rather adverse than favorable. Still more frigid and repellent was naturally the demeanor adopted by the official guardians intrusted with the safe-keeping of the great seals of good taste: the sworn connoisseurs, the privy counselors of music, and all possessing a seat and vote in the sacré collège of the Conservatory and of the Institute. And they were not so wrong, after all, in making things rather uncomfortable for this Terrorist and his programme, which now and then was somewhat wild. I believe these more or less violent opponents of his to have been perfectly sincere, and I can very well understand how the composer of Le Postillon de Longjumeau, a man deficient neither in talent nor wit, must necessarily regard Berlioz's first Symphony as the music of a lunatic asylum. But Berlioz's sternest critics were the "connoisseurs" of the educated higher classes. Reared in the religion of a certain music, they could see in Berlioz only a hateful and heretical reformer. A portion of these dilettantes acknowledged nothing save the simple moving or sparkling tunes of the old French music (Dalayrac, Méhul, Monsigny, Grétry, etc.); the graceful, piquant, wittily-animated, pleasing, and theatrical strains of comic opera; or, lastly, the magnificent, brilliant, and dramatically-colored productions of the Meyerbeerian muse. By far the most respectable part of these dilettantes had attained in the Conservatory concerts and the numerous quartet associations a not insignificant amount of musical education, in about the same way as by frequent and observant visits to museums and galleries a man may gain an eye for painting and sculpture. Now, when all these various classes of persons fond of music, especially the last named, turned with dissatisfaction from Berlioz's compositions, it must be granted that they did not do so out of blind hostility, and could be at no loss to justify their blame and their taste. His weaker opponents objected to him because they could not at once retain in their heads his melodies (supposing any were to be found in what he wrote), and that to understand such complicated architecture required a very learned musician. Others laughed at his ultra-romantic programmes, at the masses of instruments, and at the mad demands he made upon the performers. His strongest opponents, however, had very weighty grounds for their strictures on the new music. They relied on Haydn, Mozart, and Beethoven. The works of these great benefactors were forcing their way every day more deeply and more convincingly into the souls of mankind as represented in Paris. When these lofty names were pronounced, Berlioz's boldest adherents were silent. . . . I have employed the word adherents; I wanted to make you understand that, while this very eminent man certainly had, and even still has, numerous adversaries, he had at a very early date attracted round him a constantly increasing circle of friends, partisans, and even unbounded admirers.

As far back as 1838, when I first came to Paris, Berlioz stood quite apart from all other artists there. Even then it was impossible any longer to dispute his right to the name of a daring seeker after the great in art. His works, his words, and his whole bearing gave him the air of a revolutionist as regards the old musical régime, which he was fond of supposing had lived itself out. I do not know whether he was a Girondin or a Terrorist, but I believe he was not unwilling to declare Rossini, Cherubini, Auber, Hérold, Boieldieu, etc., those "Pitts" and "Coburgs" of the corrupt state of music, guilty of high treason, and to put them on their trial. The horrible aristocrats of music were played every day, and, in receiving the regulated percentage on the receipts, were sucking the marrow of their subjects, the public.

But Paris is the only place in the world where people understand all situations, and like to search out the strangest among them, for the purpose, to a certain degree, of encouraging and supporting them. Only the situation must possess some especial features; it must have a physiognomy of its own, or be characterized by something pathetic. In a word, a man must have a legend circulated around him. Berlioz had several legends. There was his invincible passion for music, — a passion which neither threats nor poverty could diminish, — he, the son of a well-to-do physician in high repute at Grenoble, being compelled to become a chorus-singer at one of the smallest theatres; there was his fantastic love for Miss Smithson, who, as Ophelia and Juliet, had carried him away, though he did not understand a word of English; and, lastly, there was his Symphonie Fantastique, depicting his feelings, and, when heard by her, causing the English actress, who,

on her part, understood nothing about music, to reciprocate his love, — all these things furnished Berlioz with the situation here necessary for exciting the sympathies of certain enthusiasts. Men of this kind, intelligent, partial, ready for any service and frequently capable of any sacrifice, are to be found in Paris by every man of genuine talent, provided that talent be exhibited in a certain light. Thus, a few months after I first made his acquaintance, I saw that Berlioz was beginning to be accepted as the head and chief of the unappreciated geniuses of Paris. He was unappreciated, it is true. But like a man who might easily be so. Berlioz raised the non-appreciation of talent to a dignity, for the appreciation, nay, the profound admiration, of a large circle caused the want of appreciation to appear so glaring and so unlovable that it obtained for its object new friends every day. This compensation would have sufficed to make a man of a more philosophical disposition feel happier. The delicate sense of the Parisians (I mean of a certain class among them) was hurt and insulted at seeing an artist, who had at any rate given proof of eminent talent, glowing zeal, and high courage, persecuted, blamed, and plunged in poverty. And Frenchmen are not contented with merely loving quietly and platonically; with wishing a friend every possible kind of good fortune, and then leaving matters to take their own course. They are active, set about a thing in good earnest, and do not require to be adjured in the name of everything that is holy to open their lips for the purpose of uttering a few enthusiastic words for an unappreciated artist needful of praise. The French government, in the person of Count Gasparin, one of the ministers, made a beginning, and ordered of Berlioz a Requiem (a work, by the way, full of magnificent things), and subsequently the funeral music for the interment of those who fell in July, — also, of its kind, an admirable tone-painting, only not so well known. Meanwhile, all more or less gifted, more or less unappreciated, art disciples and apprentices ranged themselves around their honored chief. They were apostles, clients, and business men given to Berlioz by nature. It was especially members of other professions who were attracted towards him, — when not by his music, by his poetic intentions and picturesque programmes. Nearly all the painters (who as a rule have a taste for music), engravers, sculptors, and architects were numbered among his adherents. To these must be added many of the best poets and romance writers, such as Victor Hugo, Lamartine, Dumas, De Vigny, Balzac; the painters Delacroix, Ary Scheffer, etc., who saw in him, and very justly, an adept of the romantic school. All these great writers, who had not a spark of music in themselves, and who, in the most solemn scenes of their dramas, had a waltz by Strauss played to heighten the emotion or terror, — it is true the waltz was played in a slow and solemn manner, with mutes and a certain amount of tremolo, — all these men raved about Berlioz, and demonstrated their sympathy by their words and their writings. Lastly, with all these active propagandists of the quasi-unappreciated Berlioz was allied a section — small, indeed, but influential — of the fashionable and elegant world, people who desired to obtain at a cheap rate the reputation of freethinkers. They were not capable of distinguishing a sonata of Wauhal's or Diabelli's from one of Beethoven's, but they cried out against the criminal sensuousness of modern music; they ridiculed those of their own station who reveled in Meyerbeer, Rossini, and Auber, and prophesied the destruction of such vicious, short-skirted melodies, and the victory of a new, world-moving, sublime, and eternally virile art.

¹ Addressed to Dr. Hanalek, and published by him in the Neue freie Presse. Translated in the London Musical World.

If now you add the not inconsiderable number of good and genuine musicians capable of understanding the really bold and grandiose, the frequently wonderful originality and the magical orchestration of his scores, you will allow that Berlioz did not live and work in such isolation as he was fond of asserting. From 1838, the instances growing more frequent with the course of time, detached pieces of his symphonies found brilliant, nay general, recognition. They were encored and tumultuously applauded. I will mention merely the "Marche au Supplice" in the Symphonie Fantastique, the "Marche des Pèlerins" and the "Sérénade dans les Abruzzes" in Harold en Italie, the party at Capulet's in Roméo et Juliette, several things from La Fuite en Egypte, the overture to the Carnival Romain, etc. That much of high significance in his works was only slightly successful cannot be denied. But to how many equally great, nay greater, artists has this not happened? There was scarcely ever an artist so much a stranger to anything like resignation, that German virtue, as Berlioz, and it was in vain that I played the part of a German Plutarch, relating to him traits from the lives of such men as Weber, Mozart, Beethoven, Schubert, Schiller (whom he liked very much), etc.

He often complained bitterly and compared his own successes with those of the then popular composers for the stage; but whenever he did so, I used to say to him: "My good friend, you want too much; you want everything. You despise the general public, and yet want them to admire you. You despise, in virtue of your right as a noble-minded and original artist, the approbation of the majority, and yet you bitterly experience the want of it. You wish to be a bold innovator, an opener-up of new paths; but, at the same time, you desire to be understood and valued by all. You desire to please only the noblest and the strongest, and yet you are angry at the coldness of the indifferent — at the insufficiency of the weak. Do you not desire to be solitary, inaccessible, and poor, like Beethoven, and yet surrounded by the great and the little ones of this world — loaded with all the gifts of fortune, with honors, with titles, and with offices? You have attained what the nature of your talent and of your whole being can attain. You have not the majority on your side, but an intellectual minority exerts itself to uphold and encourage you. You have achieved for yourself a thoroughly special place in the world of art; you possess many enthusiastic friends — nor are you, thank God, without redoubtable foes, who keep your friends vigilant. Your material means of existence have, thank goodness, been assured for several years; and, finally, you may with certainty reckon on something hitherto valued by all men of mind and heart — the more thorough recognition which posterity has in store for you." I often succeeded in reviving his spirits, a fact he always admitted with friendly and touching words. I remember with especial pleasure one particular instance. We were spending the evening as the guests of B. Damcke — also one of those now no more — and of his wife, whose goodness of heart and kind hospitality Berlioz gratefully mentions in his Memoirs. We were in the habit of meeting there nearly every evening, Berlioz, J. d'Ortigue (a learned writer on musical and literary history), Léon Kreutzer, and others. We used to chat, criticise, and play music, freely and without constraint. This little circle, also, has been thinned by death; latterly Berlioz and myself were the only members of it left. Well, one evening that Berlioz again began his old lament, I answered him in the manner described above. I finished my sermon; it was eleven o'clock, and the cold December night outside was dark and dreary. Tired and out of sorts, I lighted a cigar. Suddenly, Berlioz started up with youthful alacrity from the sofa on which he was accustomed to stretch himself in his muddy boots, to the secret anguish of the cleanly and order-loving Damcke. "Ha!" he cried, "Heller is right — is not he? He is always right. He is good, he is clever, he is just and wise; I will embrace him," he continued, kissing me on both cheeks, "and propose to the sage a piece of folly." — "I am ready for any such act," I replied. "What do you propose?" — Let us go and sup together at Bignon's" (a celebrated restaurateur's at the corner of the Chaussée d'Antin). "I did not make a very good dinner, and your sermon has inspired me with a desire for immortality and a few dozen oysters." — "All right," I replied, "we will drink the health of Beethoven, and that of Lucullus too; we will drown and forget in the noblest wines of France, with pâtés de foie gras to match, the sorrows which vex our souls." — "Our host," said Berlioz, "can stop at home, for he has a charming wife. We, however, who are not so blessed, will be off to the wine-shop — I will hear no objection! The matter is settled." The old, fiery Berlioz was once more awakened within him. So we sauntered, arm in arm, joking and laughing, down the long Rue Blanche and the equally long Chaussée d'Antin, and entered the brilliantly-lighted restaurant. It struck half-past eleven, and there were very few customers in the place, a fact at which we were well pleased. We ordered oysters, pâtés de foie gras, a cold fowl, salad, fruit, and some of the best champagne and most genuine Bordeaux.

Berlioz, as well as myself, was the more inclined to do all honor to this admirable repast because, like me, he was usually very moderate and simple in his mode of living. At one o'clock the gas was extinguished, and the waiters glided gapingly about us (we were quite alone; the other customers had left) as if to remind us that we ought to go. The doors were closed and wax candles brought. "Waiter!" exclaimed Berlioz, "you are trying by all kinds of pantomimic action to make us believe it is late. Let me beg you, however, to bring us two demi-tasses of coffee and some real Havana cigars." So we went on till two o'clock. "At present," said Berlioz, "we will be off, for my mother-in-law is now in her best sleep and I have well-founded hopes that I shall wake her up." During supper we spoke of our favorites, Beethoven, Shakespeare, Lord Byron, Heine, and Gluck, and continued to do so as we slowly walked the long distance to his house, which was not far from mine. This was the last merry, lively social evening I spent with him. Unless I am mistaken, it was in 1867 or 1868.

It was in the same year that he was seized with a sort of passion for reading Shakespeare, in the French translation, to some few friends. We used to meet at his lodgings at eight o'clock in the evening, and he would read us some seven or eight pieces.

He read well, but was frequently very greatly moved; in especially fine passages the tears used to course down his cheeks. He would, however, still go on and hastily wipe away his tears so as not to interfere with the reading. The only persons present on such occasions were the Damckes and two or three other friends. One of the latter, an old and well-tried comrade of Berlioz's, but with no great literary culture, undertook of his own accord the office of a claqueur. He listened with profound attention and endeavored to discover in the countenances of the other members of the audience and of the reader the right moment for manifesting his enthusiasm. As he did not venture to applaud, he invented an original method for expressing his approval. Every extraordinarily fine passage, delivered and received with deep emotion, was accompanied on his part by the half audible emission of some oath or other usually heard among the lower classes and in the workshops. Thus, after the poet's most touching scenes we were greeted with: "Nom d'un nom! Nom d'une pipe! S . . . matin!" After this had been repeated some dozen times, Berlioz, suddenly bursting out angrily, and breaking off in the middle of a verse, thundered forth: "Ah ça, voulez-vous bien f . . . le camp avec vos nom d'une pipe!" Hereupon the offender, pale with dismay, took to flight, and Berlioz with perfect composure resumed the balcony scene in Roméo et Juliette. — What I once told you touching Berlioz's short musical memory referred to modern music, with which he was not very familiar. But he retained well the music he had studied. Such music included more especially Beethoven's orchestral works (he was not so well up in the quartets and piano-forte pieces); then the operas of Gluck and Spontini, as likewise those of Grétry, Méhul, Dalayrac, and Monsigny. Despite his marvelous hatred of Rossini, he was a warm admirer of two of that master's scores: Le Comte Ory and Il Barbiere di Siviglia. Berlioz was one of those genuine artists who are carried away and moved to tears by every production which is in its way perfect. I was with him at Adelina Patti's first appearance here in Il Barbiere. You will believe me when I assure you that, in the most joyous and most charming passages of the work, his eyes were suffused with tears. But what shall I say about Die Zauberflöte, which also I heard in company with him! He entertained a sort of childish indignation for what he termed Mozart's culpable concessions. By these he meant Don Ottavio's air, Donna Anna's air in F, and the famous bravura airs of the Queen of Night. Nothing could induce him to acknowledge the excellence of these pieces, apart from their dramatic value, which is certainly not as great as that of many others. But how truly delighted was I to see the deep and powerful impression the opera produced on him. He had often heard it before, but whether he was in a better frame of mind, or whether the work was better represented, he said the music had never previously penetrated so profoundly into his heart. Nay, his exaltation in two or three instances became so loud that our neighbors in the stalls, who were picking their teeth and wanted quietly to digest their dinner, complained of such "indiscreet" enthusiasm.

One evening at a quartet concert we heard Beethoven's Quartet in E minor. We were seated in a distant corner of the room. While I was listening to this wonderful work, my feelings were those of a devout Roman Catholic who hears mass with deep piety and fervor, but, at the same time, with calmness and clear consciousness; the sublime feeling he experiences has been long familiar to him. Berlioz, on the other hand, resembled a neophyte; a kind of joyous dread at the sacred and sweet secret revealed to him was mixed up with his devotion. His countenance beamed with transport during the Adagio—he was, so to speak, transfigured. Some other fine works were set down for performance, but we left, and I accompanied him to his house. The Adagio still reëchoed prayer-like in our souls. Not a word was exchanged between us. On my taking leave of him, he grasped my hand and said: "Cet homme avait tout . . . et nous n'avons rien."

At that moment he was crushed, annihilated, by the gigantic grandeur of "cet homme."—One more short anecdote: Near the house where Damcke resided, in the Rue Mansard, there was an especially large white stone laid down in the pavement. Every evening that we returned from the Rue Mansard, Berlioz used to place himself on this stone as he wished me good-night. One evening (a few months before his last illness) we bade each other good-by in a hurried fashion, for it was cold, and a thick, yellow fog hung over the streets. We were already ten paces' distance from each other, when I heard Berlioz crying out: "Heller! Heller! Where are you? Come back! I did not bid you good-night on the white stone." We came together again and began looking about in the pitch-dark night for the indispensable stone, which, by the way, had among other characteristics a peculiar shape. I took out my matches, but they would not light in the damp air. We both groped about the pavement until at last the weather-beaten stone gleamed on us. Placing his foot with the greatest seriousness on it, Berlioz said: "Thank God! I am standing on it. Now, then, good-night!" And so say I to you, my dear sir. My pen ran away with me—I could not pull it up. STEPHEN HELLER.

JOSEPH JOACHIM.

(From the Peether Lloyd.)

THE eminent master of the violin is once again stopping in our midst, and great is the feeling of pleasure and delight among the friends of art in the Hungarian capital, to whose lot it has fallen once more to enjoy the rarely occurring treat of hearing, after a long, a too long interval, Joseph Joachim, the celebrated son of our native land. A decennium has elapsed since he last entranced us with the display of his artistic power. How often have we since then yearned to hear him! A few years ago he was in Vienna, and we thought we might hope that, remembering his home, at so short a distance off, and his faithful, devoted admirers, he would gladden us with a visit,—but our hopes were vain! Let us, however, leave the past and rejoice in the present, which has at length so generously favored us by fulfilling our long-cherished wish. Let us congratulate ourselves on seeing the well-loved master, fresh in mind and body, among us, surrounded by his old admirers, and received with feelings of pleased expectation by all those who will now become acquainted with and hear him for the first time. The former do not need to be informed what Joachim is and of what kind is his artistic significance. A conviction of the great artist's extraordinary worth must spontaneously have forced, and forever impressed, itself on all who at any period in their lives heard him. But, at the present time, when men live so quickly and forget so quickly, it will not be superfluous shortly to characterize Joachim's significance, fully and completely to realize the value of him whose appearance to-day is an event in the musical existence of our capital. We do not possess among our contemporaries so many heroes in the world of art that, in the case of this great one among the great, we should not like to dwell awhile on the thankful remembrance of what we have received from him.

What is it, then, which raises Joachim above all his predecessors, the most celebrated violinists of the century,—which precludes all comparison between his artistdom and the virtuosity of Paganini, Ernst, Lipinski, Beriot, and even Vieuxtemps, and which stamps him as undoubtedly superior to the most eminent living masters of the violin? Joachim is greater than all these because, to express the matter briefly, he possesses a style of his own. It is significant that, in Joachim's case, we never think of the virtuoso. Are his technical capability and development inferior, then, to those of any among the artists above named? Not at all. If the sign of perfect virtuosity consists in playful facility and unerring certainty, Joachim is surpassed by no one. But it is not this, or at least not this alone, which renders him the first among the great ones in his art. His high musical significance is rooted in the depth and grandeur of his conception and execution, both of which together cause the act of the executive artist, reproduction, as an independent product of no small artistic value, to appear like an important musical creation. As the interpreter of the musical classical writers for the violin, Joachim is more than a mere player, he is a plastic artist; he fashions, while others are satisfied with reproducing what already exists.

It is here plainly perceptible how eminent art individualities contain in themselves the incentive for the clearing up of complicated artistic problems. Joachim's artistic peculiarity is connected with one of the innermost questions of musical æsthetics, the much disputed difference between executive and creative art. In an essay written with considerable cleverness, Franz Liszt once refused to recognize this difference. Some persons may feel inclined to explain this view, for which, be it observed, there are weighty reasons, by the well-known variance between Liszt the virtuoso and Liszt the composer; but, even when it may not be so glaringly apparent, we agree with Hegel's clear definition of virtuosity (in his Æsthetik), and concede the possibility of creatively fashioning, independent, reproduction. This may be characterized as the acme of artistic perfection, as the privilege of genius, for whom the secret of the inmost sanctuary of art has been thrown open. Such reproduction appropriates the musical material as the mere background on which to execute its own intellectual work. It is this which breathes into the composer's tone-outline glowing life, which bestows shape on the composer's creations, and permeates them with its own individuality. In such a sense we may certainly speak of an independently active power of reproduction, which gives forth nothing on which it has not impressed the intellectual stamp of its artistic self.

This is what most popular virtuosos on the violin have been unable to do! They have been able to dazzle and to fascinate; with daring feats of enormous executive skill to throw the great mass of concert-goers into transports and ecstasy. Even they, despite their want of true intensity and of artistic intention, have rendered indisputable service; they have brought to perfection the technical means of expression, and contributed powerfully towards popularizing art. But for intellectual deeds, which have advanced the interests of art itself, we look to them in vain. In their case, the artist's individuality is still identified with his performance; this is the condition of merely interesting subjectivity. It was reserved for Joachim to create, on an essentially different and ever enduring basis, a new kind of virtuosity, and to bring out in the latter that objectivity which bears in itself the mark of the classical, that objectivity which, in plastic art, we admire in the model works of Greek sculptors.

There are players who play in a subjectively fine manner. Every note speaks and every phrase is intelligible. But the expression of the whole picture strikes us as changed, as strange. And there are players who play in an objectively fine manner; with whom all is harmony (in the highest sense), calm, clear, and distinguished; with whom all is finished and complete in itself, and these are the true artists.

Perfection of form, steady, calm completeness, plasticity of expression, such are the classical elements in the art of execution. All technical mastery is a mere means for the expression of truth, that is, of something very different from mere brilliant virtuosity. Intellectual penetration for the details of a whole constitutes the genius of execution. But genius requires high intelligence as much as it requires stern artistic training. "Every one who thinks that genius can be without understanding," says Jean Paul, "thinks without understanding himself."

The purity and nobleness of his artistic sentiment are the most admirable traits in Joachim's character. Whatever he plays is pure truth, clear and sterling, like his whole nature, his appearance, and the entire course of his long, glorious, and beneficial efforts in the service of art. Joachim never plays for effect; he plays for the piece. His absolute calm and imperturbability, together with his classical demeanor, set the finishing touch on his virtuosity. The masses do not always know how to appreciate this objectivity. It does not excite and carry them away, as do the inspiration and lightning-like manifestation of genial fancy. But the mild light of this vestal fire on the altar of art is none the less brilliant.

The task of the instrumental virtuoso consists in rendering a composition intelligible to the hearer; more intelligible than as a rule it can possibly be. This means a great deal. "A man cannot write everything down," said Meyerbeer once regretfully, when asked for directions, affecting even the slightest details, as to the gradations of light and shade which he desired. Of Bach's works we possess nothing authentic but the notes; none of the usual signs; not even the specification of the time, which would come from himself. Everything relating to the style of execution, the degree of force, the tempo, the rhythm, and the césura, the performer must obtain from the commentaries, if he is so inclined, or from himself! The decisive part of this process is always the grasping of the musical purport of the idea. This is something which concerns the intelligence, an intellectual process. In this again lies Joachim's greatness. The psychological conception of a musical composition, the congenial insight into the composer's intentions, though buried far below the surface, — this is what marks Joachim as destined to be the interpreter of the musical classics, of the Bachs and the Beethovens. That artist more than any other will always be the classical Bach-performer who masters with calm certainty the mighty forms of musical architectonics. Bach's music is an intellectual chalybeate spring which comforts, strengthens, and preserves us from being enervated by the luscious music of the present. Before many days have passed we shall once again hear it performed by Joachim, though we shall, it is true, hear only one piece, the world-renowned Chaconne, but we shall have an opportunity of admiring in it his grandiose conception, the plasticity of his expression, the nobleness and volume of his tone. Unfortunately we are not fated, during his present visit, to hear the gem of all his efforts, his performance of Beethoven's Violin Concerto, a loss for which nothing can indemnify us. A clever writer on music, Otto Gumprecht, of Berlin, the musical critic of the National Zeitung, says in reference to this: "For the first time I have brought away with me from a performance an impression of absolute perfection. Even in the very smallest details we had a most true and inspired reproduction of the work, a reproduction in which every component part, including the grand interpolated cadence in the first movement, seemed a factor necessitated by the inward nature of the production. There was nothing superfluous, no empty virtuoso-like ornamentation, but everything, every staccato, crescendo, sforzato, was justified by the work as a whole. After the concert it struck me that the greatest wonders of bravura had passed by unheeded: double-stopping, chromatic runs in octaves, and I know not what else; but during the performance I scarcely noticed all this, for the virtuoso is here merged completely in the artist; the former is utterly concealed by the latter. Our city must not allow this master of the violin to leave us, but secure him permanently, no matter at what price."

The wish has been fulfilled. Joachim resides in Berlin, where, both in the concert-room and in the High School of Music under his direction, there is the grandest field for his exertions. An imposing array of gifted and accomplished young artists honor in him their master, who has brought them up in the traditions of the classical school.

It need scarcely be mentioned that Joachim, who above all things values with unshakable fidelity and truthfulness the purity of music, is opposed to the destructive tendencies of the New German School. Just as he is the most characteristic among the virtuosos of the present, just as during the whole of his long professional career he has preserved immaculate the purity of a true priest of art, his place in the musical life of the present day is not amid the turmoil of those engaged in struggling with each other, but in that sanctuary whither the noise of the every-day world and the strife of party do not penetrate, and before which the mighty names of musical history, Bach and Beethoven, keep guard like the cherubim with swords of flame.

MAX SCHÜTZ.

LORENZO SALVI.

THE death of Lorenzo Salvi, the once famous tenor, is announced. It is now nearly thirty years ago that the lovers of music in this city became enthusiastic over the singing of Salvi, but there are doubtless many who retain affectionate recollections of him, and who will learn of his death with a feeling almost of personal loss.

Lorenzo Salvi was born at Bergamo, Italy, in 1812. His first appearance as a public singer was at Rome, in 1832, and during the next few years he sang in Naples, Venice, and Vienna with great success. In 1846 he visited Moscow and St. Petersburg, and two years later he appeared in London. In 1849 he was induced to visit Havana by Signor Marti, a well-known theatrical manager of that day, and the following year he was brought to New York by Max Maretzek. His first appearance here was at the Astor Place Opera House. Afterward he was engaged at Castle Garden and at Niblo's. He remained here for several months and then went to Mexico with his manager. In 1851 he returned to Italy by way of New York. He continued to sing for several years, and visited Spain and other countries; but about ten years ago he retired from the stage and has since resided at Bologna.

As a singer, Salvi was regarded as the best tenor of his time; and by those who knew him most intimately, it is claimed that, with the exception of Mario, he was the best tenor upon the American stage. His voice was not very strong, but it was clear and sweet, and was cultivated in a rare degree. He was a tall, finely formed and very handsome man; and his personal attractions, united with the magic of his voice, were sufficient to captivate any audience. He made his debut here in La Favorita, and from the first his success was marvelous. In other operas he was equally as popular as in La Favorita. He was the first to give Meyerbeer's Prophet in this country. He also sang here in Maria di Rohan, by Donizetti, which was written expressly for him. When Jenny Lind came to this country, Mr. Barnum secured Salvi as the tenor of the company, although it required an almost fabulous sum to induce him to abandon his engagement with Maretzek. His success in New York and his engagement with Barnum soon filled his purse, but the money was spent as easily and almost as soon as it was obtained.

The condition of his countrymen in this city aroused Salvi's warmest sympathy, and he did what he could to relieve their distress, and to put them on the road to prosperity. Among his many plans for their benefit, the attempt to establish a number of them in business on Staten Island was characteristic of the man, and eventually cost him all that he was worth. It was during his most prosperous days that he purchased or leased an estate on Staten Island and started a large candle manufactory, the business being conducted by several of his countrymen. He also fitted up in the house rooms for himself and some of his intimate friends. One room was prepared especially for Garibaldi, who was then here, and for whom Salvi entertained warm affection. These rooms were the scene of many meetings of Italian patriots as also of many a convivial party.

In the winter of 1850, Salvi went to Mexico with Max Maretzek, but the venture did not prove a profitable one. After a few months he returned to New York without funds. He found that the factory had not been successfully conducted, and the men to whom he had confided it had sold or mortgaged the entire property. His bad fortune had a depressing effect upon his spirits, and he determined to return to Italy. He refused all proffered engagements here, and no persuasion of his friends could turn him from his purpose to seek his native land. The money for the voyage was furnished by one of his friends, who is still a resident of this city, and in the fall of 1851 Salvi left this country never to return.

To the general American public Salvi was not so well known as many foreign singers who have visited the country since his departure. His stay here was comparatively short, and, except in New York, he sang mostly in company with Jenny Lind, whose fame overshadowed his own. — N. Y. Tribune, March 15.

TALKS ON ART. — SECOND SERIES.¹

FROM INSTRUCTIONS OF MR. WILLIAM M. HUNT TO HIS PUPILS.

III.

THE lines of action in that boy's head and shoulders are not right. See how comfortably the shoulder comes up to meet the face, and how easy the action is! An easy thing like that ought to be done easily. You can't do it by getting frightened and worried about it. And see how little difficulty there is in setting it right! Get the action right before you finish it at all. The action is the truly important thing, and you can't add it to your finish if you get that first.

It is not that I don't want you to finish things. Carry them just as far as you like, but do have something right to start upon. Hardly anybody can change the action after a picture is carried far. It is sometimes done, but is hardly ever possible. Besides, in a figure like that boy's, the slouch and ease with which he sits are the native things about him.

I'm dreadfully afraid that they'll beat you at the Art Museum School. There they are made to be as careful as can be about all their drawing. Perhaps I should have done better to have begun so with you. I preferred to show you how to make pictures, and to will you to learn, and to give you as much of my own life as I could. And that's a good way, if you'll take pains about the important things. But not one in a dozen of you ever uses a vertical line. You don't know what it is to dig.

Look at that boy now! See the ease of that slouch! It's as royal as Henry the Eighth. And see how his arms make a wreath together, and how his body is like part of another wreath! It would be very hard to draw that. Knowledge of the figure would not do it, and yet it could not be done without it. Prudhon could do little fellows like him. If you can't see the humanity in such a thing, and feel it too, it isn't worth while to draw it.

You must find something that you really care for, and do it. I remember that little dead bird of yours. That had a meaning of its own, and that's what I want you to try to express. Otherwise there's no use in learning. I remember men in Paris who used to work in the ateliers for nine or ten years, and produce nothing of their own. They could draw the figure well enough, — worse, perhaps, as they went on; but nothing would come of it.

I want you to apply what I've said to yourselves individually, and find what you have to express. I don't want you to think that continual instruction is all that you need; that you are to go on for years having things told you, and accomplishing next to nothing. You ought to have something of your own to express; to work patiently on it, and do with it as well as you can. Remember why you are studying. Our plan is right, but you must accomplish something with it.

¹ Copyright, 1879, by Helen M. Knowlton.

Whistler was quite right in prosecuting Ruskin. Such criticism should not be allowed — endangering a man's chance of earning his bread — for all the English follow Ruskin like sheep. Whistler is an excellent painter. When he works, he works like a tiger. I saw at Rossetti's house a picture of his, a beach, and supposed that it was done in a day, it was painted so simply and freshly; but Rossetti told me that he had worked over parts of it again and again before he was satisfied with it.

Whistler's pamphlet calls out a lot of silly replies; but not one that is a real answer. He paints his pictures, and is called a conceited puppy and a coxcomb. He publishes a ten-cent pamphlet in order to defend himself, and now the critics fall upon him and call his talk "nonsense, — worse than his pictures," etc. But not one of them can answer him, nor can they write a pamphlet for which anybody would pay ten cents.

The way to criticise is to do something better yourself; to show what you mean. It's the producers we care for, not for the men who go about abusing other people.

All the world laughs at chromos, but each of those very people has a chromo enshrined in his very heart as a standard by which to run down pictures. Talk about a skeleton in a closet! It is n't anything to a chromo.

When you want to catch a lion you must go at night and alone.

"Is there any good book about drawing oxen?"

No, there is n't any book but out-of-doors.

Dwight's Journal of Music.

SATURDAY, APRIL 12, 1879.

AUGUST KREISSMANN.

THE sad news comes from Germany to many friends in Boston of the death of this excellent artist, this long-suffering, generous, noble man; the founder and for many years conductor of the Orpheus Society, the oldest of our part-song clubs; for a long time our best vocal exponent of the songs of Franz, as well as of Schubert, Schumann, Mendelssohn and others; an inspiring teacher of singing, who initiated his pupils into the love of what is best in music; distinguished for his warm and faithful friendships, his benevolence, his public spirit, his frank and manly independence, and beloved through many winning social qualities. He died on the 12th ult. at the age of fifty-six years, at Gera, in the principality of Reuss, where he has for several years been forced to reside by his terrible rheumatic sufferings, in the vain hope of cure. Only brief, illusive periods of comparative health and strength came to him; and at such moments his fine voice returned, so that he made a marked impression by his songs in several concerts, once winning the admiration of Liszt by his singing of the Franz songs in one of his private mornings at Weimar. — At a meeting of the Orpheus Society on the receipt of the news of his death, the following resolutions were adopted: —

Resolved, That by the death of August Kreissmann the society loses one of its most loved and honored members;

one whose services as conductor were freely given for many years; one whose influence was powerful in the early days, when strong men were needed; one whose musical knowledge aided in placing the society on the firm basis of art, and one whose generous and manly character endeared him to every member.

Resolved, That the progress of music in this city, and throughout the country, is largely indebted to his energetic efforts, and to the enthusiastic spirit which he infused into the drill of the male chorus, and that every existing musical organization has found its pathway smoothed by the steady and unselfish labors of the first conductor of the Orpheus.

Resolved, That in recalling his natural gifts and his culture as a singer in connection with his learning and experience in the science of music, we appreciate the power of the fortunate combination, and acknowledge the great services he was able to render.

Resolved, That we tender our profound sympathy to his widow and his son in their great and irreparable loss.

Resolved, That the officers of the Orpheus be requested to convene the singing members on some evening to be named for the purpose of joining in a simple memorial musical service in the presence of the whole society.

THE WORKS OF PALESTRINA.

THE indefatigable choir-master of Ratisbon (Regensburg) Cathedral, Rev. F. X. Haberl, is engaged on a work of truly colossal dimensions, being nothing less than the publication, by subscription, of a complete edition of the works of Giovanni Pierluigi da Palestrina. An extract from his Prospectus will explain the plan, which surely needs no commendation: —

"The renowned publishing firm of Breitkopf & Haertel, in Leipzig, has for some years past been elaborating a plan for giving to the world a splendid monumental edition of all the works of the immortal master and Princeps Musicae, the so-called Palestrina. Six volumes are now ready, beautifully brought out, in exactly the same style as the world-renowned editions of the works of J. S. Bach, G. F. Handel, L. van Beethoven, etc. By a contract entered into with the undersigned, Breitkopf & Haertel undertakes to publish all the works of Palestrina, about thirty-six volumes, by the year 1894, the tercentenary celebration of Pierluigi's death, provided three hundred subscribers can be found to constitute a Palestrina society. I therefore earnestly hope that you and friends may join in this undertaking. The only condition stipulated is that as soon as the requisite number of subscribers shall have been found, each shall pay a yearly subscription of twenty marks ($5.00). In return the subscribers shall receive each year two volumes of from 160 to 170 pages, large folio size, and can have eventually through me the six volumes already published at ten marks, ($2.50) each. This subscription is not enforced until the full number of three hundred subscribers is completed. Payment beforehand will not be received."

Further information, for the benefit of any who may be interested in the publication on our side of the Atlantic, comes to us in the following circular appended to Father Haberl's Prospectus: —

The modest manifesto gives a very inadequate idea of the work undertaken. The thirty-six volumes will comprise all the masses of Palestrina, ninety-three in number, of which only sixteen have ever been published in modern form. These will occupy fourteen to sixteen volumes. There will be six or eight volumes of motets, over four hundred in number: one volume of Hymns for four voices; two volumes of Lamentations, for four, five, and six voices; one volume of Magnificats, for four, five, six, and eight voices; one volume of Litanies for four, six, and eight voices; and finally, two to three volumes of Madrigals, for four and five voices. These volumes, moreover, are brought out in Breitkopf & Haertel's best style, large folio size, splendid paper, and clear, distinct musical type. Again, the privilege accorded by our late Holy Father to Father Haberl of examining and copying the archives of the Sistine Chapel — a privilege denied to all previous petitioners — gives the advantage of being able to guarantee the authenticity of the genuine works of Palestrina, as well as to eliminate all that might be doubtful or spurious. The Reverend Editor has authorized the undersigned to receive subscriptions from North America. Intending subscribers will therefore kindly send their names and addresses to me, and I shall forward them to the Father Haberl without delay. Should any wish to have the six volumes already published, I will undertake to order them.

Ecclesiastical colleges and seminaries and musical libraries should not be unprovided with this splendid work, and the smallness of the subscription spread over such a long period — fifteen years — will, I doubt not, complete the list of three hundred in a very short time.

The net price of each volume to subscribers of the United States is $3.50, including the expenses for carriage and delivery, etc.; to non-subscribers $4.75, so that subscribers save $1.25 on each volume, or $45.00 on the entire work.

J. SINGENBERGER,

Professor of Music and President of the American St. Cecilia Society, St. Francis Station, Milwaukee Co., Wis.

CONCERTS.

WE must look back again to pick up a few performances, mostly of piano-forte music, which we had no room to notice in our last. These were: —

March 5. A Soirée Musicale at the Knabe Piano-forte Rooms, by Mr. John Orth, pianist, Mr. Wulf Fries, cellist, Miss Fanny Kellogg, soprano, with Mme. Dietrich Strong for an excellent accompanist. These artists are too well known to need our praise; so, as we were unable to be present, we will simply give the programme, which is unexceptionable: —

Piano Duet, Overture to "Rosamunde" . . . Schubert.
Cello Soli:

(a) Aria Lotti.
(b) Capriccio Golttermann.

Aria, "As when the dove laments her love." . . . Handel.
From "Acis and Galatea,"

Sonata, in E-flat major, Op. 7 Beethoven.
Allegro, Molto, Largo, Allegro, Rondo.

Piano and Cello Duet, two pieces Rubinstein.
Song, "Tender and True" Morison.

Polonaise, E-flat major, Op. 22 Chopin.

March 21. Mr. S. LIEBLING, one of the most painstaking and enthusiastic among the younger pianists who have established themselves in Boston within a few years, gave a concert at Union Hall with the following programme: —

Sonata, for Piano (Op. 7) Grieg.
Allegro, Adagio, Minuetto, Finale.

Mr. S. Liebling.
Aria, "Bei diesem schönen Händchen" Mozart.

Mr. Clarence E. Hay.
Fantaisie, for Violin, "Faust" Wieniawski.

Mr. Albert Van Raelte.
(a) Rondo in C (from Weber's Sonata, Op. 24) Brahms.

(As a study for the left hand).
(b) Ballade (Op. 47) Chopin.

Mr. S. Liebling.
Aria, from "Don Giovanni" Mozart.

Miss Laura Schirmer.
Grand Fantaisie, for two Pianos (Op. 207, new) Raff.

(First time in Boston).
Messrs. B. F. Lang and S. Liebling.

Aria, "Honor and Arms," from "Samson" Handel.
Mr. Clarence E. Hay.

(a) "Thou art like unto a flower" Rubinstein.
(b) "Serenade" Raff.

Miss Laura Schirmer.
Soirée de Vienne (Nachtfalter) Tausig.

Mr. S. Liebling.

Mr. Liebling undoubtedly has talent and a strong feeling for music. He brings out the tones well, plays with vigor, and has great facility in rapid fingering. But there is sometimes more fire than discretion in his heroic execution; many passages are over-loud, and some are blurred by reckless inattention to the pedal, — a habit which it should not cost him much, being so musical, to unlearn. A certain crudity and want of judgment seems to be the present drawback in his playing. The Sonata, by Grieg, has some pleasing ideas, but did not leave a deep impression. Mr. Liebling was at his best in Weber's "Perpetuum mobile" (made into a study for the left hand), and in Tausig's willfully difficult arrangement of Strauss's "Nachtfalter" (Moth) waltz, which might be named "Nachtfalter" (nightmare or torture). We were not greatly interested in the new Fantasia by Raff, for two pianos, except as it was finely played by Mr. Lang and the concert-giver. The high opus number (207) suggests the question whether Raff is not turning out too much work of late.

Miss Laura Schirmer, with her attractive presence, her delicate, sweet voice, and grace of style, made her vocal contributions highly acceptable. "Vedrai carino" was given tenderly, but she entered more completely into the spirit of the songs by Rubinstein and Raff; the "Serenade," by the latter, is a lovely melody, and was interpreted in such a winning way that the singer was obliged to repeat it. Mr. Clarence E. Hay has a solid, telling, well-developed bass voice, which he used to good advantage in the Aria by Mozart, — a piece seldom if ever heard in our concert rooms, composed as an occasional piece for a singer in the part of Sarastro in the Zauberflöte, — but with more complete success in the heroic air from Samson, which he sang with great spirit and in a sustained and even style. Young Mr. Van Raalte is steadily developing into an artist as a solo player on the violin.

A very interesting concert was that given on the evening of March 24, at Union Hall, in compliment to Miss JOSEPHINE E. WARE, a modest, interesting maiden, yet in the middle of her teens, and one of the most gifted and truly musical of Mr. Sherwood's pupils. She certainly has made remarkable progress in piano-forte execution, and in the intelligent interpretation and expression of a high order of music for one so young. Her treatment of compositions by Bach and Handel, Beethoven, Schubert, Chopin, Schumann, Saint-Saëns, etc., was tasteful and sympathetic. All was neat and clear, well phrased, with plenty of both power and delicacy of touch, indeed a high degree of brilliancy and finish, while she entered into the spirit of each work. She began with a Prelude and Fugue in G, and a Gigue in D minor, by Bach, followed by a genial Fantasia in C by Handel. Next she played, with the artist-like accompaniment of Mr. C. N. Allen, the Sonata Duo for piano and violin, in C minor, by Beethoven, which went very satisfactorily. Another group of piano-forte solos consisted of the charming Minuet from Schubert's Sonata, Op. 78, the first Polonaise of Op. 26, by Chopin, and a captivating Mazourka (No. 2) by Saint-Saëns. These were followed by some characteristic little pieces, "im Volkston," by Schumann, for piano and 'cello (Mr. Wulf Fries), which were much enjoyed; and the concert closed with a brilliant if not particularly original Valse by Von Bülow.

The vocal numbers were sung by Miss S. E. Bingham, of Indianapolis, who has a beautiful contralto voice, giving evidence of good training, and who sang with unaffected, true expression and refinement, "Know'st thou the land?" from Gounod's Mignon, "Widmung" (Dedication), by Robert Franz, and "The Brook," by Schubert.

For both the young pianist and the singer the omens seem auspicious.

Before leaving the subject of piano-forte recitals, we may as well say what we have to say of a more recent one (April 4), at Chickering's Warerooms, by Mr. HENRY G. HANCHETT, an other advanced pupil of Mr. Sherwood's. It was an invited audience, completely filling the long room. Musical editors and critics were not only invited, but were challenged and instructed, through a very unique circular letter, to attend and to "report in unmistakable terms," whether the debutant is competent to "the position which he aims to fill," — that, namely, of "an exclusive pianist," that is to say, a pianist who can live by his virtuosity alone without having, like all other artists, great or small, to give lessons for his daily bread. He "wishes to record a decided success, or a total failure;" does "not mean to do half-way work," and does not want "half-way results," and there is nothing which he is so unwilling to face as "faint praise," not even "ignominious silence" on the part of the critics aforesaid.

We are really sorry for this silly faux pas on the part of a young man, who seems really to have talent and to be much in earnest about what he has undertaken. And yet it looks a little as if the ambition for worldly success were stronger in him than the real love of music, if he can give music up so easily unless rewarded with decided and immediate success. Moreover, the alternative which he demands on the part of his judges is an absurd one and impossible. There is no absolute success for any one, nor can there be a total failure for one who can execute such a programme as we give below in such a manner, both of technique and expression, as to win the recommendation of a teacher like Mr. Sherwood. It is asking too much of "the critics" that they should by jury vote determine a young aspirant's career for him; nor can he rely on such a vote with half the confidence he could upon a single wise and candid friend. This was the formidable programme: —

Das wohltemperirte Clavier Bach.
a. C minor, Book 1.
b. E-flat major, Book 2.
Sonata, Op. 2, No. 3, in C Beethoven.
Allegro con brio — Adagio.
Scherzo, Allegro — Finale, Allegro assai.
Les Preludes, Symphonie Poem Liszt.
(Arranged by the author for two pianos.)
Romanza from Op. 5 Saran.
Scherzo, Op. 31, D-flat major Chopin.
Kreisleriana, Op. 16, No. 3 Schumann.
Rigoletto — Paraphrase Liszt.

Now Mr. Hanchett, as we have said, showed talent and a certain kind of musical feeling and enthusiasm, — how fine or deep we would not undertake to say upon a single hearing. His playing was far from being altogether bad; it would be wrong to call it a "total failure;" it had many excellent qualities. He has great strength, rapidity and certainty of finger; he achieves long stretches of most difficult execution in a triumphant manner; phrases intelligibly, and has considerable light and shade. But there are great faults. In the Bach pieces he betrayed a continual tendency to hurry, making the movement uneven and spasmodic. In the Beethoven Sonata the quick movements were taken at an exaggerated tempo, making the little phrase of four sixteenth notes in thirds, in the first theme, sound like only three. And he is apt to pound the instrument with startling force. The strong, stern chords, to which the pleading, delicate figures respond in the Adagio, were made painfully and ruthlessly explosive like so many discharges of heavy ordnance. We thought him most successful in the Liszt paraphrase and in the arrangement of "Les Preludes," which his teacher played with him. We can thank him also for the opportunity of renewing acquaintance with that most original and beautiful Romanza from the Sonata-Fantaisie by Saran, though the interpretation rather lacked "true inwardness" (to use a vulgar cant term for what has a good meaning in the German). His selection from Schumann's Kreisleriana was one of the least familiar and very interesting.

We trust Mr. Hanchett will not be sickened by half praise, nor discouraged by even wholesale condemnation, but will continue to study and improve, winning success by gradual and sure steps, and reconciling himself to the conditions by which even the most gifted of performing artists have to live. A foolish letter should not be allowed to compromise his future.

HARVARD MUSICAL ASSOCIATION. — The eighth and last of the Symphony Concerts of the fourteenth season fell upon about the stormiest and most disagreeable day of the whole winter; yet the audience was much the largest and the best of the season. And the close and deeply interested attention paid to the very end of a concert of unusual length (two hours and twenty minutes), to a programme which would have been called "heavy" a few years ago, was the most hopeful omen we have seen for a long time as to our prospects for orchestral music, by our own local orchestra, in coming seasons. It was the crowning success of a series of truly noble and delightful concerts, recognized as such by all who have attended them. Indeed this series, although the pecuniary support has still fallen short of the expenses, which have been put upon the most economical footing, has involved a comparatively small loss, while it has gone far to win back the old favor with which these concerts used to be regarded, and to convince our musical citizens of the ability and of the pains-taking zeal of our musicians and their indefatigable conductor. Considering the hard times and how poorly musical entertainments generally have paid, the Symphony Concerts may be said to have succeeded. They have revived public faith in such things, and it will be strange if means and measures be not found before another season for putting them upon a generous and permanent footing.

This success must be credited in a great measure to the generous conduct of the members of the orchestra, who have rehearsed with unusual fidelity and zeal at a reduced rate of pay, and have even given extra rehearsals of their own accord purely for the sake of doing justice to some new and difficult work. The same unselfish spirit has been shown — the same devotion to the concerts for the sake of keeping them alive, and from the patriotic motive of Art culture — by the solo artists who have so enriched the programmes. It is a mistake to suppose, as we have seen often intimated in the newspapers, that the revival of interest in the concerts, and the marked improvement in the playing of the orchestra, has been due to any "new departure" in the policy of the managing committee, such as the infusion of a greater variety of elements, a larger proportion of "new music," etc., into the programmes. The amount of new music given has been just about the same as for several seasons past; the preponderance of standard classical works has hardly varied, and the complexion of the programmes has undergone scarcely any change that is perceptible. But somehow, since formidable competition was withdrawn, the public has been in a more reasonable and receptive mood towards our own local efforts, and our musicians have heartily exerted themselves to do their best; and verily they have their reward, for henceforth their good-will and their competency will be believed in. — If anybody doubts the good achieved by such a series of concerts and rehearsals, let him pay attention this week to the performance of Bach's "Passion Music," and ask himself where we could have looked for an orchestra so well prepared to take hold of its difficult accompaniments at such short notice, but for this season's training in the symphonies and other master-works?

The audience poured out, lingeringly, from the hall, exchanging congratulations on the finest and most interesting concert of some seasons in spite of its great length and the solid character of these selections: —

Heroic Symphony, No. 3, in E-flat, Op. 55 Beethoven.
Allegro con brio — Marcia funebre — Scherzo — Finale.
Piano-forte Concerto, in A minor, Op. 54 Schumann.
Allegro affettuoso — Intermezzo (Andantino grazioso) — Allegro vivace.
Franz Rummel.
Overture to "Preciosa" Weber.
Fantasia on Hungarian Airs, for piano-forte with orchestra Liszt.
Franz Rummel.
Overture to "Leonora," No. 3, in C Beethoven.

The Heroic Symphony, which, with all its grandeur and its wealth of beautiful, original ideas, has often been found "heavy" and fatiguing to an audience, — partly no doubt on account of its great length, nearly an hour, — was this time listened to with eager interest throughout. It has seldom if ever been so well presented in this city; if there was room for finer finish in detail, the life and true Beethoven fire of the great work were eloquently and convincingly brought out. For this is the symphony in which Beethoven first went his own way entirely and left the leading strings of his great models; then his genius, his full individuality shone out with startling brilliancy. All the movements went well; particularly the Marcia Funèbre, which had just the right solemnity of movement without dragging. As the great symphony opened and gave the tone to the concert, so the great Beethoven Overture, the ever welcome "Leonora" No. 3, formed the last word of the concert and the season. This, too, was finely played, as was the charming gypsy overture of Weber, furnishing a bright diversion in the middle of the programme.

We would rather have had some other less incongruous piece of brilliant virtuosity to follow up the Preciosa music, than that Hungarian Fantasia of Liszt's, which, after hearing so many of his Rhapsodies Hongroises for the piano alone, and finding them all essentially alike, all made out of the same materials, only worked up with new tricks of effect, still sounded as the same thing over again, more aggravated than enriched by the barbaric orchestration. Coming as it did in the midst of genuine great music, there was too much vulgarity and clap-trap about it. But it afforded a rare opportunity for Mr. Rummel to display his extraordinary virtuosity; nothing could exceed the verve, the brilliancy, the startling contrasts, the finesse and the polish of his execution, and it wrought a large part of the public up to such a pitch of excitement that he was recalled several times. Mr. Rummel gave a splendid rendering of the Schumann Concerto. We do not say it showed so deep and fine a feeling of the poetic quality of the work as we have been taught to know by others who had not his astonishing technique. But he played it with power, with great clearness, with rare delicacy and grace where that is required, and he went through it all with a freedom and a triumphant swing which carried his audience with him. He is certainly one of the most effective concert players we have had since Rubinstein and Von Bülow.

It may be interesting at the close of the season to take a survey of the matter which has been presented in the eight concerts. The following are the works by each composer. The asterisk denotes the first performance in these concerts, two asterisks the first time in Boston.

J. S. Bach. Organ Fantasia and Fugue in G minor, arr. by Liszt for piano. — *Pastorale from Christmas Oratorio. — Orchestral Suite in D, entire. — *Concerto in D minor, for three Pianos, with String Orchestra. — Cradle Song from Christmas Oratorio.

Haydn. "Oxford" Symphony, in G (second time here). — *Symphony in D (Breitkopf and Härtel, No. 14).

Mozart. Piano Concerto in A major. — Overture to "Magic Flute."

Beethoven. Symphonies, Nos. 2, 3, and 7. — Piano Concerto, No. 5, in E-flat. — Overtures to "Prometheus," "Egmont," "Leonora," No. 3. — Adagio and Andante from the "Prometheus" Ballet. — *Scena: "Ah! Perfidio."

Spohr. Overture to "Jessonda."

Schubert. Overture to "Alfonso and Estrella." — Reiter-Marsch in C, transcribed for Orchestra by Liszt (second time). — Song: "The Young Nun," with Liszt's Orchestral Accompaniment.

Mendelssohn. Overtures to "St. Paul," and "Die Heimkehr aus der Fremde." — Nocturne and Scherzo from "Midsummer Night's Dream."

Weber. Overture to "Preciosa."

Schumann. Symphony in C. — Overture to "Genoveva." — Incantation and Extracts from "Manfred." — Piano Concerto in A minor.

Cherubini. Overture to "Anacreon."

Gade. "Osian" Overture.

Hauptmann. *Song: "Ave Maria."

Meyerbeer. *Song: "The Fisher Maiden."

Chopin. E minor Concerto (Romance and Rondo).

Liszt. Tarantella from "Venezia e Napoli." — *Fantasia on Hungarian Airs, Piano and Orchestra.

Wagner. Siegfried Idyl (twice). — "Der Ritt der Walküren," Piano transcription by Tausig.

Raff. Suite for Orchestra, in C, Op. 101 (second time).

Brahms. Second Symphony, in D (twice).

Saint-Saëns. "Phaëton": Poème Symphonique (second time).

Habérlier-Guilmant. *Prelude and Fugue transcribed for Piano by Mme. Rivé-King.

PASSION WEEK. — Bach's sublime and profoundly tender music to the Passion, according to St. Matthew, has made this a Passion Festival in Boston. Every day of the week the great work has been rehearsed, — on Monday and Tuesday by the orchestra and solo-singers; on Wednesday and Thursday afternoons, public rehearsals or double chorus, solos, double orchestra, and organ, all combined; and on Good Friday (yesterday) the full performance — not a number or a passage of the whole work omitted — before an audience occupying every seat in the great Music Hall, of the First Part at three in the afternoon, and the Second Part at eight in the evening. It was simply the greatest event so far in the musical history of this country.

And what a hopeful sign of progress that so deep an interest should be taken in so difficult and formidable a work, dating from a century and a half ago! At the same time we may think with satisfaction of the quantity of Bach's music in various forms that has been presented and enjoyed in Boston during the past season. Besides what the symphony programmes have offered, which is enumerated above, there has been a great Cantata sung, with orchestra, by the Cecilia; a superb Motet for double chorus by the Boylston Club; and no end of Organ and Piano Preludes and Fugues, and smaller pieces in the various Piano-forte Recitals, particularly those of Mr. Sherwood.

This week we have had also the fourth and last Euterpe Concert (Wednesday evening); and Cambridge has had its third and last Chamber Concert by the same artists on Tuesday evening.

Close upon Good Friday comes the joyful Easter, and tomorrow evening the Handel Society will follow up their good work with Handel's jubilant, heroic Judas Maccabæus, — thus completely the most successful and remunerative Oratorio season which the old society has ever had. — And, as if this were not enough, on the 2d of May, an extra performance will be given, of Elijah, in honor of the twenty-fifth anniversary of the day when their efficient and esteemed conductor, CARL ZERBAHN, in a performance of the same work, first assumed the baton he has wielded ever since.

NEXT WEEK will bring its rich supply of music worth the hearing. On Tuesday evening, 18th, at Mechanics' Hall, the first of the Three Classical Concerts by Messrs. SHERWOOD, ALLEN, and FRANKS. The programme includes a String Quartet by Rubinstein; Polonaise for Piano and Cello; Chopin; the great Piano Quintet by Schumann; and Songs by Mozart, Rubinstein, and Franz, to be sung by Miss Mary E. Turner.

— April 18. The BOYLSTON CLUB, Geo. L. Osgood, Conductor.

Thursday, 17th, at three P. M. Mme. RIVÉ-KING, who has been fulfilling numerous concert engagements in this city and vicinity during the past fortnight, drawing largely from her almost inexhaustible repertoire of the best classical and modern works for the piano-forte, will give her Farewell Recital for the season at Mechanics' Hall, assisted by the charming vocalist Miss Abbie Whinnery. The programme is one of exceptional interest, including for the concert-giver: Beethoven's "Sonata Appassionata;" Allegro, from Schumann's "Faustsingschwanke;" Op. 28; six pieces en groupe from Chopin (Nocturne in G minor, Op. 37; Berceuse; Impromptu, C-sharp minor, Op. 68; Valse, A-flat, Op. 34; Scherzo, B-flat minor; Rondo, E-flat, Op. 16); Mendelssohn's "Spring Song," and Andante and Rondo from the Violin Concerto, transcribed by Mme. King; and the Strauss-Tausig Waltz: "Man lebt nur einmal." There surely will be great interest felt in this Recital, for it is a much better thing to hear so finished a pianist in a small room than it can be in our great Music Hall.

— On the evening of the same day (Thursday), a concert for the benefit of the Chapel of the Evangelists will be given at Huntington Hall (Institute of Technology) by members of the choirs of the Advent, Emmanuel, and Trinity churches, assisted by Mr. J. C. D. Parker, Mr. C. N. Allen, Mr. Wolf Fries, Miss Mary Beebe, Dr. Langmaid, and other artists. The programme offers a choice selection of sacred choruses, vocal solos, and trios for piano, violin, and cello.

— Friday evening, 18th. The advanced Violin classes of the Boston Conservatory of Music, under the direction of their teacher, Mr. JULIUS EICHBERG, will give a concert at Union Hall, which will of course excite an interest.

MUSICAL CORRESPONDENCE.

NEW YORK, MARCH 24. — The fourth concert of the Brooklyn Philharmonic Society took place on Saturday evening, March 15. The orchestral selections comprised the Suite in Canon form, Op. 10, by Otto Grimm (violin, viola, violoncello, contrabasso, obligato. Messrs. Brandt, Schwarz, Bergner, and Uttroff); Beethoven's Pastoral Symphony; and the ballet music from "Samson and Delilah," by Saint-Saëns. Miss Josephine C. Bates was the pianist.

Mr. G. Carlberg gave his fifth symphony concert at Chickering Hall, New York, March 22, with the following programme: —

Symphony in E-flat Haydn.
Concerto for Piano, No. 3, in C minor, Op. 37 Beethoven.

Miss Josephine Bates.

Overture: "Midsummer-Night's Dream" Mendelssohn.
Aria from "Acis and Galatea" Handel.

Miss Gertrude Franklin.

Nocturne (new) C. F. Daniels.

For Orchestra, with cello obligato.

Eine Faust Overture Wagner.

The Haydn Symphony, one of the best of the long list of similar works which have come down to us from that genial composer, was performed in a manner which was highly creditable to Mr. Carlberg and his orchestra. Mr. Brandt, the leader of the first violins, was very successful in his performance of the variation for solo violin, which was played to perfection. Miss Josephine Bates made her first appearance before a New York audience. She is, we understand, a pupil of Kullak. It would be very pleasant to compliment the lady upon the merits of her performance, as, for example, correctness, good taste, etc., but these qualities alone are not enough to make a pianist. Miss Bates should acquire more force and freedom of style before she again attempts such heavy work as the C minor concerto. Miss Gertrude Franklin has an exceptionally good voice, and has been well taught. She sang with good effect. The Nocturne, by C. F. Daniels, is properly a melody for violoncello, accompanied at first by violins pizzicato, and afterwards repeated by the orchestra. We believe that it was originally composed as a nocturne for piano, violin, and cello. It is very brief and unpretentious, but the theme is romantic and beautiful, and the subject is well worked up. That which is most to be dreaded in American compositions is the musical platitude, and this bête noir is not to be found in Mr. Daniels's work, which contains nothing trite or commonplace; therefore it is to be hoped we may have more of it.

A. A. C.

NEW YORK, APRIL 7, 1879. — Dr. Damrosch gave his sixth Symphony Concert at Steinway Hall, on Saturday evening, March 29, preceded by the usual public rehearsal on Thursday afternoon. The attendance was very large, owing to the unusual attractions offered in the programme, as well as the general desire of musical people to show their appreciation of the arduous and successful labor which has enabled the conductor to bring the season to a brilliant ending. The small hall at the back of the auditorium was thrown open to accommodate those who could not obtain seats in the main hall. The stage was beautifully decorated with flowering plants, after the manner usual at the Philharmonic Concerts in Brooklyn. The scene was impressive, and reminded one of the days when the Thomas enthusiasm was at its height. People are just now beginning to find out that it is possible to live without that worthy conductor.

The programme was an exemplification of contrast, for surely no two composers differ more widely in their methods and their results than Beethoven and Richard Wagner.

The selections were as follows: —

Richard Wagner:

Overture, "Tannhäuser."

Choral, from "Die Meistersinger."

For Chorus and Orchestra.

Kaisermarsch.

For Orchestra and Chorus.

L. Van Beethoven:

Ninth Symphony.

Orchestra Soli and Chorus.

The soloists were Mrs. Mary L. Swift, Miss Emily Winant, Mr. Chr. Fritsch, and Mr. E. A. Stoddard. The chorus was the Oratorio Society of New York. The Tannhäuser overture was nobly played, and the chorus did some excellent work in the choral from "Die Meistersinger," (which was repeated), and in the Kaisermarsch. The orchestral parts of the Ninth Symphony were well performed, and it is high praise of the soloists and the chorus to say that if it were possible to sing the parts assigned to them they would have sung them well.

"But what's impossible can't be."

And never, never comes to pass."

I give below the repertoire of the six concerts and public rehearsals given by Dr. Damrosch during the winter: —

Bach, J. S.:

Air from the Suite in D, for violin with string orchestra.

(Violin solo: Herr August Wilhelmj.)

Chaconne for violin solo. (Herr August Wilhelmj.)

Beethoven, Ludwig van:

Symphony in C minor (No. 5).

Symphony in D minor (No. 9). (Soli: Mrs. Mary Louise Swift, Miss Emily Winant, Messrs. Ch. Fritsch, and A. E. Stoddard. Choral part: The Oratorio Society of New York.)

Concert in E-flat (No. 5), for piano-forte with orchestra

(Mr. Max Pinner).

Concert in D (first movement), for violin with orchestra

(Herr August Wilhelmj.)

Berlioz, Hector:

Symphony Fantastique, Op. 14 (Episode in the life of an artist)

Overture, "King Lear."

"La Captive." Reverie for contralto with orchestra (Miss Anna Drædill).

Cherubini, Luigi:

Overture, "Anacreon."

Glinka:

Kosakinnakaja, Capriccio for Orchestra.

Goldmark Carl:

Overture, "Sakontala."

Grieg, Edward:

"At the Cloister Gate," for mezzo soprano, contralto, female chorus, and orchestra. (Misses Antonie Henne, Emily Winant, female chorus from the Oratorio Society.)

Concert in A minor for piano-forte with orchestra (Mr. Frans Rummel).

Handel, G. F.:

Allegro in D minor for string orchestra.

Air from "Xerxes" (Miss Anna Drædill).

Haydn, Joseph:

Symphony in G (No. 9, Br. & H.).

Liszt, Franz:

"Les Preludes," Symphonie poem.

Mendelssohn, Felix:

Overture, "Fingal's Cave."

Raff, Joachim:

Concert in B minor for violin with orchestra (Herr August Wilhelmj).

Saint-Saens, Camille:

Symphony in A minor (No. 3).

Scharwenka, Xavier:

Concerto for piano-forte, Op. 32 (Mr. B. Boekelman).

Schubert, Franz:

Symphony, fragment in B minor.

Schumann, Robert:

Symphony in C (No. 2).

Swendsen, Johann:

Norwegian Melody for string orchestra.

Volkman, Robert:

Serenade in D minor for strings and violoncello obligato (Mr. Fr. Bergner).

Wagner, Richard:

Overture, "Die Meistersinger von Nuernberg."

Choral from " " " "

Prize Song from " " " "

(Arranged for violin solo with orchestra, Herr August Wilhelmj.)

Overture, "Tannhauser."

"Kaisermarch" (with chorus).

Weber, Carl Maria Von:

Overture, "Euryanthe."

The last Philharmonic Concert of the season took place at the Academy of Music on Saturday evening, April 5. Beethoven's Seventh Symphony was performed; also "Wotan's Farewell" and "The Fire Scene," by Wagner (from Die Walküre), and the "Carnival Romain" Overture, by Berlioz. Herr Wilhelmj played Lipinski's Concerto Militaire for violin and a transcription of Chopin's Nocturne, Op. 37, No. 1. The orchestral works were performed in the dreary, monotonous style to which the regular attendant at these concerts must now be well accustomed. The playing of Wilhelmj was of course superb. For encore he played a Romanza of his own and an air by Bach. The Mapleson Opera Company gave a farewell matinee on Saturday, April 5. The occasion was the benefit of Mme. Gerster, who sang in Sonnambula to the delight of some 3,000 auditors. At the conclusion of the performance Colonel Mapleson and the greater part of his troupe embarked for Europe on board the City of Chester.

The last of the Carlsberg Symphony Concerts (for this season) will take place on April 12, with rehearsal April 10. Wilhelmj will play, and an attractive programme is offered, including Schubert's Symphony of "heavenly length."

A. A. C.

CHICAGO, APRIL 4. — The record of our musical season would not be complete without some passing mention of the "Marie Litta Concert" which took place on the evening of March 24, at Plymouth Church. She had the assistance of a local quartet (Mrs. Stacy, Mrs. Bagg, Mr. De Celle, Mr. Bowen), Mr. Walton Perkins, a young but promising pianist, and Mr. Owen, organist. The programme was of that so-called "popular" order, which does little for the elevation of musical culture. Miss Litta, following in the footsteps of so many opera singers, presented her audience with selections from her stage rôles, singing the "Caro nome" from Rigoletto, and the Polonaise from Mignon; and, not forgetting the usual custom, gave "The Last Rose of Summer" for the inevitable encore. When we consider how much beautiful music there is so well adapted for the more quiet dignity of the concert stage, we cannot but regret that so many artists seem unmindful of its existence, and are "forever" giving us worn-out selections from the popular operas. Think of the stately arias of Handel which Robert Frans has so beautifully arranged; the concert arias of Mendelssohn and Beethoven; and the vast number of lovely songs by Schumann, Schubert, Franz, and Rubinstein, Liszt, and others of the modern school, that are yet unknown to the general musical public. True, it is often remarked that this class of music is out of place upon a "popular concert" programme. But do we want any more "popular" concerts (taken in the sense now used, meaning, doubtless, poor music), in this stage of our musical culture? I consider them hindrances to a healthy advancement, for they often fill the rightful place of better things. We must show our disesteem of bad programmes, and insist upon better offerings from the so-called great singers. If the public has a taste for songs that express a certain kind of sentiment, let the art of music, while it gratifies it, present vocal selections of such beauty, purity, and character, that the sentiment may be elevated into the realm of true culture. Music may be joyful, light, and sparkling, and, grand, brilliant, solemn, and almost reach the heavenly in her perfection, but if she forgets her royal station, and panders to what is low in human nature, her art forsakes her, and her sweetness, beauty, and wondrous harmonies are gone forever. Art lives but in noble attainment, and in striving to reach the height of purity and beauty. If she is debased, she dies by the very consciousness of her guilt.

On Friday evening, March 28, the "Abt Society" gave its second concert presenting the following programme: —

The "Capetan Chorus"	Smart.
Serenade: "In Stilly Night"	Lachner.
"Marcia and Finale" from "Concertstueck"	Weber.
The "Equinox"	Kreutzer.
Aria: "Capa Fatal Maestra"	Centeneri.
"The Village Blacksmith"	Hatton.
"A Fresh Song in the Forest"	Abt.
"Rhapsodie Hongroise" No. 15	Liszt.
"The Desert Fountain"	Gade.
Romanos: "Marguerite's Three Bouquets"	Brega.
(Cello accompaniment by M. Eichheim).
"Absence"	Abt.
a "Oh, Winter"	Gade.
b "King Witlaf's Drinking Horn"	Hatton.

As I have mentioned before in my notes, the gentlemen who compose this society have fine voices, and individually much culture in music. The concert on the whole gave much satisfaction to the large audience that was present. The singing indicated a better idea of finish than at the first performance. The greatest drawback (one easy to correct, however), to a perfect delivery, was a too enthusiastic endeavor on the part of a few of the first tenors to make themselves heard. In this way they forced their tones until the quality became quite disagreeable, and destroyed the balance of other parts. There should be no individuality or personal prominence manifested in chorus singing. Each person should sink the idea of self, and strive for the perfection of the whole. In the more delicate portion of their singing, in the soft parts, the blending of their rich voices had a delightful effect. Mrs. Farwell, who is one of our most accomplished singers, sang her numbers with much taste and refinement. Miss Neddy Stevens, the pianist of the evening, is a graceful young lady, with a quiet and gentle bearing, and is devoted to her art, with such a strength of purpose and correctness of aim, that under the right influences she is sure to develop into something a great deal more than an ordinarily good player. She has a firm touch, no small amount of technique, and more than all, fine sentiment. Her phrasing at times indicates the novice; yet it is generally directed by a positive aim, and foretells that a wider experience, more study, and better opportunities for musical development, will ripen her talent so that she may accomplish greater things. On Monday evening last, one of the "Hershey Popular Concerts" was given under the direction of Mr. H. Clarence Eddy, with a fine programme — not by any means of the so-called "popular" order, Miss Ingersoll, Miss Hiltz, Miss Mayers, Mr. Knorr, and Mr. Lewis assisting.

On Saturday last Mr. Eddy gave his eighty-eighth organ recital, with a very fine and rich programme. It is in those home efforts that our musical culture finds the material for its best advancement.

C. H. B.

MILWAUKEE, WIS., APRIL 5. — The musical events which call for record at this writing are the performances of Aida and Mignon by the Strakosch Company, and of Faust, The Chimes of Normandy, and Paul and Virginia by the Hess Company. The former I found both interesting and enjoyable, in spite of some inevitable defects. The stage here is too small for Aida, and the orchestra and chorus were small. However, as it is hard for any opera troupe to pay expenses here, we have no right to complain of reduction of forces. The solo parts were uniformly good, except that Mr. Adams seemed to be in bad voice. I have never heard Miss Kellogg to better advantage. She did the showy Polonaise in Mignon most brilliantly, as well as it deserves to be given. Miss Cary, too, was at her best, and acquitted herself most admirably. I suppose the operas themselves are too well known to your readers to need any characterization from me.

The Hess Company was much lighter, the orchestra especially being weak to the point of insignificance. Think of giving opera with only two first violins, and only six stringed instruments in all! There were no horns and no bassoons. A piano eked out the accompaniment. I was unable to hear their performance of Faust, but suppose it must have been very inadequate, of course. I should say it would have been better to give only the very lightest operas, in which the weak points would be less apparent. They certainly succeeded in making the Chimes of Normandy enjoyable. They gave it twice. I only heard it the second time, when Miss Randall took the two rôles of Mignonette and Germaine. Her voice seems to be well adapted for such parts, and her whole performance was very creditable and satisfactory. I think the strongest point in the whole piece was Mr. Ryse's acting of the part of Gaspard. His singing also was excellent. The other singers were fully equal to all that was required of them.

Paul and Virginia is intended to be a tragedy, but I cannot say that I was affected by it as if it were really one. I came away with the impression that it was nearly worthless rubbish. Miss Abbott sang her part skillfully, and both she and Mr. Castle were well received by the audience, which, on this evening, was respectably large. In the afternoon the house had been nearly empty.

I do not think the season could have been satisfactory to Mr. Hess, and the lack of patronage is not encouraging to operatic enterprises in Milwaukee. But I wish Colonel Mapleson would try the experiment of bringing here a company of artists of high rank, with full chorus and orchestra, to do great opera; a company in which the best of the Hess singers would necessarily take light subordinate parts. I think he might hope to succeed.

J. C. F.

NOTES AND GLEANINGS.

VIOLIN COLLECTORS. — A writer in the "Contributors' Club" of the Atlantic Monthly for March hits the nail on the head in these remarks: "When Mark Twain wrote his inimitable story of the rich uncle who ruined himself and his family by making huge collections of everything he could think of, from stuffed whales to echoes, he gave a very fair slip at those monomaniacs who have the rage of making collections for collection's sake. In most cases the collecting mania is as innocent a form of idiosyncy as any other; it can hurt nothing but the collector's own pocket; in some cases, indeed, it may have the beneficial effect of partially filling the vacuum in his skull. But there is one sort of collector who does real harm, — the man who insanely collects valuable stringed instruments, Stradivarius or Amati violins and violas, cellos, and basses, and lets them lie in their cases in shameful inanition. Now, a valuable Stradivarius is not only a rarity, but it is an instrument which the art of music absolutely needs. The world cannot afford to have such a gem lie idle; its value as an authentic specimen of a famous maker's craft is incomparably less than its intrinsic value as a musical instrument. To take it out of the reach of fine artists, and place it on the shelf in a mere collection, is to commit larceny upon music. It properly belongs to the art of music, and should be honestly devoted to its service. The man who can keep such an instrument in his house merely for the pleasure of looking at it, and of knowing that he owns it, must have a queer conscience. Other collectors are very proper butts for ridicule. The violin collector rises to the sublime height of distinct immorality, and is not a fit subject for anything short of unsparing execration."

The latest discovery of unknown musical works is announced in a German musical paper to have taken place in Vienna, and this time Beethoven is the selected man. A double chorus, with orchestral accompaniment, which dates back to the time of the Vienna Congress, and a rondo for piano solo, with orchestral accompaniment, are the two compositions mentioned.

Mr. Carl Rosa, who seems to be meeting with unusual success in his present London season, has brought out an English version of The Huguenots, which has been received with marks of the highest approbation. Mme. Vanzini (known better to this public as Mrs. Jennie Van Zandt) did excellently well as Valentine, and Mr. Mass won a decided triumph as Raoul.

Saint-Saens has produced a new opera in four acts entitled Etienne Marcel, which has just been performed in Lyons. A London paper says that "the composer, despairing of ever seeing his piece mounted by a Paris theatre, carried it to Lyons, a step towards decentralization which has created much comment. Many of the Paris musical critics repaired to the first performance, and they are unanimous in praising the work."

Mme. Nilsson's husband, M. Rouzeaud, has purchased for £10,000 a one-third share in a large Parisian Agence de Change, and Mme. Nilsson has declined all further engagements for this and next season. As she has already signed, she will sing in Madrid, but she has declined a protracted tour in the French provinces. Mme. Nilsson will go to London in the summer, and may possibly sing in "Le Roi de Lahore." But owing to the new business engagements of her husband in Paris, she will not accept any offer of an engagement in the United States during next winter.

BOSTON, APRIL 26, 1879.

CONTENTS.

GEORGE SAND AND CHOPIN. Mrs. F. R. Ritter	65
WAGNER'S "GÖTTERDÄMMERUNG" AT VIENNA. E. Hanslick.	67
BOOK NOTICES. F. H. U.	68
Holmes's Life of Motley. — Hardy's "Return of the Native."
ART TALKS, etc., etc.	69
BACH'S PASSION MUSIC ON GOOD FRIDAY	69
JUDAS MACCABEUS: Master	71
CONCERTS	71
Euterpe. — Messrs. Sherwood, Allen, and Fries. — Mme. Julia Rivé-King.
AUGUST KRISMANN	71
MUSICAL CORRESPONDENCE	71
Baltimore. — Cincinnati. — Chicago.

All the articles not credited to other publications were expressly written for this Journal.

Published fortnightly by HOUGHTON, OSGOOD AND COMPANY, 220 Devonshire Street, Boston. Price, 10 cents a number; $2.50 per year.

For sale in Boston by CARL PRUEFER, 30 West Street, A. WILLIAMS & Co., 283 Washington Street, A. K. LORING, 369 Washington Street, and by the Publishers; in New York by A. BRENTANO, Jr., 39 Union Square, and HOUGHTON, OSGOOD & Co., 21 Astor Place; in Philadelphia by W. H. BOWEN & Co., 1102 Chestnut Street; in Chicago by the CHICAGO MUSIC COMPANY, 152 State Street.

GEORGE SAND AND FRÉDÉRIC CHOPIN.

A STUDY.

BY FANNY RAYMOND RITTER.

(Continued from page 48.)

CHOPIN said of himself, that his whole life "was contained in one episode." After having attempted to discover how well founded or otherwise is M. Karasowski's assertion that "the spirit of Chopin breathes from the best of George Sand's romances," we may not unreasonably inquire whether the episode, which, Chopin himself has said, contained "his whole life," had much influence on his artistic productivity or development.

The entire list of Chopin's works as they appeared during his life, contains only 65 numbered publications; 9 additional works appeared posthumously, one of these a collection of songs; besides 10 additional unnumbered works, the genuineness of some of which is very questionable. There are also a few compositions, said to be by Chopin, in circulation, — dances, a march, two or three separate songs, — to which his name is not attached; in all 310 to 320 distinct compositions, some of these of very small dimensions indeed. But we must not assume that the source of musical invention in Chopin's mind was small or easily exhausted, on account of the limited number of works he published; did not their richness of idea, extreme originality and variety contradict such an assumption, his wonderful powers of improvisation, as vouched for by his friends and contemporaries, would do so. In improvisation, a gift he possessed from childhood, he must have continually exercised his powers, at the same time carrying his mastery of form to perfection, and throwing away countless beautiful ideas that he never committed to paper; indeed, his admirers have asserted that his published compositions were only a pale reflection of his wonderful powers of improvisation. In his "Salon," Heine wrote: "Chopin is no mere virtuoso, he is a poet able to express in tones the poetic feelings that agitate his soul; and nothing can equal the delight he bestows when he improvises at the piano-forte. Then he is neither Polish, French, nor German, but he betrays a higher origin; we then perceive that he comes from the birthplace of Goethe, Mozart, and Raphael, that his native land is the imperial realm of the poet. And while he is improvising, I seem to be receiving a visit from one of my own countrymen, who is relating to me the remarkable events that have occurred in my beloved home during my absence; and often I long to interrupt him with questions: How is the lovely water-fay who so coquettishly wreathed a silvery veil among her green tresses? Does the gray bearded sea-god still continue to persecute her with his foolish withered passion? Do the roses at home flame as victoriously as ever? And do the trees still sing as sweetly in the moonlight? — above all, he preferred to improvise at night, or in the dark, when no outward object could interfere with the free play of his imagination." After he had embarked on an independent professional career, Chopin could seldom be persuaded to play in public; between 1834 and 1848, he only gave one public concert in Paris; but he gave occasional private recitals to his pupils, to which the 20-franc tickets were sold on personal application, he reserving the right to exclude any person whom he did not care to play to; but he was most liberal in displaying his powers of improvisation to his friends. These seem always to have struck every one as extraordinary. I find in the Allgemeine Musikalische Zeitung, for November 11, 1829, a correspondence to that paper from Vienna, where Chopin, then 20 years old, had just given a concert. "M. Chopin, a pianist from Warsaw, apparently a pupil of Würfel, proved himself a master of the first rank. His indescribable mechanical dexterity, the delicacy of his touch, his perfect shadowing inspired by the most profound feeling, the manner of his crescendo and diminuendo and continuance of tone, the remarkable clearness of his phrasing, combined with the geniality of his compositions, but above all, his extraordinary free improvisations, stamp him as a richly gifted and original virtuoso, who, without any preliminary sounding of trumpets, instantaneously impressed us as one of the most brilliant meteors now rising above the musical horizon."

Chopin's first published composition was a march, written at the age of ten; he also wrote dances during his childhood, which are said to have possessed much grace, and some Polish coloring. In his Rondo, Opus 1, composed at the age of sixteen, we find little that presages the Chopin we now know. It contains very little national character either, and still less of his own chromatic individuality; its ornaments are in the manner of John Field, and its harmony and passages display close acquaintance with Bach, Hummel, and Clementi. While admiring, I cannot help wondering a little at Schumann's immense enthusiasm over Opus 2, the variations on "La ci darem la mano." Its grace and beauty are incontestable; but where is the astonishing originality that so struck Schumann? Only in the adagio there occurs a foreshadowing of the Chopin who was to follow with works of such unrivaled poetic originality. But we, les enfants de notre siècle, are surprised, when we first read

"Werther" or "Jacopo Ortis," at the revolutionary excitement they created; we forget that in their contemporary and after influence lies the reason why the source of that influence affects us only moderately. Referring my present readers to the note I gave on page 7 of the English edition of Schumann's "Music and Musicians," I will now give an extract from the criticism on Chopin's Opus 2, by the editor of the Allgemeine Musikalische Zeitung, which followed Schumann's communication, and was no doubt intended as an antidote to it! To this criticism I merely alluded in that note. After a tedious account of his usual mode of reviewing new compositions, Fink says: "A very powerful bravura piece! needs immensely large hands. Only thoroughly good players, Paganinis of the piano, will be able to play it as it should be played. Yet one might be able to get on up to page 17, without hands as large as violas. But one would find little reward for one's pains. Nothing but bravura and show passages! However, with the exception of some harshnesses, which, it appears, are easily digested by the grammatical consciences of the authors of the present day, and the ears of their listeners, the piece is passably correct." In the same note in "Music and Musicians," I mentioned that Fink completed the above review by saying that the paper had also received a third review of the work, by Friedrich Wieck, who seemed to be of the same opinion as his pupil, Mr. Schumann, but the paper had "no space" to insert it.

The following review, which I find in a number of the Cecilia for 1832 (published in Mayence), is probably the very article, — or rather an extract from it; as I do not translate the whole. Clara Wieck, then only 14 years old, had lately played Chopin's variations with great success before the court of Saxony; and it is pleasant to find her father — qualified to write, as an artist and teacher, with judgment and authority, — speaking of a work by so new a composer, with well-founded enthusiasm and liberality. "I do not know whether Chopin is a direct pupil of Field; but in the whole style of this piece, every page of which engages our feelings through its imaginativeness, from the form of the passages, often surprising and wholly novel, yet presenting a certain solidity that is in itself an artistic enjoyment, as well as in the bold and uncommon fingering, and the masterly light and shade of the marks of expression, we at least gather that he is thoroughly familiar with Field's soulful musical language, and that he has practically appropriated Field's manner of playing. But my readers must not therefore conclude that I mean to hint at an imitation of Field. No! This work is completely independent. Yet it also betrays a close acquaintance with the light, graceful, purely mechanical Viennese manner of playing, in which style so many virtuosos have obtained reputation, as well as with the elegant and striking, if at present rather frivolous French school, in which Herz and others excel. Chopin did not select the duet from Don Juan merely to write variations upon it, but took this theme in order to sketch the entire outline of the wild, adventurous, amorous existence of such a character as Don Juan. This he has done, according to my opinion, by means of the boldest and most original touches; and I would not lose one measure of this fantastic bravura composition, so characteristic is everything it contains, from the beginning of the grand, original introduction, to the close of the polonaise-finale, which seems to overflow with the foam of the most dazzling musical champagne."

Yet, until Opus 15, Chopin still appears in process of development as a composer; the second nocturne in Op. 9, greatly resembles John Field's eighth, though with the difference that has been observed by the Polish critic whom Karasowski quotes: "Field's nocturnes may be compared to a cheerful, flowery landscape flooded with sunshine; while those of Chopin represent a romantic mountain country with a dark back ground heavy with storm clouds which are pierced by flashes of lightning." Beautiful as are the Études Op. 10, they are chiefly dedicated to technical aims. No. 3, a sort of berceuse, lovely indeed, yet lulls some quiet sorrow only; Numbers 6 and 7 are much deeper and stronger. In the first concerto, Op. 11, we meet with our Chopin in the romance. In a letter written in 1829 to his intimate friend, Titus Woyciechowski, Chopin said that this movement was composed while thinking of the opera singer, Constantia Gladkowska, with whom he was then in love, and whom he hoped to marry. He also said of this part of his Concerto: "It ought to create the same impression which a landscape, that has become dear to us on account of the remembrances it awakens, calls up in the mind on a fine, moonlit spring night." The group of three Nocturnes, Op. 15, is thoroughly Chopin-uesque, though the first still contains some echoes of Field; but the second possesses all Chopin's own tender grace, and the third, — characteristic even in its leading direction to the player, "languido e rubato," has his own peculiar melancholy, if not his passion, and moves the hearer profoundly in the monastic legend with which it closes.

I think it will be generally conceded that Chopin's greatest works are comprised within Op. 15 to Op. 45 or 50. At the age of 22, an age corresponding with the close of his first period, that of development as a composer, Chopin had apparently already left behind him the spontaneous joyfulness, the fresh delight in artistic creativeness, the enthusiastic hopefulness that often accompany genius to the end of life. At that time, enforced separation from home, the defeat of the patriotic uprising in Poland, regret for his distant love, and uncertainty respecting his future position and resources, combined to transform the visionary youth, still dependent on models and tradition, into the active, struggling, suffering, most original and individual man. Passages in his letters of this period prove the state of his mind: "Should I return to Warsaw? Go on to Paris? Kill myself?" He distractedly asks his friend Titus. In one letter he begs that friend to remind Constantia of him, and to say to her, "Even after my death, my ashes will be found under her feet," an expression as forcible and direct in its poetic simplicity as the language of a folk song. Then followed his removal to Paris, his at first unsuccessful attempt to establish himself there, his project of emigration to America. This idea occurred to him in the same year as that during which the poet Lenau passed some months in the new world. Lenau, who would have had "all that yields no sound" excluded from man's nature, as all material unnecessary to its harmonious existence is thrown off by the violin in its vibrations, lamented the absence of sympathetic warmth in the people, of joy in the life, of nightingales in the woods of America; impressionable, melancholy, and impassioned as Heine, but devoid of his satirical strength and his sense of humor, the positive and mercantile side of American civilization repelled Lenau. He was too idealistic and contemplative ever to have done justice to the active industry, the energetic will, the intense intellectual and material acquisitiveness of "our American cousins." His American experience, though not a happy one, was at least brief. Would Chopin ever have made himself at home in America? That is very doubtful. What affinity or answer would he have found there, fifty years ago, to the requirements of his exquisite and sensitive nature? The trying climate; the hurrying rush, and absence of leisure in social life; the absence, also, of artistic and aristocratic circles numerous or powerful enough not only to estimate, but also to recompense as his merit deserved, the artist not yet crowned with the halo of European reputation; the lack of any remunerative demand for original compositions; the intrigues of other foreign artists who might have been desirous of establishing themselves, and likely to regard with a jealous eye the possible residence among them of one so much their superior; — it is well for art and art lovers, that Chopin never underwent this ordeal. His high moral artistic standard, his refinement and disinterestedness, would certainly have prevented him from entering the lists with those who, directed by managerial experience, so frequently "inaugurate a new era in art," and become for a time "the best advertised artists in the country;" for we know that even in Paris, and despite his eventually great social influence, he chose to withdraw almost altogether from public exhibition of his artistic powers. But, since his was not the nervous, eager, somewhat combative nature of Berlioz or Delacroix, his creative genius itself might have succumbed under too harsh an experience. Instead, however, of emigrating to America, he remained in Paris. After the marriage of his first love, Constantia Gladkowska, he became attached to another Polish lady, with whom, as his wife, he hoped to return to Poland to reside in the neighborhood of Warsaw, but who jilted him for the sake of a titled bridegroom. A year or so after this second disappointment, his first meeting with Madame Dudevant occurred, — a meeting so accidental in its character, yet so impressive to the fancy of Chopin, always at home in the region of supernatural ideas, from the shadow that haunted, the scent of violets (her favorite perfume), that affected his fine perception like a presentiment, immediately before it took place. Years afterward, when he was about to return home from England to die, he wrote to his friend Grzymala, in regard to the arrangement of his apartments for his reception: "Place a bouquet of violets in the salon; I should be glad to find a little poetry awaiting me on my return." Reader,

"... as-tu quelquefois respiré
Avec ivresse et lente gourmandise,
Ce grain d'encens qui remplit une église,
Ou d'un sachet, le muse inspiré?
Charme profond, magique, dont nous grisons
Dans le présent, le passé restauré!"

During this eventful period, and during the years that succeeded it, from Op. 15 to Op. 64, what a study! And not only a musical, but also a philosophical, psychological one. Take Op. 20, for instance, the great Scherzo in B minor (once called in England, "Le banquet infernal" — why? and who so baptized it?), overflowing with the vigor of powerful pathos and the exhaustless originality that seems at last to have conquered its own world unto itself! Yet thus was the splendid Scherzo reviewed in 1836, in Castelli's Viennese Musikalischer Anzeiger: "If this be jesting, it is a jest of a very peculiar kind, and quite in Hell-Breughel's manner." (Poor Hell-Breughel! What a scarecrow for composers those critics turned him into! And, oddly enough, by some singular union of ideas, or suggestiveness of sound, I never meet his name without instantly conjuring up a vision of Macbeth's witches and their hell-broth). "This is à la 'Valse infernale' in Robert le Diable. Fancy reigns throughout it, but what kind of fancy? Discontented with itself, brooding over disappointment, angry, as misanthropic as it is possible to imagine. Oh, heavenly harmony, whither hast thou flown? In what corner has the spotlessly pure one concealed herself?" This is nothing compared to Rellstab's attacks on the great Concerto, Op. 21, almost colossal in its grandeur, with its wonderful slow movement; and no one with a heart to feel can avoid sympathizing with Schumann's noble anger when he defended this Concerto in particular, and Chopin in general, from Rellstab's continual misinterpretation of his works. Ludwig Rellstab, born ten years sooner than Chopin, at Berlin, studied at first for the musical profession, but, having fought as a volunteer in the campaign of 1815, he afterwards entered the military academy as a student, and became an officer of artillery and a teacher of mathematics. He eventually turned editor and novelist. He was imprisoned for six weeks in consequence of his attacks on Spontini as manager of the Berlin theatre; and during several months as a punishment for his satire, "Henrietta, the fair Songstress." I translate a few extracts from Rellstab's many reviews of Chopin's compositions, which appeared in the Iris from 1833 to 1836. "It is really not worth the trouble to indulge in long philippics concerning the distorted mazurkas of Mr. Chopin. We hope that only the erratic world of Paris cares anything about the erratic writings of Chopin; for they repel all who possess one spark of true feeling. On the title-page of his Concerto, Op. 11, Chopin prints, 'played by the composer at his concerts,' to show that some one is willing to take so much trouble for so small a result. When a surprise is often repeated, it ends by stupefying us, unless founded on an intellectual, and not on a purely mechanical basis. We have from the first opposed this merely mechanical manner of writing for the piano-forte, which has ended by stupefying us. His last Nocturnes are so like his first, that we are afraid to say that they are not the very same Nocturnes. The fame of Chopin the pianist will long outlive that of Chopin the composer. Where Field smiles, Chopin grins; where Field sighs, Chopin groans; where Field shrugs his shoulders, Chopin twists like a cat; where Field uses a pinch of spice, Chopin throws in a handful of cayenne. This composer is indefatigable in his search for ear-tearing dissonance, forced transitions, cutting modulations, and contradictory distortions of melody and rhythm. Does not Chopin know that the measure of poverty of genius is in exact proportion to the means made use of to create effect? If these works were laid before a master, he would tear them up and throw them at his feet, as we now do figuratively. Chopin is not quite devoid of talent, however; so let us beseech him to return to truth and nature, and no longer stunt and deform his own gifts." On page 19 of "Music and Musicians," Schumann repeats a very similar piece of advice which was once given by some musical reporter to Beethoven. Poor Rellstab! "Wretched Berlinese reviewer!" as Schumann says. The indulgence that might be accorded to apparently dishonest praise or blame emanating from an incompetent ignoramus, cannot, of course, be given to so able a man as Rellstab, who has pilloried his own reputation for judgment and integrity in such criticisms as those he wrote on Chopin; however, after he had outlived the envious or quarrelsome temper of his earlier years, he attained to a higher degree of sense, taste, and justice in his opinions and his expression of them.

After the Concerto we find the Ballade, Op. 23, every phrase weighty or flamboyant with concentrated anger, patriotic rage, and regret; and the magnificent set of Études, Op. 25. Let those who care to take the trouble, discover why, in measure 20 and on, of the seventh of these Études, two lovers of Chopin are accustomed to call this their "Lohengrin Étude." Until Opus 26, the gloom or fervor of disappointed patriotism seems to be the most distinguishing trait of these later compositions, lightened here and there by charming episodes; but Chopin's opus numbers do not always correspond to the date and order of the compositions. For example, in his first collection of Études, Op. 10, the sixth, so expressive of proud despair, was composed by Chopin in 1831, on receiving the news of the capture of Warsaw by the Russians, and is therefore, commonly called the Revolution Étude, and the great Ballade, Op. 52, in spite of its high publication number, ranks in order of composition soon after the Preludes Op. 28, as it was written on Chopin's return from Majorca.

(Conclusion in next number.)

WAGNER'S "GÖTTERDÄMMERUNG" AT VIENNA.¹

THE fourth and most solid course of the gigantic Bayreuth musical repast was solemnly

¹ From the Neue Freie Presse of Feb. 16. Translated in the London Musical World.

served up yesterday at the Imperial Opera House. What we had to digest at Bayreuth in four days, and so to speak, on the same seat, has been more conveniently spread out over two years for the Viennese. The Walküre (as the first piece) was performed in March, 1877; Rheingold, in January, 1878; Siegfried, in November, 1878; and now (14th February, 1879) the Götterdämmerung—a result which, attainable only by the employment of every available resource, commands the respect even of those who are opposed to the management. Ere long, the four separate performances are to be played together in series à la Bayreuth, thus fulfilling the last demands of that powerful musical party which Hanns Hopfen so well terms "the elegant conspiracy."

The plot of Die Götterdämmerung is a direct continuation of the preceding drama of Siegfried, where we left the hero engaged in an ardent amorous dialogue with Brunhild, who has been awakened from out the "flickering glow" and a twenty years' sleep. We now, in the prelude to Die Götterdämmerung, behold the pair, taking a tender farewell of each other, step forth from their rocky grot; Siegfried, in complete armor, is sallying forth "to fresh deeds," and hands Brunhild the Nibelungenring as a gage of his truth. In less than half an hour we shall see the self-same Siegfried in the Tarncap², on the self-same spot, struggling with and overcoming his beloved Brunhild for King Gunther, for whose sister, Gutrune, his heart has taken fire! But let us follow the story step by step. Siegfried, having ridden to the Rhine on Brunhild's well-known steed, enters the hall of the Gibichungen. Hagen has just been telling King Gunther and his sister, Gutrune, all about Brunhild, the "most sublime woman in the world." Siegfried is to secure the invincible beauty for Gunther, and as his reward, receive Gutrune, who, on her part, looks forward with longing for the "most sublime hero." Hagen, Gunther, and Gutrune (also a band of elegant conspirators!) resolve without more ado to give Siegfried a magic potion which will cause him to forget Brunhild and fall in love with Gutrune. This is done; Siegfried appears, with the Tarncap and in Gunther's form, before the defenseless Brunhild, from whom, after a struggle, in which she is overcome, he wrests the magic ring. The second act takes us again to the hall of the Gibichungen; Hagen is instigated by the dwarf, Alberich, to destroy Siegfried, for the purpose of obtaining possession of the ring. Gunther appears with Brunhild; Siegfried, in his own form, advances, hand in hand with Gutrune, to meet them. Brunhild rushes up to him, and, recognizing the ring on his finger, becomes aware how faithless is the man she so dearly loved. She demands his death, and Hagen traitorously stabs him while they are out hunting. Immediately before Siegfried's death, however, Hagen gives him another magic potion to neutralize the effect of the potion which produced forgetfulness. Siegfried suddenly remembers Brunhild, and dies with a greeting to her on his lips. Gutrune quietly resigns her place by Siegfried's bier to Brunhild, who claims it from her, and then flings herself on the funeral pile kindled for Siegfried's corpse. The waves of the Rhine inundate the hall, the Daughters of the Rhine swim in, and, dragging down Hagen, hold up triumphantly the ring of which he wanted to obtain possession. At the same time a red glow is perceived in the sky; it is the reflection of the conflagration which consumes the Fortress of the Gods and all its magnificence.

From this short table of contents it will be

² "Tarnkappe;" a cap which renders its wearer invisible.

p'ain that in dramatic animation Die Götterdämmerung decidedly surpasses the three earlier dramas of the Nibelungenring series. The action of the second act contains a considerable amount of interest, which latter rises very much higher in the third. The dwarfs and giants, the gods and dragons of the Edda at last retire and make room for human beings, the heroes of the Nibelungenlied. But, even when thus approximating to the German heroic poem, how much has R. Wagner not departed from it—how much has he not distorted and degraded the characters! What a repulsive detail, introduced by Wagner, is the fact that Siegfried overcomes for another, to whom he delivers her over thus subdued, not some female who is nothing to him, but his own beloved, his own wife! From this instant all sympathy for Siegfried vanishes from our breast, and we by no means grieve at his violent end. The expedient of the potion which produces forgetfulness does not render the occurrence less hateful and less insipid. A man who brings about the emotions of his hero by physical means such as mixtures, may be a good apothecary, but is assuredly a bad poet. Already in Tristan und Isolde, the fact that the love of the hero and heroine for each other is exclusively owing to the operation of a magic drink, of a mechanical accident, exerts a repellant effect. But, at any rate, in that instance, Wagner was contented with only one kind of physic. In his last hour, however, the faithless Siegfried has a remembrance-producing draught poured down his throat as an antidote to the potion of forgetfulness, so that he may exhale his last breath in a pretty sentimental fashion à la Werther, and with a tender speech to his mistress! He is not a "hero," but a puppet. A disenchanting drink by which any weak-headed individual suddenly becomes conscious of all the acts of stupidity he has committed while under the influence of a spell (or of liquor) is properly an incident for a farce. In tragedy, where moral will must hold sway, it is a monstrosity. We care very little whether or no these magic potions belong to the oldest saga. We read in the play-bill: "Poem by Richard Wagner." Who compelled the modern dramatist to admit in his drama what was repulsive and impossible? Hebbel and Em. Geibel were as familiar with the myth as Richard Wagner, but how different a course did they pursue in their Siegfried tragedies! Both rejected as unnecessary and objectionable precisely that which Wagner's partiality for what is morally revolting makes the principal thing. There was not the slightest inward necessity for Siegmund and Sieglinde, Siegfried's parents, to be brother and sister. When we think of Hebbel's tragedy, and especially of the touching lament uttered by Chriemhild over the corpse of Siegfried, how low does Wagner's conception of the story sink in comparison! With his potions and poisons, Wagner has deprived the lovely, pure character of Chriemhild (Gutrune) of all its beauty. Hagen, the type of a rough, unselfish, faithful vassal, becomes in Wagner's hands a gold-seeking, low scoundrel. Thus the only person left who enlists our sympathies is Brunhild.

The action proper is by Wagner interwoven or interrupted by scenes retrospectively connected with the stories of the Gods in the three previous pieces, and intended to establish a connection between the different parts of the work. This harking-back to the mythological business is a real misfortune for the tragedy, because it is done in a violent manner, without any sufficient motive, and is unintelligible for the spectator. The change of the original title: Siegfried's Death, to The Twilight of the Gods, tells us everything. It shows plainly that it was an afterthought of Wagner's to derange and render confused the simple, clear events of the Siegfried tragedy. In the second volume of his Collected Writings, Wagner gives us the original conception of the tragedy of Siegfried's Death; he does not mention a word about any Twilight of the Gods. The fact is that Siegfried's death has nothing at all to do with the end of the Gods, which, as a mysterious prediction, runs through German mythology. The effect of the work as a whole has to pay for the arbitrariness and obstinacy with which Wagner clings to the Ring as the assumed leading motive connecting all four dramas with each other. The supernatural premises produce unnatural and unintelligible consequences. The poet appears at times to have himself swallowed a draught of forgetfulness. Of the vaunted power of the Ring, which confers mastery over the world, we perceive nothing, as the said Ring comes into the hands of its various possessors, from Wotan and Fafner down to Brunhild. And Siegfried, notwithstanding that the magic potion is supposed to have effaced from his mind all memory of Brunhild, immediately finds his way back to her, and, on her approach, calls her, as some one well known to him, "Brunhild!" It was not in the interest of the drama, but for the sake of his "profound" and old-world mysticism, that Wagner wrote the expositional scene (omitted in Vienna) of the "Götterdämmerung": "The three Nornes" (daughters of Erda) in the weird twilight throw to each other the golden rope symbolizing the course of human life. The confounding of the laws of epic and of dramatic poetry, of the purely symbolical with what should be represented on the stage, was here striking enough; in Bayreuth, the scene bordered on the comic. Apart, too, from the intolerable length of the first act, the Vienna management did well in cutting out this introduction. We would recommend the application of the same process to another equally superfluous scene: Waltraute's, which tried the patience of the public no less rudely. The above Walkyre, who turns up quite unexpectedly in Die Götterdämmerung, visits Brunhild for the purpose of giving her a very moving description of the august Wotan's bad state of health. We suspect that the majority of the public (openly or secretly) congratulated themselves at having on the third evening, at least, been spared the personage in question, and consequently would willingly have foregone a sentimental and protracted description of his melancholy and want of appetite. In a similarly surprising fashion does the dwarf, Alberich, shoot up, quite episodically, through a trap, for the purpose of telling Hagen, in a scene so rich in dissonances that it is martyrdom to listen, something we knew long before. But the gravest mistake of all is, in our opinion, the end: the motiveless and, for the spectator, unintelligible introduction of the Götterdämmerung, which has simply nothing whatever in the world to do with the only thing that has any interest for us, — the fate of Siegfried and Brunhild. The entire catastrophe is managed most precipitately. While, as a rule, he is fond of spinning out situations in the most incredible manner, Wagner hurries forward the final scenes of Die Götterdämmerung. The murder of Gunther by Hagen, Brunhild's sacrificial death, Hagen's salto mortale into the stream, and the entrance of the Daughters of the Rhine; the inundation below, and the Twilight of the Gods in the "Walhalla" overhead — crowd on each other with such absolute and surprising haste, after the manner of a ballet, that it is well-nigh impossible for the spectator to make out what it all means. How the picture of the Twilight of the Gods ought to be scenically represented at the conclusion is a point on which Wagner seems not to have quite made up his mind. It was ugly, obscure, and unsuccessful in Bayreuth as it was here, but it was also very different, though it was here placed on the stage in conformity with "The Master's" most recent directions and under the immediate supervision of his agents, openly accredited and secret. Other experiments have been made in other German theatres with this final tableau, but with not much better result. The cause of the mischief lies unquestionably in the poem; Wagner's intentions have in this instance overshot the limits of what is possible, or at least of what can be correctly carried out. The obscurity of this fourth drama might be essentially diminished by two little omissions: the omission of the title, Götterdämmerung (in favor of the previous one, Siegfried's Tod); and secondly, the omission of the cloud scene representing the aforesaid "Götterdämmerung."

Our notice of the poem has extended to such a length that very little space is left for the music. Our only excuse is that the story of Die Götterdämmerung is new and different from that of the first three Nibelungen dramas, but the music is, generally speaking, the same. The music in by far the larger number of cases is constructed out of the leading themes of the other three evenings, and, therefore, of the same materials and in exact conformity with the same well-known method. With a few exceptions, which shall quickly be mentioned, every thing we said, either in the way of praise or censure, for the purpose of characterizing the music of Die Walküre, applies to the score of Die Götterdämmerung likewise; consideration for our readers forbids us again to repeat what we have so often said before. The most important difference, musically speaking, distinguishing Die Götterdämmerung is the — at least sporadic — employment of polyphonus song. The unexpected concession of an actual chorus for male voices especially must agreeably surprise audiences so long treated homophonously. Indeed, we can attribute the ecstasy manifested at the noisy merriment of Gunther's vassals solely to the elementary charm of the long missed sound of a number of men's voices in combination. There is no want of beautiful detached touches of melody either in the first or in the second act; unfortunately, like Siegfried, they all possess a Tarncap, beneath which, nearly the instant they appear, they make themselves invisible or change into something else. The third act rises above the two preceding acts, more especially by two longish pieces better knit together, organized musically more firmly than usual, and possessing melodic charm; these are the original and magically sparkling Song of the Daughters of the Rhine, and a piece already known from having been performed at concerts, the Funeral "March for Siegfried," a composition as cleverly combined as it is magnificently carried out. — EDUARD HANSLICK.

BOOK NOTICES.

JOHN LOTHROP MOTLEY. A Memoir. By OLIVER WENDELL HOLMES. Boston: Houghton, Osgood & Co.

Holmes's memoir of Motley is one of the noteworthy books of the year, being a warm and tender tribute from one man of genius to another. If the dead historian could awake to pass judgment upon it, strong and fervid as he was, he would be gratified at the courage, the strong affection, and the excellent good sense displayed by his friend. The memoir, though brief, is sufficient to give a good idea of Motley's character and training, of his toils and achievements. In view of what his life and labors were to be, it was a singular coincidence that one of his schoolmasters at Northampton should have been Bancroft, the historian, and that Bismarck, the prop of modern, Protestant Germany, should have been his fellow student at Göttingen and Berlin.

Those who came in contact with Motley at different periods of his life agree in representing him as wonderfully brilliant in conversation, and attractive in person. Precisely what turn his mental development was to take could not be predicted; but he had the vivid perceptions, the quick sense of comparison, the talent for apt retort, and the general exuberance of resources which belong to men predestined to greatness.

The failure of his first novel was fortunate. It has value as a profound study in autobiography, but not much else. The brilliant and lamented Edmund Quincy was the one who first advised Motley to turn his attention to history; assuring him that most of the elements of a really great novel could be employed with effect in historical portraiture and in the dramatic presentation of events. The result showed the wisdom of the advice. The histories of Motley, being relations of the great struggle for religious liberty in Europe during the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries, are necessarily partisan in character: but they are laid upon solid foundations after years of intense activity in research; and they are meant to be just, — that is to say, to be absolutely truthful in the statement of facts. But the author, as a Protestant and a believer in free institutions, does not attempt to disguise his sympathies; and his commanding energy and splendor of diction give the high lights of poetry and the vivid colors of romance to the exciting and often tragical events he portrays.

The letters quoted by Dr. Holmes give a good idea of the historian's labors. A more difficult matter was to treat with due thoroughness the diplomatic services of Motley, and the unfortunate personal controversies in which he was involved with the Washington State Department. In common with all our foreign ministers he experienced the annoyance of entertaining or of repelling the pretentious and vulgar persons among his countrymen who go abroad expecting to hob-a-nob with princes. A man so fastidious as Motley could hardly have concealed his aversions. But probably he would have survived the attacks of the McCrackens and other wasps, if he had not been exposed to the jealous malignity of persons in exalted office. This is a very sorry business; and Dr. Holmes, following the able and fearless John Jay, makes it pretty evident that the complaints against Motley were trumped up to cover a revengeful purpose.

The blow was keenly felt, and the relation of Motley's medical attendant, Sir William Gull, leaves little room to doubt that the intense mortification, preying upon an over-sensitive nature, was the not very indirect cause of the disease which ended his life. To Boston, which reared and nurtured Motley, his good name is precious. The public owes a debt of gratitude to his fearless biographer. The friends of letters, and the friends of purity and honor in politics, will welcome the final and triumphant justification of Motley by the great tribunal to which he so solemnly appealed. F. H. U.

THE RETURN OF THE NATIVE. By THOMAS HARDY. New York: Henry Holt & Co.

This book might almost serve as a touchstone. It is an infallible test as to whether the reader has the faculty of imagination, or rather the power of realizing the imagination of others. For we must say (having small space to come to the subject by slow approaches), that this is a great book, and the author one of the few creative minds at present engaged in writing fiction.

The description of the heath on which the almost awful drama is to be enacted is one of those stern pictures which become a part of one's memory forever. William Black is a fine painter of wild scenery, and gives the poetry of the hills and the sea in the most melodious sentences; but Hardy, whose vigor is like Carlyle's, puts more energy and more vividness into five lines than the elegant Black can compass in a page.

Hardy is equally strong in his people. The peasants, singing and dancing about their fires on the fifth of November (Guy Fawkes's day), are drawn as if by the swift pencil of Teniers, and they talk as if they had been overheard and reported by Shakespeare. The power to enter into the mind of a boor, to think his thoughts, and fashion them in his way, has come to few men. The grave-digger is an entity no easier to conceive than Hamlet himself.

Hardy is remarkable for the power he shows in making his characters depict themselves. The nature of the voluptuous and not very conscientious Eustasia is nowhere described in set phrase; nor is the amiable, truthful, and rather weak Thomasin. A very few touches suffice to show the worthlessness of Wildeve; and poor Clym stands out like a statue of melancholy Duty in bonds to fate.

Probably the quaintest character of the whole is his "reddleman," whose activity, shrewdness, and ubiquity make him the very centre and mainspring of the plot.

The prevailing gloom of the book is its chief drawback; not that we would not rather have Hardy's gloom than almost any other novelist's gayety; but with such great and glorious gifts we think an author owes something to the great public that admires him. This is a busy age; and over-worked people, especially lettered people, crave the benign influence of more joyous and more brilliant scenes than those represented upon the immortal Egdon Heath. F. H. U.

TALKS ON ART.—SECOND SERIES.

FROM INSTRUCTIONS OF MR. WILLIAM M. HUNT TO HIS PUPILS.

IV.

At the State Capitol, Albany, N. Y.

It's great fun to be one of a gang. There are ever so many workmen down below our scaffolding, working while we do. We come here at nine every morning, climb the stairs, and don't go down until six in the evening. Have a light dinner brought us near the middle of the day. There's plenty of exercise, for one must keep coming down the step-ladder and running away to see how the panels look. I have two step-ladders, on rollers. We have everything that we could desire. They insisted upon giving us a carpenter, whom we employ in washing our brushes. They are as careful of us as possible, never letting a workman come up-stairs without some one to look after him.

We don't use very large brushes; not bigger than my wrist. Large ones proved too sloppy. We have to take care lest the paint in the sky, for instance, should splash down on the figures below. The stone isn't a bit too rough. In fact, I almost wish it were rougher, the paint fills it up so. The figures are about twice the size of life. The women's arms are the size of a man's leg; and the Discoverer is twelve feet high. But you get entirely used to that large scale, and don't think of it. And it's fun! It's fatiguing of course; but it's the things which bore you that kill you, not the fatiguing ones; and I'm never bored here at all. It don't take the life out of you half as much as thinking whether the family would like her eyes blue or not in a portrait!

I have n't lost a working day since we began. On Sundays we go off driving, and once or twice after work when we can see a few bright streaks in the sky, but generally not. Two months is a horribly short time; but I can only do what I can. The paintings won't be like anything else. I don't know what people will think of them; but that's not my lookout.

It is an entirely new kind of work for me, different from anything else. I have to be very decided, for one thing, otherwise the work won't be seen from the very great distance. To disengage the clear figures from the light sky, I have, in places, to use a brun-rouge line as thick as your finger. Every mistake or weakness "carries" perfectly. It won't do either to have things vapory. A fascinating little head, dissolving into nothing, won't do at all. You can't see what it means. Then I have to paint in a key which, though very colored, is very light, far lighter than my studies of the compositions, because I don't expect to have much light on my work. The abyss of darkness in the "Flight of Night" is really not much darker than brown paper. On a rainy day we have to work by torchlight, and my greatest anxiety is to know what the effect will be when the window screens and all the scaffolding come down irrevocably, and I see my work for the first time, as it is to be seen!

It's a beautiful hall, and I have to work with one eye on my picture, and two on its surroundings, to make my work take the right place in it. Ever since I began I have tried to keep both pictures so together, that if the scaffolding were taken down at any moment, they should be intelligible as far as they went. The architect is very much pleased with them, and says that even if I were to leave them now, his dreams would be more than fulfilled.

It's great fun! It makes you glad you have an occupation in life!

One thing let me tell you. You must learn to be precise, to draw exact lines, so that when you have mural painting to do, you may be able to do it.

I've learned a great deal by this work. Not that my ideas have changed; but, for one thing, I should be much quicker in putting in the background of a portrait, and not keep working on small parts of it. Then I've learned more about getting the general, simple character of the figure, and making the important lines very precise and firm, and I've learned not to think it so necessary to have strong shadows and lights; but to do figures as you see them out of doors when you come out of your shop in the afternoon, and there's no sun shining.

At first I hardly knew how to make pictures that should be mural decorations and full of color. Before I began this work I had always looked for "effect," for "chiaro-scuro," etc., rather than for vivid colors, and for qualities that are now needed. You could not stay in the room with the colors that I have had to use in order to make the panels look colored and light over rows of windows.

BOSTON ART MUSEUM. The completion of the front section of the noble building, and its inauguration last Monday evening by the opening of the grand exhibition of painting, statuary, crayon drawings, and all kinds of art work, under the auspices of the Art Club, the Society of Architects, and the schools connected with the Museum, was enough to make one proud of Boston. Thousands of guests were present, who went home enthusiastic about what they had seen. The long range of rooms, brilliantly lighted, and so richly filled, offered most seductive vistas to the eye. Most proud might one feel at the array of copies and original productions by the pupils in our local schools. What was there of the sort when we were boys!

Dwight's Journal of Music.

SATURDAY, APRIL 26, 1879.

BACH'S PASSION MUSIC.

OUR old Handel and Haydn Society may well feel pride in its great achievement on the afternoon and evening of Good Friday (April 11). The entire St. Matthew Passion Music, by Sebastian Bach, was actually presented, without any omission whatever, in these two performances, — a thing very seldom done in Germany itself; and never elsewhere in this country has any considerable portion of the great work been attempted, — here and there a choral, or a single aria, is all we have seen reported outside of this city, — so that Boston, too, can take pride in it, and in the society which has shown the earnest aspiration, the courage, the perseverance, and the ability to organize and carry through so noble and so vast an undertaking. It was the culmination of a series of gradual approaches to completeness, beginning with the festival in May, 1871, and resumed in May, 1874, and April, 1876. Increasing interest in the music has followed all these efforts; the singers themselves have gradually learned to love the work as they became familiar with it through rehearsal, until those who still think it dry and merely learned, difficult, and unrewarding, are left in a decided minority. Their enthusiasm has spread beyond themselves, until at last the public was prepared to seize with eagerness the rare opportunity now offered of hearing the grandest monumental work of sacred music for once well presented and complete. The Music Hall was crowded at both concerts, many persons coming from a distance, and many having to stand up through the whole; and for the benefit of hundreds who could not procure seats, public rehearsals of both parts were given on the two preceding afternoons.

The division into two performances was a wise one, and indeed absolutely necessary to completeness, for the First Part occupied two hours, and the Second Part almost two hours and a half. It was also in accordance with the original design of the work, which was composed for the church service, in the old Thomas-Kirche of Leipzig, of which Bach was Cantor, Part I. being sung before sermon (and probably before dinner), and Part II. after. That was on Good Friday, 1729. Then the MS. lay shelved for a century, until Mendelssohn and his friend, Edward Devrient, revived it in Berlin, March 12, 1829. Our performance was on its 150th anniversary; and the day was timely, many persons being drawn through their religious sentiment to music so expressive of all that there is most deep and tender and sublime in the associations and emotions of the Holy Week.

We have written so much about this Passion music in past years, that we need not enter into any full description of it now. It will be enough to speak of the performance and the impressions produced, dwelling a little more, perhaps, on the more important numbers hitherto omitted. For order we will take the various elements which enter into the construction of the work. Of course the real order is that of the gospel narrative of the betrayal and crucifixion of Christ. That narrative forms the connecting thread in all representations of the Passion, whether dramatic or musical; and therefore we have to consider: —

1. The Recitative, which is of two kinds: first, the simply narrative, which is assigned to a high tenor voice, in the character of Evangelist, of the kind called recitativo secco, sustained by mere chords struck on an upright piano-forte (Mr. Tucker). For the singer it is a most exacting task, requiring not only a voice of high range and great endurance, but thorough artistic training, taste and skill and feeling. For Mr. W. Courtney's delivery of what would be task enough for two voices, independently of the tenor arias, we have only praise. He acquitted himself most creditably. The voice was clear and sweet and flexible; the trying and unusual intervals were taken accurately and surely; the declamation was intelligent and telling, and it was nearly all expressive; perhaps now and then a trifle too expressive, where a few commonplace words of narrative were dwelt on with gratuitous pathos. But, on the whole, it was excellent, considering the long, high strain upon the organ. (It must be remembered that our modern pitch is about a tone and a half above that of Bach's time.) Some call these recitatives "dry" in other than a technical sense. We cannot for a moment agree with them. Bach's recitative, here and always, is unsurpassable in its wonderful expressiveness and beauty. The singer who has mastered it knows that, if nobody else does. Every phrase and every note of it is perfectly adapted to the thought, the image, and the world. Now and then it melts into unconscious melody, a measure or two of most pathetic cadence, as where "Peter wept bitterly;" or, again, grows graphic and appalling, as where "The veil of the temple is rent in twain." Experience, closer acquaintance, with true sensibility and taste, will surely sustain all that we have said of these "dry" recitatives.

Then there is the dialogue recitative, where characters are introduced as speaking, and which are more cantabile, and none could be more characteristically contrasted. The words of Jesus (Bass), as here set in tones, have all the dignity and tenderness that could be imagined. And with what exquisite sense of fitness and distinction Bach always, the moment Jesus begins, causes a delicate stream of violin harmony to flow in like a halo about his sacred head, as in the old pictures! Perhaps it escaped the notice of some of the critics. Mr. M. W. Whitney gave these sentences with due solemnity and tenderness, particularly in the scene of the Supper. Those of the High Priest, of Judas, and others, equally well individualized, were for the most part truly and strongly brought out by Mr. J. F. Winch, and then such expressive bits as the pert accusation of the two maids: "Thou, too, wast with Jesus of Galilee!" But it will not do to enter into detail here; perhaps we may, some day, if only for our own satisfaction, try to complete our old description of the work.

2. The German Chorals, with Bach's inimitable harmony, whereby the Passion bridges its entrance over into the Protestant (Lutheran) communion, representing the voice of the congregation, or whole Christian people, may be considered as the next essential element. There are some fifteen of these, counting the instances in which the same melody is introduced more than once, with a new harmony and changed expression. These, like the chorus in the old Greek tragedy, reflect and comment on the passing moments of the action. If the disciples ask, "Lord, is it I?" when told that one of them will betray him, the choral takes it upon itself for all and each: "'Tis I! my sins betray Thee!" Some of the chorals come in by themselves as moments of calm, grand repose, amid the exciting, agonizing stir of the recital, like broad, cool, still sheets of water in the midst of a bold, wild landscape, reflecting hills, and woods, and sky; others steal in softly and with exquisite effect, verse by verse, at intervals during a solo; and one, clothed with a marvelous wealth of figurative counterpoint, and with an orchestral accompaniment as rich and grand as a Symphony, is lengthened into a grand concluding chorus for the First Part. They were all sung by the five hundred voices with impressive power and rich sonority, accompanied by instruments in unison with each of the four parts, as well as by the great organ, used discreetly throughout the work by Mr. Lang. We felt, however, that some of them were rather too coarsely sung; we should have liked some delicate, expressive shading here and there in lines, such as we are told is given them in Berlin and Leipzig. We may except, however, from this comment the choral, "O head all bruised and wounded," which was sung with a subdued and tender feeling, very beautifully. We cannot help thinking that these chorals, sung by so many voices, would sound better unaccompanied. It is true, Bach indicates the instruments in his score and Franz retains them; but Bach had, perhaps, thirty voices in his chorus, and it is probable that he followed the old German custom of letting the congregation sing the melody in unison (that, to be sure, means octaves!), so that for harmony the instruments, at least the organ, would be necessary; we have heard chorals done so in the Cathedral at Berlin. For, otherwise, these chorals miss their proper function in the Passion, which is to afford sublime, refreshing moments of repose. Yet all credit to the correct and hearty and impressive manner in which they were done! Year by year (taking it for granted that the Passion at Good Friday will become an institution) there will be more and more refinement and expression in the rendering. Several of the chorals were sung here for the first time.

3. Grand choruses of entrance and of exit in each part, gigantic portals, fitly leading up to the stupendous scene, and leading us away, filling the mind with wonder and with awe, or swelling forth the universal requiem. We need not describe the colossal opening (double) chorus, "Come ye daughters," with the soprano ripieno choral sung by boys. Never before has it been so grandly sung here, and so well accompanied; it was an earnest labor, the rehearsal of it, on the part of singers and conductor, and was well rewarded. The boys, drafted from three of our public schools, had been well trained by Mr. Sharland, and were posted in a side upper gallery. In the public rehearsals we feared the loud cornet used to lead the boys would drown their voices, — Franz designates clarinets and the soprano trombone, softer instruments, — but on Friday the cornet was more subdued, and the fresh, delicate quality of the boy voices was pleasant to the ear.

"Ye lightnings, ye thunders," that swift, tremendous outburst of indignation, and imprecation of divine vengeance, after Jesus is bound and led away, may also count among the grand choruses, though it is only incidental, passing like a whirlwind in an instant, and is properly the conclusion of a scene, of which the first part is that tender duet of soprano and alto, with exquisite accompaniment of flutes, oboes, violins, and violas, in which every note weeps, and in the midst of which the incontinent rage of the disciples vents itself in exclamations, "Leave him! bind him not!" (which we would rather hear not so fortissimo) like the muttered thunder of the coming storm, until the double chorus finds full vent, "Ye lightnings!" etc. Somehow this chorus had not all the spirit that it has had on some former occasions; partly, perhaps, because so many of the tenor and bass seats were empty in the afternoon, and partly because it was not taken quite fast enough. Yet it made an impression and was loudly applauded, in spite of the request that there might be no applause.

Then, closing the first part, must be named the sublime figured choral, "O Man, bewail thy sin so great," before alluded to, which, though only in four parts, sounds, with its exceedingly rich and gorgeous orchestration, quite as grand and broad as any of those in eight parts. The pervading instrumental figure keeps up that caressing of the notes of which Bach is so fond: —

The melody, or tune, is sung always by the sopranos, beginning just ahead of the other voices, which are interwoven in an inexhaustible variety of most expressive counterpoint. The parts are hard to learn, but once learned are not soon lost, for in their character they are essentially singable; what a melodious, natural flow the bass part has, which looks so difficult! This chorus was given for the first time, and it was about as capital an achievement as the Handel and Haydn Society has ever reached.

The infinitely rich and tender "Schluss-Chor," or concluding chorus, which we have called the requiem, "Around thy tomb here sit we weeping," never fails to make a profound impression; it is simply perfect; no choir can sing it, no audience hear it, without deep emotion, which all carry home with them. It was grandly, nobly sung; and yet, we thought, too loudly, with too rough accompaniment of brass, for the sentiment of words and situation, "Here sit we weeping, and murmur low in tones suppress: Rest thee softly," etc. When Franz put in those parts for horns and trombones, he meant them doubtless to be kept down somewhat, so that they might greatly enrich the ensemble of tone, but not make it overloud and coarse.

4. The so-called "Turba," or short, stirring choruses of an excited crowd, now of the disciples, now of an infuriated mob, clamoring, "Let Him be crucified," etc. All of the more moderate ones in Part I. had been sung here before: "No, not on the feast," "Wherefore wilt thou be so wasteful?" etc. They are difficult, the parts curiously interwoven, vividly suggestive of the situation, and they were sung better than ever before, though there are always too many voices which seem to wait for surer ones to make the first attack. Most of the fierce choruses of the Jews had not been sung before, and it was a great work to master them, and in the main reasonably successful. "Let Him be crucified," for instance, which occurs a second time in a key one tone higher, is in its intertanglement of parts like an oak wrenched and twisted by the hurricane and lightning. What a satisfaction to have mastered such a thing! So, "He guilty is of death," "O tell us . . . who gave the blow," "What is that to us?" "His blood be on us," "Thou that destroy'st the temple," and that piercing cry (diminished seventh), "Barabbas!" all bring an angry, taunting, and relentless multitude, exciting one another, and out-screaming one another, in a few brief strokes most vividly before us. The conductor had been urgent and exacting, and the chorus had wrestled bravely with these knotty problems, and they solved them pretty satisfactorily.

5. The Arias, with their introductory melodic recitatives. These form a very large portion of the work, representing the reflective element. They are too numerous, too important, too full of pathos and of beauty to be passed lightly over in the small space we have left us now. Quite a number of them were sung here for the first time; and among these were some of those exquisitely lovely arias with chorus, which are among the finest numbers in the work, such as the tenor recitative and aria: "O grief!" . . . "I'll watch with my dear Jesus away," in which the soft, sweet harmonies of the choral: "So slumber shall our sins befall," comes in repeatedly. A new one this time was the opening number of Part II., alto aria: "Ah! now is my Jesus gone," and chorus, in a somewhat romantic, pastoral vein, suited to the words from the Song of Solomon, "Whither has thy Friend departed?" We must take another time to call attention to the sometimes at first hidden beauties of all these melodies, with their no less beautiful accompaniments. At present we can only briefly thank the artists who showed themselves so well fitted for their several tasks, and who entered so well into the spirit, as well as the severe technical requirements of the work. Miss Henrietta Beebe sang the soprano arias in a pure, sweet, flexible voice, in a tasteful, finished style, with respect for the composer, and with good expression, although her voice is of too light a character to bear all the weight of emotion with which these songs are charged. She was particularly happy in the air with the flute solo, and delicate accompaniment of two clarinets: "From love unbounded." Miss Edith Abell has a rich contralto, or mezzo soprano voice, well trained and effective, and sang all her arias artistically, with true feeling and expression. Her lowest tones, however, were sometimes blatant and unpleasant; and she seems easily fatigued. Her great aria: "O pardon me, my God" (Erbarme dich), was sung with breadth and sustained nobleness of style. Mr. Remenyi's violin obbligato was in some respects finely played, but there was too much of himself in it. And the same may be said of his obbligato in the bass aria, which Mr. J. F. Winch sang so tellingly and grandly: "Give me back my dearest Master." Mr. Winch was hardly in his best voice, but he was well prepared and effective in some of his exceedingly difficult tasks, such as "Come, blessed cross!" And let us not forget, while speaking of this aria, to give credit to Mr. Wulf Fries for the altogether beautiful and faultless manner in which he played the interesting and very difficult new violoncello solo. Mr. Courtney was as artistic, and on the whole satisfactory, in his trying arias as in the narrative recitatives, — a remarkable achievement for one man, indeed! Mr. Whitney's ponderous and noble bass told to fine advantage in the most beautiful of all the bass solos, the recitative: "At eventide, cool hour of rest," and aria: "Cleanse thee, O my soul, from sin," which he sang with a sustained and even breadth of style and with true feeling and expression.

We have yet to speak of the highly creditable coöperation of the orchestra, and of the important nature of the work they had to do, and of many other things, before this record will be worthy and complete.

JUDAS MACCABAEUS. — Handel's martial and heroic Oratorio was given with great spirit and in grand style on the evening of Easter Sunday, April 13. The only drawbacks were that, in spite of large omissions, it was altogether too long, coming so soon after the exhausting music of the Passion week; and that many numbers of the work require the labors of a man like Robert Franz to fill out the accompaniments. The choruses, some of them very difficult, were on the whole splendidly sung. The soloists were: Miss Fanny Kellogg, who achieved a brilliant success in the soprano arias, delighting all by the clear, bright, musical quality of her voice, and fine, tasteful execution. She has some faults yet to unlearn: chiefly, the habit of attacking a passage with a too explosive sforzando; Miss Edith Abell, whose voice seemed somewhat dull and weary after the former efforts, though she sang finely; Mr. Courtney, who again distinguished himself by the clear, ringing tone and fervor of his martial tenor airs; and Mr. M. W. Whitney, who did all justice to the bass part of Simon. Orchestra, and organist (B. J. Lang), and the thorough-going conductor, were up to all requirements.

Everybody, of course, with "his sisters and his cousins and his aunts," will go to the complimentary benefit of CARL ZERMAIN on Friday, May 3, and hear Elijah, — that is, everybody who can squeeze into the Music Hall.

CONCERTS.

We have only room for a mere line or two about a few of the many interesting Concerts of the past three weeks; the rest will have to wait their turn.

The fourth and last EUMENÆ Concert (April 9), was the most brilliant and delightful of them all. The New York Philharmonic Club gave a most pure and satisfactory rendering of Beethoven's perfect Quintet in C, Mr. Arnold leading with more fire than he has shown before. Mozart's dainty first Quartet in G, was very smoothly, neatly, delicately played. But the great Oetel of Meudelssohn (for four violins, two violas and two 'cellos), which starts off with such fire in the Allegro, has such grace, and beauty, and finesse in the Andante, and such scouring speed and rush in the Finale, carried all before it by the fire and vigor, and the perfection of ensemble, with which it was played. Three of our own Boston artists (Messrs. Allen, Akeroyd, and Wulf Fries) were no mean match for their associates in this performance.

The first of the three Classical Concerts announced by Messrs. SHERWOOD, ALLEN, and WULF FRIES, took place at Mechanics Hall, on Tuesday evening, April 15, and was a choice, artistic, and delightful entertainment. The String Quartet, in F, an early work by Rubinstein, impressed us more agreeably than many more ambitious and wild things which he has written since. It is all fresh, clear, spontaneous, and charming in its ideas, and consistently wrought out; and it was very nicely played by the "Beethoven Quartette" (Messrs. Allen, Julius Akeroyd, Henry Heindl, and Wulf Fries.) Chopin's "Polonaise Brillante," in C, Op. 3, for piano and 'cello, was finely played by Mrs. Sherwood and Wulf Fries; and that lady covered herself with credit by the smooth, facile, graceful technique, as well as the verve and fire with which she played Schumann's great E-flat Quintet, with the above-named artists. Miss Mary E. Turner, soprano, who sang Panina's aria, "Ah! lo so," from the Magic Flute, showed great improvement both in the developed quality of her fine voice, and in the tasteful delivery and phrasing of the music, albeit the rendering was a little cold and impassive. Franz's "Slumber Song" seemed less well suited to her; but "The Lark," by Rubinstein, much better. We shall have still better things to report of the second concert (April 22), and doubtless, also, of the third, next week.

Mme. RIVE-KING's Piano-forte Recital (April 17) had a large audience for a stormy afternoon. The programme was what we stated in our last, save in the omission of the Mendelssohn "Spring Song." Her consummate technique was more than ever appreciated in the small hall; difficulties seem no longer to exist for her. The Sonata Appassionata of Beethoven was superbly rendered; though one must have had more of life experience to sound all its depths of meaning and of feeling. In the Allegro from "Schumann's "Faschingsschwank," and in six notable selections from Chopin (Nocturne in G minor, Op. 37; Berceuse; Impromptu in C-sharp minor; Valse, in A flat, Op. 34; the Scherzo, in B minor, and the Rondo in E flat), she showed many phases of her interpretative faculty. Most of it was very fine, indeed, though one sometimes felt that all-conquering executive power claimed notice rather than the inner sense and spirit of the composition. But we think that altogether too much fault has been found with her performances in this regard.

Her transcription of the Andante and Rondo from Mendelssohn's Violin Concerto is a musically and clever piece of work, and sounded well. Some may question the legitimacy of such a transfer from one instrument to another so entirely different; but Beethoven arranged and published his own Violin Concerto to be played on the pianoforte, and Liszt has transcribed great Organ Fugues of Bach to general acceptance. In Tausig's expansion of the Strauss waltz, "Man lebt nur einmal," Mme. King revelled in the dazzling maze of difficulties.

Miss Abbie Whinnery (whom Boston, we regret to say, has lost) sang Beethoven's "Know'st thou the land?" Haydn's "Mermaid's Song," and Faure's "Sancta Maria," in a most simple, pure, artistic style, and with great sweetness and evenness of voice.

AUGUST KREISSMANN. — The following tender tribute was received just a day too late for our last issue: —

MR. EDITOR: Let one of many sorrowing friends speak through your columns a word of tribute to the memory of that kind and noble man and devoted musician, August Kreissmann.

The lately-received news of his death in Germany was a sudden and severe blow to those in Boston who enjoyed the privilege of his friendship. Gentle and amiable in disposition, equally charming in his domestic and social life, of almost unlimited generosity — as more than one can testify, — his loss surely calls forth more than common grief. Through all the years of his constantly recurring illness, he never lost the sweet patience which was one of his distinguishing traits.

His music was his never-failing comfort; he wrote recently to a friend: "In my shattered state of health, the pursuit of Music (die edle Musica) affords almost my entire life-enjoyment. She never yet abandoned a faithful follower." Many a musician now in this city or on foreign ground, can recall delightful hours passed under his roof in sympathetic enjoyment of their beloved Tonkunst. Hopes have often arisen that renewed strength would permit him to return and resume his place among us. How sad is the certainty that those hopes can be cherished no more! . . .

Our hearts mourn over that grave in German soil; and our deepest sympathy goes out to the sorely-stricken family whose lives are thus over-shadowed. S. B.

Boston, April 10, 1879.

MUSICAL CORRESPONDENCE.

BALTIMORE, APRIL 21. — Since my last there has been nothing of general interest in musical matters here beside the Peabody Concerts. The programmes of the last two were as follows: —

SIXTH CONCERT, APRIL 5.

Eighth Symphony. B minor. No. 8. Niels W. Gade.
Work 47
Prelude and Romance, from the 4th act of the opera Troville Asger Hamerik.
Miss H. A. Hunt.
Piano-Concerto. A minor. Work 18. Edvard Grieg.
Mr. B. Courlaender.
Elfin Hill. Danish drama. Work 100.
Fragments. Composed 1828 Fr. Kuhlau.
(Overture, Folk-songs, Agnete's Dream and elfin dance, Folk-song, Minuet.)
The folk-songs sung by Miss H. A. Hunt.

SEVENTH CONCERT, APRIL 19.

Fantastic Symphony, C major. Work 14. Hector Berlioz.
Recitative and Air, from Theodora G. F. Handel.
Miss Edith Abell.
Serenade, D minor. No. 8. Work 69 R. Volkmann.
(For string orchestra and 'cello obligato.)
Mr. Rudolph Green.
The Lost Chord. Song with piano Arthur Sullivan.
Miss Edith Abell.
The Roman Carnival. Concert overture.
A major. Work 9 Hector Berlioz.

Mr. Courlaender, who took the piano part in Grieg's concerto, is one of our veteran pianists and has been connected with the Peabody Conservatory for a number of years. Mr. Rudolph Green played the 'cello obligato in Volkmann's Serenade (an interesting piece of humorous music) with much expression and in appropriate style. He is well known here as an able, conscientious 'cello performer, and was for several years a member of the old Thomas orchestra in its palmiest days. The serenade and Berlioz's "Carnival" overture are the first new selections that have been attempted by our orchestra this season.

The Fantastic Symphony of Berlioz is not a stranger to Boston audiences. The letter of Stephen Heller, published in your last issue, will have given your readers a conception of the personal peculiarities of the eminent French master of instrumentation sufficient to dispel any surprise they may have felt at the peculiarly wild and eccentric choice of subject of this brilliant, sensational work.

The peculiarities of this symphony which call for adverse criticism on the part of the lover of the orthodox in music, are the very attributes that render it so effective with a general audience. Your correspondent has heard it here time and again, but never in any instance has it failed to elicit the warmest approbation.

The prelude to the fourth act of Mr. Hamerik's opera, Troville, is a surpassingly beautiful piece of tone painting. It is very popular with our concert-goers, and I find it is gaining decided favor elsewhere. At the last Carlsberg concert in New York it was received with much enthusiasm, and it has been lately performed in Copenhagen and in Berlin and elsewhere on the continent. MUSICUS.

CINCINNATI, APRIL 4. — A glance over a few past and the present musical seasons is most gratifying. Then musicians and music-lovers looked upon the concerts given by the Cincinnati Orchestra, and the few chamber concerts arranged by our local pianists, as oases in a desert; now, we have a series of twelve orchestral concerts and one of twelve chamber concerts, of constantly improving excellence. Then, the public could scarcely be persuaded to support these concerts to such an extent as would make the necessary rehearsals possible; they were not appreciated except by a few earnest advocates of art culture; now it is a positive demand of society to converse intelligently or unintelligently on the "last concert." The change is astonishing; and when the petty dissensions of the last two weeks are over, it is to be hoped that gradually the public will patronize artistic efforts, not because it is fashionable, but because it has grown to be a want, almost a necessity of life. Now, too, we have a chorus constantly increasing in membership, and promising finally to embrace all good singers, who find it possible to give as much time to the rehearsals as the rigid discipline of the organization demands.

The College Choir (as it is officially named) was heard for the first time in the last orchestra concert. The programme consisted of, —

Symphony, G minor Mozart.
Twenty-third Psalm Schubert.
Chorus of women's voices with orchestra.

"Stabat Mater," Rossini.
Miss Annie Norton, Miss Louise Rollwagen, Mr.
Hartley Thompson, Mr. Charles Davis, the College Choir, and Orchestra.

It is gratifying to conservative musicians that Haydn, Mozart, and Beethoven, as well as Schumann and Schubert, have been so largely represented in the concert. The public, too, appears to enjoy the tone-poems of these masters, which can be heard with pleasure for the sake of the true music they contain, without the necessity of a long psychological dissertation as to their meaning. In that magnificent masterwork of Mozart, the improvement in the playing, especially of the strings, was noticeable. Unity in phrasing, so necessary in Mozart's beautiful thematic work, had evidently been prepared with the utmost care and to good effect. How universal was the desire to hear the first performance of the College Choir was attested by the unusually large audience of from twenty-five hundred to three thousand persons. The beautiful "Twenty-third Psalm," for female voices, was sung well throughout. The material over which Mr. Thomas disposes is indeed excellent. The intonation was good, the shading in some instances very fine. There was, however, perceptible a slight nervousness which at times made the attack uncertain. This will doubtless disappear as the chorus gains confidence by singing in public more frequently.

A work in which the sentiment of the poem and that of the music are more thoroughly at variance than in Rossini's Stabat Mater it would be difficult to find. It is an interesting study in psychology to trace, by the attempts of the composer here and there to do justice to the text, and his irresistibly falling back into his inborn musical bias, the states of mind in which the different numbers sprang into existence. It is certain that the Stabat, however interesting from a purely musical point of view, cannot lay claim to that unity and harmony of all its factors, which every true art-work demands. The performance, as a whole, was very uneven. The good shading, the accuracy in rhythm, and in intonation present, for instance, in No. 1, were at times wanting, as in "Eia Mater." In the "Inflammatus," the chorus was often completely drowned by the brass instruments, while in the same number the sotto voce chorus accompaniment was smoothly and accurately sung. The final fugue, that oddity in contrapuntal art, could not be appreciated in the large hall. Miss Annie Norton, the soprano soloist, possesses a voice of unusual beauty. With great fullness it combines an exquisite timbre. The soprano part in the Stabat Mater demands a thorough knowledge of all the means of dramatic expression, which Miss Norton does not at present command. Yet her singing was thoroughly musical, and making allowance for the embarrassment always attending the first appearance before a large audience, she acquitted herself in a manner which justifies the promise of a bright future. Miss Rollwagen, who in the interpretation of German songs has proved herself a thorough artist, was not so successful in her rendering of the "Fac ut portem." The tendency to sing too high when under the excitement of appearing in public, was especially noticeable. Miss Rollwagen, however, never fails to interest with the earnestness and intensity which mark all her efforts. Mr. Thompson, through the good judgment and routine which he commands, made up for the shortcomings of his voice in the exacting tenor part. The contrary must be said of Mr. Davis, who with a very good, sonorous voice, — rather weak, however, in the lower register for so large a hall, — has not the necessary control over it. The choir promises well for the future, and we may hope soon to hear difficult choral works produced in an excellent manner. Already the Cantata, My Spirit was in Heavenness, by Bach, is in course of preparation for the last one of this series of orchestra concerts. The programme of the Eighth Chamber Concert, from attending on which I was unavoidably detained, contained: —

Quartet, B-flat (for strings) Haydn.
Five Scotch Songs, Op. 108 Beethoven.
"Schlummerlied" and "Für Einen" Frans.
Quintet, G minor (for strings) Mozart.
Miss Annie Norton, vocalist. Mr. G. Schneider, piano accompanist.

The quartet and quintet, the latter with the assistance of Mr. Eich, I am informed, were rendered with extraordinary smoothness and technical perfection, as well as with unity of sentiment. The unusually large audience I hope was an evidence of the growing appreciation of the treasure we possess in such a string quartet. Miss Norton appeared to great advantage in the songs by Beethoven, beautifully accompanied by Messrs. Schneider, Jacobsohn, and Hartdegen, and in those by Frans.

The Ninth Thomas Orchestra Concert had for its programme: —

Symphony, D major Haydn.
Concerto No. 5, E-flat, Op. 73 Beethoven.
Franz Rummel.
Ballet Music and "Wedding Procession," from "Faramors" Rubinstein.
Fantasia on Hungarian Airs Liszt.
Franz Rummel.

In the Haydn symphony the remarkable improvement in the playing of the orchestra was again evident. The strings seemed to be in perfect accord; for instance, in so delicate a passage as the Trio of the Minuet. What a mine of beauty there is in that symphony! Every motive is so perfectly in its place, seems so to have sprung from intuition, from inspiration, that the slightest alteration or omission would break up the whole organism, every part of which is so homogeneous and necessary.

Mr. Rummel, who was preceded by the most favorable and flattering criticisms, did not appear to the best advantage in the "Emperor Concerto." The first movement lost much of the grandeur, which is its characteristic feature, through the hurried manner in which it was played. The last movement may serve as display for virtuosity, but certainly not the first. The Adagio Mr. Rummel played in beautiful style, barring the slip of memory which occurred both in the public rehearsal and concert. In the Hungarian Fantasia he displayed remarkable execution and brilliancy; his playing was full of dash and fire, sometimes to the disadvantage of technical perfection. His efforts could not be duly appreciated in the immense hall, which is certainly not adapted for piano playing. For this reason every connoisseur was glad to embrace the opportunity of hearing Mr. Rummel at a piano recital given in Dexter Hall, with the following remarkable programme: —

Fantasia Chromatique and Fugue Bach.
Sonate, F minor, Op. 67 Beethoven.
Variations Serieuses, Op. 54 Mendelssohn.
Faschingsschwank, Op. 26 Schumann.
Impromptu, Op. 29, A-flat }
Nocturne, Op. 27, No. 2, D-flat } Chopin.
Polonaise, Op. 53, A-flat }
Gondoliers } Venezia e Napoli Liszt.
Tarantella }

To execute such a programme accurately, and from memory, too, requires complete control over the entire field of technical skill; to interpret every number well and truthfully, more than talent and education is necessary. That Mr. Rummel is equal to the technical requirements of the most difficult piano literature is beyond question. From the Fantasia Chromatique to the shorter pieces of Chopin and Liszt, he played every composition of the programme with apparent ease and with brilliancy. His touch is crisp and decided, his execution generally clear and smooth, as is almost always the case with constitutions in which nervous energy predominates over purely muscular power. He has rare command over gradations and the character of the tone, and constantly takes advantage of this, often for the better production of effect, but at the expense of objective interpretation. In every respect he is purely subjective. In consequence of this there was a sameness in his rendering of the different composers which bordered on monotony. No matter how brilliant may be effects produced by contrasts over-sharply marked, their frequent repetition deprives them of zest. A constant fluctuating between dynamic extremes can be interesting for a time, but is totally contrary to the character of many of the compositions which were so treated by Mr. Rummel. His playing appeared to me to depend more on sporadic and chaotic flashes, and moments of impulse, than on the reproducing of the idea of the composer, which by constant reflection and study, from being objective at first, has become subjective or thoroughly flesh and blood with the interpreting artist. Mr. Rummel, however, so completely masters the entire technical apparatus of piano-playing, with such ease and certainty, that, living in a musical atmosphere as he does, and surrounded by the most refining and educating influences, he cannot fail to become more thoroughly imbued with the spirit and poetry of music than he seems now to be, and thus satisfy all the requirements of a true artist.

CHICAGO, April 17, 1879. — I cannot forbear offering a few words of tribute to the memory of my old friend, and kind instructor, the late AUGUST KREISMANNS. In former years, when the musical art was attracting the warm interests of my youth, and the desire for culture and knowledge in music was shaping my pathway in life towards the musician's humble rank, it was my good fortune to meet Mr. Kreismanns, and under his directing care to study the German Lieder. As memory recalls the teacher, the cultivated, gentle, and warm-hearted man, and echoes his noble advice, his instructive talks of art, his enthusiasm for what was good and beautiful in music, the mind becomes conscious of its great debt to this faithful instructor, for the wise influence he exercised over youthful endeavor. The whole musical literature of what was classic in German song, was unfolded little by little to my comprehension; and to his artistic treatment of the refined sentiment of those noble compositions, and his masterly interpretations, do I owe the formation of my taste for good vocal music. I remember how his keen analysis of a song would pass beyond the simple words and notes, until it made manifest the emotion of the mind that was represented in the composition. There was a reality of feeling to be presented, and that so clearly, that the delicate shades of the picture, together with its strong characteristics, must form a representation that was an embodiment of truth. It was no exaggeration of sentiment, but a feeling for art, that reached the spirit in the ideal, and transformed it into an actuality, by clothing it with a living vocal form. His interpretation of the "Aufenthalt" of Schubert comes to my mind as I write. To those who are familiar with the song, no suggestion of its weird beauty is necessary. As his rich voice caught up the wild and almost tragical cry of the storm-king — as he sings out his lament, — it seemed almost to hold one transfixed by the very majestic murmuring of the grief of the real personage. When the climax of the song was reached at the last few measures, where the high G is held with a piercing cry of weird power, the effect was thrilling and grand. It was my good fortune to hear Mr. Kreismanns sing a great deal in those far-away days, and to have the pleasure of furnishing the accompaniments for song after song; and many a bright picture is left in my mind of his devotion to his art. As a gentleman he was ever courteous and kind, and his judgments of others were always tempered by justice and charity. The first songs he sang in public in Boston, were the "Adelaide" of Beethoven, and "Am Meer," of Schubert. So he told me one morning when he gave me the pleasure of hearing them. While his gentle spirit has passed into the bliss and peace of the Beyond, his influence in this busy world is still felt by many a friend and pupil, who will long reverence his memory. True to his art, faithful to his friends, earnest in good works, and a noble champion of the truth, Requiescat in pace!

Passing to my record of our musical season, the "Symphony Concert" under the direction of Mr. S. G. Pratt, which took place on the evening of April 16, deserves mention. The following was the programme: —

"Les Preludes" Liszt.
Vorspiel to "Otto Visconti" Glenn.
Prayer from "Tannhauser" Wagner.
Mrs. Clara D. Stacy.
Symphony No. 4. (Italian) Mendelssohn.
Aria from "St. Paul" Mendelssohn.
Mrs. W. S. Watrous.
Minuet Boccherini.
String Orchestra.
(a) — The Watersprite Schumann.
(b) — Wedding March Sodermann.
Chicago Lary Quartette.
Anniversary March Overture Pratt.
Chorus and Orchestra.

Mr. Pratt, who is a young and very enthusiastic musician, has doubtless been under the censure of criticism more than any other member of the musical profession of our city. Yet in spite of any number of adverse comments, and in the very face of failure itself, he has been constantly energetic in his endeavor to carry out his plans. He went twice to Europe for extended study, and although disappointment might sadden for a time, it could not suppress his enthusiasm, or dishearten him in his work. In his effort to be a composer he wrote a symphony, an opera, and a large number of smaller things. His large works seemed (to me) to be an indication of his ambition, rather than manifestations of a new musical genius. Yet in his composition he presented many marked signs of talent and originality, and gave promise of passing into a much higher field than that which is held by mediocrity. The great element in all successful endeavor is consistency of action. Ambition must be held in subjection by sound discretion, to enable even a genius to ripen into a rich maturity of accomplishment. As a conductor Mr. Pratt has indicated much talent, many good ideas, and gives forth a promise of success in his endeavor, should propitious circumstances furnish him the opportunity. The mountain height of excellence cannot be reached except by the rough and hard pathway of persistent study and consistent work. That Mr. Pratt gave us three Symphony Concerts, even at a financial loss to himself, indicates a praiseworthy devotion to his art, for which he deserves our thanks. The bright and joyous "Italian Symphony" of Mendelssohn was the best performed orchestral work that I have heard from our home band this season. It had many enjoyable points, and was the most refreshing offering that the programmes presented. Considering the number of rehearsals that were given to it, it was fairly done, and the conductor deserves praise for his labor in bringing it out. The little Minuet was also nicely given. The lady singers all received recalls for their vocal offerings, and seemed to please the audience very much. The programme also gave us an orchestral composition by another of our home musicians, Mr. Gleason of the Hershey School of Music. It was a short, but pleasing work, and gave satisfaction. One hearing would forbid me from speaking of it with the justice it deserves. All honest and well-directed efforts for the advancement, or cultivation of what is pure in art, should receive the commendation of every true musician. C. H. B.

A SILVER ANNIVERSARY. — On the 16th of April the Mason & Hamlin Organ Co. celebrated their silver anniversary by a dinner at Young's, it being the twenty-fifth year since the commencement of their business. The beginning was very small, in two or three upper rooms on Cambridge Street, where they made two or three melodious a week. But so excellent have their productions proved, that they have now reached No. 104,000, having actually made and sold nearly that number. The reputation of their work has extended to all civilized countries, so that the whole world may now be said to be their market. For many years they have borne off the highest honors at all World's Industrial Exhibitions, and won golden opinions from the musical magnates of the old as well as the new world, and in a single year they have supplied England alone with 1000 organs.

BOSTON, MAY 10, 1879.

CONTENTS.

GEORGE SAND AND FRÉDÉRIC CHOPIN. A Study. Fanny Raymond Ritter	78
BEETHOVEN AT THE HEIGHT OF HIS PRODUCTIVITY (1807-9). Translations from Thayer's Third Volume	76
TALKS ON ART: SECOND SERIES. From Instructions by Mr. Wm. M. Hunt to his Pupils. V.	76
MARIA DEL OCCIDENTE. F. H. U.	76
VANDAL "IMPROVEMENTS": BOSTON MUSIC HALL IN DANGER	77
THE EXPRESSIVE POWER OF MUSIC. William F. Apthorp	77
THE PASSION MUSIC	78
THE ZEBRAH TESTIMONIAL	78
CONCERTS	78
Mr. Eichberg's Violin School. — The Cecilian. — Messrs. Sherwood, Allen, and Fries.
MUSICAL CORRESPONDENCE	79
New York. — Baltimore. — Chicago. — Milwaukee.
NOTES AND GLIMPSINGS	80

All the articles not credited to other publications were expressly written for this Journal.

Published fortnightly by HOUGHTON, OSGOOD AND COMPANY, 220 Devonshire Street, Boston. Price, 10 cents a number; $2.50 per year.

For sale in Boston by CARL PRUFER, 30 West Street, A. WILLIAMS & Co., 283 Washington Street, A. K. LORING, 309 Washington Street, and by the Publishers; in New York by A. BRINTON, JR., 39 Union Square, and HOUGHTON, OSGOOD & Co., 21 Astor Place; in Philadelphia by W. H. BOWEN & Co., 1102 Chestnut Street; in Chicago by the CHICAGO MUSIC COMPANY, 512 State Street.

GEORGE SAND AND FRÉDÉRIC CHOPIN.

A STUDY.

BY FANNY RAYMOND RITTER.

(Continued from page 67.)

In the twenty numbers succeeding Op. 26, we find Chopin at the height of inspiration. Here we have the very emotion that lies at the heart of many of the most beautiful of Byron's or Lamartine's lyrics, Shelley's Indian Serenade, Keats's Ode to a Nightingale, Petrarca's sonnets. An almost voluptuous richness pervades the tender or melancholy passages of some of these; suffused with glowing tone color, sadness and regret are less predominant in them than in most of his previous or subsequent compositions; they often reach a depth that is profoundly touching, and yet not enervating to the feelings. Among these we meet with delicious waltzes, some of his most original mazurkas, and loveliest, most persuasive nocturnes, martial Polonaises, especially the C minor Polonaise in Op. 40, and the difficult Op. 44 (which also includes a mazurka), besides the Tarantella and the Impromptu in A-flat:—

"Scarcely may the ear, the finest, clearest, follow;
The lightest foot, the step most fairy-foot
Must rest, while, spell-entranced, the listening spirit
Rocks on the waves of this wild melody!"¹

Then Op. 39, that furious Scherzo, a choral interspersed with tossing arpeggio and octave passages; Op. 38, the Ballade dedicated to Schumann; the Sonata, Op. 35, and the Preludes! Of the Schumann Ballade, Ehler observes: "I have seen children break off their games to listen to the story told at the beginning of this Ballade. It is a fairy-tale transformed into music. And as much transparency plays through its four-part phrases, as through the flexible fans of the palm-tree waved by the mild spring air." But that fairy-like mood becomes tragic wildness in the presto; this always recalls to me the supernatural fascination of an old melodrama founded on the tradition of the "Flying Dutchman," and I fancy I detect a resemblance in the melody, and still more in the spirit of this Ballade, to that of Senta's romance in Wagner's opera on the same subject. Which of Mickiewicz's poems inspired it? For Chopin told Schumann that it was while perusing these that the idea of this Ballade first awoke in his mind. Surely a sense of wild, homeless, but not ignoble or unmanly despair pervades it; as though the spectre of his own destiny, a lost and wandering vessel, struggling vainly with the elements and an adverse fate, unhappy, yet not unconquered, floated before the composer's fancy. The Sonata is a treasure of musical power and beauty, containing the most mournful of all funeral marches, and a Scherzo of indescribable sweetness and pathos, a very garden of Boccaccio, far removed from, yet not unconscious, of death and desolation. And the wild finale! All this is "music of the future," to the radical extremity; Chopin's Ninth Symphony.

¹ From Ferdinand Hiller's poem written for the celebration at Düsseldorf in memory of Chopin, Nov. 3, 1849.

As for the Preludes, some of these seem to have attracted to, and crystallized within themselves an entire existence; the all of emotion in an atom. Free creations thrown off for the relief of the composer's deepest feelings, and almost entirely independent of technical aims, though nearly always perfect in form, many contain the germs of complete tragedies; some are poetic and graceful episodes; some are absolutely realistic reflections of passing moods; in others he seems to be conversing with, confessing, perhaps seeking to console himself. The fourth, a masterpiece of large phrasing and chromatic harmony, and the sixth (this was the prelude written by Chopin on that evening when Mme. Sand was absent from Valdemosa during an inundation—to which event, as related by her, I have already referred), were played by Lefebvre Wély on the organ, at the Madeleine, in Paris, during Chopin's obsequies, when the funeral march in the sonata Opus 35 was also performed by an orchestra. Some of the Preludes present to us "a vision of deceased monks and funeral chants," writes Mme. Sand; such we may imagine when we listen to No. 15, with its sustained melody of enthusiastic, loving faith, broken in upon by a long and solemn processional strain, advancing and passing away, and accompanied by the tones of a convent bell. No. 20 greatly resembles, in its character, some of the choruses in Gluck's Orpheus; and this resemblance is especially striking when we compare it with the chorus of furies, "Chi mai dell' Erebo" (in the same key and tempo), in that opera. Passionate despair (or despairing passion?) lightened by episodes of ravishing, heart-piercing tenderness, and monastic gloom broken in upon by the ecstasies of transcendental religious aspiration, are the leading psychological traits of the Preludes. If George Sand has described for us, in her book on Majorca, the outward character of the people, the life, the nature, that surrounded them there, and the reflections these suggested, Chopin's Preludes may be accepted as the quintessence of the impressions made by that experience on a remarkable mind, and as a soulful commentary upon some of her pages, such as the following:—

"How vast, how noble in style, this convent must once have appeared! How many remains attest its former splendor and elegance! How sweet it must have been to come here at evening, to breathe the soft air, to dream, while listening to the sound of the sea, when these high galleries were paved with rich mosaics, when crystal water murmured in marble basins, when a silver lamp glimmered like a star in the depth of the sanctuary! Who would not abjure all the care, fatigue, and ambition of social life, to bury himself here in tranquillity and forgetfulness of the entire world, on condition that he could remain an artist, and devote ten, perhaps twenty years to a single work, which he might polish slowly, like a precious diamond, and place upon an altar, not to be found fault with by the passing ignoramus, but to be saluted and invoked as a worthy representation of Divinity! . . . When the weather was too inclement for us to climb the mountain, we roamed under cover through the convent, and many hours were passed in exploring the immense building. I know not what attraction led me to seek, amid these deserted walls, for the inmost secret of monastic life. Its trace was yet so recent, that I often fancied I heard the noise of sandals on the pavement, and the murmur of prayers under the chapel vaults. One day, when we were exploring the upper galleries, we found a pretty tribune, from which we were able to look into a large and handsome chapel, so well furnished and arranged that it might have been deserted only the day before. The chair of the superior still stood in its place, and the order of weekly religious exercises, in a frame of black wood, hung from the ceiling amid the stalls of the chapter. Each stall had a little image of a saint attached to its back, probably the patron saint of each monk. The odor of incense, with which the walls had been so long saturated, had not yet passed away. The altars were decorated with withered flowers, the half burned tapers still stood in their candlesticks. The order and good preservation of these objects contrasted singularly with the ruins outside, and the tall brambles that filled up the windows. My children, Solange and Maurice, expected every day to find a fairy palace filled with marvels, in the garrets, of the chartreuse, or the traces of some wild and terrible drama buried under its ruins; and when they disappeared from my eyes in the windings of some spiral staircase, I fancied they might be lost to me forever, and I hurried on with a sort of superstitious fear; for so sinister a building certainly has its effect on the imagination, and I would defy the calmest and coldest brain to remain there long in a condition of perfect sanity. . . . To do justice to the grand style of the olive trees of Majorca, and the glowing sky from which their savage outlines stand out so boldly, we should possess nothing less than the grandiose pencil of Rousseau,—one of the greatest landscape painters of our day, but who is still unknown to the public, thanks to the obstinate jury of exhibition that has for several years refused to allow him to exhibit his masterworks; the limpid waters in which myrtle and asphodel are reflected, call for Dupré. More cultivated landscapes, in which nature, although at liberty, seems to assume an air of pride and classicism, from excess of coquetry, would tempt the severe Corot. To exhibit those adorable wildernesses of vegetation, in which a world of grasses, wild flowers, old tree-boles, and weeping garlands, droop over those mysterious springs where the stork comes to wade, I would fain hold, like a magic wand, the burin of Huet at my disposition; but it is you, Eugène, great artist, dear friend, whom I would have led with me into the mountain on that night when the moon vividly illumined the inundation that overtook us!"

The last fifteen or sixteen of Chopin's published compositions display less spontaneity, are more involved, than those preceding them, although we still find such noble inspirations as the first Nocturne in Opus 48, a life-drama in itself; some beautiful mazurkas, the unrivaled Berceuse, and the exquisite set of waltzes, Opus 64. Of No. 2 in this last set, the silly story has been told, that Chopin, on hearing one day that Mme. Sand was ill and could not receive him, turned to his piano-forte and composed the first thirty-two measures; but being suddenly informed that she was better, played the much gayer second theme. As if such art-works, the essence of a poet's blood and brain, were shaken out of his sleeve, and strummed in such a manner for the delectation of an indifferent messenger; especially in the case of the refined, retiring, exclusive Chopin, whose dances are not to be danced to, but are, rather, "the dance, not of the body, but of the soul, that dances, like rage and remorse, out of the ball-room into the stormy night." But this silly story is a pendant to the other foolish gossip about Chopin's black nails and unwashed hands; the circulation of such anecdotes proves that the race of clowns, once so numerous, who formerly saw in every musician an uneducated, half-tipsy minstrel, or a sort of merry-Andrew, an inspired idiot, is not yet quite extinct.

Chopin's posthumous works present little that is remarkable, though the Fantaisie Impromptu contains something of his youthful freshness. The songs, collected by Fontana, do not, perhaps, offer us a just idea of all that Chopin, who was so essentially lyrical, might have accomplished as a writer for the voice, had he chosen to turn his attention to this branch of musical art. Written at the call of love or friendship, but not for publicity, a few for the albums of his pupils, the princesses Beauvau or Potocka, they possess the sincere charm of folk-songs, and were probably written in such a manner and for such a reason as are those,—the necessity for instantaneous expression. Perhaps while rambling in the country round Warsaw with his father, who loved such open-air excursions as a recreation from academical labors, listening to rustic singers and musicians, or observing the peasants chanting songs or hymns in chorus, on the way to market or church, as is the custom in some parts of Poland, or in memory of such hours, he may have composed several of these songs; assuredly a thought of Constantia Gladkowska, with whom he exchanged rings on his departure from Poland, breathes through the soft regret of No. 14; patriotism, and sympathy for his friend Titus Woyciechowski, who joined the Polish army in 1830, may have inspired Nos. 9 and 10.

It has been often supposed of Chopin that he developed at once as a composer, and remained the same, from his first period of artistic productivity to his end. The striking character of Chopin's compositions may have created this impression, for their effect must have been that of powerful originality from the first; but I believe the student will not fail to observe in them a gradual process of artistic evolution within itself, up to a climax of full, independent expression, varied according to the moods and thoughts of the composer, followed by a subsequent diminution of power, and even of originality. And to suppose that the events of his life, especially such as more nearly regarded his deeper feelings, came and went without any influence on the character of his works, would betray a misunderstanding of the nature of music in general, of Chopin's music in particular. The psychological character of this has made it an especially interesting object of study to poets and philosophers. Of few composers can we say, that they are able fully to reveal to us the general emotions awakened in men by the experiences of life, the appearances of nature; of only one, perhaps, can it be said that he resembles a seer, whose "eye becomes enlightened from within, and who, the more he loses connection with the outer world, the more clairvoyant becomes his glance into the inner supernatural world;"¹ this cannot be said of Chopin; but his music is so intimate, a reflection of those more secret struggles of the human heart, those "tempests under a skull" that epitomize more general, objective tumults and vicissitudes, that it is deeply interesting to a very large circle of music-lovers, who imagine, perhaps, that their own unexpressed experience may have touched, here and there, on the wider, deeper experience of this tone-poet. Not every one is willing to admit the truth of Beethoven's assertion, that "music is a higher revelation than that of all wisdom and philosophy;"² not even every student of music may accept Schopenhauer's assertions in regard to his favorite art;³ still less will the unmusical thinker be inclined to believe in the immense importance which science begins to attach to music, not merely as an art, in its human, modern, formal development, but as a tremendous elementary force in its original material, possibly the primary motive power of all volition, vibration, vitality;³ but no one

¹ Beethoven; by Richard Wagner. Translated by Albert R. Parsons (by permission of Richard Wagner). Indianapolis: Benham Brothers, 1873.

² "We may, with equal justice, term the universe embodied music, as embodied will. . . . The essential seriousness of music, which entirely excludes the laughable, results from the fact that its object is not the representation of the will, but absolute will itself; that is, the most serious of all things, that on which all others depend. . . . Music stands entirely apart from, and above all other arts; for we cannot discover in it any imitation or repetition of any idea in the world; therefore it is the greatest, the most peculiarly noble of all arts. . . . Music exceeds ideas, is independent of the world, ignores it, and would exist even if the world had no existence. It is not an image of creations or ideas, but the image of the Will (the Creator) itself; this is why its effect is so much more powerful and penetrating than that of the other arts; they merely reflect shadows: music discourses of the essence of all existence." (Die Welt als Wille und Vorstellung. Von Arthur Schopenhauer. Brockhaus, Leipzig, 1873.)

³ "Matter in general, and plants and living creatures in attempts to deny that music is the most intensely subjective, profound, and emotional means of expression at present possible to mankind. And the most natural province of music is the revelation of that subterranean agitation of thought and passion which is too deep and individual, or that elevation of spiritual aspiration which is too transcendental, for more superficial formal expression; the audible manifestation, that is, of love and religion, the most human and the most divine of all passions. Love and religion—and patriotism, a lower form of these—are the predominant tones in all Chopin's creations, colored, lighted, or shadowed by inward mood or outward experience. While under the dominion of one wholly absorbing affection; while trusting in a finally happy solution of the struggles which that necessitated, his finest, richest works were written; and their fascination and beauty are only heightened by the contrast between the tragedy of that unhappy passion, and the pure sublimity, the ideality and trustful piety, of Chopin's innate character.

He has been termed sensualistic in the highest degree; so, of course, he was, so far as that, being an artist, consequently of fuller, finer perceptions, more completely a man, than other men, he was more sensuous as well as more spiritual, than they are. And the composer is perhaps the most sensitive of all artists, precisely as the ear, the organ par excellence of the musician, is the most perceptive and sensitive of all organs. Chopin's very morbidity, being musical morbidity, possesses a purity which we may seek in vain among artists of a similar cast of mind in the realms of poetry and literature. Only in his latter works, the reflection of his noble soul became unbeautiful, for then physical suffering had incapacitated him from mastering his feelings of disappointed love, patriotic regret, and pietistic gloom; he no longer struggled with his emotions,—they overpowered him. As Balzac says: "When an artist is so unhappy as to overflow with the passion he seeks to express, he cannot depict it; he is the object itself, instead of its image. When his subject domineers over him, he is like a king besieged by his people: too great an excess of feeling at the instant of execution is the insurrection of sense against reflection." Elsewhere, Balzac has proven his fine perception of the peculiar nature of Chopin, where he says: "This great genius is less a composer than a soul which has become audible to us, and which would communicate its own individuality to us in any kind of music, even in mere chords." Herbert Spencer, on the other hand, has spoken of the reports of Chopin's exquisite sensibility as "almost incredible." Fink, a particular, possess within themselves a vital vibratory power that continually agitates them in various ways. This force, which vitalizes inert matter, and whose nature we do not understand, but can only perceive through its effects, being in continual agitation and vibration, embodies, modifies, and transforms itself in various ways, and takes the shapes of innumerable creatures and things, which, interlinked, and proceeding from each other in endless orders and species, resulting from their natures and relations to each other, form what we term a world. And this divine, vibrating, motive force, sounding, spreading through the eternal spaces of infinitude, vitalizes other particles, and forms other modes of existence, that is to say, other worlds, spheres, systems, creatures. (Opere di Giacomo Leopardi. Firenze: Le Monnier, 1865.)

partisan of the old school, much surprised at the philosophical questions and controversies that were aroused by the psychological character of Chopin's music, wrote of the composer and his imitators in a mingled strain of mysticism and Philistinism amusing enough, though not devoid of some good ideas. "There is a party that revels in enjoyment when its emotions float on the moonlit waves of Chopin's sea of tones; in their rush and murmur they discover the highest and deepest things that the present day has produced in the sphere of music. Others again, and those not uncultivated listeners, feel repelled, and think they speak favorably when they term his productions unpleasant, involved. In the way he writes, things are written for which posterity will not be thankful. Passion moves in extremes, and overleaps the boundaries of happiness, ever the companion of thoughtful, benevolent content. And yet we may say of Chopin, in spite of the opposite opinions indulged in regarding him, that he is an attractive individuality, sharpened and polished by modern life. Yet, since he is almost always true to himself, he is fascinating, though he wanders amid shadows and clouds. But his imitators are unbearable; they do not dream a dream, they hunt one. In Chopin's tones we listen to the morning dream of Time, and imagine what might become of this child of morning, if he would only open his eyes and wander through the daylight." Elsewhere, Fink has compared Chopin to Ludwig Berger! Lenz was more happy in styling him the Heine of the piano-forte; yet the comparison is only half true, for Chopin, with all the fire, sweetness, and concentration of Heine, possesses not a trace of his corrosive irony; but then Lenz, in the short space of eighteen lines, has compared Berlioz to Robert Macaire, the Vicar of Wakefield, and King Lear! No; Chopin was most individually, originally himself; no imitation of him can prove more successful than is Paris paste as an imitation of the diamond.

[Concluded in our next.]

BEETHOVEN AT THE HEIGHT OF HIS PRODUCTIVITY (1807-9).

TRANSLATIONS FROM THAYER'S THIRD VOLUME.¹

THE C MAJOR MASS.

1807. At the end of the month of July Beethoven returned from Baden to Heiligenstadt, and devoted his time there to the C minor Symphony and the C major Mass. To the latter refers one of the anecdotes related by Czerny: While he (Beethoven) was on a walk one day in the country with the Countess Erdödy and some other ladies, they heard some village musicians, and laughed over the false tones, especially of the violoncellist, who brought out the C major chord with difficulty, groping after the tone somewhat in this way:—

Beethoven employed this figure for the Credo of his First Mass, and wrote it down upon the spot.

THE FIFTH SYMPHONY.

1807. This year is noteworthy not only in

¹ Ludwig van Beethoven's Leben. Von ALEXANDER WINKLOCK THAYER. Dritter Band. Berlin. 1879.

Beethoven's life, but in the history of music altogether ; it is the year in which the C minor Symphony was completed, — that work which even now by many competent judges is designated as the acme of all pure instrumental composition ; while those who do not without qualification grant it the first place, yet almost without exception place above it only the first three movements of the Ninth Symphony by the same master. Yet this wonderful Symphony was no sudden inspiration. Motives to the Allegro, Andante and Scherzo are found in sketch books, which date at the latest from the years 1800 and 1801. There are studies in existence which prove that Beethoven, at the time when he was busied with Fidelio and the piano-forte Concerto in G, was also working on the C minor Symphony, that is in the years 1804 to 1806 ; in the last year he laid it aside in order to compose the Fourth Symphony (in B-flat). This is all that is known about the origin and progress of this famous work ; except that it was completed in 1807 at the favorite places of the composer about Heiligenstadt.

"IN QUESTA TOMBA."

A communication in the Journal des Luxus und der Moden (November, 1806), acquaints us with the origin of a smaller, but well known composition of Beethoven's; indeed it is the only accredited and satisfactory notice that we know of it. The article reads: "In some musical sport a short time since, a competition arose between a number of very celebrated composers. The Countess Rzewuska improvised an Aria at the piano-forte; the poet Carpani immediately improvised a text to it. He imagined to himself a lover, who had died at grief at having found no hearing; the loved one repents of her cruelty, she waters his grave with her tears, and now his shadow calls to her:—

“ In questa tomba oscura
Lasciami riposar;
Quando vivevo, ingrata,
Dovei a me pensar.
Lascia che l'ombre ignude
Godansi pace almen,
E non bagnar mie ceneri
D'inutile velen.”

"These words have now been set to music by Paer, Sulieri, Weigl, Zingarelli, Cherubini, Asiolì, and other great masters and amateurs. Zingarelli alone furnished ten compositions on them; in all about fifty have been gotten together, and the poet will communicate them in a volume to the public."

The number of compositions rose to sixty-three ; these were published in the year 1808 ; the last of them (Number 63) was by Beethoven. Although this at the time was by no means regarded as the best, it is the only one which has survived to the present day. The Leipzig Musikalische Zeitung selected, as an appendix to its criticism on the work, one of the two compositions by Salieri and one of the three by Sterkel, and said of Beethoven's : " On the whole it is not precisely unworthy of this excellent master, but it will hardly entwine a new leaf into the wreath of his fame."

ORCHESTRAL CONCERTS.

1807. . . . The want of better opportunities for hearing good Symphony music well performed, than were offered by the Schuppanzigh concerts limited to the summer months, and by the occasional hastily prepared "academies" of composers and virtuosos, led "a society of respectable and willing friends of music in the beginning of the winter to form an organization under the modest title of Amateur Concerts. So an orchestra was got together, whose members were selected from the most excellent musical amateurs (dilettanti) of the city. Only a few wind instruments, such as horns, trumpets, etc., were drawn from the orchestra of the Vienna theatre. . . . The audience consisted only of the resident nobility and distinguished strangers: and of these classes preference was given to musical connoisseurs and amateurs." To this end they hired at first the hall "zur Mehlgrube;" but, as this proved too small, the concerts were transferred to the hall of the University, where, in "twenty concerts, Symphonies, Overtures, Concertos and vocal pieces were executed with zeal and love and were received with general applause. An excellent selection of pieces, a unity and precision on the part of the orchestra such as is seldom heard, the most seemly behavior and the deepest silence on the part of the listeners, as well as their distinguished, brilliant company, all combined to make a whole of this production, such as cannot often have been reached." The banker Haring was the director in the earlier concerts; but "owing to some misunderstanding which had arisen" he resigned the place to Clement.

The works of Beethoven which were produced in these concerts were the following: "The Symphony in D, in the first concert; the Overture to Prometheus, in November; the Sinfonia Eroica, and the Coriolan Overture in December; and at New Year's the Fourth Symphony, in B-flat, which had also been performed November 15, in the Burg theatre, in a concert for the public charitable institutions. The most of these works, if not all, were conducted by the composer himself.

PROGRAMME MUSIC.

Those who seem to think that "programme music" for the orchestra is a modern invention, and those who regard the Pastoral Symphony as an original attempt to describe nature musically, are equally in error. It was not so much Beethoven's ambition to find new forms for musical representations, as it was to surpass his contemporaries in the application of forms already in vogue.

In one of Traeg's announcements of the year 1792 are found simultaneously : "The Siege of Vienna," "Le Portrait Musicale de la Nature," and "King Lear," three symphonies ; in another : "La Tempesta," "L'Harmonie della Musica," and "La Bataille." There were, in fact, few great battles, in those stormy years, which were not supplementarily fought over again by orchestras, military bands, organs, and piano-fortes. One might fill pages with a catalogue of programme compositions now long since dead, buried, and forgotten. Haydn's "Seven Words" still live, partly because a text is put under the music, but more on account of his great name ; but who, in our time, has ever chanced to hear of the Baron von Kospoth's "Composizioni sopra il Pater Noster, consistenti in 7 Sonate Characteristiche con un Introduzione," for a 9-part orchestra ? What do our readers say to the following ? "The Sea-fight. 1. The drum-beat ; 2. The martial music and marches [in a sea-fight!] ; 3. Motion of the ships ; 4. Crossing of the waves ; 5. Cannon shots ; 6. Cry of the wounded ; 7. Shouts of victory from the triumphant fleet ;" or this : "Musical imitation of Rubens's 'Last Judgment.' 1. Gorgeous introduction ; 2. The trumpet resounds through the graves ; they open ; 3. The angry Judge pronounces the dreadful sentence upon the rejected ; they fall into the pit ; howling and gnashing of teeth ; 4. God receives the just into eternal blessedness ; their blissful feelings ; 5. The voice of the blest unites with the choirs of angels ;" or this : "Death of Prince Leopold of Brunswick : 1. The quiet course of the stream ; the winds which drive it faster ; the gradual swelling of the water ; the complete overflowing ; 2. The universal terror and shrieks of the unhappy ones, who foresee their doom; their shudders, lamentations, weeping, and sobbing; 3. The arrival of the noble prince, who resolves to help them; the representations and entreaties of his officers, who seek to hold him back; his voice to the contrary, which finally stifles all complaints; 4. The boat sets off; its rocking on the waves; the howling of the winds; the boat upsets; the prince sinks under; 5. An affecting piece, with the feeling appropriate to this event. These are no jokes taken from the Fliegende Blätter, the Kladderadatsch, or Kikeriki of former days; they are actual extracts from the programmes of the Abbé Vogler's organ concerts; and so, too, is the following, which will surprise the most of our readers: "Contented shepherd life, interrupted by a thunder-storm, which withdraws, however, and the naive, outright joy in consequence."

A remark of Ries, which is confirmed by other evidences, as well as by the form and matter of many of his teacher's works, must here be repeated. "Beethoven in his compositions often thought of a definite object, although he frequently laughed and scolded about musical paintings, especially about those of a petty sort. Among them the Creation and the Seasons of Haydn had many a time to bear the brunt of his criticism, although he did not fail to recognize Haydn's higher merits." But Beethoven himself did not scorn to introduce imitations into his works occasionally. The distinction between him and others in this regard was only this: they undertook to give musical imitations of things essentially unmusical; this he never did.

On a bright, sunny day in April, 1823, Beethoven took Schindler out on a long walk through the places in which he had composed his Fifth and Sixth Symphonies. "After visiting (Schindler, I, page 153) the bath-house at Heiligenstadt, with the adjoining garden, and after talking over many a pleasant reminiscence, having reference to his creations, we continued our ramble toward the Kahlenberg in the direction over Grinzing. Striding through the delightful meadow valley between Heiligenstadt and the latter village,¹ which was crossed by a swiftly hastening and softly murmuring brook from a neighboring mountain, and lined with lofty elms, Beethoven stopped repeatedly and let his look, full of blissful feeling, wander over the splendid landscape. Then seating himself upon the meadow, and leaning against an elm, he asked me whether there was no yellow-hammer to be heard in the tops of those trees. But it was all still. Thereupon he said: 'Here have I written the "Scene at the Brook," and the yellow-hammers up there, and the quails, and nightingales, and cuckoos round about have composed with me.' On my asking why he had not introduced the yellow-hammer also into the scene, he seized his sketch-book and wrote:—

"That is the composer up there," said he; 'has she not a more important part to execute than the others? With them it is merely meant in play.' Truly, with the entrance of this motive in G major the tone-picture acquires a new charm. Expatriating further upon the whole work and its parts, Beethoven declared that the digression into the key of the yellow-hammers is pretty distinctly heard in this scale just written down in the Andante rhythm and same pitch. He gave as the reason why he had not also named this fellow-composer: 'This name would only have increased the great number of malicious interpretations of this movement, which have hindered the acceptance and appreciation of the work, not merely in Vienna, but in other places. Not seldom was this Symphony declared to be mere trickery on account of the second movement. In some places it shared the fate of the Eroica.'

¹ In a note Thayer says: Schindler is here in error. The ramble to the Kahlenberg brought them northward into the vale between Heiligenstadt and Nusdorf, where now an idealized bust of the composer marks the "Scene by the Brook."

(To be continued.)

TALKS ON ART.—SECOND SERIES.¹

FROM INSTRUCTIONS BY MR. WILLIAM M. HUNT TO HIS PUPILS.

V.

"Do you not think that it requires as much intellect to be a great artist as to be a great statesman or writer?"

To be sure I do. When Rubens was acting as minister at a foreign court he was asked if he did not sometimes amuse himself by painting. "No," he replied, "I am a painter who sometimes amuses himself with state affairs."

He was chosen by his government, the Netherlands, as the most accomplished diplomatist of that country, in more missions than one.

William Blake was sometimes called "Mad Blake." But those who were pleased to call him so, are to-day, thought to have been idiotic.

I believe that Shakespeare is the only name that the literary world bring forward as claiming equality with Michael Angelo.

If book-learning is called intellect, who wrote the first great books?

Which is greater, Shakespeare or his reader?

Which is greater, the producer or the enjoyer?

Where was Abraham Lincoln's intellect while he was on a flat-boat on the Mississippi? Lincoln always said that he had read very little, and he referred questioners to Seward.

Harvard University has not graduated a great man for fifty years; and as print grows cheap, thinkers grow scarce.

A great thing has nothing to do with what has been done; and things have to be found out before the word even can be put in a dictionary.

There is a good deal of ground that can be cultivated for a century without giving back the seed. Art requires as much cultivation as anything else, not only to produce, but even to understand. There is probably not a man living capable of sufficient cultivation even to understand or appreciate the work of Michael Angelo.

A man can only be cultivated up to his capacity.

I like Calvert's writing because he gets an independent idea of a person's character, and carries it out, against all common opinions of its necessity. Common opinion about a man is worthless enough. Think of what was the common opinion of Rembrandt in his day! He was "a miser," everybody said. Or think of what they say of Turner now! Then consider what their pictures are, and see the insight which they give you into the characters of the men who painted them. Facts are easy enough to find. But the facts of splendid power and imagination don't get talked about as much as disagreeable facts. People look for what they love. They love the disagreeable, and they find it.

"You don't believe in working from photographs, do you?"

No, indeed! and don't make portraits of people who have died, either. A sensitive person gives out altogether too much life in trying to put some life into them. If you get into that sort of thing, you'll be overwhelmed and fenced in with dead people. Keep out of it while you can. Leave death alone. Life is what we are trying to get at.

So they objected to your painting on Sunday! You might have told them that your work is one sort of prayer. It's good for nothing if it is n't. And it isn't "Now I lay me down to sleep, either."

It is a good plan to paint different kinds of subjects. It is exactly what you were put on the face of the earth for. Because there are specialists, don't hesitate to paint horses, or anything else that you please. Try to feel happy about your work. That kind of elation which you speak of is not conceit. A little boy pleased with his mud pie is not conceited; and if you have enough to do you won't be conceited. The Saint Patrick people, riding around in the mud with their green saashes, are not conceited. Besides, that feeling does n't last. You know very well that you'll pay for it soon enough. Painting is a great joy and privilege to you. Take it as such, and don't make a labor and duty out of it.

Have you seen the Tanagra figures at the Art Museum? They are the gayest, most joyous little things, and full of life. They are like the work you ought to do in your two-hour sketch-clubs. "Like dolls?" Not a bit. For one thing, dolls always have their arms stuck out, and all their fingers and nails very plainly made out, the nails especially. But these figures often are folding the cloak up to the chest with the arm, and there's no fussiness of detail. People might learn a great deal from them about feeling and action, and grace.

MARIA DEL OCCIDENTE.

READERS of the literary cyclopædias and learned histories will recall a pleasant memory of Maria Gowen Brooks, born in Medford, Mass. almost eighty years ago, and one of the few genuine poets that era could boast. The era in fact did not boast at all. There was little poetry then, and little for many years after. The venerable Dana (after a few fine specimens) was settling, in exquisite prose and with admirable judgment, how poems ought to be written. Bryant had just printed "Thanatopsis," which, though great, signified less to the people of that day than it does to us. Charles Sprague not long after was writing his strong and touching Indian poem, and his "Winged Worshippers." The Townsend sisters were pondering sublimities in blank verse. But passing by other names, it is safe to say that from 1800 to 1825 was not a period of great intellectual activity nor of any general refined taste.

It was during this period that a lovely and most sensitive woman attempted to offer her poems to the Boston public. So few were sold that the edition was soon withdrawn. Mrs. Brooks soon after removed to Cuba, where her husband owned a plantation, and there between the years 1823 and 1828, the six cantos of her principal poem, "Zophiel," were written. It is founded on the old Jewish story in the apocryphal book of Tobit,—that of the bride whose seven successive suitors were slain by an evil spirit. The least imaginative person cannot fail to be struck with the ease, beauty, and vigor of Mrs. Brooks's verse, no matter where the book may be opened. There are passages of almost the highest excellence.

But we fear the verdict to-day may be like the verdict of half a century ago: that the poem is too long, and that the supernatural portions fail to hold the attention of the reader. No man can endure an uninterrupted siege of the Facrie Quene. Bunyan's allegory after a while is apt to tire all but the very godly. And we fear that "Zophiel" is a book that will be monument to the genius of the author, without being very generally read, except by the wise few who make it a point to read all notable things.

¹ Copyright, 1879, by Helen M. Knowlton.

But Mrs. Brooks was clearly a woman of genius. Her song beginning "Day in melting purple dying," establishes her rank if she had written nothing else.

We are indebted to Mrs. Gustafson, author of "Meg," a charming pastoral, for the new edition of "Zophiel" with memoir and notes. It has been a labor of love, and one that lays all lovers of poetry under a pleasant and lasting obligation. "Zophiel" is published by Lee & Shepard, Boston.

F. H. U.

Dwight's Journal of Music.

SATURDAY, MAY 10, 1879.

VANDAL "IMPROVEMENT."—BOSTON MUSIC HALL IN DANGER.

EVERY large, "progressive" city, in this fast age of ours, has in its population a certain restless element ever on the watch to improve its own selfish business interests, even at the expense of infinitely higher interests of the whole community. A and B, and possibly C, are petitioning the Board of Street Commissioners to extend Hamilton Place through the Music Hall (!), to Washington Street, so as to gain an open frontage to their own estates and thereby raise their value. The burden of this so-called "improvement" is to be borne by the good city of Boston; and the petitioners, through their lawyers and their retained newspapers, are doing their utmost to manufacture opinion, and persuade the venerable matron that she needs a new street in that precise locality, and that it must come sooner or later to relieve other narrow and crowded thoroughfares.

Whether it would be a gain to business and to public travel we leave to business people to determine; though already the great majority of real estate owners in that neighborhood have expressed themselves decidedly against the project. We would present the question from another point of view, and humbly ask whether "business," mere private business, too, is alone to have any voice and vote in such a matter. No one, we presume, will undertake to say that Boston is in duty bound to improve the individual property of A, B, and C, in any way which they point out as feasible. So they trump up arguments to make it appear that Boston for her own sake, for the good of all, requires it. Happily, for the present at least, this is a minority opinion; but the enemy, though few, are vigilant and will still press their point, while the community at large, contented with things as they are, takes no part in the question; it is time that it should be aroused; forewarned is forearmed; and we are glad, therefore, to see that a protest is passing round for signatures, already signed by the presidents of our leading musical societies, by the superintendent of the public schools, and by many other citizens of weight and influence, praying the Commissioners that this vandal act may not be consummated.

What is Boston, city of our love and pride, that she should allow this thing? Is Boston but a crowded mart, or wilderness of streets and shops? Is this all that we mean by the dear and honored name? What is the worth of these except as they serve a higher end? By Boston do we not mean a home of pure and noble life, of education, culture, art, religion, charity? Proud as she may be of her wealth, her trade, her enterprise, is she not far prouder of her schools, her churches, art museums, public charities, measures for promoting general health and cheerfulness, her beautiful parks and gardens, her historic monuments, her noble buildings about which cluster fine associations, and none more so than her halls of noble music? And here in this Boston Music Hall we have enjoyed now for a quarter of a century one of the noblest and largest halls for music in the world. Its very atmosphere is full of inspiring memories and associations; its floor is consecrated ground. It is remarkably well situated and convenient of access to all; it is withdrawn from all disturbing noise; and it is admirable in its acoustic properties; we have never seen a hall of the same size, here or in the old world, in which music can be heard so well. Can Boston afford to throw away so great a blessing for the cheap consideration of a few more shops, or a single short street more or less in the great labyrinthine wilderness of brick and stone? To enhance the property of A, B, and C, shall Boston dispossess herself of one of her noblest means of general good and culture, one of her proudest monuments?

We but express a deeply implanted sentiment of the whole more or less cultured and intelligent community, of every truly patriotic child of Boston. The petitioners have to respect this sentiment, or feign respect for it. Accordingly they go about disparaging the Music Hall on the one hand, and on the other prophesying smooth things, as that somebody, somewhere, at some early date, will build us a bigger and a better and more showy hall. They say the hall is running down, that it is let for dog shows, and "hen operas," and demoralizing, brutal, and disgraceful prize-fights; alas, too true! but this need no longer be, since the hall is paying a fair dividend, and musical enterprises are already again on the increase; art, with trade, is gaining headway.

But as for a new and better hall,—trust not the flattering illusion! This reckless, ready way of sacrificing the goods we have, does not inspire confidence for the creation of new ones. Destroy the Music Hall, and you discourage every enterprise of the kind hereafter; who will build again upon such slight security? The hall we have would never have been built but for the conviction that it would stand at least a century. At all events a bird in hand is worth two in the bush; first show us your new Music Hall, before you rob us of the one we have; and also show us, after sufficient trial, that music will sound as well in it, since, as the remonstrants well say, "the excellent acoustic properties of the Hall are the result of a happy accident, and consequently, if a new hall were to be built, it might in this respect turn out to be greatly inferior to the present one."

THE EXPRESSIVE POWER OF MUSIC.

DR. EDUARD HANSLICK, in his pamphlet on "The Beautiful in Music," makes a very nice distinction in speaking of what is commonly called the expressive power of the art. He says very truly that music cannot present to the mind definitely predicable emotions, but only their dynamic quality. In other words, that, in characterizing the expressive power of music, we can rightly use only adjectives, but not substantives. We often hear people say that this piece of music expresses "passionate love," and that piece "overwhelming grief." But if we examine closely, we shall find that the music only expresses the dynamic force of these emotions; it expresses "passionate" something, or "overwhelming" something, but what this something is, we are unable to determine without the aid of some clue with which the music itself does not furnish us. In vocal music this clue is given us by the text; in so-called descriptive instrumental music it is given us by the title or by the programme. Yet even in these cases we should be careful to recognize the fact that the music does not really express the meaning of the text or programme, but only intensifies that which the text or programme has already expressed. That is to say, that the emotional power of music is in itself something utterly vague and indeterminate; a power which commands our emotional nature in general, which holds sway over all the passions a Collins could enumerate, but which is yet incapable of imperatively calling forth any especial one of them. I say that music commands all the passions, but it is as a master commands a troop of servants whose various names and duties he does not know, and who needs the intervention of some serviceable major-domo before he can have his orders duly executed. Or, to make a more striking simile, it is like a torpedo of unlimited power, which has to be directed by an intelligent hand before it can blow up the desired object; all the torpedo does is to explode, and it is of no consequence to it what it blows up; it only shatters to atoms that which happens to lie in its way.

These apparent restrictions upon the emotional power of music in no way contravene the possibility of music's having, in a certain sense, a very decided intrinsic character. It can indicate not only the dynamic force of emotions, but also their nobility, elevation, seriousness, or frivolity. We may be utterly at a loss to determine whether a certain composition or phrase expresses love or anger; we can only feel that it presents some more or less violent emotion to our æsthetic contemplation; but we can in most cases appreciate very keenly whether the emotion, indeterminate as it is, is that of a demigod or of a boor. Phryne cannot sing in the same strains as Antigone; Francesca disdains the dialect of Messalina; none but a very gullible ninny can mistake Salomoneus for the Olympian Zeus.

The element of nobility or baseness in music is, to be sure, dependent to some extent upon convention; yet not so much so as is often supposed. If one man says that he can associate nothing with the finale of Beethoven's A major symphony but a merry-making of boors, there are an hundred who will prefer to associate it in their mind with the dance of the Corybantes. It is always allowable for the listener to furnish music with his own subjective substratum of ideas, if he only remembers that the ideas are his, not the composer's. What these ideas are will depend upon his mood, his accidental surroundings, and in a great degree upon his own musical experience and habits. A man of essentially frivolous and shallow nature may accept much trivial music as grand and impressive; a man whose sense of the sublime can only be aroused by the most extravagant and tangible effects may even look upon essentially noble music as trivial and commonplace if it have not in it that magniloquent quality which is necessary to call his finer feelings into action. But here we take extreme and exceptional cases. Taking the music-loving portion of our race as a whole, we shall probably find that men agree quite as well about the serious, elevated, or frivolous character of a musical composition as they do about similar characteristics of any other work of art—of a statue, a painting, or a poem. But to call music a "universal language," as many people have done, and still do, is going too far. The great desirableness and convenience of a mode of expression that shall be comprehensible in every part of the inhabited globe is, no doubt, the cause that impels ingenious individuals to believe in the possibility of such a thing. As human experience has shown that articulate speech, what we call language, has steadily refused to adopt any single, universal form, it was not unnatural that the seekers after this tangible means of making the whole world kin should have sought for it in the most potent, and at the same time the vaguest of human arts. Richard Wagner, who has read his Schopenhauer to good advantage in many respects, makes the scream unconsciously uttered by a man just waking from a dream, the germ (in figurative Huxleyan language, the primordial cell) of all music. Apart from the metaphysical truth of this idea (which it would take too long to consider in all its bearings here), there is one great truth which it makes manifest, and that is that Music is, in its very essence, inarticulate, incapable of expressing definitely any particular train of thought, or any definite idea. Now an essentially inarticulate universal language, is one which will be open to much misconception; it will be one which does not deserve the name of language at all. If there be really a means of communication between man and man which is absolutely unmistakable as to its meaning, it is a very old and primeval one, and one which has little in common with what we call art. A sharp blow, delivered straight from the shoulder, and striking just between the eyes of the person who is to be enlightened as to our intentions, is an argument the gist of which can be comprehended by every son of Adam. Other form of universal language is unknown to the present writer. But when we come to screams, howling, or even the more orderly sounds which we habitually call Music, their meaning is very vague indeed. Many a traveller in the Sahara has been chilled to the marrow by the sudden howling of his Arab escort, thinking that fell murder was imminent, when the peculiar vocal noises made by his wild troop were only expressions of peaceful rejoicing. We have all heard the authentic story of the musical German who sang (in his native tongue) "A Maiden's Lament over the Death of a Rose," and was met by the complacent remark of one of his English-speaking listeners: "I suppose that is one of your National War Songs!" I own that it sounds cold-bloodedly cynical when Hanslick says that you can change the text of Gluck's great aria:—

"J'ai perdu mon Euridice, Rien n'égale mon malheur,"

so as to make it read:—

"J'ai trouvé mon Euridice, Rien n'égale mon bonheur," without making the music one whit less expressive of the sense of the text. All of us who love Gluck, and have had the wondrous melody speak to our very heart of hearts, are inclined to reject such an insinuation as verging upon the scurrilous! But let us think a moment—still better, let us make the experiment for ourselves with the greatest practicable freedom from prejudice, and see what the result will be. To me, personally, the experiment has been convincing that the expression of passionate sorrow is no inherent quality in Gluck's beautiful melody, and that it lends itself equally well to the expression of passionate joy. The thunderstorm in Beethoven's Pastoral Symphony might be brought forward as an argument on the opposite side. It certainly would be hard to find a listener who (even if ignorant of the intention of this movement) could not recognize it as a thunderstorm set to music. But this is not an expression of a thunderstorm, nor a description of one; it is a phonetic imitation of one, or at least just enough of an imitation to guide the listeners' ideas in the desired direction.

It may be asked, "Does then music, of itself, express nothing? Has music no emotional value whatever, or only such emotional power as we find in all formal beauty?" The answer to this is evident; it is well known that music has the very strongest emotional power, apart from any especial beauty of form. What then can it express? Just this: Anything the listener pleases. It clothes his personal, subjective feelings in a garment of glowing light that makes them truer, deeper, nobler, than they were before. A Beethoven symphony will weep with him if he is in sorrow, rejoice with him if he is glad; if he is ambitious, the music will show him the object of his ambition in fairer colors than he had ever imagined it before. In a purely emotional sense, music is a bank that gives you back whatever you yourself put into it, with an hundred fold interest.

There is an old fable of a cunning magician who sold little bits of mirror to credulous persons, telling them that if they looked into those magic reflectors they would see the object of their most ardent desire and love. The people bought and looked, and only saw their own faces, but the little mirrors had an enchanted power, by virtue of which people always saw themselves at their best when looking into them.

Now music is just such an enchanted mirror: it shows you your own self, only glorified and ennobled.

WILLIAM F. APTHORP.

THE PASSION MUSIC.—We had intended to make our account of the performance on Good Friday more complete, by entering into a somewhat detailed description of its many long, elaborate Arias, which, with a few exceptions, are not readily understood and appreciated by hearers unfamiliar with them; also of the solos accompanied with chorus; and particularly of the wonderfully delicate and effective instrumentation throughout, in which Robert Franz, while showing the utmost reverence for Bach's intentions, has only added, with a master hand, what was necessary to make those intentions clear. But for this we must take some time when there is more room and leisure.

For the present we wish, first, to correct a ridiculous error which, without our knowledge, crept into our last article. In speaking of the Bass Aria, "Come, blessed cross!" the types made us praise Mr. Wulf Fries's playing of "the interesting and very difficult new violoncello solo." That word "new" was composed into our score by the compositor!

In the next place, we wish to give some important credits for which we had not room before. In paying our thankful acknowledgments to the organist, the chorus, and the solo singers, each and all, we omitted to say expressly, what was nevertheless implied in every word of praise we gave to the performance, namely, that to the intelligent enthusiasm, the unstinted, well directed labor, and the remarkable tact of the conductor, CARL ZERRAHN, far more than to any one, were we all indebted for this great success. He held all the elements completely in his hand. We might question his conception or his theory as to the treatment of some few parts of the music, but there is no denying that he proved himself master of the situation.

All honor, also, to the president and board of government of the Handel and Haydn Society, especially to the very able and devoted secretary, Col. A. Parker Brown, to whose great organizing faculty, as well as taste and judgment, and staunch fidelity to what is best in music, the present prosperous condition of the old society is largely owing.

In recognizing, as we do heartily, the excellent service of the orchestra in almost every portion of the difficult accompaniments, we may repeat, al rovescio, a remark we made at the end of the Symphony Concerts. Then we asked where we could look for an orchestra to play the Passion Music, but for that practice in the Symphonies. Now, we may suggest: What practice could an orchestra possibly have, that would go so far, in so short a time, toward fitting it for all the nobler tasks, as that one solid week spent in rehearsing and performing the accompaniments of the Passion Music?

THE ZERRAHN TESTIMONIAL.—The Handel and Haydn Society were not reckoning without their host when they relied, not only on their own large membership, but on a quick and warm response of all the artists and musicians, and of our whole musical public, to their glowing invitation. The Music Hall was crowded; the chorus seats were filled to the utmost limit; solo singers presented themselves in such eager competition that that service was divided among two and twenty of our leading artists; beautiful gifts and floral offerings, with presentation speeches before the Oratorio (outside of the Hall), enhanced the interest for all and expressed for all the cordial sympathy for the recipient, for the honored conductor at the end of twenty-five years of faithful and efficient service. And so on this occasion, as on that of his first assuming the conductorship, Elijah was performed with everything conspiring to a most complete and grand interpretation. It was inspiring; the enthusiasm never for a moment flagged. All sang and did their best. If we were to begin to praise individually we should not get through in this number; yet the occasion was one of which this paper should preserve the record in full, and for that we must take another time.

CONCERTS.

THE Symphonies, the Oratorios, the Operas, the regular courses, are all over; and now that the mighty men of war and the huge frigates have withdrawn, a multitudinous fleet of smaller craft that have been awaiting their Spring turn in snug harbors, and in every hidden cove, have ventured out as usual, each on its own account,—some of them, from their amateur or semi-private character, having less the air of business than of pleasure yachts. Nearly every evening for some weeks has had its concert, mostly in some smaller hall. There have been more of them than we can even mention; much less could we attend them all. But most of them have been interesting; several of them too significant to go unrecorded. None more so than that given on Friday evening, April 18, at Union Hall, by the advanced Violin Classes of Mr. JULIUS EICHBERG's Boston Conservatory of Music. It more than made good the promise we have hailed in similar exhibitions of several years past. To hear young men and maidens, even girls of sixteen, or under, play difficult violin compositions of masters like Bach, Beethoven, Haydn, Ernst, and Wieniawski, and play them like artists, not only with good, firm tone, correctly, but with ease and grace and power, entering into the spirit and expression of each piece, is something to astonish those who hear it for the first time. But this is what was realized that evening, in a pretty formidable programme:—

Allegretto, Menuetto, and Finale from 1st Quartet	Haydn.
Messrs. Albert Van Raalte, Edw. A. Sabin, Willis Nowell, Chas. Behr.
Legende	Wieniawski.
Miss Lillian Shattuck.
Prelude and Fugue for Violin solo	Bach.
Mr. Edw. A. Sabin.
Othello Fantasia	Ernst.
Miss Lillian Chandler.
Adagio and Finale from Sonata, F ma., Op. 30	Beethoven.
(For Violin and Piano.)
Messrs. Willis and Geo. Nowell.
Nocturne for four Violins	Eichberg.
Misses Chandler, Shattuck, Shepardson, and Launder.
Polonaise	Wieniawski.
Miss Edith Christie.
Concertante for two Violins	Duncla.
Misses L. Launder and A. Shepardson.

Faust Fantasia Wieniawski.
Mr. Albert Van Raalte.
Menuetto and Finale from C minor Quartet Beethoven.
Misses Lillian Chandler, Lottie Launder, Abbie Shepardson, Lillian Shattuck.

Mr. Van Raalte may be considered as the most advanced pupil of this admirable school, — a graduate, in fact, of several years back, and now fully competent to figure as a concert virtuoso. It would have pleased Wieniawski to hear his Faust Fantasia so well played. The Prelude and Fugue of Bach, too, told for what it is in Mr. Sabin's clear, intelligent, and vigorous interpretation, only wanting the freedom that will come in time. The movements from the Beethoven Sonata were ably rendered by both violinist and pianist. But most interesting of all was the quartet playing — both that by the young men, and still more, for obvious reasons, that by the four young ladies. Miss Lillian Chandler, who led in the Beethoven Quartet, is a girl of sixteen years, who, during half that time has been studying the violin with Mr. Eichberg. By her beautiful performance of the Othello Fantasia she had already given signal proof of uncommon talent highly cultivated. There was perfect purity of intonation, even to the highest tones, fine phrasing, good legato and staccato, and in fact, all that the first violin part required to make the intentions of the music clear. And she was well seconded by the second violin, the viola, and the cello, ably handled by Miss Shattuck, who had also made her mark as solo violinist in the beautiful "Legende" of Wieniawski. On other occasions we have heard these young ladies play Quartet movements in which they have shifted about, now one, now another taking the first violin, the cello, etc. Each seems at home in more than a single part. There is power and promise here. We shall not lack material for chamber concerts; we shall some day have such players in our orchestras for Symphony, etc. And, better still, think of such a resource for refined entertainment and culture in the home, when you may call on sons and daughters, with friendly neighbors' aid, perhaps, to play a string quartet, as easily as you would suggest a game of whist, — and how much better!

Mr. Eichberg's beautiful Notturmo for four violins was played by the same fair hands with fine unity and balance of parts, and with delicate expression. Miss Edith Christie, another of the younger ones, appeared only as soloist, but the brilliant rendering of that Polonaise placed her among the foremost. The Concertante for two violins showed the abilities of Misses Launder and Shepardson to great advantage. On the whole, we are more than ever convinced that Mr. Eichberg is doing a great work in this violin school. The violin is a fit instrument for woman, and this truth he here practically and signally illustrates. Scholars will become teachers, and the school will have its branches elsewhere.

THE CECILIA, on Monday evening, April 21, Mr. B. J. Lang, director, sang in Tremont Temple, before the very large and cultivated audience always eager to accept its invitation. Part I. consisted of copious selections from Handel's L'Allegro ed il Penseroso, which were given with orchestra and with fine effect. Mr. Sumner presided at the organ. The soprano airs were sung by Miss Mary A. Turner, in good voice and style, and those for the tenor by Mr. G. L. Osgood, with admirable taste and feeling. The chorus singing was excellent. Part II. included Hauptmann's "May Song" (part-song); Rubinstein's "The Nixie," a romantic ballad for alto song (Miss Ita Welch), and female chorus, greatly increased in interest by the orchestral accompaniment; Mozart's "Il mio tesoro," sung by Mr. Alfred Wilkie; the clever comic glee of "Humpty Dumpty," by Caldwell, which was gleefully received; and Gade's cantata, "Spring Greeting," in which of course the orchestra again was all-important.

The last concert of the (third) season was on Thursday of this week, when the music of the "Midsummer Night's Dream" was given in full, with reading by Mr. George Riddle.

The second and third of the three classical concerts of Messrs. Sherwood, Allen, and Fries, more than confirmed the promise of the first. The second (April 22) opened with the string quintet, with clarinet, by Mozart, a delicious work, and played to a charm; Mr. E. Weber's clarinet playing was of the finest quality. For the closing piece, Beethoven's Septet, with all the instruments for which it was written, was played entire, and in a most satisfactory manner, except for a little awkward scrambling of that slow instrument, the horn, in the almost impossible passage given to it in the rapid scherzo. Chopin's Rondo, in C, for two pianos, was brilliantly played by Mr. E. B. Story and Mr. Sherwood. Mrs. E. Humphrey Allen sang Mendelssohn's concert aria, "Inferno," in an intelligent and finished style, and with a beautiful voice, but hardly with enough of the dramatic fire. In Schumann's songs, "Beautiful Cradle," and "Why should I wander," she gave real pleasure.

The last concert (April 29) began with a most interesting Concerto in C minor, for two pianos, with string quartet, by Bach, heard here for the first time. The pianists were Messrs. Hanchett (who, we were glad to see, has determined not to quit the field yet) and Sherwood; the string accompanists were Mr. Allen and his party. To balance this, at the end of the concert, Mendelssohn's Quartet in E-flat, Op. 12, was played delightfully, indeed inspiring; the quaint Canzonetta went so perfectly that it had to be repeated. Other instrumental pieces were: Beethoven's Sonata for piano and violin, in E flat, Op. 12, by Messrs. Sherwood and Allen, and three piano solos by Mr. Sherwood, given in his best style, namely: 1. "Moment Musical," Op. 7, in C sharp minor, by Moszkowski, a singularly fascinating and original production; 2. Schumann's "Vogel als Prophet;" 3. Chopin's A-flat Polonaise, Op. 53.

Mrs. Cappiani sang with delicate and true expression a lovely little song by Grieg, "Ich liebe dich," "Er ist gekommen," by Franz, and "Pietri," by Meyerbeer. But we were still more charmed by her singing, with Mr. Fessenden, of two exquisite, and to us wholly new, duets by Schumann: "Liebhaber Standchen" and "Liebesgarten." Mr. Fessenden, for solos, gave "Yearnings," and "Not a breath of Spring," both by Rubinstein, with all that contrast of rich, open tones and delicate and tender sotto voce which makes his singing always so acceptable.

These concerts have demonstrated that we need not go to other cities for good quartet playing; we trust that next year Boston will make the most of her own resources in this line.

A long list of concerts must lie over to another number.

MUSICAL CORRESPONDENCE.

NEW YORK, APRIL 21. — The programme of Mr. Carlberg's last symphony concert, April 12, was as follows: —
Overture, "Coriolan," Op. 62 Beethoven.
Concerto for violin (first time in America) Rubinstein.

Herr August Wilhelmj.
Love Scene. Entr'act from the opera "Tovellille,"
Op. 12 Asger Hamerik.
Miss Henrietta Beebe.
Aria, "Non temer, amato bene," Mozart.
Reverie for violin Vieuxtemps.
Symphony in C, No. 9 Schubert.

Mr. Carlberg has now thoroughly established his reputation as a conductor of marked ability, and his success is all the more creditable for the reason that he had to contend with the general apathy and indifference of our musical public and the press at the opening of the season. Without claiming that he has brought his orchestra to the highest attainable degree of excellence, it is sufficient to record the fact, that each performance under his baton has shown a steady improvement in strength, clearness, and finish of execution, as well as in spirited, intelligent expression. During the season of six concerts and six public rehearsals, the following works were performed: —

Bargiel, Woldenar. Overture, "Medea."
Beethoven. Overture, "Coriolan." Overture, "Egmont."
Symphony in A (No. 7). Symphony in B flat (No. 4).
Concerto for Piano in G major, Mr. S. B. Mills.
Concerto for Piano in C minor, Miss Josephine Bates.
Brüll, Ignaz. Concerto for Piano, Op. 10, Mr. Richard Hoffman.
Daniels, C. F. Nocturne for Orchestra, with Violoncello Obligato (Mr. Wm. Popper).
Handel. Aria from "Acis and Galatea," Miss Gertrude Franklin.
Hamerik, Asger. Love Scene from "Tovellille."
Haydn. Symphony in E-flat (No. 1).
Liszt. Hungarian Fantasia for Piano and Orchestra, Mr. Franz Rummel.
Mozart. Letter aria from "Don Giovanni," Miss Kate Thayer.

Aria from "Nozze di Figaro," Signor Campobello.
Aria from "Belmonte e Constanza," Mrs. J. K. Barton.
Aria, "Ah, non temer," Miss Henrietta Beebe.
Mendelssohn, F. Symphony in A minor (Scottish) Overture, "Ruy Blas."
Martini, Padre. Gavotte. Arranged for string instruments by Ferd. Duleken.

Nicholl, H. W. Romanza from the Suite, No. 1.
Raff, Joachim. Symphony "Im Walde."
Rubinstein, Anton. Concerto for Violin with Orchestra, Herr August Wilhelmj.
Schubert, Franz. Symphony in C, No. 9.
Schumann, Robert. Symphony in D minor, No. 4. Concerto for Piano, Mr. Franz Rummel.
Spohr, Louis. Concerto dramatico for Violin, Mr. Edouard Remenyi.
Svendsen, Johann. Norwegian Rhapsody, No. 4.
Vieuxtemps, Henri. Reverie for Violin, Herr August Wilhelmj.
Wagner, Richard. "Waldweben," from the Music Drama "Siegfried." Eine "Faust" Overture.

The list of compositions performed by the Philharmonic Society, during the past season, is as follows: —
Bargiel, overture "Prometheus"; Beethoven, "Eroica"; Seventh Symphony in A; Aria from "Fidelio," "Abscheulicher" (Mme Granger-Dow); Concerto Aria, "Ah Perfido" (Miss Minnie Hauk); "Leonora" overture No. 3; Berlioz, "Caraval Romain"; Pastorale from "Symphonie Fantastique," Op. 14; Brahms, Symphony No. 2; Brüll, Concerto, Op. 10, for piano-forte (Richard Hoffman); Chopin-Wilhelmj, Nocturne, Op. 37, No. 1, for violin (August Wilhelmj); Ernst, "Concert Pathétique," Op. 23 (Edouard Remenyi); Fuchs, Serenade in D; Lipinski, Concert Militaire (August Wilhelmj); Liszt, Concerto in E-flat, for piano-forte (Franz Rummel); Hunnenschlacht; Tasso, "Lamento e Trionfo," Mendelssohn, Symphony No. 4, in A; Mercadante, "Il Giuramento" (A. Galassi); Mozart, "Jupiter" Symphony; "Un Aura Amorosa," from "Così fan tutte" (Mme Granger-Dow); Rubinstein, "Ach wenn es nur immer so bliebe" (Miss Minnie Hauk); Schubert, "Ungeduld" (Mrs. Granger-Dow); "Haiderslein" (Miss Minnie Hauk); Schumann, Concerto in A minor (Mme Grossaler-Heim), Symphony in E-flat, No. 3; Tchaikowsky, Symphony No. 3, in D; Fantasia, "Francesca di Rimini"; Wagner, "Wotan's Farewell and Magic Fire-Scene"; Scenes from "Tannhäuser," for baritone (A. Galassi).

The Oratorio Society gave their fourth concert, at Steinway Hall, on Thursday evening, April 17, preceded by a public rehearsal on Wednesday afternoon. The programme included F. Kiel's Oratorio of "Christus" [given for the first time in America], and compositions by Handel, Bach, Wagner, Beethoven, and Mozart. The soloists were Miss A. Henne, Mrs. Florence Rice-Knox, Messrs. Jacob Graff, and A. E. Stoddard. Herr August Wilhelmj was the instrumental soloist, and played among other compositions, the well-known Largo, by Handel.

Mr. W. H. Sherwood gave his first matinée piano-forte recital at Steinway Hall, on Saturday, April 19. His selections covered a wide range, as will appear from the list given below: —

XII Etudes Symphoniques, Op. 13 Schumann.
Fugue, E minor ("Fire Fugue"), Handel.
Sonata, Op. 31, No. 3, E-flat Beethoven.
{ a. Fugue, G minor, Op. 5, No. 3 Rheinberger.
{ b. Serenade, D minor, Op. 93 Rubinstein.
{ c. Waldesrauschen — Concert Etude Liszt.
{ a. Ballade, A-flat, Op. 47, Chopin.
{ b. Nocturne, C minor, Op. 48,
Toccata di Concerto, Op. 36 August Dupont.
{ a. "Lohengrin's Verweis an Elsa," Wagner-Liszt.
{ b. "Isolden's Liebes-Tod," Grande Polonaise, E-major Liszt.

Mr. Sherwood's enviable reputation as a pianist had preceded him, and his appearance here was a matter of interest to musical amateurs and musicians, who, though a minority in the audience, were present in force, and who could not fail to perceive and appreciate the merit of his playing, which was distinguished by great technical ability, remarkable versatility, and an excellent touch. In the Liszt pieces especially, he made a marked impression, and his rendering of the entire bill was characterized by good taste, correctness, and fine musical feeling. A. A. C.

BALTIMORE, MAY 5. — The thirteenth series of Peabody concerts closed here on Saturday night, with the following programme: —

French Suite, D major, 1685-1750 J. Seb. Bach.
Air from the "Messiah," 1684-1759 G. F. Handel.
Miss Jenny Busk.
Piano Concerto, E minor. Work 11. 1810-1849
Fr. Chopin.
Madame Nannette Falk-Auerbach.
Scene and air from "Freischütz," 1786-1836
C. M. von Weber.

Miss Jenny Busk.
Fourth Norse Suite, D major. Work 25. Fragments.
Composed in Baltimore, 1876-77. Love Song.
"Ode to the Sea," 1843- Asger Hamerik.

Much has been said and written during the past season of the share system under which our orchestra has been playing, and of its effects on the nature of the selections, and the manner in which they were rendered. It must be admitted that such an arrangement can only be unsatisfactory to all concerned; but at the same time, it gives me pleasure to say that our orchestra, although no decided progress is apparent, has succeeded in holding its own, and has resisted that tendency to retrogression, which under the circumstances was to be feared. It is understood the Institute will be in a position next winter to place the fourteenth series of concerts on a firmer footing.

The following is a list of the compositions played here during the past season: —

J. S. Bach. French Suite, D major.
Beethoven. Third Symphony, "Eroica." Eighth Symphony, Overture to "Egmont." Piano Concerto, E-flat, No. 5 (Mme. Nannette Falk-Auerbach).
Violin Romance, F major (Mr. Josef Kaspar).
Berlioz. Fantastic Symphony, C major; The Roman Carnival, concert overture.
G. Bizet. Melodrama from third act of "The Maid of Arles."
O. B. Boie, Ohio. Piano concerto, G minor (Mme Falk-Auerbach).
Chopin. Piano concerto, E minor (Mme Falk-Auerbach).
Donizetti. Cavatina from "The Martyrs" (Miss H. A. Hunt).
Maz. Erdmannsdörfer. Overture to the legend "Princess Ilse."
Niels W. Gade. Eighth Symphony, D minor.
M. J. Glinka. Overture to "My Life for the Czar;" Komarinskaja, Russian scherzo.

Gluck. Overture to "Alceste."
Gounod. Songs with piano (Miss Elisa Baraldi).
Edward Grieg. Piano concerto, A minor, work 16 (Mr. B. Courlaender).
Auger Hamerik, 1843.—Fourth Norse Suite, D major, work 25; Prelude and Romance from the opera "Tosvillie" (Miss H. A. Hunt).
Handel. Rec. and Air from "Theodora" (Miss Edith Abell).
Air from "Messiah" (Miss Jenny Busk).
Haydn. Symphony, G, No. 13; Symphony, B-flat major, No. 21, "Queen of France."
Fr. Kuhlau. Elfin Hill, Danish drama, work 100. Fragments.
Mozart. Symphony, G minor; Jupiter Symphony, C major; Rec. and Air from the "Magic Flute" (Miss Jenny Busk).
C. C. Müller, New York. Nocturne, E minor.
H. W. Nichol, New York. A movement from a Symphony, work 12.
G. Rossini. Cavatina from "Semiramide;" Cavatina from "The Barber of Seville" (Miss Elisa Baraldi).
August Söderman. Norse Folk-Songs and Folk-Dances.
L. Spohr. Symphony, D minor; Overture to "Jessonda;" Romance from "Zemire and Azor" (Miss Jenny Busk).
Arthur Sullivan, 1842.—"The Lost Chord," song with piano (Miss Edith Abell).
R. Volkmann, 1830.—Serenade, D minor (Mr. Rudolph Green).
Von Weber. Rec. and Air from "Der Freischütz" (Miss Jenny Busk).

CHICAGO, May 1. — The warm days of spring press upon us, and announce the close of our musical season. On the evening of April 22, the Beethoven Society gave its last concert in the regular course, presenting the following programme:—

1. Elegie Raff.
Miss Lizzie Hoyne, Miss Jessie Jenks, and Beethoven Society.
2. "Song of the Spirits over the Water" . . . Miller.
3. "Fable of the Fairest Melusine" . . . Hoffmann.
Melusine Miss Jennie Dutton.
Clotilde Mrs. Frank Hall.
Raymond Mr. James Gill.
Sinttram Dr. C. A. Martin.

The works were given with the aid of an orchestra, and the performance was a pleasing termination to a successful season. The most important of the numbers was "The Fair Melusine," by Hoffmann. The pretty fable has been most charmingly set to music of a very attractive character, and by its brightness and variety made the concert very enjoyable to the large audience. The orchestral part contains some charming effects, and as a whole furnishes a pleasing accompaniment. At times a little melodic movement suggests Mendelssohn, while again a hint of Schumann is felt, although the work possesses an identity of its own. The choruses in the Cantata were very well given by the Society, who seemed to enter into the spirit of the work with no small enthusiasm, and the result was that they gave us some of the best singing we have had from them this season. Unfortunately, the lady who sang the part of Melusine has a faulty method, which prevented a very good voice from doing justice to some charming music. Her articulation was made very bad and unintelligible by mingling the vowel and consonant sounds without any regard to their relative importance. The vowel sound is the soul of a word, and in vocal music must always be used in prolonging a note. Otherwise, the tone loses its beauty, and the language its life and meaning. A confusion of sounds is neither music nor language.

On Thursday evening the Apollo Club gave their third concert of the season, with a "request" programme, made up of choruses, part-songs, etc., with which they had before won approbation. The selections were from Palestrina, Mendelssohn, Schubert, Eccard, Macfarren, Handel, Smart, Dr. Arne, Hatton, and Benedict. They had the assistance of Miss Fanny Whitney, who sang the aria "Nobil donna" of Meyerbeer, and "Non so più" from the Figaro of Mozart. Also of Mrs. Dyhrenfurth and Dr. Fuchs, who played the "Concerto Pathétique" of Liszt for two piano-fortes. The chorus work of the Apollo seemed particularly well done. There is one most pleasing feature about the singing of this Society, and that is its due regard for purity of tone. The voices blend with an exactness of intent in quality and power, such that a good balance is preserved among the parts, and the effect of harmony is never lost. Miss Whitney has a fine voice; her singing would be very enjoyable, were she always correct in intonation; but, unfortunately, in her effort to deliver the high notes with power, she is inclined to sing slightly sharp. She might make a very successful concert singer if she would take pains to mend this fault. It can be accomplished with a right method for the delivery of the tone.

Although the Liszt Concerto was written for Tausig and Von Bülow, and is unquestionably a most difficult work, it did not excite much interest or admiration. On the first hearing the impression comes of its difficulty, and variety of effects, but no distinct tone-picture is left in the mind, while the musical nature is hardly excited into sympathy with it. Now and then a melodic movement will arouse attention, but just as it begins to mean something, it has resolved itself into gigantic chords quite incomprehensible in connection with the first idea. It is very difficult, but it must be more than this to enter the ideal world of art, and, "like a thing of beauty, live forever." It was well performed.

Mr. Carl Wolfsohn has commenced his yearly piano-forte recitals before the Beethoven Society. A week ago the selections were from Chopin; this last one was made up of compositions by Liszt. It is with much pleasure that I mention these recitals, for I realize that they are given for the good of the musical art, and are expressive of the devotion of this gentleman to the cause of promoting a taste for what is good and beautiful in music. It pleases me to also note that at a recent organ recital of Mr. H. Clarence Eddy, Miss Hiltz sang five of the lovely songs of Robert Franz. Although we are in the spring time of our musical culture in this Western land, the seeds of good taste are being sown by many an earnest hand, and we shall yet reap the fruits of our labor.

C. H. B.

MILWAUKEE, Wis., April 18. — The following programme was given at the concert of Chr. Bach's orchestra, April 14:—

- Overture to "Don Juan" Mozart.
Two parts from the E minor Suite (for the first time) F. Lachner.
Solo for Contralto—"When the tide comes in" H. Millard.
Miss Bella Fink.
Meditation by S. Bach and Gounod.
Polonaise brillante C. M. v. Weber.
For Piano and Orchestra, instrumented by Liszt.
Mr. Joseph Petros.
Duet—"Quis est homo"—from Stabat Mater Rossini.
Mrs. Teetzel and Miss Lina Bach.
Fantasie for Cornet DeBeriot.
Mr. H. N. Hutchins.
Selections from Verdi's "Aida," arr. Zimmermann.

I regret to say that the performance of the orchestra was by no means equal to the best of the programme. It seemed to me that I had hardly ever heard them play in so spiritless a way, and so carelessly. The singing was very poor. Miss Fink has a powerful, deep voice, worthy of thorough training; which she evidently has never had. The other ladies are equally deficient in schooling, without her natural advantages. The pianist, a pupil of the Vienna Conservatory, showed that he had been well taught; but his performance, both of the Weber Polonaise and of Chopin's Fantaisie-improvisée, Op. 66, which he played for an encore, was mechanical, uninspired and uninspiring,—very far indeed from an artistic interpretation.

This evening the Arion Club, assisted by the Ceciliaan Choir, gave its third concert of the season, with the following programme:—

- Motets. { a. Adoremus Te Palestrina.
 { b. Presentation of Christ in the Temple Eccard.
Ye Spotted Snakes, "Midsummer Night's Dream" Macfarren.
Cecilian Choir.
Ballad.
Chas. T. Knorr.
{ a. Farewell to the Forest Mendelssohn.
{ b. Hunting Song Mendelssohn.
Piano Solo.—Ballade, G minor. Op. 23 Chopin.
Miss Amy Fay.
{ a. Largo, arrangement from Handel.
 Solo by Mrs. A. W. Hall.
{ b. Haste Thee, Nymph Handel.
{ c. Three Fishers went Sailing Goldbeck.
{ d. Italian Salad Genée.
Chas. T. Knorr and Arion Club.
{ a. Dirge for a Faithful Lover Benedict.
{ b. Hunting Chorus Benedict.
Aria—"O Mio Fernando," Donizetti.
Mrs. A. G. Hayden.
Cradle Song Smart.
Piano Solos. { a. Maerchen (Fairy Story), Raff.
 { b. Gnomes Reigen (Elfin Dance), Liszt.
Miss Amy Fay.
The Lord is my Shepherd Franz Schubert.
Cecilian Choir.
Motet. Judge me, O God, Psalm xliiii. Mendelssohn.

Though it contained no extended work, it had no lack of noble compositions by great masters, besides lesser productions of talented and able writers. The piece called "Italian Salad," however, I must regard as wholly unworthy of a place in such a programme.

The singers were suffering from colds and fatigue, having just had two of the worst rehearsals they ever went through. Under the circumstances the singing was better than could be expected, giving evidence of careful and thorough drill. The performance was greatly marred by Mr. Tomlin now and then beating on his desk, and giving orders in a loud voice. This withdrew our attention from the music so as to seriously impair the effect, producing at times an extremely unpleasant shock. It was worse than overhearing the prompter in a play.

I wish I could honestly say I had discovered a great artist in Miss Amy Fay. As it is, I failed to be impressed either with her powers of execution or interpretation. Her playing of the Raff and Liszt pieces was fluent, easy, clear, and graceful, but by no means forcible; while in the Chopin Ballade there seemed to be a very perceptible lack of power. I do not think I should ever have discovered how noble and beautiful the latter composition is from her playing of it. But she played a Chopin Nocturne for an encore, and, I am glad to say, played it in a way which pleased me very much.

Mr. Knorr is a Chicago tenor with a thin voice, squeezed up into the nasal passages. I very much fear he has no future as a public singer. Mrs. Hall and Mrs. Hayden are two of our local amateurs, pupils of Mr. Tomlin. They did their parts every way creditably. I do not remember that I ever heard Mrs. Hayden sing so well.

The Musical Society is to give portions of Kiel's "Christus" next week. J. C. F.

NOTES AND GLEANINGS.

THE New York Philharmonic Society is to be congratulated. At the annual election held yesterday, Mr. Theodore Thomas was unanimously elected conductor. On the first ballot the vote stood fifty-four for Thomas, nine for Dr. Danneberg, and six for Mr. Neundorff; the minority subsequently changed their votes, so that Mr. Thomas becomes the choice of the whole society. Mr. Julius Hallgarten was elected president; Mr. Boehm retains the vice-presidency; and the Board of Directors, we understand, is not changed, except that Messrs. Braudt and Arnold replace two of the older members. The directors will soon have a conference with Mr. Thomas, and it will then be determined whether arrangements can be made to permit of his accepting the conductorship. — Tribune, April 30.

MISS THURSBY has made an enviable success in Paris. All the critics unite in praising her voice and execution. Figaro calls her another Patti. L'Art Musical—which, by the way, credits her with being descended on one side from an old "Knicker-looker" family—says that she is in concert without a rival. Le XIX. Siècle, praising her voice, which it declares that she manages with skill and grace, says also that she is ravishingly pretty. Le Sport speaks of the sweet, vibrating timbre of her voice, and of its great flexibility. Le Petit Journal praises her not only for technical power, but for feeling and expression. The Paris Journal, mentioning first her charming voice and her musical cultivation, says that she sang an air of Mozart, and a theme with variations of Proch, and adds that she gave the first "with a taste and simplicity marvelously appropriate to Mozart's style; and the second with an ease, a flexibility, a strength and a certainty of attack which won hearty and unanimous applause." Le Gaulois says that she is on the way to become one among the most celebrated singers. Le Rappel declares that she is in talent of the family of Patti and Albani, and that her voice is of the same metal, forged in the same school. Charivari says that with her first notes she conquered her audience, and Le Temps and Le Ménestrel are full of her gifts and graces. Her audience recalled and recalled her, and certainly since Albani no foreign singer has had such a flattering success in the French Capital.

MR. W. H. SHERWOOD has started on a western tour of recitals and concerts. He played May 3 in Portland, Me.; May 5 in Lowell. He is engaged for two recitals each in Oberlin, Ohio, Cincinnati, and St. Louis, three in Chicago, four in Burlington, Iowa, and one each in Pittsburg, Evanston, Ill., and many other western towns; and on the return journey, in New York. He will be away five weeks or more.

ERNST FRIEDRICH RICHTER, one of the most distinguished musical theorists of the present generation, died at Leipzig on the 9th inst. in the seventy-first year of his age. He was born at Gross-Schönau, near Zittau, on October 24, 1808, and at a very early age showed great musical aptitude. In 1831 he went to Leipzig to study music; and on the founding of the Conservatorium in that town, he was appointed Teacher of Harmony and Composition. On the death of the late Moritz Hauptmann, Richter was invited to succeed him as Cantor at the Thomas-Kirche, a post formerly held by Sebastian Bach. His compositions, especially those for the church, are highly esteemed, and often performed in Germany; but it is as a writer of theoretical works that he will be best remembered. His treatises on Harmony, Counterpoint, and Fugue, are standard instruction-books, being adopted as text-books at the Leipzig Conservatorium. — Academy.

MISS EMMA THURSBY has before her most gratifying prospects. She will remain during the present season in London; she then goes to sing at the German watering-places. She will return to England for the Hereford Festival in September, and for the fulfillment of engagements in the provinces during October and November. She will afterwards go back to Paris to sing at the Conservatoire, and also at the concerts of Padeloup and Colonne. Then follows a tour in the French provinces and in Holland, to which succeed engagements in Berlin, Vienna, Prague, Pesth, St. Petersburg, and Moscow. The next season she will spend in England, and will return to America in the autumn of 1880.

BOSTON, MAY 24, 1879.

CONTENTS.

SANZIO. Stuart Sterne	81
GEORGE SAND AND FRÉDÉRIC CHOPIN. A Study. Fanny Raymond Ritter	81
ERNEST FRIEDRICH RICHTER. F. J. Sawyer	82
THE ZERRAHN TESTIMONIAL: BOSTON, MAY 2, 1879	82
TALES OF ART: SECOND SERIES. From Instructions by Mr. Wm. M. Hunt to his Pupils. VI.	84
A LETTER FROM FLORENCE	84
CONCERTS	85
George L. Osgood's Concert. — The Cecilia. — Fourth Annual Festival of (Episcopal) Parish Choirs. — Concerts of the Apollo Club.	85
MUSICAL CORRESPONDENCE	86
Providence. — Philadelphia. — Chicago. — Milwaukee.	86
NOTES AND GLEANINGS	88

All the articles not credited to other publications were expressly written for this Journal.

Published fortnightly by HOUGHTON, OSGOOD AND COMPANY, 220 Devonshire Street, Boston. Price, 10 cents a number; $2.50 per year.

For sale in Boston by CARL PRUEFER, 30 West Street, A. WILLIAMS & Co., 283 Washington Street, A. K. LORING, 369 Washington Street, and by the Publishers; in New York by A. BRENTANO, JR., 39 Union Square, and HOUGHTON, OSGOOD & Co., 21 Astor Place; in Philadelphia by W. H. BAKER & Co., 1102 Chestnut Street; in Chicago by the CHICAGO MUSIC COMPANY, 512 State Street.

SANZIO.

BY STUART STERNE, AUTHOR OF "ANGELO."

"She was the daughter of a soda-burner who lived across the Tiber, near St. Cecilia. A small house is still shown, which is said to have been her birthplace. Formerly a garden was attached to this, in which the lovely girl was often to be seen. Her beauty, therefore, was soon talked about, — and Rafael also was attracted by her fame and seized by such passionate love that he had no peace till he could call her his own, and would no longer live without her." — Passerani.

THEY rode in silence for a time. The woods, bright in the fresh young green of early spring, E'en now far in beneath the aged trees, That thickly interlaced their spreading boughs, Grew dusky with the falling eve, save where The stems divided, or a timid sapling, Its trembling leaves stirred by each passing breath, Made room for light and air; while far and near The setting sun scattered his golden shafts, — Among the gnarled, brown oaks, whose swelling buds, Big with new life, must burst to flower ere long; And on the towering, melancholy pines, That rest unchanged through all the fitful year, Save for the brighter tips that in the springtime Light their dark crowns as with a sombre smile; On the grave olives, with their pallid leaves; And on the virgin willows, modestly, Yet with a tender grace ineffable, Wearing their bridal veil of delicate green, Whose drooping ends kissed the glad earth. And here The mellow sunbeams, wandering onward, found, Close nestling at the foot of some great trunk, Or in the shelter of a moss-grown rock, Young, tiny ferns, unrolling cautiously Their furry, silvered caps, dark violets In fragrant, purple clusters, or a knot Of yellow crocus cups, or, spread far out Like a dim, pale-blue mist, a starry bank Of small forget-me-nots. Loving and long, As with a fond caress, and loath to go, Lingered and dwelled the late mild light upon These sweetest of Spring's children, that so humbly Herald the gorgeous Summer's pride and pomp. And where it fell the woods all flashed and flamed With glittering drops, sole marks of the fierce shower Which scarce an hour ago had swept the land, And left these after him, that quivering hung From tree and bush and flower. None spoke, while all Drank in the freshness of the odorous air, But when perchance some overhanging branch, Some trailing vine, brushed mantle, plume, or face, And showered its weight of drops down over him Who passed below it. Then a short exclaim, A jesting word, or railing laughter, broke From him and his companions. All around The forest, too, seemed hushed, and slowly folding His green wings for the night; their horses' hoofs Fell noiseless on the carpet of soft moss, Save when they crushed a rustling last year's leaf, Or a brown, crackling twig. And but for this, And the low gurgle of an unseen brook, And the faint, long-drawn notes of some lone bird, Who far away upon some lofty branch Sang his sweet chant to the departing sun, — No sound fell on the stillness.

Thus they rode, A merry company of gay young friends,

Whose lips were scarcely wont to rest long silent, By twos and threes, close as the narrow path Would give them leave. But one among them all Lagged in the rear alone, suffered the reins Loosely to lie upon his horse's neck, Who moved but slowly forward, bending down To sniff the grass and herbs, while his young master Hung idly in the saddle, with his head Bowed on his breast, lost in some dreamy thought, Heedless of brushing vine or showering branch, And all unconscious how from time to time One of the others, turning in his seat, Cast back at him a furtive, smiling glance, And drew his shoulders up.

And so at length They came to where the trunks stood far apart, And the low shrubs more dense, the light poured in With fuller flood, and the dim forest ended, And swiftly now emerged upon a plain That rolled before them far and wide, and broke Into small hills and level valleys, sweet With soft, young, tufted grass and delicate flowers, That dripped with shimmering freshness like the wood, While in the distance, bathed in rosy sheen, The towers and domes of the Eternal City Rose up, a fair, familiar sight.

"Look you," One of the friends said now, and glanced around, "How all the hills, that in the winter time Wear but a sober tint of purple brown, Have taken on their bright green summer robe E'en now, so early in the year!"

"Ay, like Some fair, vain woman!" cried another gayly, "Who cannot oft and swift enough exchange Her most enchanting robes for others new, And more enchanting still!"

And then a third, Pointing to where a rocky height rose up, Crowned by a cloister's stern, gray walls, "See where The pious women of the Hill walk forth, To catch a breath of air! Vespers are done, But still methinks their hands are clasped in prayer, And hark, they chant! Ay, how the golden light Plays o'er their sombre garments and white veils, And seems to cast a moment's gleam of joy Into their barren lives! Well, surely these Have done with worldly pride and vanity!" And when the other laughed and would have answered, A fourth exclaimed, "Who's this that o'er the plain Comes spurring towards us there?"

Shading their eyes, They watched the approaching rider, and then all Cried out in chorus, "Ay, it is the Count! I know him by his waving yellow plumes, And his long mantle! Look you! how the clasp Flashes upon his breast!"

A moment more, And he was close to them and checked his horse, Received with noisy greetings and loud cries Of "Well met, Count!" and "Welcome, Baldassar!" "What brings you here so late?" "A thousand pities You were not with us first; you cannot know All you have missed!" "Ay, what a precious gem, A pearl of rarest lustre, we found hid Deep in the woods!"

The other smiled. "Good friends, I am rejoiced to find you, and perceive That the great shower washed none of you away! But where's my Sanzio? Ah, I see him there, Wrapped in deep meditation, it appears!" Glancing at him who, fallen far behind, Unconscious still of all that passed, marked not That a new-comer joined the rest, nor heard The babble of the merry tongues, now wholly Loosed from the unwonted spell of silence. "Well, Let's halt till he comes up!"

The horses stood And, with their heads together, curiously Gazed each upon the other with great eyes, Or mildly snuffed his neighbor's outstretched nose. "But pray where found you shelter from the storm? And what is this I've missed, — that precious gem Found in the woods?" asked Baldassar again, Of the friend next him. "Oh, all that," cried he, "Hangs by the self-same thread! The stealthy storm Surprised us in the woods and scarce gave warning. The daylight turned to sudden night, — a flash, A clap of thunder, and the first great drops, — It seemed but one brief moment. We, dismayed, Scattered in haste, rode aimless here and there, In quest of rock or tree to shelter us, And so came to a clearing and a house Just on the forest's edge, and well content Dismounted, drew the horses 'neath a shed, And knocked upon the door. By all the Saints, I tell you when 't was opened, Baldassar, We well-nigh all of us, just as we stood, On the wet ground, beneath the streaming rain, Had dropped upon our knees! A fairer vision, A face and form, a brow and lip and eye, Of rarer grace, your sight ne'er lit upon,

Than in the sweetest maid, who bade us there Enter and welcome!"

"Every one of us, Lost instantly his stricken heart to her!" Another cried. And yet another, "Ay, Bold Cupid stood upon her shapely shoulders, Sat in her eyes, — what though 't is true enough, They were cast down with blushing modesty! — And nestled in the ringlets of her hair, Plying his deadly trade, — let fly his shafts In all directions, swift and merciless, Till none escaped unscathed!"

"But yet you bear Your wounds with much heroic fortitude!" Said Baldassar, smiling, and the one Who first had spoken, "Ay, but there is one In whom methinks the rankling dart sits deep!" Nodding towards Sanzio.

"Nay, Giovanni, hush!" The other cried, in earnest, lowered tones, "I know those dreamy moods full well in him, And ever stand aside in reverent awe! Who knows what vision of immortal beauty, What heavenly fair Madonna, or sweet Saint, To grow to shape beneath his cunning hand, And keep his memory green from age to age, Rises e'en now within his spirit's eye! Let us not rudely jar or break those dreams, Least we might prove us robbers, in advance, Of the world's proudest treasures!"

"Oh no, no!" Giovanni said, and laughed, yet sank his voice, — "Good Baldassar, have no fear! I swear 'T is but a very earthly little Saint, Who this time holds his heart and senses bound!" "And pray who is she? what her name and state?" "I know not. It appears they live with folks, — She and a grandam whom she calls but mother, — Who like a thousand others till the soil. But these two of far finer stuff are made Than other common peasants, and we heard Her name is Benedetta."

It might be That word had roused him as it reached his ear, For Sanzio raised his head and gazed around With a deep, long-drawn sigh, and then at last, But with a kindling eye, saw Baldassar, And suddenly seizing on his idle reins Rode swiftly up, and with a grave, sweet smile, Reached out his hand.

They turned their horses' heads, And all together now, at swifter pace, Moved towards the city, while the waning light Fast faded from the purpling hills; the Count With Sanzio first, the others following close, Discouraging endlessly of this and that. But ever in the midst of friendly converse, Sanzio from time to time slid back again To sudden thoughtful silence for a space, And his companion, smiling to himself, Would check his ready flow of speech, suspend A phrase half finished, unperceived by him, And patiently delay till he looked up, Ere he concluded.

Thus they rode ere long In at the gates, and clattered through the streets, Where the gray shadows of swift-falling eve Lay gathered, and the mellow twilight hung But with a last, faint, rosy flush, high up 'Mid topmost spires and windows.

At the door Of Sanzio's stately mansion, they cried down A gay good-night to him, as he alighted, And then with laughing words and loud farewells, And promises to meet again, dispersed, Each hastening on his separate way alone.

(To be continued.)

GEORGE SAND AND FRÉDÉRIC CHOPIN.

A STUDY.

BY FANNY RAYMOND RITTER.

(Concluded from page 76.)

THE total loss of the letters written by Chopin from Paris to his relations and friends in Poland was an irreparable one for any biographer, not only on account of all they must have contained in reference to the many historical and artistic celebrities with whom he came in contact at that period, but still more for the sake of the clearer light they would have shed on his own life and state of mind at the time, though he might have but half revealed this in his correspondence. It was difficult to induce one so profound and serious to converse on the subject of love or friendship; questions having such a bearing were always parried with amiable satire or refined badinage. The letters given in that part of Karasowski's biography which treats of Chopin's early youth are as charming — though in a different manner — as those of Mendelssohn, who scarcely excelled Chopin in social accomplishments and literary cultivation. All the information given by Karasowski respecting the first twenty years of Chopin's life — of many details of which we were ignorant — is valuable and interesting; but this biographer, possibly unable to take the steps necessary to obtain a fuller knowledge of Chopin's life in Paris, and apparently influenced by his own prejudices, and not altogether unreasonably so by the regrets and opinions of Chopin's relations, endeavors to persuade us that the composer's early death was in a great measure owing to the disenchantment of his Parisian experience. But, though not all those "whom the gods love die young," Chopin seems to have been one of those who are fated to do so. His sister Emilie died of consumption in early youth; from this fact we may suppose that disease to have been hereditary in the family. In French journals of that time, Chopin's death was attributed to a combination of asthma and consumption. He told Fétis, who knew him well, that he was of so delicate a constitution in childhood that he merely vegetated for several years. The servants of the Chopin family in Poland said that Frédéric's "mind was sick;" though chiefly on account of his excessive love of study, and his unhealthy habit of rising in the middle of the night, to improvise at the piano-forte. At the time of the Polish outbreak, his parents forbade him to join the insurrectionists "on account of the delicate state of his health." In 1837, a year before his meeting with George Sand, his first decided attack of disease of the lungs had occurred. Liszt says he was so weak when he went with the Dudevant family to Majorca that no one expected to see him return alive; but in spite of that rainy winter on the island, his health was so much benefited by the change, and the care he received, that he remained comparatively well for some years afterwards. The air of Majorca, the life and character of the place, were certainly favorable to his mental productivity, since, besides the Preludes, he composed more than a dozen works there; and his best compositions were written during the years following, in the rue Pigale, or the square d'Orléans at Paris, or at Nohant, under the influence of that gentle scenery, and the society of artists and people of distinction who were invited thither by Mme. Sand, among them some of Chopin's old friends, who rejoiced to find his gayety, wit, and geniality as great as they formerly were, in early youth. How inspiring, how poetic was this life, of which Mme. Sand was the guiding spirit, we learn from one or two anecdotes which Karasowski gives us as reported by the relations of Chopin. In further proof of this, and of the kindness and care of the châtelaine towards her guests, I translate a few passages from the recently published letters of Delacroix, some of which were written from Nohant, where he was visiting, to friends in Paris: "This is a most agreeable place, and nowhere can one find more amiable hosts. When we are not together at breakfast, dinner, billiards, or walking, one is in one's room reading, or lounging on the sofa. Through the open window, looking upon the garden, I hear snatches of Chopin's music, for he practices on his side of the house; it blends with the song of birds and the fragrance of roses. You see I am not to be pitied, yet labor is necessary to add its grain of salt to all this life of ease, which I ought to purchase by a little brain work. . . . My health has greatly improved since I came here. I have grown passionately fond of billiards, in which I take lessons every day. We have delightful conversations on the subjects that please me best, and music by fits and starts; but I must do something, so I am amusing myself with Maurice, the son of the house, and we have undertaken to paint a Saint Anne for the parish church. . . . We expected Balzac; he did not come, and I am not sorry, for his talkativeness would have broken up the harmony of this nonchalance, which lulls me so pleasantly; walking, billiards, a little painting and music, — more than enough to fill one's time! . . . I have many a long tête-à-tête with Chopin; I love him sincerely; he is a man of rare distinction of character, and, more than that, the truest artist I ever met. He is one of the small number of people whom I admire and esteem equally. Mme. Sand is at present a sufferer from weak eyes and violent headaches, which she bears with the kindest fortitude, to avoid giving us pain by the knowledge of hers. The recent event has been a ball given on the lawn of the château to the peasants of the neighborhood, accompanied by the best cornemuse players in the country. The type of these country people is gentle and good-natured; though real beauty is uncommon, ugliness is rare among them. The women have much of that soft expression often met with in pictures by the old masters. They are all Saint Annes."

After the inroads of disease began to tell continuously on Chopin's mind as well as on his physical well-being, and especially after his father's death, he became not unfrequently the victim of fantastic hallucinations; like Hamlet, he imagined himself haunted by his father's ghost. Yet this excess of gloomy imaginativeness should not be attributed to the jealousy, disappointment, or regrets of this period of his life, as it always characterized him. As early as his twentieth year he wrote to his friend Titus Woyciechowski: "How often I take day for night, and night for day! How much time I lose in dreams and reveries! and instead of gaining strength from this stupefaction, I am tormented by it. . . . My heart always beats in syncopation, so to speak. . . . When shall we meet again? Perhaps never; for, seriously, my health is miserable. I appear gay, especially when with my own relations; but my deepest feelings are troubled by sad presentiments, unrest, bad dreams, sleeplessness, indifference, desire for death, and then desire for life. Sometimes it seems as though my spirit had congealed, and then I feel a heavenly repose within my heart; and then again I behold pictures from which I cannot tear my imagination, and which pain me to excess. It is an indescribable mingling of sensations. . . . Should I leave Warsaw, I fear it would be never to return. I feel convinced that I should then bid farewell to home forever. Oh, how painful it must be to die elsewhere than in the spot where we were born! How it would grieve me to see around my bed of death only an indifferent physician and a hired servant, instead of the faces of those who are near and dear!"

In a letter written in 1831 to his master, Elsner, Chopin gave very practical, honorable, and noble reasons for his determination to become at first a pianist rather than a composer by profession, intending, however, to make the former only an eventual stepping-stone to the higher calling, and never meaning to lose sight of his aim "to create a new era in the history of art." How far has he — who remained true to the dreams of his youth as much as was humanly possible — fulfilled his aim? Strictly speaking, he has not created "a new era," even in his own branch of composition. But his works constitute a remarkable, original, and unique episode in art history; one too poetic and rife with lovely suggestiveness ever to be lost sight of; one as significant, in the development of musical art, as to his own artistic development was that episode in which, he said, his "whole life" was contained, and which has formed the subject of this study.

[My readers will observe that I have occasionally quoted from the first edition of Karasowski's biography of Chopin; the second edition has recently appeared, announced by its author as "completely revised, with additional letters." I shall consult this, hoping to find in it some fuller record of Chopin's life in Paris, before arranging the above study for separate publication. — F. K. R.]

ERNST FRIEDRICH RICHTER.

BY F. J. SAWYER, B. MUS.

MANY a musician throughout Europe and America will hear, with deep regret, of the death, on the 9th of this month, of Professor Ernst Friedrich Richter. I doubt if there ever was a master so universally beloved and respected as "dear old Papa Richter," as he was often called. Those who have studied under him — who remember his pleasant and cheerful way, yet strict and thorough method, — his kind word for the persevering, his disgust and dislike of the conceited and lazy, the high standard of art to which he pointed them, will deeply regret the news of his death. He was such a master as one rarely finds, so wise and kind, and yet so thorough. Would we could point to many like him, but we cannot. To say his fame was universal would be fully true. His excellent book on Harmony, after passing through twelve editions in his own country, has appeared in America, translated by John P. Morgan, in Russia translated by another pupil of the old cantor, and also in England by Franklin Taylor, a translation in no way equal to the original.

Ernst Friedrich Edward Richter was born near Zittau, October 24, 1808, and was, therefore, in his seventy-first year. His father was schoolmaster at Gross-Schönau, a man of good repute and position. His son received from him his first instruction, going afterwards to the Gymnasium (college) at Zittau. Here he found in the school choir an opening for his musical talents, which had already developed themselves, and, working studiously at composition, he soon became conductor of the choir and obtained for it much applause at its sacred and secular performances. Once more he moved, this time to Leipzig, where he entered the university, and attended the usual course of philosophy and theology, but also working on at his music under Weulich, who was then occupying the post of cantor to the Thomas School. During this time he founded and conducted the Zittauer Gesangverein, and on the death of Pohlenz was elected to the direction of the Singakademie. When, through the energy of Felix Mendelssohn, the Leipzig Conservatorium came into existence, Richter was chosen with Moritz Hauptmann as Professor of Harmony. But what a galaxy of talent was then on the staff of Europe's greatest music school! Mendelssohn, Robert and Clara Schumann, Ferdinand David, Hauptmann, and Richter! It is truly no wonder that, with such an impetus as this start gave, the Leipzig Conservatorium has ever been the foremost amongst our European musical institutes.

Here it was that Richter was thrown into contact with Mendelssohn, and to this we owe the production of the excellent treatises on Harmony, Counterpoint, and Fugue, which have since appeared. For Mendelssohn, with that quick perception of another's powers, had urged on his colleague the writing of a work which would serve as the textbook for the Conservatorium. Richter, however, with that large amount of self-criticism which he possessed, worked long at his book, and so not before 1853 did the long-expected "Treatise on Harmony" appear. Two years previously he had been appointed organist of the church of St. Peter, and in 1862, together with this post, organist to the New Church, and also a little after to the Nicolai Kirche. On the 3d January, 1868, Moritz Hauptmann died, and Richter was unanimously chosen to succeed to the post of cantor of the Thomas School, he being the eighth who had held the place since it was filled by John Sebastian Bach (the exact line of succession being Bach, Harrer, Döles, Hiller, Müller, Schicht, Weinlich, Hauptmann, and Richter). To this post no one could have been better fitted. His early scholastic training, his keen practical methods, rendered him in every way peculiarly adapted to the work, and thus under his careful supervision a steady reformation began. The "Kirchenmusik" (orchestral productions at the Sunday services from Easter to Trinity) were reintroduced, and motets were learnt and old ones re-studied (Reduer). From the 13th October, 1868, he steadily worked on with his choir until their singing became noted throughout the whole of Germany.

But the Conservatorium ever remained the centre of his work, and from thence he has sent out, to fill the best musical positions in all parts of the globe, pupils who will long live as bright examples of his excellent teaching. His mild and gentle spirit seemed always to try to find the best side of everything. Only once can I remember him put out, and that was over Verdi's Requiem, a work the music of which is so vastly different from the masses of either Mozart, Cherubini, or Brahms, that it might well arouse a purist of Richter's type. When his criticism was to be obtained it was always keenly true. Once he was asked what he thought of Rossini's "Stabat Mater." He replied, "Lieber Herr —, I will only say, I don't think Rossini understood Latin," — a criticism as mild as it was accurate.

His compositions include psalms for chorus and orchestra, motets, two masses, a "Stabat Mater" (voices only), part songs, string quartets and sonatas, and also pieces for organ and for piano. But it is his treatise on the theory of music that will keep Professor Richter's name from oblivion. As already mentioned, two English editions have appeared: one in London (printed without Richter's leave, by the way) by Mr. Franklin Taylor, which must by no means be accepted as a translation, but merely as a very moderate adaptation; the other, unfortunately little known in this country, printed with Richter's consent by John P. Morgan, in New York. The latter translation is most carefully done, and forms a strong contrast to the English edition.¹ On last Good Friday, the 150th anniversary of the first production of Bach's "Matthew Passion," the dear old cantor and beloved professor was laid to his last rest, accompanied to his grave by the solemn sound of the beautiful choral, "Jesu, meine Zuversicht." More hearty regret has rarely filled the hearts of those standing round a musician's grave. Once more the voices of his choir arose in Bach's beautiful melody to "Wenn ich einmal soll scheiden," and then with a last look at his coffin the crowd dispersed. But though gone to his last rest, the memory of many of us will long cherish, as one of the truest artists, most thorough musicians and excellent teachers, that we have ever met, the name of Ernst Friedrich Richter. — London Mus. Standard, April 26.

THE ZERRAHN TESTIMONIAL: BOSTON, MAY 2, 1879.

THAT evening's performance of the Oratorio of "Elijah" by the Handel and Haydn Society, in the Music Hall, marked the twenty-fifth anniversary of the engagement of Mr. Carl Zerrahn as conductor, a position he has held with honor and marked ability uninterruptedly during the entire period. Before the performance, the society, as usual, assembled in Bumstead Hall, where the esteemed beneficiary was presented with a beautiful gold medal and full scores of Mendelssohn's "Elijah," "St. Paul," and "The Hymn of Praise," the medal from the gentlemen of the chorus, and the scores from the ladies. The presentation speech, made by President C. C. Perkins, was as follows: —

Mr. Carl Zerrahn, I am requested by the ladies and gentlemen members of the chorus of the Handel and Haydn Society in their name to convey to you, who have been for so many years their ever zealous conductor, certain presents in token of their sense of the unflinching ardor with which you have discharged the duties of your office, and in recognition of the important services which you have rendered to the society during the last quarter of the century.

They feel that you have enabled them to gain a deeper appreciation of the beauties of the oratorios which they have studied under your direction; that by your conscientious and judicious criticisms you have taught them to sing the choral works of the great composers in a manner which has not only maintained, but greatly increased, the reputation of the society of which they are members. Their gratitude to you is in proportion to their pride in the position which it holds among the musical societies of America, to their deep and lasting affection for it, and their earnest wishes for its prosperity and improvement.

As the work in which the Handel and Haydn Society is engaged is the efficient production of oratorios of the great composers, and as the way in which this work has been accomplished owes much of its excellence to you, the lady members of the chorus thought it not inappropriate to offer you, in testimonial of their high regard, the orchestral scores of some of the oratorios which they have performed under your conductorship; and as you yourself saw fit to select the "Elijah" for performance this evening, they have charged me with the agreeable duty of presenting to you the various scores written by the composer of that great work, which was performed in the Music Hall under your direction in 1854, when you first assumed the baton, and will be given to-night in honor of the completion of your twenty-fifth season as conductor. Considering it desirable that you should also carry away with you, in memory of this notable occasion, a gift over which, by reason of its material, time can have but little power, the gentlemen members of the chorus have directed me to offer you on their behalf a gold medal, bearing on its obverse the device of the Handel and Haydn Society, and on its reverse an inscription setting forth the date and the circumstances of its presentation.

While offering you these presents, I feel that I am but expressing the feeling of the donors when I say that they hope that your future career may be as honorable and useful as that which reflects so much credit upon your past life, and that you may long maintain your connection with a society which owes you so much, and would fain owe you more.

Mr. Zerrahn, in reply, spoke as follows: —

Ladies and Gentlemen, and Mr. President, let me say that I feel on this occasion a great deal more than I can express. Even had I designed to prepare anything to say, my head has been for the past two days in a perfect whirlpool. I thank you for your kindness to me, and for the testimonials of your regard, but I can hardly express myself as I would. There is one thing, however, I can say. If the government of your society never had paid me a dollar, if I never had received any testimonial at your hands, and if this concert never had been given, I should feel that I was richly repaid by the honor of having stood before you for so many years. If I am again chosen to be your conductor, I shall spare no endeavors to continue to merit your approbation.

The medal is very rich and elegant, is oblong in form, and depends from a pin of gold. On the obverse is finely engraved the seal of the society, so familiar to all patrons of the oratorio concerts, inasmuch as it appears on all the programmes; and upon the sides are the years "1854" and "1879," while the name, "Carl Zerrahn," appears upon the cross-bar of the pin. On the reverse is the following inscription: "Presented to Carl Zerrahn by the Handel and Haydn Society on the completion of his twenty-fifth year as their conductor. Boston, May 2, 1879."

The Music Hall was crowded when the chorus entered, and the appearance of Mr. Zerrahn, wearing the insignia of his quarter-century of distinguished service, was the signal for prolonged applause by the society and audience as of one accord. The front of the stage was decorated with flowers in a very tasteful manner. An elaborate floral device, several feet in height, occupied the centre near the conductor's stand. At its summit was a crimson star, and below the inscription, worked in flowers, "1854. C. Z. 1879." A laurel wreath formed a part of this elegant and fragrant ornament, and a wreath of flowers, said to be the offering of Miss Annie Louise Cary, handed up when Mr. Zerrahn first made his appearance, was hung upon the conductor's stand. One of the other tributes received by the beneficiary in the course of the evening was a porcelain horse-shoe, quaintly decorated with flowers — the gift of Mme. Erminia Rudersdorff — transmitted through the hands of Miss Fanny Kellogg. The decorations were painted by the donor.

The rendering of the oratorio was undoubtedly one of the finest, artistically, ever heard here. The chorus sang in their great numbers, "Yet doth the Lord," "Blessed are the men," "Thanks be to God," and "He, watching over Israel," with more than wonted fire, fervency, and effect, and the Baal choruses were also admirably sung. The striking novelty of the performance was the host of soloists, changing as the oratorio progressed from floor to stage and back again, and relieving each other in relays. All were volunteers, and their names are Mrs. H. E. H. Carter, Mrs. J. R. Ellison, Mrs. Abby Clark Ford, Mrs. Annie L. Fowler, Mrs. J. W. Weston, Miss Sarah C. Fisher, Miss Fanny Kellogg, Miss Helen A. Russell, Mr. J. C. Collins, Mr. W. H. Fessenden, Mr. Clarence E. Hay, Mr. A. C. Ryder, Mrs. C. C. Noyes, Mrs. H. M. Smith, Mrs. Agnes Giles Spring, Mrs. Julia Houston-West, Miss Ita Welsh, Miss Emily Winant, Mr. D. M. Babcock, Mr. Alfred Wilkie, Mr. John F. Winch, Master William H. Lee. Two others, Messrs. Myron W. Whitney and William J. Winch, took part in the public rehearsal Thursday afternoon. Mr. John F. Winch's singing of the "Elijah" numbers was remarkably rich in expressive feeling, and really moving to the audience, as was evident in the effect made with "It is enough." Miss Emily Winant likewise created a deep impression with her "Oh, rest in the Lord," which was redemanded with one unanimous, strong, and prolonged burst of applause. Her rich and uniform contralto, producing its tones without guttural forcing or subterfuge of any kind, was governed by a very sound and discriminating intelligence as to dramatic sentiment, drawing the line between coldness and "o'erstepping the modesty of nature" with a good taste that appears instinctive. Mrs. Houston-West succeeded well in "Hear ye, Israel," and her recitative towards the close. Mr. Fessenden's delivery of the tenor part was with his well-known refinement and tenderness, and Mr. Alfred Wilkie registered the great improvement his voice and style have made since his former appearance in this music. Master W. H. Lee, in the music of "The Youth," displayed the correctness of his training in a very beautiful performance of his brief task. Mrs. H. M. Smith was in fine voice, and sang "The Widow's" music with admirable breadth and warmth and full effect. Miss Ita Welsh and Miss Kellogg were also heard at their best. The concerted numbers were not all equally well done, but "Lift thine eyes" was finely sung by Miss Kellogg, Miss Fisher, and Mrs. Ellison, and another concerted piece, especially well given, was the quartet, "Cast thy burden upon the Lord," sung by Mrs. Weston, Mrs. Fowler, Mr. Collins, and Mr. Ryder. Altogether, the performance was exceptionally fine, and one to be long remembered. — Transcript, May 3.

¹ The excellent translation by J. C. D. Parker (Boston, O. Ditson & Co.) should also be mentioned. — Ed.

TALKS ON ART. — SECOND SERIES.¹

FROM INSTRUCTIONS BY MR. WILLIAM M. HUNT TO HIS PUPILS.

VI.

(1877.) It's a good thing to study with Couture. Anything is good which gives you a start, and makes you want to work. He does certain things admirably. I'm glad that I went to him, and I'm glad that I left him when I did. When you think of Millet — that's different enough. There's more humanity in one of his haycocks than in anything that Couture can do.

I owe a great deal to Thomas Couture; more, in a certain sense, than I do to any one else. But I don't approve of his method. I think it is uncertain and unsatisfactory to put on thin color in that way. His principles are admirable. He has taught people to give their work the true, broad, out-of-door look; and, in that way, has done a great deal of good. Troyon would not have been half the painter that he was, without Couture. You would not recognize his early work:

¹ Copyright, 1879, by Helen M. Knowlton.

earnest and digging; but hard and dry. It was from Couture and Diaz, and those men, that he learned the things which make people love his work. The critics may as well believe that the artist who painted the Décadence Romaine at twenty-one had a few more tools than they are ever likely to know the use of. I want no one ever to think me ungrateful to him. At the same time, I don't paint in his method, and don't want to. Even before I left his atelier I had begun to paint differently. The head of the "Jewess," and that of the Dutchwoman which I painted for the "Fortune-Teller," show that; and he acknowledged it. My way of working, and of teaching too, is utterly different. Why, you can hardly find Couture's name in my little book. Certainly, only one or two things which he told me are quoted there. When did I ever tell you to try to paint like Couture? Or when did I ever give you a receipt for painting at all? It would be unjust to Couture and to me to pretend that I ever held him up in that way.

As for what is called French Art, it's a bad phrase, and I'm sorry that men like John Everett Millais should talk about the "French School," as if it were all one thing. Those men form no school. Some of them have schools of their own, but they are as different as can be. Some of their work I dislike as much as any one can; but they have among them more knowledge of painting than exists in any other country. Even the new Munich School grows out of French ideas, and is not truly German.

I like Duveneck's work; although that sort of painting of stuffs is not my aim in art. There's no use in painting unless you have something to say by it.

Literary critics can't appreciate art, because they don't work at it. It takes as much love to rightly criticize a picture as it does to paint it. Why, Théophile Gautier, one of the best of them, came and told Couture that if he did n't do this and that to his picture he would n't notice it in his review of the Salon. To which Couture replied, "You will be obliged to notice it under penalty of being thought an imbecile!"

What a proposal to make to a painter! Besides, the critics know that people like to see faults pointed out. It is comparatively stupid to admire, when you can so easily join in detraction and slander. Really great work can never be fully appreciated, because only the men who did it can appreciate it. And yet plenty of young fellows write about Michael Angelo's faults! What a privilege it would be for him to hear them!

(To be continued.)

A LETTER FROM FLORENCE.

MY DEAR DWIGHT, — There has been what is called, in the grandiose phrase of this region, a "solemn exposition" of some rare art products, the sale of which shall swell the fund for the completion of the Façade of the Duomo.

The grand building itself reached its elevation and finish by successive throes of the religious heart ever since the time of Dante, until

"Love and terror laid the tiles."

But the front, like that of many another Italian cathedral, and notably the San Lorenzo in Florence, has remained incomplete, its rough rubble-work showing more unsightly in contrast to the lace-like marble traceries of Giotto's Bell Tower, that rises beside it into the blue air, and swings over the historic town now, as in the day of Savonarola, a weltering boom of sound.

But the pictures. These are a gift from the munificent Prince Demidoff, and are at first sight disappointing, as they consist entirely of sketches by modern masters, on some of which Death has set his ineffaceable seal of rarity and increased value.

"What misers are we to the toll,
What spendthrifts to the name!"

Here is a sketch, by Horace Vernet, of cannoneers in the act of running a piece of ordnance back from an embrasure in order to reload. It has the strain, the fierce, objective, decisive stroke of this great battle painter. There is a flower-piece by Jacquemart, who rivaled Jan Steen, and the best of the old Flemings in presenting by pigments the verisimilitude of liquids in glass. What interested me most was a charcoal landscape, by Th. Rousseau, with its sculpturesque economy of line, — few strokes and infinite suggestion. In another part of the Accademia is exhibited, simply for the artist's benefit, a new statue in plaster of Cleopatra, where skillful handling, costume, and accessories are, according to the modern Italian method, made to take the place of informing expression; so that we see not the character but only a pert, fantastic metamorphosis of the immortal queen.

Owing to deep snows in the Alps, and extending along the spinal column of the Apennines, the spring has opened late in Florence. The almond, apricot, and peach, which blossom usually in February, did this year "take the winds of March with beauty." On the 18th of that month I saw the first lizard of the spring. The cunning little footed snake had tided over Saint Patrick's Day, and came out fresh on the following morning. He was clinging to the bark of an evergreen oak, his tail so near the color as scarcely to be distinguishable from it, but his back of a spotted, greenish gold. I watched him quietly, when a man came down the walk and stopped beside me. Without turning head I glanced toward the man, then instantly back to the lizard. He was gone! He had vanished in the division of a glance.

Only yesterday, after a heavy rain, the clouds rolled away from Monte Morello, showing his three peaks like billows heaving towards the east, and all crested with snow. An hour after, under the spring sun, not a vestige of white remained upon those summits; but the piled masses of Vallombrosa and the great Carrara crag still outline with snow against the blue this lovely Val d'Arno, gray with olive, green with wheat, and plumed with immemorial pines.

Elve and I were walking one afternoon up that magnificent avenue of pines, cypresses, cedar, and evergreen oak that leads to the old Ducal Palace, when the strange note of a bird in sad undertone drew our attention and stopped our talk. That was a nightingale. Her song came with a throb, as if the bird were all heart, and her heart all music, and the music all melancholy; as if it were the dream and passion and memory of an imprisoned human soul made audible. Her nest is in that cypress.

This avenue is on the way to Galileo's Tower, and Milton may well have trod it when visiting the "Tuscan artist."

Tempel, a short, round German astronomer and enthusiast, has the post of professor at the Observatory of Florence. This is built on a spur of the same eminence where stands the old Tower of Galileo. Tempel is hospitable, cordial, to an inspiring degree, a living proof that

"Spring makes spring in the mind
When sixty years are told."

He seems by evidence of comparative photographs to have defined certain nebulae better than any other astronomer. His "nature is subdued," or rather elevated "to what it works in," — he has become a globe! As we left the genial presence of this companion of the stars, I mused how different was his honored lot from the dungeon of Galileo. The world moves.

I began with an intention of sending you a letter on art, but have done little more than indicate certain aspects of nature. Yet I know you will accept the record in remembrance of a deep saying by Sir Thomas Browne, that "Nature is the art of God."

Odo.

FLORENCE, April 24, 1879.

Dwight's Journal of Music.

SATURDAY, MAY 24, 1879.

CONCERTS.

MR. GEORGE L. OSGOOD'S Concert, at Mechanics' Hall, Wednesday evening, May 7, was one of the most interesting and unique that we have had. Indeed, it was full of most charming matter charmingly interpreted. There was variety, there was freshness, there were choicest songs and choruses without stint, and there was excellent relief of instrumental pieces for the most part new and striking. The only fault that could be found was the great length of the following programme, of which, however, no one wished to lose a single number.

- (1.) Choruses —
 - a. "Benedictus," (1590) . . . Giovanni Gabrieli.
For three chorus, in twelve real parts.
 - b. "Ave Verum," Mozart.
With accompaniment of piano-forte and string quartet.
- (2.) Quartet in B-flat major, Op. 41 . . . Saint-Saëns.
For piano, violin, viola, and 'cello.
- (3.) Song Series, "Frauen-Liebe und Leben." . . . Schumann.
The words by Von Chamisso.
- (4.) Chorus, "May Dew," Op. 95, No. 1 . . . Rheinberger.
- (5.) Piano-forte solo — "Benediction de Dieu dans la solitude" Liszt.
From the "Harmonies Poétiques et Religieuses."
- (6.) Suite of Spring Songs Franz.
 - a. "Tis the dark green leaves," Op. 20, No. 5.
 - b. "The moon 's to rest declining," Op. 17, No. 2.
 - c. "When the earth from slumber," Op. 23, No. 3.
 - d. "Mid blossomy sheen," Op. 14, No. 2.
 - e. "Thro' the wheat and the corn," Op. 33, No. 3.
 - f. "The hills are green," Op. 11, No. 3.
- (7.) Three Characteristic Numbers Rubinstein.
 - a. Songs :
 - (1.) "There was a monarch golden."
 - (2.) "As sings the lark."
 - b. Chorus — "The Pine Tree," Op. 39, No. 3.
 - c. First movement of the Trio in B-flat major, Op. 52.
For piano, violin, and 'cello.
- (8.) Chorus, "Laughing and Crying," . . . Schubert.

For the choruses, Mr. Osgood had expressly trained a mixed choir of fifty sweet, fresh, telling voices, and their execution was remarkably effective and refined. The Benedictus by Gabrieli, composed four years before the death of Palestrina, proved a most exquisite, one might say heavenly piece of purely vocal harmony; the effect of its three beautifully alternating and blending four-part choirs (one of 1st, 2d, and 3d soprano and tenor, one mixed, and one of tenor and 1st, 2d, and 3d bass), was of something so serene, so pure and far above the world, that to hear it was to feel as one may when gazing up into the clear blue sky entirely rapt and lost. Shall it shake this testimony of soul and sense to be told that its beauty is "staid and formal," and that it has but "the interest which attaches to a curiosity?" Mozart's Ave Verum is a well-known gem and model of a more sensuous kind of four-part composition; never had we heard it sung so perfectly before. (Mr. G. W. Sumner took the piano, and Messrs. Allen, Akeroyd, Heindl, and Fries the string accompaniments.) Rheinberger's "May Dew" chorus (words from Uhland), and Rubinstein's to Heine's "Pine-Tree" dreaming of the Palm, are each instinct with fine imaginative feeling, — the music sensitively true to every thought and image of the words. These too were sung with rare grace and delicacy, and with true expression. The quaint, half sad, half playful Schubert chorus, "Laughing and Crying," closed the concert well. In the Thematic Catalogue we find it only as a song, — one of a set of four, which includes the ever beautiful "Du bist die Ruh," remote as possible from this in mood and character!

Mr. Osgood's song selections were of the choicest. The most important was that cycle of eight songs by Schumann, "Woman's Love and Life," which he was the first to sing to us three years ago. Hardly can we conceive of a more delicate or bolder undertaking either for the poet (Chamisso, represented on the programme by Baskerville's translation), or the composer, or the singer. The latter should by good rights be a woman, for the songs describe the most ideal, most absorbing, and most private experience of a woman's life: the first awakening of the tender passion, the worship of "the noblest among all," the dream of blissful union, the calling upon the sisters to help deck her for the wedding, the sad thought of parting from them, the new joy of maternity, and finally the grief of widowhood, the song of despair, like Thekla's "Ich habe gelebt und geliebet!" Schumann's music gives new inwardness and delicacy and fervor to the poetry, which is already remarkable for these qualities, and Mr. Osgood's singing, with Mr. Lang's accompaniment, was worthy of them both. The fervor of the interpretation was unaffected; there was none of the sentimentality which one shrinks from, and the entire expression was refined and chaste. The suite of Spring Songs was happily chosen out of Franz's inexhaustible garden, where the fresh wild flowers and birds of song appear to be perennial. He sang them all in German, while translations by himself and others were printed for the audience. The spirit and the charm of each were finely reproduced both in the singing and in Mr. Lang's accompaniment. The same may be said of the two fine songs by Rubinstein, so different in character, "The Page" ("There was a monarch olden"), a tragical and simple ballad about the "old, old story," and "As sings the lark," which soars to a pitch of uncontrollable ecstasy, in a breathless 12-8 rhythm, and returns to reason in two lines of common time. This last Mr. Osgood sang in English, with irresistible fervor and with powerful crescendo; more than any song it carried his audience away, and had to be repeated.

Of the instrumental numbers, the strangest and most novel, and in some respects most interesting, was the Quartet in B-flat by Saint-Saëns, for piano-forte, violin, viola, and 'cello. The Allegretto has a rather moody, fragmentary character, with a light and airy first theme, mostly in octaves, worked up later with a strong and nervous second theme in triplets, the piano-forte dealing largely in arpeggios. There is originality and brightness in it all. The Andante makes not at all the impression of an Andante on the hearer. For it is in the main a most willful, stubborn movement, full of angry bursts, and rushing, scouring blasts; it is only when occasionally in one or another instrument you hear a bar or two of evenly divided choral melody, that you perceive the movement to be Andante. It is a strange, wild, tempestuous thing. The third movement, a sort of 6-8 Scherzo, crisp and piquant, is genial and highly entertaining; but there is more of the madcap demoniacal than of the fairy fancy in it; what a sullen rage in that long cadenza of the violin, mostly in the low tones, and every note forzando! The finale (Allegro) is a broad, rich movement, leading back into the theme of the Allegretto. Mr. Lang played the piano part superbly, and was ably supported by Messrs. Allen, Heindl, and Wulf Fries. Mr. Lang's interpretation of Liszt's "Bénédiction de Dieu dans la Solitude," was altogether admirable; yet we cannot, after repeated hearings, get over the feeling that the composition is somewhat vague and prolix, in spite of its undeniably serious and noble vein. The movement from the Rubinstein Trio was fine, but suffered from the excess of richness that preceded.

THE CECILIA, in its last concert (May 8) offered a thoroughly delightful entertainment to its usual crowd of associates and friends. It was nothing more nor less than the performance of Mendelssohn's entire music to "A Midsummer Night's Dream," with orchestra, female (fairy) chorus and solos, conducted by Mr. B. J. Lang, and with an admirable reading of the play by Mr. George Riddle, one of the teachers of elocution in Harvard University. This combination gave rare unity and life and charm to the work as a whole. The quality of Mr. Riddle's voice seems naturally light, but clear, elastic, musical, and sympathetic, and his physique is slender; yet he has somehow developed volume and power enough in it to bring out the tearing tragedy and bombast of Nick Bottom in a most palpable and humorous manner; indeed, one wondered how he could roar so much and have any voice at all left for the stately speech of Theseus, the quarrels of Titania and Oberon, the light, delicate, and tricky humor of Puck (which he gave delightfully), and for such marked, true contrast as he made between nearly all the several characters, both farcical and serious and fairy-like. He read, too, with an evident appreciation of all the musical effects; and, as the orchestra was commonly quite up to the mark, and played with just light and shade and proper phrasing, the fitting together of the reading and the picturesque little snatches of "incidental music" was really exquisite. The set orchestral pieces too, — the Overture, Scherzo, Intermezzo, Wedding March, etc., — were beautifully played. Is the boy yet born, perhaps, in this America, who, as boy or man, will give us such an Overture as that? The work for the Cecilia Club itself was slight, being confined wholly to the ladies, and only two songs with chorus for them, namely, "Ye spotted snakes," and that in which the fairies bless the house at the happy conclusion. These choruses were sung most charmingly, as were the song parts by Mrs. Hooper and Miss Gage. Of all the readings with the music of the Mendelssohn-Shakespeare fairy play that we have had, this as a whole was much the most successful.

The fourth Annual Festival of (Episcopal) Parish Choirs took place on Wednesday evening, May 14, and for the first time in the Music Hall. The choirs of twenty-five churches of Boston and its vicinity completely covered the extended platform; and the sonorous mass was very powerful, the voices of the several boy choirs making themselves extremely prominent. Yet there were many sweet and pure, as well as blatant, voices among the boys, and three or four of them, who took part in solos or quartets, sang very beautifully. Mr. S. B. Whitney conducted the performances with marked ability; and Mr. J. C. Warren officiated as organist, generally well, but as it seemed to us with too much fondness for the roar of the full organ; this we felt particularly in the long voluntary while the audience were assembling. Considering what heterogeneous materials had been brought together, without much rehearsal together, the chorus singing was for the most part creditable and quite effective. Could the boy force be tamed down considerably, and more light and shade be introduced throughout, the result would be still better.

The selections on the programme indicated what we presume to be the real object of these festivals, namely, to raise the artistic standard of the musical portion of the church service; to supplant the commonplace and dry, the namby-pamby, sentimental, shallow compositions which have been so much in vogue, by others of more dignity and true expression, conceived and executed in the spirit of true art as well as piety. To a considerable extent this programme realized the aspiration, but not altogether. It was as follows:—

Hymn, "Forth to the fight, ye ransomed," John Heywood.
Te Deum Laudamus C. E. Stephens (in C).
Hymn, "Come unto me, ye weary" Rev. J. B. Dykes.
Anthem, "Oh, taste and see how gracious the Lord is" A. S. Sullivan.
Anthem, "Let us now go even unto Bethlehem" E. J. Hopkins.
Hymn, "O Sacred Head, now wounded," Hans Leo Haasler.
Cantate Domino Sir John Goss (in C).
Anthem, "He that shall endure" Mendelssohn.
Tenth selection of Psalms { S. B. Whitney (in F).
G. A. McFarren (in A).
Rev. Sir F. A. G. Ouseley (in E).
Benedic, anima mea J. C. D. Parker (in E).
Anthem, "God hath appointed a day," Berthold Tours.
Anthem, "The Lord is my Shepherd" Henry Smart.
Hymn, "Nearer, my God, to Thee" A. S. Sullivan.
Anthem, "Sing Praises unto the Lord" C. Gounod.

The first three numbers hardly rose above commonplace. Mr. Sullivan's Anthem has something more like musical invention; and that which succeeded it, by the accomplished organist of the Temple Church in London, Mr. E. J. Hopkins, seemed to us to come still nearer to the idea of chaste and sound religious music. It was strange, and not particularly edifying to hear the profoundly beautiful and tender Lutheran hymn, "O Haupt, voll Blut und Wunden," sung with Hassler's harmony, when it has been harmonized so wonderfully, as we all heard in the Passion Music on Good Friday, by Sebastian Bach; the performance, too, was rather loud and coarse. The Cantate Domino (in unison), by Sir John Goss, was of a brilliant and inspiring character. Of course Mendelssohn's "He that shall endure," from Elijah, was facile princeps among these choral works.

The Psalm chanting, which began the second part, by its monotonous reiterations of the same short sentence, appeared out of place in a concert, where art, not ritual, ought to reign. Mr. Parker's Benedic, anima mea, was decidedly one of the best things of the whole, and gave general satisfaction; clear and strong and musician-like throughout, it is very happy in its fugal close. The anthem by Berthold Tours, full chorus alternating with double quartet of boys and men, was on the whole interesting and striking, though perhaps somewhat rambling and indefinite in form. The rest we were obliged to lose. On the whole, we should think these festivals might be efficacious in bringing about a great reform in the music of the church they represent; nor would the influence be limited to one communion.

APOLLO CLUB.—The third pair of concerts of the eighth season took place in the Boston Music Hall on the evenings of the 15th and 20th inst. For both there was the usual crowded and enthusiastic audience, and on both occasions the splendid body of finely trained male voices, full of esprit de corps, seemed, if that were possible, to surpass their best previous instances of well-nigh perfect execution. It is hardly worth the while to point out wherein this or that special piece was a shade more or less felicitous than others. The first of these concerts had only the director's (Mr. Lang's) piano-forte accompaniment, highly effective so far as that could go. This was the programme:—

Night on the Ocean Brambach.
(With piano accompaniment.)
"Hail, Smiling Morn" Spofforth.
Piano-forte quintet in E-flat Schumann.
Allegro brillante.
(Played by Mr. Lang, Mr. Allen, Mr. Akeroyd, Mr. H. Heindl, and Mr. W. Fries.)
Absence Hatton.
Rhine-Wine Song Liszt.
(With piano accompaniment.)
Spring Matins, Op. 67 Franz Behr.
For tenor solo, quartet, and chorus.
(The solo sung by Mr. J. C. Collins, the quartet by Mr. Want, Mr. Chubbuck, Mr. Harlow, and Mr. Babcock; with piano accompaniment.)
Evening Scene Debois.
Piano-forte quintet, in E-flat Schumann.
Finale.
Serenade—"Slumber, dear one" Mendelssohn.
Song, "Ho, pretty page" B. J. Lang.
The words from Thackeray's poem.
(Song by Mr. J. F. Winch.)
Hunting Song Abt.
Morning Rubinstein.
(With piano accompaniment.)

The two noblest choral pieces were those at the beginning and the end, especially that by Rubinstein, "Morning," whose elaborate piano-forte prelude and accompaniment suggested the intended orchestral instrumentation which it afterwards received. The two brilliant things were the once well-worn glee by Spofforth, which renewed its youth, sung with such precision, yet such spirit and abandon, and Liszt's fiery Rhine-wine song, — a kind of thing in which Liszt is wont to be peculiarly happy and original. Abt's "Hunting Song" is brilliant, too, but comparatively commonplace. The tender, sentimental strains by Hatton and Debois called for and received the most refined and delicate expression, and of course won their way to the common heart. "Spring Matins," by Franz Behr, is an elaborate composition of considerable beauty, but hardly such as haunts one when the sounds have ceased. The Mendelssohn Serenade is one of the most sincerely musical and inward of his for a long time unrivaled part-songs.

Mr. Lang's setting of Thackeray's "Ho, pretty page," catches and reproduces the fine pathetic humor of the verses, and is a fresh, genial, fascinating bit of music. As sung by Mr. Winch it took the audience almost off their feet, and had to be repeated. The two movements from Schumann's Quintet, capably well played as they were, could not, of course, sound there as they do in a smaller room; the piano-forte tells well enough, but the strings, having to bear on so hard to overcome the great space, sounded somewhat dry and forced; yet all was clear; and the warm reception of such instrumental chamber music by an Apollo audience was a cheerful sign of progress.

The last concert had the great advantage of a full orchestral accompaniment in seven of its twelve numbers. These were: (1) Brambach's "Night on the Ocean;" (2) Recitative and Air from Sullivan's "Prodigal Son," sung by J. F. Winch (for these two we arrived too late, thanks to apple-blossom season and the open horse-cars); (3) Chorus of Dervishes from the Ruins of Athens; (4) The Roman "Song of Triumph," by Max Bruch; (5) Vintagers' Song, from Mendelssohn's Loreley; (6) "Morning," by Rubinstein. Besides which, the orchestra also played Beethoven's Turkish March, and two movements (Scherzo and Andante) from Gade's first (C minor) Symphony. In all, the orchestra, with Mr. Allen as Vorgeiger, won the general approbation. Rubinstein's "Morning" gained immensely by such accompaniment; the instrumentation in itself proved almost as interesting as a Symphony, and the work as a whole is one of his most genial, original, and strong creations. The other numbers repeated from the former concert, without orchestra, were "Hail, smiling Morn," Debois's "Evening Scene," Mendelssohn's Serenade, and Abt's Hunting Song. The new pieces were:—

(a.) Recitative and air from "The Prodigal Son," "Bring forth the Best Robe" Sullivan.
(Sung by Mr. J. F. Winch.)
(b.) Chorus of Dervishes from the "Ruins of Athens," "Twas thou, beneath thy sleeve-fold hiding" Beethoven.
(c.) Turkish March from the same work, for Orchestra Beethoven.
(d.) Song of Triumph Max Bruch.
(e.) Scherzo and Andante from the Symphony in C minor Gade.
(f.) Vintage Song from the "Loreley" Mendelssohn.

Altogether this was a very richly varied, noble programme. Beethoven's Dervish Chorus was sung and played with the greatest verve and furor, and received with uncontrollable applause, which nothing else except the equally wonderful, imaginative Turkish March could satisfy. Bruch's Song of Triumph, "Hail, O Cæsar!" is something almost overwhelming in its martial and barbaric pomp, and its terrible suggestion of the blood-thirsty conquering crowd, the captives in procession and the lion hungry for them in the arena. How many times we might care to hear it we will not surmise; but there is startling power in it for once at least. The "Vintage Song" went capably, both orchestra and chorus.

This concert made a proud finale for another season of the Club.

We are still in arrears with our record as to numerous concerts, including that of Miss Selma Borz, with her interesting programme of Finnish and other Northern music, old and modern, in which she herself conducted the orchestra. We must wait for room.

MUSICAL CORRESPONDENCE.

PROVIDENCE, R. I., APRIL 19. — The third and fourth concerts of the "Cecilia" took place on the evenings of March 18 and April 1, as follows:—

Third Concert. — Artists: Mrs. E. Humphrey-Allen, Soprano. Beethoven Quartette Club (Messrs. Allen, Akeroyd, Heindl, and Fries), and Messrs. Alex. Heindl, Contra Bass; Ernst Weber, clarinet; Paul Eltz, Bassoon; Edward Schormann, Horn. — Programme:—
Septet, First Part Beethoven.
Concert Aria. Op. 94, "Infelice" Mendelssohn.
Violin Solos. (a.) Air (4th string) Bach-Wilhelmj.
(b.) Gavotte in D. Vieuxtemps.
Quintet, Mozart.
For Clarinet and String Quartet.
Songs: (a.) "Beauteous Cradle," Schumann.
(b.) "Why should I Wander" Schumann.
Quartet, No. 3. Haydn.
Theme and Variations (Austrian Hymn).
Song, "The Chorister," Sullivan.
With accompaniment of Piano, Violin, and Cello.
Septet, Second Part Beethoven.
Fourth Concert. — Artists: Mr. M. W. Whitney, Bass; Mr. William Sherwood, and Mr. H. G. Hanchett, Pianists. The Beethoven Quartette Club with Mr. Alex. Heindl, in the place of Mr. Fries, who was necessarily absent. Programme:—
Concerto, No. 1, C minor Bach.
For two Pianos and String Quartet.
Allegro, Adagio, Rondo.
Aria, "Per questa bella mano" Mozart.
Piano Solos. (a.) Ballade in A-flat, Op. 47, Chopin.
(b.) Toccata di Concerto, Op. 36 Dupont.
Mr. Sherwood.
Quartet, Op. 17, No. 3 in F Rubinstein.
Allegro Moderato ma con moto, — Scherzo, — Andante non troppo, Allegro Assai.
Songs. (a.) "A Rider through the Valley Rode," Franz.
(b.) "The Two Grenadiers" Schumann.
Duet. Two Pianos, "Les Preludes," a Symphonic Poem Liszt.
Song. "A Mariner's House by the Sea" Randegger.
Selection from Quartet, Op. 18, No. 2 Beethoven.
Allegro molto quasi presto.

The Septet is too well known either in its original form or in piano four-hand arrangements to require much notice. As a whole it was remarkably well given. The instruments blended finely. Instances of individual success may be mentioned in the case of Mr. Weber in the clarinet solo in the Adagio; Mr. Schormann in the horn solo in the same movement, where his tone was particularly smooth, rich, and pure, and the crescendo very effective; Mr. Allen in the violin part; and Mr. Fries with the 'cello, especially in the Adagio and the Trio of the Scherzo. In the third variation of the Tema the contrasts between the two reeds, clarinet and bassoon, were very finely brought out by both artists. The phrasing was throughout that of artists; the lights and shades and the marks of expression, so numerous with Beethoven, were carefully observed.

The Quintet by Mozart is a work of sterling merit, but rarely heard, and is a fine specimen of his best style. The combination of instruments is a happy one; and the players were in full sympathy with one another. Mr. Weber's tone was especially fine; we have never heard a better; his execution was clear and his phrasing artistic.

The movement from the "Kaiser" Quartet was very acceptable. The beautiful hymn and its matchless variations will ever remain among the finest specimens and purest models of quartet writing. Haydn is always happy and genial even in his more sober moods.

Mr. Allen's solos were remarkably well rendered. We can never tire of the wonderful and inexpressibly beautiful air from Bach's Orchestral Suite in D; nor do we seriously object, as some have done, to Wilhelmj's arrangement. It makes a very effective solo piece, and besides brings the composition within the knowledge of many who would otherwise never make its acquaintance. We have heard Mr. Allen play this arrangement several times before, but think he surpassed any previous performance in the rendering he gave us this time. The accompaniment for muted strings formed a delicate yet sufficient background to the solo. The Gavotte by Vieuxtemps was a contrast to the Bach air, — quaint, in some places possibly a little ugly, — but full of the genuine gavotte spirit.

Mrs. Allen sang the trying and difficult "Infelice" with good success. We thought there might have been more dramatic fervor and passion in parts of it. The accompaniment must have been a very fair suggestion of the orchestra. There were eight instruments: quintet of strings, clarinet, horn, and bassoon. The two Schumann songs were delightfully given. But why alter two notes in the "Schöne Wiege"? How expressive Schumann's accompaniments are! Mr. Bonner played them in a thoroughly musician-like manner. In response to a hearty encore, Mrs. Allen sang Taubert's "My Darling was so Fair," the rendering of which does not seem capable of improvement. Sullivan's "Chorister" gave great pleasure. Gounod's "Serenade," was given as an encore.

The fourth concert opened with a concerto for two pianos and string quartet by Bach, which was entirely new to us. It is a strong work, and, to those who had, by a study of Bach in other works, come prepared for it, the composition must have proved a pleasant and profitable surprise. The opening Allegro is earnest and spirited. The Adagio, with a sort of 'cello obligato, the rest of the strings pizzicato for the most of the time, is perhaps the best part of the work. Here it seems to us is the real "unendliche Melodie" so much talked of by the "School of the Future." All moves on so smooth and flowing and comes from a seemingly inexhaustible fountain. The Rondo was quite brilliant and brought the whole work to a fitting conclusion.

Mr. Sherwood's solos were rendered in a manner entirely consonant with his reputation. We were glad of the opportunity of hearing him after reading so much about him, and hearing so much from friends who had enjoyed his playing. His conception and rendering of the Chopin Ballade seemed to us very refined and poetical; although we have heard contrary views expressed. All agree that the execution was well-nigh perfect. The Dupont Toccata gave him a chance to exhibit his fine technique, besides being in itself a work of merit. The Chopin, however, seemed to us to be his work for that evening, leaving the Bach out of consideration.

The "Preludes," in the author's own arrangement, were given as well as it is possible to give orchestral music on a piano. The arrangement itself is superbly done; but the tone and coloring, both so important in a work of this kind, are unavoidably and necessarily lost. The work itself, too, seems out of place, no matter how well done, on such a programme. Why could they not have given us the Andante and Variations by Schumann, or the Chopin Rondo, works of much greater intrinsic merit than the "Preludes"?

The quartet playing was especially fine, though perhaps not better than at the previous concerts. The Rubinstein Quartet was a new work to us, and we must say we like it very much. It is throughout characteristic of its author, though reminding us now and then of Schumann. The opening Allegro was full of beautiful melody, soaring high in the first violin over the fine accompaniment of the other instruments. The Scherzo (we suppose this to be the title of the movement; it was accidentally omitted on the programme) was wild and rapid, interrupted by a beautiful passage of quiet harmony, after the manner of Schumann, then resuming its breathless haste and fury. The Andante was very much enjoyed. The writer overheard several remarks in its favor as we were passing out at the close of the concert. The impression was that it was the best part of the work. It was beautifully played. The finale was full of fire and vigor. The spirit of the composer seemed here almost to get the mastery of him; and at the close, which is very brilliant, he seemed almost to need more instruments to express his thought. The work abounds in solo passages for the 'cello, which were finely rendered by Mr. Heindl.

The selection from Beethoven's quartet was a fitting close to the concert and the series. How many fine touches there are in that last movement! Beethoven must have been happy for a little while when he wrote that.

Mr. Whitney added much to the success of the occasion by his fine rendering of the songs. He was in splendid voice, and his selections were in thorough harmony with the rest of the programme. The Mozart Aria was splendidly given. The Franz song was entirely new, as was also the encore piece, "Swift fades the land I love." We never heard Mr. Whitney do better than he did in the "Zwei Grenadiere" of Schumann. It was simply magnificent. Words cannot describe it. Heine's poem means to us much more than it ever did before, and to accomplish such a result is praise enough for any artist.

The Sailor Song by Randegger and the encore, "It is no Dream" (author unknown to writer), completed the songs. It is needless to say both were given in Mr. Whitney's best style.

The "Cecilia" have given us as fine a series of concerts this season as it was ever our fortune to attend. In conclusion let us express the hope that the organization will be permanent, and that it will annually provide a series of concerts for the musical portion of the citizens of Providence as entertaining and instructive as has been that of the present season. The influence for good of such music cannot be estimated.

A. G. L.

NEWPORT, R. I.

PHILADELPHIA, MAY 17. — Frequent annual benefit concerts have been given by our resident musicians, but with one invariable result: "Profit and Loss" debit to "Cash." Mr. C. H. Jarvis has closed his interesting series of classical concerts with great eclat; he has proved himself this season to be fully entitled to be classed among the best artists of the period. Mr. S. T. Straug is playing a second series of Organ Recitals with more popular programmes, but his forte evidently is the classical style.

Gilmore's Band gave three concerts, with a meagre support from the public, notwithstanding the popular and high-priced artists assisting him. The Hess Opera Company presented Masset's "Paul and Virginia" for two nights, but it failed to make any impression owing mainly to the very indifferent rendering of the principal rôles by the soprano and tenor, whose voices seem to be entirely worn by excessive work. The composition is a fair specimen of French work of the period.

Mr. Carl Gaertner made an interesting exhibition of his studies of his pupils, and was warmly complimented for their skill. Mr. Richard Zeckmer made a like occasion very enjoyable to his friends and admirers. Mr. J. Remington Fairbank produced, under great difficulties, his enlarged opera "Valerie," which, from causes apart from the quality of the music, which is good, made a fiasco. Great sympathy was felt and expressed for him.

The Peabody Orchestra, under Ager Hamerik, from Baltimore, gave two concerts on 14th inst., and were well received. Mme. Auerbach made a profound impression by her performance of Concerto, Op. 11, by Chopin, and Concerto in E-flat, by Beethoven, in which she was ably assisted by the orchestra, the accompaniments being played with more judgment and taste than within the recollection of AMERICUS.

CHICAGO, MAY 16. As the season closes for the larger musical entertainments a number of piano-forte recitals, chamber concerts, and the yearly receptions of the leading teachers to their advanced pupils claim, not only our attention, but in many cases our sincere admiration. For these chamber concerts do much for the advancement of a love for the art, by showing that the noble compositions of the classical and worthy modern composers are within reach of the home life of the people. All culture should have its best encouragement within the home.

In this connection it pleases me to notice what has been done by a small club of sincere musicians during the past season toward familiarizing our people with the beautiful string quartets, quintets, and trios of the masters. Mr. Lewis (violin), Mr. Rosenbecker (violin), Mr. Eichheim (violin), Mr. Kurth (viola), and Miss Ingersoll (piano-forte), compose the organization. The afternoon I heard them they gave the Trio of Schubert, Op. 100, Quartet No. 12 of Mozart, and a Quintet of Raff. They were assisted by Mrs. Stacy, who sang songs of Schubert, Rubinstein, and Randegger. The playing was very enjoyable, and indicated a sincere intention on the part of the performers to bring out the beauty of the music, as well as to give an honest interpretation of the composers' works. I am glad to state these concerts are to be continued another season, and I trust they will have the large circle of admirers they so richly merit.

On Monday evening last Miss Amy Fay began a series of three concerts, which gave the musical public an opportunity to hear her in an extended programme. At the first performance she had the assistance of Mme. Salvotti, vocalist, Miss Mantey, violinist, and a male quartet. Miss Fay played: Bourée, in A minor, Bach; Gavotte, by Gluck; "Des Abends," Schumann; Ballade, G minor, Chopin; "Spinning Song" from Flying Dutchman, Wagner — Liszt; and "Ländlicher Reigen," by Kullak. At her second concert she had the assistance of Miss Grace Hiltz, vocalist, Miss Mantey, and the Ladies' Quartette. Her important numbers were: Sonata in D, Op. 28, Beethoven; Improvisu, Op. 112, Schubert; with smaller selections from Mendelssohn, Liszt, Raff, Jensen, and an old Gigue by Hissler. It is with sincere regret that I cannot speak of Miss Fay's playing with that admiration which I had hoped to be able to express. From what I had heard of her accomplishments, her culture, and her splendid opportunity for study under the most celebrated masters of Europe, I had looked forward to hearing her with the expectation of great pleasure. While her playing in some of the numbers indicated the intelligent musician, on the whole her performance was disappointing. There was a lack of that repose, that balance of power that should stamp the performance of the great artist. In the Chopin Ballade her interpretation was hardly of that poetic character which the lovely music of this writer seems to demand; and, indeed, at times her playing was extremely faulty. In the second concert her playing was much better than before, and in the Beethoven Sonata, the Raff, and Liszt selections she did some brilliant work. The possession of a nervous organization may account for that lack of a full command of her powers, — so necessary to the success of a concert player. Without an adequate control it would be extremely difficult for even a person of remarkable talent and fine powers to win universal approbation as a public performer. Unfortunately Miss Fay played upon a very poor piano-forte of the Weber make, which was a serious drawback to a finished performance.

Last evening I had the gratification of hearing a piano-forte recital by Mr. Wm. H. Sherwood, of Boston, who performed the following numbers: Etudes Symphoniques, Op. 13, Schumann; Fantasia in C minor, Bach; Gigue of Mozart; Sonata by Scarlatti; Ballade, Op. 47, Etude, Op. 25, No. 7, and Polonaise, Op. 53, of Chopin; Barcarole, Op. 123, Kullak; "Wedding March," Grieg; "Dervish Chorus" of Beethoven, arranged by Saint-Saëns; "Mephisto Waltz," Liszt; Rhapsodie Hongroise, No. 6, Liszt; and, with Mr. Lewis, the variations and finale from the "Kreutzer Sonata" of Beethoven. This recital was the first of a series of three, all of which present programmes of equal magnitude.

In the playing of Mr. Sherwood one recognizes at once the true artist. Possessing a seemingly faultless technique; a sympathetic touch, capable of every variety of expression, from the most delicate tenderness to extremely wonderful displays of power, he has everything to fit him to give splendid interpretations of the piano-forte works of the masters. Throughout the whole range of his programme, embracing as it did such a number of different and trying compositions, there was a uniform excellence of performance, while each work received that careful interpretation which only a conscientious artist could give. I have not heard the "Etudes Symphoniques" of Schumann more perfectly played since Rubinstein gave them. The grand finale came out with a wonderful power, while the contrasts in the music were displayed with a marked fidelity to the composer's intention. In the Polonaise of Chopin, Op. 53, he met the composer in his heroic mood, and gave a most enjoyable performance of this splendid work. The two long crescendos which occur in the composition were given with a better idea of gradations in tone than I have ever heard before. In the Etude he found this poetical composer in a more tender and delicate mood, and his interpretation was marked with great refinement. In the Liszt Rhapsodie, its weird effects, many contrasts, and wonderful difficulties were performed with astonishing brilliancy. Yet it seems to me that when the fire of youth has been tempered by a wider experience, and his talent has had time to ripen to its fullest perfection, there will be shades of a deeper feeling in his tone-painting than at present mark his interpretations, no matter how faultless they are in point of execution. Perhaps then some of the melodies of the old masters will be given with a hallowed feeling, and the soul of art may inspire him to greater tenderness. Of his other recitals in my next. C. H. B.

MILWAUKEE, WIS., MAY 12. Mr. W. S. B. Mathews, of Chicago, gave three illustrated lectures here April 25 and 26, the topics and programmes of which I give below. The illustrations were played by Miss Lydia S. Harris, assisted by two of our local amateur singers, Mrs. A. W. Hall and Miss Lizzie Murphy, who did themselves credit.

First Lecture: Three Great Epochs. Illustrations. 1. The Old Classical. 1750:

Bach. Prelude and Fugue in C sharp; Gavottes in D and D minor.

Handel. Aria, "Angels ever Bright and Fair" (Mrs. A. W. Hall).

2. Classical. 1800.

Beethoven. Sonata, "Moonlight," Op. 27.

3. Modern Romantic. 1850.

Schumann. Fantasia Pieces, Op. 73. ("At Evening," "Soaring," "Why," "Whims.")

Mendelssohn. "Spring Song" (Mrs. A. W. Hall).

Chopin. Andante Spianato and Polonaise, Op. 22.

Liszt. Second Hungarian Rhapsody. (With Rivé Cadenza.)

Second Lecture: Modern Romantic School.

Bach. Prelude and Fugue in C minor. ("Clavier," No. 2.)

Schumann. Etudes Symphoniques, Op. 13. (Theme, Variations I, II, III, VI, IX., and Finale.)

Chopin. Fantasia Impromptu in C sharp, Op. 66; Scherzo in B-flat minor, Op. 31.
Schumann. Romanes in F-sharp, Op. 28; Novelette, in E, Op. 21, No. 7.
Liszt. Grand Polonaise Heroique Ein; Schubert's "Wanderer;" Gounod's "Faust."
 Third Lecture: The Piano-forte as a Musical Instrument.
Beethoven. Sonata Appassionata, Op. 57.
Mendelssohn. Song, "The First Violet" (Miss Lizzie Murphy).
Beethoven. Concerto in C minor. (First movement with Reinecke's Cadenza.) Orchestral part on second piano by Mr. W. S. B. Mathews.
Chopin. Concerto in E minor, Op. 11.
Schumann. Song, "Er der herrlichste von allen" (Miss Lizzie Murphy).
Liszt—Wagner. 1812. "March from Tannhäuser."

Mr. Mathews's treatment of his topics was very clear and forcible, putting the salient points into the most compact and effective form, aiming mainly at giving the auditors the proper standpoint from which to listen. I found it a very rare pleasure to hear three such admirable programmes, accompanied by just the right sort and amount of comment and criticism; and I am sure these lectures and recitals had rare educational value.

Miss Harris is a pupil of Mr. Mathews, and has received hardly any instruction from any other teacher. Her fine, clear, powerful technique, her excellent phrasing, her style and interpretation, all give evidence that she has been carefully, thoroughly, and intelligently taught. She is, to be sure, a pupil of unusual gifts. I regard her, in fact, as possessing talent which is likely to give her a place among the very first pianists, and as being already a genuine artist, though not yet mature; but I know few teachers who could have done for her what Mr. Mathews has done in the comparatively short time during which she has taken lessons. It would require too much space to attempt to criticize her playing of particular compositions, but I will say that I found her playing of the most trying compositions on her programme quite as satisfactory as any of her work. For instance, the Sonata Appassionata, the Etudes Symphoniques, the Liszt Polonaise in E, and the E minor Concerto of Chopin, she played in a way which I think would have won hearty applause and encouragement from the composers themselves. In sober truth, I think there are very few professional pianists in this country who could have given three such programmes in so thoroughly interesting, artistic, and sincere a way. At least, few such pianists visit Milwaukee.

The 262d concert of the Musical Society had for its programme the symphony from Mendelssohn's Hymn of Praise, and about half of Friedrich Kiel's oratorio Christus. The latter is a very learned and skillfully written work, but I have not been able to find a trace of genius in it. The chorus did it respectably, but not finely. There is always a lack of precision in the singing of this chorus, and a general slouchiness, which betokens imperfect discipline. It is strange, that with the example of the Arion Club before their eyes, they should actually go into a concert with so difficult a work as Christus, after only four rehearsals under the director's baton, at two of which hardly more than half the singers were present. At the ordinary rehearsals the conductor plays the piano, and the singers look at their music. Of course when the conductor does begin using his stick it is too late to get control of his forces. The result is a lamentable absence of precision and vigor in attack, and of clearness in outline. I am glad to be able to add that the performance of the Symphony was the most finished playing I have yet heard from this orchestra.

Prof. Mickler was presented with two beautiful baskets of flowers and a silver laurel wreath, an attention due, I suppose, to the fact that he is about to withdraw from his post of director. J. C. F.

NOTES AND GLEANINGS.

LONDON. The Academy (May 10), says: "The novelties at last Saturday's Crystal Palace concert were, as so frequently happens, placed at the end of the programme; but on this occasion no ground is afforded for animadversion, inasmuch as the concert was commendably brief. Wagner's Siegfried-Idyll for orchestra was written in 1871, when the poet-composer was engaged on the Nibelung tetralogy. The circumstance of its composition was kept a profound secret from Mme. Wagner until her birthday, when she was serenaded with the work, the performers being placed on the staircase of Wagner's residence at Triebach. It is not, therefore, surprising to find that the score is but small, containing only one flute, one oboe, two clarinets, one bassoon, two horns, one trumpet, and strings; and it would be unfair to judge of the composition as other than a pièce d'occasion. Considered thus it is a charming little work, and is valuable as showing what so consummate a master of orchestration as Wagner can accomplish with but limited means. Of the four themes, three are taken from the magnificent love-duet in the third act of Siegfried, and the fourth is an old German Wiegenslied, 'Schlaf, Kindlein, schlaf.' These themes are blended very expressively, the character of the piece being dreamy and meditative throughout, and suggestive rather of delicate tenderness than vigor. The Spring overture of Goetz cannot be considered one of his best productions. The ideas are not remarkable for freshness, and the treatment seems labored rather than spontaneous. The work was not deemed worthy of any comment or analysis in the programme. Beethoven's Symphony in F, and Mendelssohn's piano-forte concerto in D minor, — the last-named work played by Mme. Moutigny-Rémaury, — completed the list of instrumental items. The vocalists were Mdlle. Friedländer — who appeared in place of Frau Schuch-Frocks — and Mr. W. T. Carleton, a baritone with an excellent voice."

UNDER the title of The Story of Mozart's Requiem, Dr. W. Pole has just published (Novello, Ewer & Co.) a most interesting little book containing the whole of the ascertained facts as to the much-disputed authenticity of this remarkable work. The whole narrative is so extraordinary as to read more like a romance than a history; yet Dr. Pole has stated nothing which cannot be clearly established. All musicians who have studied the subject will agree in the conclusions at which the author arrives. Dr. Pole's style is extremely clear, and the book is a thoroughly readable one, and will interest others besides professional musicians. A fac-simile of the first page of Mozart's autograph gives additional value to the little volume.

THE Neue Zeitschrift für Musik announces that Johannes Brahms has set portions of Ossian's Fingal for chorus and orchestra. The appearance of the work will be awaited with interest, for such a subject would doubtless be especially congenial to the composer.

M. GOUNOD, the composer, says that he makes it a principle not to trouble himself about works that are once finished, and to absorb himself entirely in those which are in course of execution. He declares that his opera of Hélène et Abelard is an incarnation of the most exalted philosophical and religious ideas. Though a Roman Catholic, Gounod is said to be a great admirer of the German Reformation, and he intends his Abelard to personify the struggle of conscience against the laws of the Church and the defense of the rights of spiritual liberty and civilization. The culminating point of the action of the opera is in the fourth act, where Abelard burns his books under the eyes of the Ecclesiastical Tribunal. Then as he is returning home he is attacked in an obscure street and murdered. In the fifth act his ghost appears to Hélène surrounded by nuns in the cloister.

MR. ARTHUR SULLIVAN and Mr. W. S. Gilbert are assuredly coming to this country in the autumn to attend to the production of their new comic opera. An entire company is to be formed in London for the representation of the piece. Mr. Gilbert will arrange all the details of stage management, and Mr. Sullivan will conduct the orchestra at the opening performance. — N. Y. Tribune.

MR. WILLIAM H. SHERWOOD will hold a Normal Musical Institute at Canandaigua, N. Y., for five weeks this summer. Among his faculty will be Mme. Cappiani; Mr. H. Clarence Eddy, organist; Mr. W. Popper, 'cello; Mr. Harry Wheeler, vocal physiology; Mr. Narcisse Cyr, French language and literature; Mr. H. G. Hanchett, pianist and business manager.

CINCINNATI SAENGERFEST. — The twenty-first annual meeting of the North American Saengerbund will be held at Music Hall in this city, June 11th to the 15th, inclusive. Extensive preparations are being made to render it one of the most successful gatherings ever held in the United States. The chorus, which has been rehearsing for the past year in this and other cities, will number nearly 2,000 voices, each society having been subjected to a rigid examination before being admitted. The instrumental music will be furnished by the great organ and an orchestra of over 100 pieces, all under the leadership of Professor Carl Barus. The prominent choral numbers on the programme are the oratorio of St. Paul, Verdi's Requiem Mass, Rubinstein's Paradise Lost, and selections from Wagner's Flying Dutchman, and Goldmark's Queen of Sheba. The soloists engaged are as follows: Sopranos, Mme. Otto Alvensleben, of Dresden, Saxony, recommended by Carl Reinecke, Leipzig, Miss Emma Heckle, and Mrs. Flora Mueller; alto, Miss Emma Cranch and Miss Louise Holtwagen; tenors, Mr. H. Alex. Bischoff and Christian Fritsch, of New York; baritone, Franz Remmert, of New York; basso, Myron W. Whitney, of Boston; organist, George E. Whitney. The societies taking part in the chorus are from Cincinnati, Chicago, St. Louis, Cleveland, Milwaukee, Louisville, Indianapolis, Detroit, Columbus, and other Western cities.

VIENNA. The programme of the last Philharmonic Concert for the season comprised Schumann's overture to Manfred, Beethoven's C minor Symphony, a Prelude and Fugue by Hugo Reinhold, and Liszt's Concerto in E-flat major, played by Mdlle. Martha Remmert. Of the last-named work Dr. E. Hanflick writes in the Neue freie Presse: —

"The E-flat major Concerto exhibits Liszt as a composer in the most agreeable light. The piano was said to be the true source whence he derives his most original and best qualities; for him the piano is what mother earth was to the mythological giant Anteus. How little and almost unpretentious does this Concerto appear compared with the Gran Mass we recently heard, — and yet how much more complete in itself, how much more true, more sterling, and more satisfactory it is! Here idea and form agree, and the means employed correspond with the clearly recognized goal. Even many a baroque and false little bit of ornament (as in the finale) seen under such mundane drawing-room illumination appears effective or at least acceptable. We here have Liszt in his best strength and in his best style; he may be allowed something apart and unusual in the department of which he is the modern ruler. But it is impossible to grant him the same privileges in the sacred style; the charter of a genial subjectivity is greatly restricted in the service of general devotion. Granted that Wagner's reforms are necessary and advantageous to opera — are they, therefore, necessarily so for sacred music? Even for minds with seven-league boots it is still a pretty good step from the Mount of Venus to Mount Calvary. It is frequently said as an excuse for certain village masses, remarkable for their want of intellect and originality, that God cares more for heart than for music. The same principle must apply to masses which suffer from a luxuriant surplussage of intellect and originality. The Almighty will assuredly be as highly pleased with the Gran Mass — since Liszt is said to have 'prayed rather than composed' it — as with the country masses of the most pious schoolmaster. We poor mortals of musicians would, it is true, prefer neither one nor the other. We believe, indeed, in our simplicity, that the E-flat major Concerto will outlive the Gran Mass. After the 'Ungarische Rhapsodien,' which we consider the best things Liszt has written — perhaps because he did not only 'compose' (and still less 'pray') but also play them — and, after these genial gypsy-pieces, we feel inclined to award the E-flat major Concerto the first place among his compositions. Since he has no longer unfortunately performed them himself, he has, by liberal instruction, taken care that young talent should learn to play them in his spirit, as far, at least, as teaching and learning will allow. But in how many cases of much-belauded 'young talent' can we perceive only the youth without the talent! Young pianists, female as well as male, from all parts of the world fly to Liszt, like swarms of wasps to a sweet tart. Every one who has tasted only a single atom of the latter immediately feels the holy spirit within him, and hums about the world an ennobled insect, as 'a pupil of Liszt's' (second degree: 'a favorite pupil'), though the world most ungratefully fails to discover the slightest flavor of the wonderful tart. To the lady pianists who have really studied Liszt's style with advantage, belongs Mdlle. Martha Remmert. Of tall and vigorous figure, this young lady when at the piano is especially a 'Starkspielelerin' ('strong player'), as people used to say in the days of Mozart and those of Beethoven. All the octave passages and chord leaps were so hammered and Remmerted that they were really quite grand. Fortunately, Mdlle. Remmert understands, also, the opposite; in the piano passages she possesses the art of fluttering lightly and softly over the keys. We can conscientiously praise her, though we hope she will in time gain repose and natural feeling; her rendering of the Concerto was brilliant, but not free from affectation; any one not hearing the latter night, at any rate, see it in numerous especially genial tactical processes. She was tumultuously applauded and repeatedly recalled."

"Cherubino," of the London Figaro, writes (May 10):

"I have before me the outline programmes for the forthcoming Birmingham Musical Festival, and I must confess they show a serious falling off from the schemes of days gone by. They include, for the morning of August 26, The Elijah; for the evening, Max Bruch's 'The Lay of the Bell,' and a miscellaneous concert; August 27, morning, Rossini's Moses in Egypt; evening, a miscellaneous concert and a Symphony; August 28, morning, The Messiah; evening, M. Saint-Saens' 'The Lyre and the Harp,' and a miscellaneous selection; and August 29, morning, Cherubini's 'Requiem,' and Mendelssohn's 'Lobgesang'; and evening, Handel's Israel in Egypt. That this scheme, superior as it is to those of the ordinary run of Musical Festivals of the present day, is worthy of Birmingham, nobody will, I believe, be able to admit. The committee have, doubtless, found it difficult to induce a foreign musician of eminence to write a new work for Birmingham; and they seem, when they were rebuffed by the chief foreign composers, to have sat down in their chairs and to have resigned themselves to their hard fate. Recollecting the failure of their attempt to bring into further prominence the work of a fashionable songwriter, they fancied that the race of British composers was bounded on the north and south by aristocracy, on the east by opulence, and on the west by patronage, entirely forgetting that we have amongst us a band of able, if not very wealthy, art workers who, had Birmingham the courage to afford them the opportunity, would be able to give a very good account of themselves against any of their foreign compeers. The fact is that Birmingham, politically one of the most democratic of towns, is, as to its Festival, one of the most finically exclusive.

THE four days' musical festival at Pittsburgh will begin May 28. The Messiah, Elijah, and Verdi's Requiem will be sung, and in addition there will be an afternoon concert, in which the children of the public schools will take part. The following quartet of soloists is engaged: Miss Abby Whinnery, Miss Ita Welch, Mr. William Courtney, and Mr. M. W. Whitney.

BOSTON, JUNE 7, 1879.

CONTENTS.

SANZIO. Stuart Sterne	89
BENEDICTA AT THE HEIGHT OF HIS PRODUCTIVITY (1807-9). Translations from Thayer's Third Volume. II.	90
BERLIOZ'S MUSICAL CREED	91
LETTERS FROM AN ISLAND. I. Vassar College. Fanny Raymond Ritter	92
TALES ON ART: SECOND SERIES. From Instructions of Mr. Wm. M. Hunt to his Pupils. VII.	93
SOME THOUGHTS ON MUSICAL EDUCATION. I. William F. Athorp	93
A CORRECTION	94
CONCHATS	94
Warren A. Locke's Concert. — Miss Selma Borg's Con- cert. — T. P. Currier's Concert.	95
MUSICAL CORRESPONDENCE	96
Baltimore. — Cincinnati. — Chicago.	96
NOTES AND GLEANINGS	96

All the articles not credited to other publications were expressly written for this Journal.

Published fortnightly by Houghton, Osgood and Company, 220 Devonshire Street, Boston. Price, 10 cents a number; $2.50 per year.

For sale in Boston by CARL PRUEFER, 30 West Street, A. WILLIAMS & Co., 283 Washington Street, A. K. LORING, 369 Washington Street, and by the Publishers; in New York by A. BRENTANO, JR., 39 Union Square, and Houghton, Osgood & Co., 21 Astor Place; in Philadelphia by W. U. BOKER & Co., 1102 Chestnut Street; in Chicago by the CHICAGO MUSIC COMPANY, 612 State Street.

SANZIO.

BY STUART STERNE, AUTHOR OF "ANGELO."

(Continued from page 81.)

OLD Nina waited long in vain, next day,
For her young master, at the morning meal.
Past doubt he had again, as was his wont
Too often, — ah, he labored far too hard!
And shaking her gray head she sadly sighed, —
Arisen with the sun and early lark,
And stolen to his work, where, brush in hand,
He never thought of rest, or sleep, or food,
Unless she summoned him.

So she crept up
And tapped upon the door of his great work room,
Then opened and slipped in — he was not there —
And so passed to his chamber just beyond;
Nay, nor here either: — nor yet anywhere
About the whole wide mansion could be found,
Where Nina, calling out his name, sought him
Through all the empty, silent, sounding halls.
For Sanzio long ere this was far away,
Speeding across the plain and through the wood,
Back o'er the path traversed but yester eve.
He paused not to salute the sun, drink in
The freshness of the beautiful morning, bent
But on the execution of a dream
That in the long hours of the wakeful night
Had ripened to a firm and fixed resolve.
Only his horse, feeling the velvet turf
Beneath his hoof again, threw back his head,
Snuffed the sweet air with wide dilating nostrils,
And whinnied loud. And Sanzio's heart rejoiced
At the good omen. "Why, a Persian prince
Had won his kingdom thus!" he smiling thought;
"May the kind gods favor my cause like his!"
And gayly cried, "Well done, well done, my friend!"
Clapping his steed's sleek neck, and urging him
Still fast and faster forward, while the horse
Whinnied again, and as with winged feet
Flew o'er the ground.

Thus rose to view ere long
The well-remembered clearing in the woods,
Where a gnarled apple-tree, its branches hid
Beneath a snowy cloud of tinted blossoms,
Threw out its shadow far and wide. And here
Sanzio leaped lightly down, and left the horse
To browse at will among the grass, while he Stole toward the house in eager haste, on foot;
But at a little distance he suddenly
He spell-bound paused, and stood immovable
At sight of her his hungry eyes had craved,
Through yearning hours, to feed on this again,
And, hidden by the trunk whereon he leaned,
He watched her long, unseen, with raptured gaze
And a heart swelling high.

The open window,
Round which a clambering vine luxuriantly
Twined its fresh tendrils, hung with small white flowers,
Framed in the fairest image in the world,
So Sanzio thought. Here Benedetta sat,
A dainty basket in her lap, wherein
She broke some long green stalks with busy hands,
Humming a tune, gayly, but yet so low
Its breath scarce parted the soft, curving lines
Of the closed lips. Her hair, glossy and dark,
What though bound back into a simple knot,
Yet waved and curled itself so willfully,

Rebellious ringlets rose up everywhere
Like a dim halo round the low white brow,
Bending above her task. Yet once or twice,
Hearing, perchance, some rustle in the woods,
Some faint, unwonted stir amid the stems,
She raised her head, like a bright, startled bird,
And slowly gazed a moment right and left,
A look of timid pride and shy surprise
In her sweet face. Then Sanzio fearfully
Drew further back, and held his breath, and would Have checked the very beating of his heart,
Which throbbed more loudly, as there turned on him
The great, wide-open hazel eyes, shining
With such a mild, clear radiance, that he fancied
The happy sun had left there half its light.
Oh, and what marvel if its brightest beam
Loved to dwell there! And he cried inwardly,
"My gentle dove! My golden-eyed, sweet fawn!"
Marked how the fair young head was set and poised
With such an exquisite tenderness and grace
On the white, slender throat, it seemed a flower
Unfolding on its delicate parent stem,
That meekly, and yet half unconsciously,
Rejoiced in its own surpassing beauty, —
And how there lingered in each purest line
Of face and form, blent to a perfect whole,
Like bloom and freshness of the early dew,
Still something of the child, not ripened yet
To full-blown womanhood.

Perceiving naught,
She ever then took up her work again,
With it her broken little tune, and drooped
The long, dark lashes, that had well-nigh kissed
The faintly-tinted cheek.

At length she paused,
And sat a moment with her slender fingers
Clasped idly o'er the basket, while a look
Of dreamy reverie, like a fleeting shade,
Passed over brow and eyes; then suddenly
A faint, half smile parted the rosy lips,
And like a quiet ripple lost itself
In a small dimple.

Then she left her seat,
Threw the low door wide open, and let in
A flood of light, dappled with shadowy leaves,
That merrily played and danced about her head,
And gliding down the dark, close-fitting bodice,
Touched the bright border of her robe, whence peeped
The dainty, tripping foot, as she arose
On tiptoe now, to fasten back above
A tangle of the vine that trailed too low;
And as she raised her hands, the long white sleeves
Fell back, revealing the fair rounded arm
And slender wrist. And Sanzio, with his heart
Brimful of joy, hanging on every breath
And motion of the little young form, drew near,
And so stepped forth at last.

When she glanced down
He stood before her, doffing his plumed cap
In silent greeting. Her wide, lustrous eyes
Lit up with a swift look of recognition,
And a faint flush, half pleasure, half surprise,
Rose over brow and neck, but yet her cheek
Dimpled again, as with a quiet word
She bade him enter, for he prayed the grace
Of a brief converse with her mother.

She,
Summoned by Benedetta, quickly came
From out an inner room; yet, Sanzio thought,
With something haughty in her step and mien,
And a mistrustful look in her dark eyes,
As briefly she saluted him, nor begged
He might be seated, like a welcome guest,
And stood herself, to wait his pleasure thus.
But he to Benedetta turned once more, —
"Would she refresh him kindly, ere he spoke,
With a cool draught of water? He had come
A goodly distance, and the sun was warm!"
Glad of this pretext thus to put from him
One moment the sweet magic of her presence,
That drew his eyes again and yet again,
To set them free no more, and would too much
Distract and hinder him while he must state
The purpose that had brought him. Even now
When she had vanished, and he heard ere long
A silvery laugh outside, and the old well
Creak heavily, and fancied how perchance
Her little hands wound up the brimming bucket,
He tripped and stumbled in his hasty speech,
As he began: "Did they not sometimes come Into the city, mayhap, for a while, —
Or had they not some friends or kinsfolk there,
Where she might stay, — in fine, would she permit
That he should paint her daughter? He was one
Who made such art the labor of his life,
And he had need of such a face as hers
For a great picture of the Blessed Virgin, Whereon he wrought just then."

The woman heard
In unmoved silence, and then shook her head.
"No, — they had no such friend! Long years ago,
While her good son yet lived, — his wife had died
When this his child was born, — they, too, had dwelled

In the great town; now all were strangers there!
Yet stay, — she recollected there was once
Among the servants of some noble lord,
A distant cousin of her own. Ay, ay,
Anna by name, and a kind, pious heart!
But she was old e'en then, and long ere this,
Past doubt, laid in her grave, Heaven rest her soul!
No, no, — what he demanded could not be!"
She said, a hard tone in her firm, clear voice,
And then to Benedetta, who returned
With the fresh draught, presenting it to Sanzio,
"Leave us, my child!" and motioned her away
By an imperious gesture.

She obeyed,
With a swift, wondering glance at both of them,
Slipped through the door and closed it after her.
But Sanzio, while he drank, his eager gaze
Following her every step, perceived ere long
How the door slowly moved, then noiselessly
Slid a small space ajar, and though in vain,
By such shy glances as he dared to give,
He watched and waited to behold her face
Peer through it, he yet fancied that he felt
Her sweet, bright eyes on him.

And there in truth
She stood, her beating heart close to the door,
To look, not listen. In the small, cracked mirror
Between the windows, that reflected here
The corner with the pretty, gilded shrine
That she had decked with flowers an hour ago,
She plainly saw the face and form that pleased
Her fancy passing well e'en yesterday,
Far more than all the other noble lords,
Then his companions. She had thought of him
Oh, many, many times, since he had gone!
And now was glad to gaze on him unseen
Till she should have content, if that might be.
How little he looked, and yet well-knit and strong,
With a short mantle flung across his shoulders,
How young, and yet long years a full-grown man!
With manly strength, and winning, youthful grace,
A noble frankness and simplicity,
And yet a quiet dignity and pride,
Like a young prince's — was he such, perchance? —
Most happily blent in him. How fair and fine
Was the brown, wavy hair, that he wore long,
And now and then tossed backward carelessly,
Standing uncovered still; how gently soft
The large brown eyes! Only upon his brow
There sat a look of thought so deep, so earnest,
It seemed like sadness, and his lips were grave.
Yet they could smile with wondrous sweetness too;
And those soft eyes kindle with dancing lights
Of sparkling mirth and mischief! She perceived
And noted all. Yet more than all things else,
A subtle, powerful something, that streamed forth
Like a rare perfume, of strange, magic spell,
From his bright presence, drew unconsciously,
But yet resistless, all her heart to him,
As she thus watched him with her mother. Ay,
Sometimes she caught her outlined features too;
How stern they looked! she thought. And once or twice
He slightly frowned, and pressed his lips together,
And tapped his foot, as half impatiently,
Upon the floor, yet ever with respect
Received her words.

For Sanzio undismayed
Had to the charge returned. Yet if it chanced
That the old cousin lived, and could be found, —
And he would search the town from end to end, —
Would she not then permit her child to come
For one short week, — three days? He pleaded long,
And long at first in vain. The woman had
A thousand arguments, and doubts, and fears,
That he must combat one by one. But as
She stood before him thus, unbowed by years,
A stately presence still, and with a trace
Of noble beauty in the hard-set features, —
Perchance she too was fair once as her child;
Oh no, yet surely never half so fair,
She ne'er had Benedetta's tender grace! —
He listened with what patience he could find,
For her sweet sake. And so at length, at length,
Won mayhap by his eloquence, mayhap
By that fine charm that silent as the sun,
And as unfailing, wrought on all, she said,
Well, let him seek, then! If old Anna lived,
The child might go and stay with her a week,
One week, but mark you, not an hour beyond!
And he might then and there — but in good truth,
Who was he, though, and what his name?

"Sanzio,"
He simply answered, "mayhap" —
"How!" she asked,
Unbending slightly from her dignity,
"Sanzio, the famous Signor, who last year
Painted St. Catherine, the great altar-piece,
For the dear ladies on the Hill beyond,
That all the country round would flock to see
On feasts and holidays, — she, too, went once
With Benedetta, though the way was long, — Could it be he?"

"The same," he smiling said,

"What though his name was scarce so widely famed,
As she most kindly thought."

She courted. "Ay,
Wherefore had he not told her this ere now,
Then mayhap had he found her more inclined!"

So it was speedily fixed: Sanzio should send
A message, telling her that all was well,
If he could find old Anna, and the child
Should come to town with their good, aged neighbor,
Within three days from then.

And now at last,
With words of thanks accepted graciously,
He took his leave, without another glimpse
Of Benedetta. But as he looked back
He saw her standing in the open door,
And for his life could not refrain, but kissed
His hand to her, again and yet again,
She waving here for answer timidly,
Till he had vanished.

(To be continued.)

BEETHOVEN AT THE HEIGHT OF HIS PRODUCTIVITY (1807-9).

TRANSLATIONS FROM THAYER'S THIRD VOLUME.

II.

THE RASOUMOWSKY QUARTET.

1808. — Count Rasoumowsky is set down in the list of arrivals in Vienna, in the summer of this year, as coming from Carlsbad, and living in "his own house," — that is to say, in his new palace on the Danube canal, to which he had removed a short time before from the Wollzeil; he had furnished its interior in the most splendid style. Of course he could not compete with men like Lobkowitz or Esterhazy (princes with extensive hereditary possessions) in the keeping of an orchestra or vocal choir; but it did lie in his power and corresponded with his taste to have the first string quartet of Europe in his service. His own skill qualified him perfectly to play the second violin, which he commonly did; but the young Mayseder, or some other one of the first violinists of the capital, was always ready to take his place when so requested. Therefore only three permanent engagements were necessary; and these were now made, in the late summer or early autumn of 1808.

Schuppanzigh, the first quartet player of his time, but still without a permanent position, received the place of first violinist for life, and to him was intrusted the selection of the rest. He at once recommended Weiss for the viola whom Rasoumowsky accepted, and to whom he assigned suitable lodgings for himself and family in the houses connected with his palace. Of Joseph Linke's skill and talent Schuppanzigh had received so favorable an impression that he secured for him the place of violoncellist. He was a young man of twenty-five years,¹ in his exterior a little hunchbacked, an orphan from his childhood. Seyfried, in whose orchestra Linke was solo violinist for many years, says of him: "At the age of twelve the orphan boy came to Breslau, to the Dominicans, in whose choir he had to assist with the violin; and from the accomplished organist, Hanisch, he received his initiation into thorough-bass, as well as on the organ. Then also he began, under Lose's and Flemming's guidance, to learn the violoncello; making such decided progress that, when the former left the theatre orchestra over which C. M. von Weber presided, he was already qualified to take his place. In the year 1808 he resolved to visit Vienna, where he arrived on the first of June, and soon after was received into the Hauskapelle of Prince Rasoumowsky. Here he enjoyed the fortune of becoming acquainted with Beethoven, who truly prized the talented young artist, wrote much for him, and even studied after his ideas. Hence Linke, with his Commilitonen (comrades in arms, fellow-students) acquired, so to say, a European fame in the performances of the tone-creations of this genial master."

¹ Linke during his last years was solo violoncellist at the Theater-an-der-Wien. Kapellmeister Adolph Müller, of that theatre, describes his personal appearance as follows: "Linke was of middle stature, with a somewhat crooked back, — perhaps from the continual handling of his instrument, which afterwards reduced him to a hunchback. Face and body fleshy, somewhat puffed out; a pale, monotonous complexion; hair a good deal mingled with gray. He spoke little, — still less when he handled his instrument, of which (without charlatanism) he was a master in every respect; for Linke was universally known and honored, not only as a correct player, but also a technical master." (From a Letter to the Author, April 25, 1873.)

Förster was the Count's instructor in musical theory, the learned Bigot was his librarian, and his talented lady was pianist. These were the years (1808-15) in which, according to Seyfried's account, Beethoven was, so to say, cock of the walk in the princely house. "All that he composed was there tried, though smoking hot from the pan, and executed according to his own directions with hairbreadth exactness, — just as he wished to have it, and not in the least otherwise, — with a zeal, a love, a complying spirit, and a piety, which could only emanate from such glowing worshippers of his exalted genius; and it was only through the deepest penetration into his most secret intentions, through the most perfect apprehension of their spiritual tendency, that those quartettists, in the delivery of Beethoven's compositions, attained to that universal celebrity about which only one voice reigned in the whole world of art."

A CONCERT WITHOUT A PARALLEL.

1808. — In return for the noble contribution which Beethoven, through his works and his personal services, had made to the charity concerts of April 17 and November 15, Hartl granted him the free use of the Theater-an-der-Wien for an "Akademie" (concert), which was announced in the Wiener Zeitung of December 17, as follows: —

MUSICAL ACADEMY.

"On Thursday, the 22d December, Ludwig van Beethoven will have the honor to give a musical academy in the K. K. Priv. Theater-an-der-Wien. The pieces collectively are of his composition, wholly new, and have not yet been heard in public. First Part. 1. A symphony, under the title 'Recollection of Country Life,' in F major (No. 5). 2. Aria. 3. Hymn, with Latin text, written in church style with chorus and solos. 4. Pianoforte concerto, played by himself.

"Second Part. 1. Grand Symphony in C minor (No. 6). 2. Sanctus, with Latin text, written in Church style with chorus and solos. 3. Fantasia on the pianoforte alone. 4. Fantasia on the pianoforte, which ends by degrees with the entrance of the whole orchestra, and at last with the falling in of choruses by way of finale.

"Boxes and reserved seats are to be had in the Krügerstrasse, No. 1074, in the first story. The beginning is at half-past six."

Can the annals of musical art name any concert programme of purely new works — and such works! — collectively by the same composer, which will bear comparison with the above?

The high importance of the compositions produced on this occasion, the strange events which (according to the reports) took place there, and the somewhat contradictory assertions of persons who were present, justify some pains to sift the testimony and set it right, even at the risk of wearying the reader.

It is to be lamented that the concert of November 15 has been so completely forgotten by all those whose contemporary reports or later reminiscences are now the only sources for our knowledge; for it is certain that, either in the rehearsals or in the public performance, something occurred which caused a serious estrangement and a rupture between Beethoven and the orchestra. But just this is sufficient to obviate certain otherwise insuperable difficulties.

Whoever is familiar with the various writings of Schindler will recollect the bitterness with which he alludes to Ries, — nay, goes so far as to ascribe unworthy motives to his statement in the Notizen (p. 84), that once a scene occurred where the orchestra made the composer feel himself in the wrong, "and in all earnestness insisted upon it that he should not direct. So Beethoven during the rehearsal was obliged to stay in the anteroom, and it lasted a long time before this difference was made up." It will presently appear that Schindler in this case is entirely in the wrong, and that such a scene did actually occur in the November concert; but first a narrative from Spohr's Autobiography must be taken into consideration. "Seyfried," he writes, "to whom I expressed my astonishment at Beethoven's singular manner of directing, told of a tragi-comical incident which happened at Beethoven's last concert in the Theater-an-der-Wien."

"Beethoven played a new Pianoforte Concerto by himself, but forgot, at the very first tutti, that he was solo-player, sprang up, and began to direct in his manner. At the first sforzando he flung his arms so wide apart that he threw both candles from the piano desk upon the floor. The public laughed, and Beethoven was so beside himself at this disturbance that he made the orchestra stop and begin anew. Seyfried, in his anxiety lest the same mishap should repeat itself in the same passage, ordered two choir boys to station themselves near Beethoven, and hold the candlesticks in their hands. One of them unsuspectingly stepped too near, and looked over into the piano part. Accordingly, when the fatal sforzando came along, he received from Beethoven's out-sweeping right hand such a hard slap in the face, that the poor lad in terror let the candle fall to the ground. The other boy, more cautious, watched with anxious looks all Beethoven's motions, and succeeded in evading the blow by quickly ducking down. If the public laughed before, this time it broke out into a truly bacchanalian jubilee. Beethoven was so enraged that at the very first chord of the solo he broke half a dozen strings. All the exertions of the true friends of music to restore peace and attention were for the time being fruitless. Hence the Allegro of the Concerto was lost entirely for the audience. After that mishap Beethoven never would give another concert."

The great inexactness and the extraordinary faults of memory in Spohr's Autobiography, even in matters which he himself had occasion to observe, are well known to every competent judge; but where he, as in this narration, repeats from memory circumstances which have been imparted to him by another, the doubt acquires an especially wide room for exercise. It stands perfectly established that in the concert nothing of the sort occurred; consequently all that he relates about the public, about the efforts of the friends of music, and of the Allegro being lost, has its foundation solely in Spohr's fancy. . . .

Reichardt begins a letter, dated Dec. 25, 1808, with an account of the "Akademie," as follows:—

"The past week," he writes, "in which the theatres were closed and the evenings occupied with public musical performances and concerts, I was not a little at a loss with all my zeal and my purpose of hearing all there was here. Especially was this the case on the 22d, when the musicians here gave the first grand musical performance of this year in the court theatre, for their excellent widows' and orphans' institution; but on the same day Beethoven also gave, in the great suburban theatre, a concert for his own benefit, in which only compositions of his own work were performed. I could not possibly lose this, and so accepted with heartfelt thanks the kind offer of Prince Lobkowitz to take me with him to his box. There, in the most bitter cold, from half-past six to half-past ten, we sat it out, and found the saying verified, that one may easily have too much of a good thing,—still more of a strong thing. The box was in the first tier, quite near the stage, on which the orchestra, and Beethoven, directing in the midst of them, stood very close to us. I did not like, any more than the exceedingly kind-hearted, delicate prince, to leave the box before the concert was entirely over, although many a failure in execution excited our impatience in a high degree. The poor Beethoven, who in this his concert had the first and only gain in solid cash that he could find in the whole year, had found in its arrangement and its execution many a great obstacle and only weak support. Singers and orchestra were composed of very heterogeneous elements; and it had not been possible to procure a complete rehearsal of a single one of the pieces to be performed, all of which were full of the greatest difficulties. Yet you will be astounded to hear what a quantity of things by this fruitful genius and indefatigable worker were performed in the course of four hours.

"First, a Pastoral Symphony, or 'Recollections of Life in the Country,' etc. . . . Every number of this was a very long and perfectly developed movement, full of vivid paintings and of brilliant thoughts and figures; and this one pastoral symphony lasted longer than a whole court concert is allowed to last with us."

What reception the symphony found with the listeners is nowhere reported. The correspondent of the Allgemeine Musikalische Zeitung evades all criticism. But the composer shared the customary honor of being called out at the end of it, as appears from an anecdote related by F. Hiller. "One of the best known Russian friends of music, Count Wilhourski, told me," he says, "how he was sitting alone in the reserved seats at the first performance of the Pastoral Symphony; and how Beethoven, when he was called out, made to him a (so to say) personal, half-friendly, half-ironical bow."

Reichardt continues: "Then followed, as the sixth piece (the Pastorale counting as five) a long Italian scena, sung by Demoiselle Kilitzky, the beautiful Bohemienne with the lovely voice. That the fair child trembled more than she sang was excusable enough in the grim and bitter cold; for we too shuddered in the close boxes, wrapped in our furs and cloaks."

"Seventh piece: a Gloria in choruses and solos. Unfortunately the execution was an utter failure. Eighth piece: a new Forte-piano Concerto, of monstrous difficulty, which Beethoven executed wonderfully well, and in the very quickest tempos. The Adagio, a masterpiece of lovely, sustained melody, he actually sang upon his instrument, with a deep melancholy feeling that streamed through me. Ninth piece: a grand, very elaborate, excessively long Symphony. A gentleman near us assured us, that at the rehearsal he had seen that the violoncello part alone, which was very actively employed, filled four and thirty sheets of paper. To be sure, the note-writers understand here how to stretch things out, not less than the court and lawyers' copyists with us. Tenth piece: a Sanctus again, with chorus and solo parts. This, like the Gloria, was a total failure in the execution. Eleventh piece: a long Fantasia (improvisatori?) in which Beethoven exhibited his whole mastery; and finally, for the close, another Fantasia, in which presently the orchestra, and at last the chorus, came in. This singular idea was most unlucky in the execution, through such a complete confusion in the orchestra that Beethoven, in his holy zeal for art, thought no more of the public or the place, but shouted out for them to stop and begin it over again. You can imagine how I suffered there with all his friends. At that moment I wished that I had had the courage to go out earlier."

(To be continued.)

BERLIOZ'S MUSICAL CREED.

(From the London Musical Standard.)

THE following letter (which we translate from our Brussels contemporary, Le Guide Musical) is not unpublished, but it is little known; and we are surprised, seeing its importance, that M. D. Bernard did not find a place for it in his carefully compiled "Correspondence of Berlioz." The history of this epistle, which displays the vigorous mind of the writer, is as follows: Hector Berlioz had just gained a wonderful success (this was in 1852) at Weimar with his Benvenuto Cellini and Romeo and Juliet. The town was full of poets and distinguished musicians, and the enthusiasm was still at its height, when J. C. Lobe, a celebrated composer and author, and one of Berlioz's most fervent partisans, thought it a favorable opportunity for the propagation of his own views and the demonstration of the ideas, tendencies, and aspirations of the author of Benvenuto, and it appeared to him that the most efficacious means to secure his end would be to get Berlioz to write a condensed form of his musical creed. Having communicated this idea to the master, Berlioz addressed to him, in reply, the above-mentioned letter, which was published in Lobe's Fliegende Blätter für Musik:—

SIR,—You invite me to write for your journal an epitome of my opinions on the present and future state of musical art, requesting me to dispense with the history of the past. I thank you for this reserve; but in order to contain even the abridgment you desire, a large volume would be necessary, and your Fliegende Blätter [flying leaves] would no longer be able to "fly." If I understand you rightly, it is simply an authentic account of the musical faith I profess that you wish me to publish. It is after this manner that electors act with regard to the candidates who court the honors of national representation. Now I have not the slightest ambition in this direction. I wish to be neither deputy, senator, consul, nor burgomaster. Besides, if I aspired to the possession of consular dignities, it appears to me the best thing I could do to obtain the suffrages, not of the people, but of the patricians in art, would be to imitate Marius Coriolanus,—appear at the forum, and, uncovering my breast, display the wounds that I have received in the defense of my country. Is not my profession of faith apparent in everything I have had the misfortune to write, in what I have done and in what I have not done? What musical art is to-day you know, and you cannot think that I am ignorant of it; but what it will be, neither you nor I can tell. What, then, shall I say on this subject? As a musician I hope much may be pardoned me, as I have loved much; as a critic I have been, am, and shall be cruelly punished, because I have had, have, and always shall have in my nature a certain amount of hatred and contempt. This is only just; but this contempt is no doubt possessed by you, and there is no need to point out its particular objects.

Music is the most poetic, the most powerful, the most enduring, of all the arts. It ought also to be the most free; but it is not so, and from this cause arise our artistic griefs, obscure devotedness, lassitude, despair, and longings for death. Modern music, music (I do not speak of the courtesan of that name, who is recognized everywhere) with certain connections, may be compared to the Andromeda of old, divinely beautiful in her nudity, whose flashing glances are split up into many colored rays while passing across the prism of her tears. Chained to a rock on the edge of a vast ocean, whose waves beat against its sides without cessation and cover her pretty feet with seething slime, she awaits the Persean conqueror who is to break her fetters and dash to pieces forever the chimera called Routine, from whose menacing jaws whirlwinds of pestilential and destroying smoke are continually shot forth. I believe, however, that this monster is growing old: his movements have not their youthful energy, his teeth are decayed, his claws blunted, and as his heavy paws slip as he places them on the edge of the rock on which Andromeda is enchained, he begins to recognize the uselessness of his efforts to scale it, and that he must soon return to the abyss from whence he came. His death-rattle is already heard, and when the beast is dead, what will there remain for the devoted lover to do but to swim to her, break her bonds, and, carrying her distracted across the waves, bring her back to Greece, at the risk even of seeing Andromeda reward so much zeal with indifference and coldness? Vainly will the satyrs of neighboring caverns laugh at his anxiety to deliver her; in vain will they cry, with their goats' voices, "Fool! let her remain captive! You cannot tell whether she would bestow herself on you were she free. Naked and in chains the majesty of her misfortune is only the more impregnable." The lover who truly loves has a just horror of such a crime, and would rather receive than take away. Not only will he save Andromeda, but, after having bathed with his tears the feet so cruelly tortured by heavy chains, he would give her wings to increase her liberty.

This is, sir, all the profession of faith that I can make to you, and I do it solely for the purpose of proving that I have a faith, in which respect so many professors are wanting. Unfortunately for me, I have one and have long publicly professed it, piously obeying the evangelical precept. The text must be greatly in the wrong that says, "By faith alone are we saved," for I find, on the contrary, that it is by faith alone that we are lost, and I also find that it is ruining me. Such is my conclusion, only adding (as my Galilean friend, Greipenkerl, does at the bottom of all his letters), E pur si muove. Don't denounce me to the Holy Inquisition. HECTOR BERLIOZ.

LETTERS FROM AN ISLAND.

BY FANNY RAYMOND RITTER.

I.

VASSAR COLLEGE.

DEAR MR. DWIGHT, — In answer to your inquiries regarding the musical "situation" at Vassar College, I am happy to inform you that the year of study now drawing to a close, in the school for musical art there, has been one calculated not alone to attract the interested attention of an observer like myself, — one whose warm sympathies are with it in all its workings, — but also of a nature to give satisfaction to those practically concerned in it as instructors and students. A genuine spirit of harmony pervades it; the plans of its director are followed with the surety of complete confidence by an able corps of teachers, two of whom are Vassar graduates; and this confidence is shared by every student. Here, all feel, there is no sham; no forced, feverish striving for superficial, temporary success; no experimentalizing, and yet no standing still. Here is an atmosphere of honorable emulation, not overdriven to the excess of ambitious rivalry; solid acquirement, genuine interest in the students' improvement, friendly esprit de corps, — in a few words, the inspiration of true art, and the life, the progress, that result from this.

The number of students in the various branches of music taught at Vassar College has been large this year, especially considering how many institutions of the kind, following Vassar's example, have been lately established. This unmistakable proof of the popularity of the musical department of Vassar College is partly owing to the excellent results of last year, — the first, initial year of its formation as a school of art on a footing of as much independence as is possible in a school not wholly isolated, but branching from a foundation of general collegiate education. The number of students in solo and chorus singing, organ and piano-forte playing, and harmony, has been one hundred and fifty; several of these are especial art students, who enter this college for the sole purpose of enjoying the musical advantages it has to offer. Seven concerts have been given since last November, though the entire plan includes nine, two of which will occur during this closing month of the collegiate year. Four of these are given by advanced students, three by artists, two by teachers. Two of the artist concerts were performances of classic chamber music by Messrs. Bergner, Matzka, and Schwarz, with the assistance of students. The third was a pianoforte recital by Franz Rummel. This was Mr. Rummel's first recital, though not his first appearance, in America; and the programme was the same that he has since repeated with such success in New York, Boston, and elsewhere. This programme was a test of the artist's marvelous acquired powers, and of his excellent and often original conception of the master-works he interpreted, — especially Bach's Chromatic Fantasia, and Chopin's Polonaise, Op. 53, — the bass octave passages of which he emphasized with finely graduated force and delicacy, — and in what a tempo he played the Liszt Tarantella! But mechanical dexterity is now so common, such a matter of course to be expected from all pianists, that even Mr. Rummel's magnificent technical ability would not appear so remarkable, were it not for the magnetic warmth of a certain eagerness of expression, a rash impulsiveness, that lend it a peculiarly interesting and piquant coloring. Was it not your own "Fair Harvard" that first among colleges, after Vassar, had the courage and wisdom to organize, within its own walls, a regular season of orchestral and chamber concerts, — or am I mistaken?

Every concert given at Vassar is prefaced by a short introductory address from Dr. Ritter, explaining and analyzing the principal numbers on the programme, — a system first "inaugurated" by him. Besides this, Dr. Ritter gives a regular bi-monthly series of lectures to the musical department during the year. But Vassar students are not wholly dependent on concerts given within its walls. As New York is only three hours distant, students are able to attend matinee performances of opera and concert there, and to return on the same day. This advantage is one of which they have frequently availed themselves this season, by listening to the masterpieces of symphonies or vocal composition performed by the Carlberg, Damrosch, or Philharmonic orchestras, the Mapleson opera company, the organ recitals in various churches, etc.

The school of musical art at Vassar possesses a circulating library which contains more than six hundred numbers, and there are many excellent works on musical literature in the college library. The appearance as solo pianiste (at the evening entertainment which takes place at Vassar on the anniversary of its founder's birthday) of Miss Stevens, a graduate of 1877, and pupil of Dr. Ritter for four years, was an interesting event of this season. Since she graduated, the lady, who is a very accomplished excutante, has appeared with success at several concerts in California and the West, and now goes, by the advice of Dr. Ritter, to study for two years with Drs. Von Bülow and Liszt, before entering upon the career of a professional pianiste. May Miss Stevens never depart from the ideal artistic principles which her instructor has inculcated! And that her future career may prove entirely successful, is the wish of all her friends. The standard of excellence in performance among the students in this school is so high that it excites surprise even in artists, who listen to the singing and playing of these ladies with admiration for the method of tuition employed, when they hear how short a time pupils are allowed (save in exceptional cases) for daily practice. And, young as Vassar is, several of its musical students of former years are already successfully engaged as teachers or organists elsewhere.

Vassar College, standing in the front rank of women's colleges, is peculiarly a mark for comment and criticism. I have observed that in New York society, and among my European correspondents, one question is more frequently put to me on this subject than any other, "How many famous women has Vassar College turned out yet?" Should a lively demand for "famous women" ever arise, no doubt a mill to supply the necessary article will speedily be established. At present there is no very apparently pressing necessity for an immediate supply, — or of famous men either, to judge from the fact, of which a distinguished editor (who should know) recently informed me, that no great man has graduated from Yale or Harvard for fifty years. If this be true, why expect so much more, in one fifth of the time, from Vassar College and the inferior sex? It is enough to ask from collegiate education that it should raise the average mind of the average thousands of students to a higher plane of thought and action; and this it certainly does. Genius it cannot create, and exceptional natures will always find their own way to exceptional acquired excellence. In this elevation of the faculties, this discipline of the mind, art is a powerful agent; and, although the benefit of such a study may not always become apparent in rare artistic accomplishments (demanding rare artistic qualifications), its effects will invariably appear in the form of greater harmony and breadth of character, superior grace of manner and softness of disposition. This result, and the favorable effect upon health of a judicious study of art, ought to be enough to establish its utilitarian claims to respect, even among those who are incapable of perceiving its beauty, or its elevated rank among the highest achievements of the mind.

President Caldwell holds out promises of excellent things in the way of lectures upon art and literature, etc., to be given in the lecture hall of Vassar College next winter. The Rev. Mr. Spaulding, well known to you in Boston, has already given there two of those illustrated lectures of his on painting, architecture, etc., which have been found so highly interesting wherever he has delivered them, from their refined tone of literary culture and experience. If a great painter does not so much place a picture on canvas, as raise the veils that separate him from the picture of his imagination, the appreciative commentator on such a picture unveils beauties to the eye of the ordinary observer that would otherwise remain unseen by him; and the expression of enlightened individual opinion is always suggestive, even though the ideas of a non-professional may sometimes disagree with the accepted canons of artists. The same quality of liberal appreciativeness which is to be found in the lectures of Mr. Spaulding characterizes (as you are aware) Mr. Fields's analysis of the works of Tennyson, which was also listened to at Vassar last winter. Ladies in general, and we English ladies in particular, may not wholly share the opinion of Mr. Fields in regard to Tennyson's mediæval ideal of womanhood; but all must agree with him in desiring a more complete and solid study of English literature than the system that generally prevails. The spirit of such lectures as these is one well adapted to further something more than the interests of literature, — those of human fraternity; and where shall we find this spirit more nobly embodied than in the creations of art and poetry? Poets, artists, are the truest republicans! When in presence of a work of art, utterly opposed, perhaps, in its character to all previously acquired thoughts, ideas, and habits, who has not, in a moment of joy, grief, or perturbation, felt a mysterious, foreign, and yet strangely familiar influence whisper to him, in some beautiful verse, some harmonious succession of tones, some rich combination of colors, "Dost thou not understand me? For most surely do I understand thee: I have suffered and rejoiced, loved and hated, like thee, and yet a thousand times more profoundly, as the poet and the artist must, ere they are consecrated to their mission. Look, listen, brother! and then may rest and benediction descend upon thee!"

Yours faithfully,
F. R. R.
MAY 26.

TALKS ON ART. — SECOND SERIES.¹

FROM INSTRUCTIONS OF MR. WILLIAM M. HUNT TO HIS PUPILS.

VII.

AFTER you have placed the shadows on that face, you want to make it subtle, to get the dream of it. Don't have the pupils of the eyes small and decided! It is only when people are angry that the pupil grows small. When they are pleased and quiet the pupil grows large. See how little you notice the distinction between pupil and iris when you are at a very short distance!

"I've made the shadow on the cheek too black."

If you put in your other darks strong enough, it will not look black.

"Besides, I have made it so bad in color that I don't like to go on with it."

It is in a good state to go on with, if you will put some greenish yellow, terre-verte brulée, and raw sienna, into that crimson shadow on the face. Just use the opposite colors, and it will come right.

I don't like the spots in your backgrounds. You ought to be able to get just as much air and color in them by painting them flat, and your figures would come out better. But I don't mean to tell you a great deal. I think that it is better that I should not. You ought to find out things for yourself; and if there is anything that I ought to set you right about, like those backgrounds, I will. But I shall not take the responsibility if you spoil them.

"How far shall I carry the face?"

As far as you like.

If that little girl won't sit still, get a photograph of her. I know that it is horrid to work from photographs generally; but you must have something to help you about the exactness of it. If you get into a real scrape with it, take another canvas, and paint her head on that.

That child's foot ought not to turn up so on one side. The figure would stand much better if it were brought down true. And that's no way to do a fiddle! Just think what a violin is! How carefully it is made! Eichberg could tell in a minute who had made an old violin; there's so much in the look of it. And it is not a thing to treat carelessly.

You must learn to be very careful. All the great men, Velasquez, and the rest, were tremendously careful. I have said that to you forty times; and I know that it won't make the least difference. Put in the whole subject at once, in masses, painting loosely. But don't precise anything unless you do it exactly right. And because a thing looks quickly done, and as if you were smart, never leave it on that account, if it is not right. Don't be afraid to carry your things where they ought to go.

You are on the right track. You are going on well. But I'm sure it won't make you pedantic if I say that now you must be sure of having certain things exactly right; and that you must try for a certain simplicity beyond what you have. I know it is easy for you to make the hard, pedantic "drawing," that people talk so much about. There is a great deal more thought in looser work. I like your studies. There is thought in every one of them. And that can't be said of all pictures.

Dwight's Journal of Music.

SATURDAY, JUNE 7, 1879.

SOME THOUGHTS ON MUSICAL EDUCATION.

I.

It seems to me that the time when it was incumbent on every true music-lover to exert himself to the uttermost to encourage the diffusion of musical knowledge throughout our country has now gone by. True, that time is not yet long past; but such is the pace at which everything rushes onward nowadays that musical institutes have sprung up on every hand, and are within the reach and means of almost every one. Musical instruction, as an item in the regular course at our public schools, is now an established fact. In so far as a general knowledge of musical matters is concerned, he who runs may learn. I would by no means be thought to regret this, or to urge anything against it: it is wholly to be rejoiced at, and not at all to be deplored. Yet it does seem that, in view of the great tendency of our peculiar civilization to favor the wide-spread diffusion of everything, from printed cotton goods to religious principles, it would be well now for those who have the honor of music at heart to exert all their influence in the direction of concentrating higher musical instruction; of making it more thorough and clearer of all dubious elements, for the benefit of the very and decidedly musical few instead of the vaguely musical many. In this I refer more especially to what is commonly called theoretical teaching, — the study of harmony, counterpoint, and other items in the art of composition. Music is as yet somewhat of an exotic in America; it has been going through the process of transplanting for some time, and is taking quite as kindly to our soil as there was any reason to expect it would. We have made especially rapid progress in respect to musical performance. I need only mention Mr. Theodore Thomas's orchestra in Cincinnati, the Philharmonic orchestra in New York, the Handel and Haydn Society in Boston, and the Mendelssohn Quintet Club, known pretty well all over the country (though it was cradled under the shadow of Bunker Hill Monument), to show that we are not wanting in excellent musical means. Some of our pianists, too, could take a very high rank anywhere and everywhere; and Albani, Miss Cary, and Miss Thursby show well what we can do in the way of singing.

But it is not the fine means of performing music that sets the musical stamp upon a country. It is not the quality of music it performs and listens to, nor the manner in which it performs it, but the quality of the music it produces. We have already done something in the way of musical production, and some of our fellow-countrymen can seriously lay claim to the title of composer; yet ours can hardly be called a composing people in any high sense of the term. But the number of young men who aspire to follow the lead of Mr. Paine and Mr. Dudley Buck is every year increasing, and it is no very visionary possibility that the time is drawing nigh when a highly respectable number of compositions in the more serious forms will be turned out annually by native-born Americans. Of the vast number of pupils who study harmony at our conservatories, there is a fair percentage who do so with some more ambitious aim than the mere getting a comprehensive, bird's-eye view of the art of music, or the qualifying themselves for improvising unobjectionable interludes between the verses of a psalm-tune in church. It is upon just these ambitious ones that the best and purest didactic musical force in our country should be concentrated. As for the others, they do very well to support conservatories for the benefit of themselves and their more worthy brethren: non ragionam di loro!

But, considering the fact that we actually have a respectable number of young Americans who dream of the chance of becoming composers, I would say a thoughtful word or two, not to our noble army of teachers (that I am by no means entitled to do), but to themselves. To be sure, one is a little inclined, when one sees a young man about to enter upon the arduous path of musical composition, to repeat to him Punch's advice "to those about to be married." But this is a purely cynical way of facing the question, and will not advance matters one whit. I am well aware that one of the most unruly and recalcitrant mortals breathing is the really talented pupil in composition: he is hard to lead, and impossible to drive; he is excelled in unmanageableness only by the generally bright and clever pupil, who has a quick intelligence and decided tastes, but no special musical talent. Yet I will take courage. I have long been struck with a singular phenomenon in my own experience as a teacher, which is that pupils, almost without exception, who have shown very marked ability, and have made gratifying progress in the study (so called) of harmony, meet with far less flattering success so soon as they begin the study of counterpoint proper. This difference has seemed to me too great to be accounted for merely by the comparative difficulty of the two studies. I think that it arises mainly from a false appreciation, on the part of the pupil, of the fundamentally different nature of the two studies. Harmony and counterpoint are, in common parlance, loosely lumped together under the general head of Musical Theory. Harmony, the science of the formation and progression of chords and of the relation between different keys, together with the means of passing from one key to another either with or without modulation, is certainly, to a very great extent, a theoretical study; it is something to be understood, learned, and remembered. But simple and double counterpoint, from the first order, note against note, up to polyphonic imitation, is almost purely a practical one. What the harmony student strives to acquire is knowledge, and that refined musical sense that comes from well-digested knowledge; what the counterpoint student aims (or should aim) at acquiring is technique, executive ability. It is a want of appreciation of this fact that makes beginners in counterpoint so self-willed and unamenable to guidance (for, if the talented harmony pupil is unruly, the counterpoint pupil is doubly so), and consequently so slow of progress. In harmony exercises the pupil can almost always answer his teacher with considerable show of justice: "You say that this progression is bad; but it sounds well!" But in exercises in counterpoint the teacher can always answer back: "Whether what you have written sounds well or not is no matter at all; it is not what you were told to do." Exercises in elementary counterpoint (say writing four notes in the bass against one in the cantus firmus, for example) exactly correspond to scales, five-finger exercises, and arpeggio practice in piano-forte playing. Their object is to develop a thorough technique in composing. As for the rules of counterpoint, they can be learned in less time than it takes to learn the notes and fingering of the various major and minor scales. To study counterpoint is one thing, but to practice it is a vastly different thing. And here I would urge upon all persons who have the ambition to become composers to practice counterpoint in all its forms, and to practice it hard, with the most implicit observance of the strictest rules. Without the practical technique that such exercise gives, it is vain to think of doing anything æsthetically worthy in the higher branches of composition.

¹ Copyright, 1879, by Helen M. Knowlton.

But the pupil may ask, "Why observe all these strict rules of preparing fourths, and passing from one measure to another by conjunct movement, and the like, which have come down to us from a set of old periwig-pated contrapuntists of the last century, and which all the greatest composers break through constantly, without stint or mercy, and, what is more, with the very best musical effect?" I answer with the counter-question, "Why practice scales with a certain strict fingering when the most eminent pianists often greatly modify this fingering in scale passages that occur in piano-forte compositions? Or, indeed, why practice scales at all, seeing that they are neither pleasing to the ear nor musically interesting in any way?" Before you think of breaking rules, first earn the right to break them, by making yourself superior to them; and remember this well, that a cultivated musician can always tell the difference between the composer who disregards rules because he wishes to and the scribbler who breaks them because he does not know how to comply with them, and has got himself into a tight place, from which he can extricate himself only by kicking over the traces. Why, the difference is as palpable as that between a pianist who makes an intentional accelerando and the one whose inadequacy of technique makes him so nervous that he cannot help hurriedly scrambling through a difficult passage. And, upon the whole, when we wish to strengthen our muscles, we swing dumb-bells and Indian clubs and other unwieldy things which are in no wise fascinating to a man of higher athletic aspirations. Call writing strict counterpoint composing in chains, if you will, but remember that by steady practice you can get to wearing your fetters gracefully, and that, in the end, they will fall off of themselves, and leave you a far freer man than you were ever before, and with the power of making a good use of your freedom, too.

WILLIAM F. APTHORP.

(To be continued.)

A CORRECTION. — We were in error in one point of our notice of the concert by the Parish Church Choirs. The choral, "O Haupt voll Blut und Wunden," as there sung, transposed into a very low key, and with the boys' blatant voices overcrowing all, sounded so strangely that we did not recognize Bach's harmony; moreover we were momentarily misled by the name Hassler attached to it upon the programme; though on reading our own article in print we suddenly remembered that the melody, the tune, is commonly ascribed to Hassler, and on inquiry found that the harmony as sung on this occasion was Bach's essentially, although not in the key he uses in the Passion music. By way of amends for our blunder we will give the historical facts about this choral, as we find them in Carl von Winterberg's "Der Evangelische Kirchengesang," etc., a very elaborate and valuable work, in three quarto volumes, in which he traces the development of the German Protestant church music, out of the simple Lutheran chorals as the germs, into the highest artistic forms of Bach and Handel's time.

The melody in question was originally a love-song. Hans Leo Hassler, of Nuremberg, published about the year 1601 a collection of songs under the title, "Pleasure Garden of new German Songs, Balletti, Galliard und Intraden, with four, five, six, and eight voices, etc." Among these is found a five-part song of five strophes, of which the initial letters form the name "Maria," — probably that of the beloved to whom the poem is dedicated. The first strophe reads as follows:

Mein G'müth ist mir verwirret;
Das macht ein Jungfrau zart;
Bin ganz und gar verirret,
Mein Herz das kränkt sich hart!
etc., etc.

Which we may loosely imitate: —

My spirit is confounded,
Because a maiden fair
My very heart hath wounded,
And filled me with despair!

A few years later (about 1613) the melody of this song, now commonly referred to by the first line of Paul Gerhard's Passion hymn, "O Haupt voll Blut und Wunden," together with its original five-part harmony, was transferred to a death-bed song, and is found as such in a collection of Latin and German sacred songs published by Johann Rhamba at Görlitz. Instead of the original words the following were now sung: —

Herzlich thut mich verlangen
Nach einem seel'gen End,
Weil ich hie bin umfängen
Mit Trübsal und Elend.
Ich hab' Lust abzuschneiden
Von dieser bösen Welt,
Sehn mich nach ew'gen Freuden,
O Jesu, komm nur bald!

Under this name, "Herzlich thut mich verlangen," this borrowed secular melody soon found its home in the church so completely that for a long time its source was not suspected, and many even now will be surprised to learn that it was not created, but only borrowed, for religious uses. Under this name it is found in all the choral books. But such a pregnant melody, so full of beauty and deep feeling, could not fail to become a favorite theme for harmonic treatment and for contrapuntal development among the German composers, particularly Sebastian Bach, who in the St. Matthew Passion alone has harmonized it in four or five different ways, according to the thought and feeling of the words sung, giving it an altogether peculiar expression in "O Haupt voll Blut und Wunden," — an expression which we confess we missed in the singing of the Parish Choirs.

CONCERTS.

MR. WARREN A. LOCKE, a Harvard graduate of 1869, — a class with more than the usual share of musical members, — after several years of study in Germany, returned last fall and settled down in Cambridge as an organist and teacher of music. On Tuesday evening, May 22, he gave his first concert in Lyceum Hall, assisted by Mr. George L. Osgood, tenor, and Messrs C. N. Allen, violin, Henry Heindl, viola, Wulf Fries, cello, and Alexander Heindl, basso. The audience was large and friendly, a fair representation of Cambridge culture, and included not a few musicians and amateurs from Boston. Mr. Locke presented the following choice bill of fare: —

Quintet in E-flat minor, Op. 87 Hummel.
a. Allegro e risoluto assai. b. Menuetto;
Allegro con fuoco. c. Largo. d. Finale,
Allegro agitato.
Piano-forte, Violin, Viola, 'Cello, Basso.

Songs.
Die Forelle Schubert.
Mondnacht Schumann.
Im Sommer Franz.
Golden rolls beneath me } Rubinstein.
As sings the lark }

Quintet (Forellen-) in A major, Op. 114. Schubert.
a. Allegro vivace. b. Andante. c. Scherzo;
Presto. d. The same con Variazioni. e. Allegro giusto.
Piano-forte, Violin, Viola, 'Cello, Basso.

A sensible programme for a debutant! First, in that he did not present himself with the ambition of a solo-playing virtuoso, but rather, it would seem, for the simple end of taking his stand in public as a respectable musician, well educated and appreciative. Secondly, because his selections were all excellent; and last, not least, because the concert was of reasonable length, precisely one hour and a half. Mr. Locke's skill and taste proved equal to his modesty. It was not a crucial test of an executive pianist to play the comparatively easy piano-forte parts in those two quintets. Yet, while not particularly difficult in a technical sense, they do require a sensitive touch, a sure, firm accent, and much fluency and grace of execution, all which they received at his hands. His playing was characterized by ease and delicacy, and showed a true musical temperament and feeling. He was fortunate also in his string quartet of associate interpreters. The two quintets were well contrasted, and both interesting, though neither of them belonging to the strong, great specimens of the not very numerous class, — not to be compared, for instance, to the E-flat Quintet by Schumann. That by Hummel — the only one he wrote — has all the fluent grace and elegance which characterize his works, with little that is deep in feeling or strikingly imaginative; but it is the work of an artist and a true musician brought up in the very atmosphere of Mozart and of Beethoven; and for us here it had the interest of novelty and freshness, and displayed the young musician to advantage.

Mr. Osgood was in his best voice and mood, and sang all his songs delightfully. He threw a plenty of fervor into Rubinstein's "Golden rolls beneath me," sometimes called by another line: "Oh that it were ever abiding!" And in that singular little "Lark" song, he rose to the climax of its passionate crescendo with such power that it had to be repeated in spite of the strange, almost Mephistophelian anticlimax of the last two lines, for which the poet is responsible: "But Reason bids me silent stand, and holds me back with icy hand" (!). It was well that Mr. Osgood sang Schubert's "Trout" song in its original form, making plain the reason of the title of the "Trout (Forellen) Quintet," which came after. The song was composed in 1817, the quintet two years later. At the end of Schubert's autograph of the song stand these words in his own handwriting: "Dearest friend! It rejoices me exceedingly that my songs please you. As a proof of my sincerest friendship, I send you here another, which I have just this moment written, at Anselm Hüttenbrenner's, at twelve o'clock midnight. I wish that I might form a nearer friendship with you over a glass of punch."

A trout might well be a fit subject for playful variations; and the melody of the song is used for such in the fourth movement of the quintet, being first played in harmony by the quartet of strings, then taken up by the piano-forte, while the strings play flashing trout-like figures of accompaniment, and so on, through kaleidoscopic shiftings of form, and of light and shadow, until at last the melody is sung by one and another of the strings, while the piano-forte gives the original figures of accompaniment. But these variations are hardly more interesting than many portions of the other movements, in which some flashing little figure ever and anon occurs to show you that trout lurking in the background. The opening Allegro has a rich, cool, buoyant character; and the Minuet and Trio are very bright and vivid. We cannot quite agree with Herr Kreissle von Hellborn, who speaks of this as "the melodious but somewhat spiritless piano-forte Quintet, Op. 114."

MISS SELMA BORG's Orchestral Concert at the Music Hall (May 16) was certainly unique and interesting, inasmuch as it presented the singular spectacle of an orchestra conducted by a woman, while the programme, with the exception of the first piece, was composed entirely of Russian, Finnish, and Scandinavian music. All of this had more or less of a Norse flavor, though comparatively few of the selections appeared to belong to the old folk-lore of the North, the greater number of them being manifestly modern and by composers of the present day. Here is the programme:—

1. Organ Solo. "Processional March." (By request) S. B. Whitney.
2. Tenor Songs:
 - a. "Dawn in the Forest" (Finnish) Carl Collan.
 - b. "Russia's Prayer for Freedom." Gustaf Stolpe.
3. Ancient Finnish Folk-Songs arranged for orchestra. "Vasa March" and "March of the Finns," played at the battle of Lützen (1632), when Gustavus Adolphus gave up his life for the cause of Protestantism.
4. Duets:
 - a. "Moonlight" Gunnar Wennerberg.
 - b. "Twilight Hour" Gunnar Wennerberg.
5. Cornet Solos:

Three Finnish songs, arranged by D. W. Reeves.
6. Swedish Wedding March Södermann.
7. Russian National Anthem Liwoff.
8. Contralto Solos:
 - a. "Remembrance" Grieg.
 - b. "The Golden Star" (Finnish) Carl Collan.
9. Overture to the Finnish Opera, "Kullervo" Filip von Schantz.
10. Tenor Songs (Norwegian):
 - a. "Forest Wandering" Grieg.
 - b. "The Young Birch Tree" Grieg.
 - c. "Spring Song" Grieg.
11. Swedish Folk Songs, arranged for Orchestra.
12. a. "Björneborg's March" played by the Finnish Guard before Plevna (1878).
- b. "National Hymn of Finland."

The general impression which we brought away from all this music was of something far less national, distinctive, characteristic, than we had expected. The truth is, we imagine, that the essential traits of all the old peoples' melodies, of whatsoever nationality, have been so much reproduced by modern composers, especially the Germans, that they have become part and parcel of the current musical coin of the world. Doubtless the "Vasa March" and the "March of the Finns," in No. 3 of the programme, are historical, but here we had them only served up incidentally in the midst of a very modern orchestral fantasia. "Björneborg's March," too, and the National Hymn which closed the concert, are no doubt genuine. But the only orchestral music of really artistic character presented was entirely modern; namely: Södermann's "Swedish Wedding March," played by an inadequate, reduced orchestra; the "Russian National Hymn," which, with the roar of the great organ added to the orchestra, had a mighty volume of sonority, but was taken at an inconceivably slow tempo; and von Schantz's Overture to a Finnish Opera. This last was interesting and original, worked up with a great deal of skill, and full of fire; but without Liszt, Wagner, Raff, etc., it never would have been written; it is wholly in the spirit of "the Future."

If we turn to the songs, decidedly the most interesting were the three by Grieg, one of the youngest of the Northern (Norwegian) composers who have passed through the mill at Leipzig. The songs by Collan, Stolpe, Wennerberg, etc., are characterized by sadness and a sentimental sweetness, as well as a certain freshness and simplicity. Those duets, the voices moving in sixths and thirds, seemed to us of much the same character with songs by English composers of some fifty years ago, such as were often heard here in the parlor. The Swedish Folk-Songs (No. 11), played by the orchestra, short little strains, seemed to us more like true wild-flowers of native melody. The contralto songs were sung in a pure rich voice, with true expression by Mrs. C. C. Noyes, and the tenor songs found a good interpreter in Mr. Julius Jordan, who has a light, pure tenor, and a refined style.

For Miss Borg's conducting of the orchestra great allowance must be made, since she had been taken suddenly ill that day on the receipt of alarming news about a dear friend in Russia, unnerving her completely for some hours. Her manner was extremely enthusiastic, seemingly inspired by her country's music; her motions energetic, free, and graceful. She seemed to be acting out the emotions of the music before the orchestra and audience; and how far that might be helpful to the musicians, we are not yet prepared to judge. Nor was it possible, from anything done in that concert, to measure her musicianship. She had the disadvantage of an orchestra too small and made up of rather heterogeneous materials. But at all events the zeal for her native music, which moves her to stand forth as its interpreter and advocate, — a mission not without its sacrifices, — is worthy of respect.

A Piano-forte Concert by pupils of Mr. T. P. CURRIER, at Wesleyan Hall, Friday afternoon, May 16, was another instance of how the tide has turned of late years, even in pupils' concerts, in the direction of sound classical programmes. The general style of performance, too (of what we heard), was worthy of the programme:

1. Overture to "Son and Stranger." Mendelssohn.
(For two pianos, eight hands.)
Misses Fisher, Gould, Osgood, and Turner.
2. Concerto, D minor Mozart.
Romance and Presto. (With second piano accompaniment.)
Miss Osgood.
3. (a.) Venice, Gondolière Jüll.
(b.) Impromptu, Op. 90, No. 2. Schubert.
Miss Gould.
4. Concerto, D minor Mendelssohn.
(With second piano accompaniment.)
Miss Fisher.
5. Rondo, E-flat. Weber.
Miss Osgood.
6. Scherzo, Op. 31. Chopin.
Miss Fisher.

The very satisfactory performances by the two young ladies in the second part showed how much we had lost in not hearing the first part. Miss Fisher's rendering of the D minor Concerto of Mendelssohn was in every way creditable to herself, and to her teacher, who played the accompaniment. She had evidently been taught in a sound method. Her touch is clear and sympathetic, her execution sure and even and equal to all the difficulties of such a work. She played the Chopin Scherzo, too, with not a little fire and brilliancy. Miss Osgood, in the Rondo by Weber, bore equal testimony to good opportunities of instruction well improved. It all seemed like honest, unaffected, faithful work in an artistic direction.

HERR HANS RICHTER, who conducted Wagner's famous orchestra at the last Bayreuth festival, has been giving some orchestral concerts in London, where he has been greatly admired. Especially fine has been his conducting of selections from Wagner's works, which, says The Academy, were given with almost electrical effect. It is announced that he will return to London next season, and conduct a series of eight concerts, in which the nine Symphonies of Beethoven are to be performed in chronological order.

MUSICAL CORRESPONDENCE.

BALTIMORE, MAY 31. — The eleventh series of exhibition concerts of the students at the Peabody Conservatory closed on Thursday last.

The programmes of the three evenings were as follows:—

1. TUESDAY, MAY 27, 1879.
 - (a) Piano-Trio, C major. No. 3 Haydn.
(For piano, violin, and violoncello.)
Miss Ada Swartzwelder.
 - (b) Violin-Sonata, C major. No. 6 Haydn.
(For piano and violin.)
Miss Hallie Edmunds.
 - Violin-Romance, G minor, No. 6. Op. 7 Vieuxtemps.
Mr. Henry Boeckner.
 - (a) Piano-Trio, B-flat major. Op. 11 Beethoven.
(For piano, violin, and violoncello.)
Miss Nora Freeman.
 - (b) Violin-Sonata, E-flat major. Op. 12 Beethoven.
(For piano and violin.)
- Adagio con molto espressione. — Rondo: allegro molto.
Miss Ida Carille.

2. WEDNESDAY, MAY 28.
 - (a) Piano-Trio in C minor. Op. 1. No. 3 Beethoven.
Miss Mary van Bibber.
 - (b) Piano-Quartet in B-flat major. Op. 16 Beethoven.
Miss Helen Todhunter.
 - (c) Piano-Trio in C major. Op. 1. No. 2 Beethoven.
Miss Agnes Hoen.
3. THURSDAY, MAY 29.

Fifteen Variations and Fugue, E-flat major. Op. 35 Beethoven.
(Composed on a theme from the Eroica Symphony. For Piano.)
Mr. Ross Jungnickel.

Fourth Scherzo, G major. Op. 101 G. Satter.
(For piano.)
Miss Susie Moore.

The Queen's Polka. Caprice. A-flat major. Op. 96 J. Raff.
(For piano.)
Mr. Adam Itzel.

Concert-Paraphrase on Verdi's "Rigoletto" Fr. List.
(For piano.)
Miss Sarah Schoenberg.

Serenade for soprano Scuderi.
Miss Mary Arthur.

Romance for baritone T. Mattei.
Mr. Wm. Lincoln.

Separation. Romance for contralto G. Rossini.
Miss Emma Steiner.

Scene and Air from the opera "Nabucco" C. Verdi.
Miss Helen Winternitz.

Air from the opera "Il Guarany" C. Gomes.
Miss Ida Crow.

Duet composed by Miss Emma Steiner.
Misses Winternitz and Crow.

Study for nine voices, in three parts P. Baraldi.
Misses Winternitz, Steiner, Grafin, Moore, Steinbach, Sharp, Crow, Sultzer, and Arthur.

Of course, every one acquitted himself or herself creditably; but those really deserving special mention are the following: The Misses Agnes Hoen, Helen Todhunter, Mary van Bibber, Sarah Schoenberg, and Messrs. Jungnickel and Itzel. The last-named gentleman is about fifteen years of age, I believe, and has evinced much talent, not only in piano performance, but also in other branches of music. His dexterity at the piano is really marvelous in so small a specimen of humanity, whose little hands would seem scarcely capable of striking an octave.

The director left to-day for Copenhagen, to return next fall; and the symphonies of the great masters have been consigned to the shelf for a season to make room for Strauss, Suppé, and Offenbach, at the summer garden concerts opening next week under the direction of Carlberg, with an orchestra of twenty-seven of our own musicians at the Academy.

- CINCINNATI, MAY 14. — As the amusement season is drawing to a close, the remaining orchestral and chamber concerts of the two series are following each other in such rapid succession that only a hasty survey of them is possible in this letter. In the tenth orchestra concert the college choir appeared for the second time in public. The programme comprised
- Symphony No. 1, C minor Johannes Brahms.
Selections from "Ruins of Athens" Beethoven.
(a.) Chorus of Dervishes, Op. 113.
(b.) Turkish March, Op. 113.
(c.) March and Chorus, Op. 114.
- Selections from 2d Act, "Flying Dutchman" Wagner.
Introduction. Spinning Chorus. Ballad and Chorus.
Symphonie Poem. Les Preludes. Liszt.

The Brahms Symphony has been so extensively commented on in your columns that I will not obtrude my opinion of it at length. I cannot refrain from saying, however, that with every hearing of the work the first favorable impression it made on me is deepened. There is an earnestness and nobility pervading every part, a perfection and polish in the detail work, and, it appears to me, often lofty flights of inspiration, which stamp the symphony as being more than the fruit of laborious contrapuntal work. The numerous synopses and shifted rhythmic accents did not produce in me the feeling of unrest and confusion which I experienced when I heard it for the first time. The contrabass, which we boast of having in our orchestra, gives a remarkable sombre coloring to parts of the work, such as is lost entirely if the part is taken by a brass instrument. In the Andante the beautiful tone and phrasing of Mr. Jacobsohn in the solo violin part was a pleasant feature.

The male voices of the college choir in the Chorus of Derivatives were very effective. Accuracy and firmness was noticeable throughout. The Spinning Song from the Flying Dutchman was the best performance with which the college choir has so far favored us. That the chorus following the ballad, especially the Prestissimo, was, in places, somewhat nervous and blurred, I think is to be attributed greatly to the position which the singers must necessarily occupy. The distance which separates the altos from the sopranos is so great that a perfect understanding between the two parts is made extremely difficult. Miss Norton, in attempting the trying role of Senta, took upon herself a very laborious task. The manner in which she sang the ballad was very good throughout, and in some passages highly dramatic, — not a little praise for a comparatively inexperienced singer. Miss Stone, in the part of Mary, assisted the ensemble very creditably. In Les Preludes the orchestra was evidently not so perfectly at home as in the Symphony. I must add that the smooth and accurate rendering of the latter was in striking contrast with the manner in which the same players performed this work in the first concert of the season.

Musicians, especially, had been looking forward to the ninth chamber concert with the greatest interest, for the programme contained, besides the Schumann Quintet, Op. 44, the great Beethoven Quartet, No. 14, Op. 131, in C-sharp minor. So exacting are the demands made on the players in this remarkable composition, that it is very seldom performed. Technically, only virtuosos can do justice to it, while few artists can give an interpretation which will, in a measure even, bring light into its contrapuntal chaos. It is, therefore, a proof of the extraordinary excellence of the rendering of this work, — which is the bone of contention to so many aestheticians, — that after the performance the audience, in the highest enthusiasm, insisted on the reappearance of the artists. And, indeed, it was a deserved tribute, for never have I heard so clear and transparent an interpretation of this intricately constructed work. There was a certainty, a freedom, even in the most difficult numbers, which I failed to notice when I heard this same composition performed by the very best string quartets in Europe. It was a worthy climax to the steady improvement which was marked in every chamber concert. The quintet, with Mr. Singer as pianist, did not show so good an ensemble as we are accustomed to hear. Perhaps it was the expectancy on the part of the performers of the great work to follow, — the quartet, that caused the lack of unity. The tenth chamber concert had for its programme: —

Quartet, Op. 192, "Die schöne Müllerin" Raff.
Sonata, A minor, Op. 19 Rubinstein.
Quintet for Strings, C major, Op. 163 Schubert.
Mr. Doerner, pianist. Mr. Brandt, 'cello.

The Raff Quartet, programme music of the purest water, I could not accept as being anything more than very skillfully "made" music. There are all the effects introduced which so perfect a musician as Raff commands, but true poetry I could not find in the composition. The Rubinstein Sonata, which is widely known, received an excellent interpretation at the hands of Messrs. Doerner and Jacobsohn. The beautiful Schubert Quintet came like a ray of sunlight after so much modern music. Never did I feel so deeply and intensely the dangers to art into which the present tendency of composing is inevitably leading. The unaffected, natural, inspired strains of Schubert stood in striking contrast with the labored, artful efforts of Raff, and the untamed, unbridled passionateness of Rubinstein. The eleventh chamber concert gave us Trio, No. 6 (Serenade), for Flute, Violin, and Viola, Op. 25 Beethoven.

Mr. Wittgenstein, flutist.
Quartet, F major, Op. 37 Xaver Scharwenka.
Sonata, A major, Op. 47 (Kreutzer) Beethoven.
Mr. Schneider, pianist.

The Beethoven Trio is a charming novelty, and shows the wonderful command which Beethoven had over all possible combinations of instruments. The viola is so cleverly employed as to make the absence of a fundamental bass instrument scarcely felt. The quartet by Scharwenka is universally pronounced by European critics to be the best composition of this kind which has been written since Schumann's famous quartets. It contains many beauties, shows the composer to be thoroughly at home in all the technicalities of composing, and above all does not attempt in its construction to improve on the logical and time-honored laws of form. The Kreutzer Sonata was played by Messrs. Schneider and Jacobsohn in most admirable style. Both performers seemed to have one conception of the work, and to command all the means necessary to bring it to the most perfect expression. With every public appearance, Mr. Jacobsohn impresses one more and more as a thorough, conscientious, and poetic artist. Mr. Schneider, one of our very best pianists here, proved himself both in the quartet and sonata to be an excellent ensemble player.

Quite an event to the lovers of piano music was the arrival of Mr. Wm. H. Sherwood, who was announced to give two recitals. Unfortunately, the welcome which it was the intention of the Musical Club to give him could not be extended, on account of his absence from the city on the day appointed for the meeting. While the programmes prepared by Mr. Sherwood could not but attract the attention of musicians, the circumstance that an enviable reputation preceded him assisted in bringing to the recitals every prominent pianist in the city. On the first evening Mr. Jacobsohn assisted in the E-flat Sonata, Op. 12, and in the Kreutzer Sonata by Beethoven; on the second, Mr. Doerner took part in the Andante and Variations, Op. 46, of Schumann. The other principal numbers were Fantasia and Fugue in G minor, Bach; Sonata, Op. 111, Beethoven; Etudes Symphoniques, Schumann; besides compositions of Handel, Rheinberger, Chopin, Liszt, and others. Mr. Sherwood's playing has been so often spoken of in your columns that it is certainly unnecessary for me to give vent to the enthusiastic admiration for it, which I only share with all the other pianists, without exception, who heard these two recitals. When the most trying feats of modern virtuosity are so completely mastered that they are almost lost sight of, even as a factor only, in the reproducing of a work, but above all, when a healthy sentiment and noble dignity pervades the interpretation of an art work, when this interpretation appears to be more the result of momentary inspiration than of long and laborious study, — then the highest pinnacle in reproductive art has been reached. And these excellences appear in Mr. Sherwood's playing. The pianists of our city have been accused of unfairness because they in the past did not show themselves willing to give adulation to virtuosos who dazzle with brilliancy of execution, but substitute for true sentiment affected mannerism. The genuine heartiness and pleasure with which they accord to Mr. Sherwood unstinted praise and admiration, I hope, will not fail to disprove that charge. — With the pleasant spring days the attendance on Mr. Whiting's organ recitals is constantly on the increase. He continues to offer choice programmes made up of the standard classic organ compositions, as well as of interesting novelties, in the executing of which nothing remains to be desired other than a hall which would permit of a more thorough appreciation of their beauties. Of the elaborate preparations for the Saengerfest of the North American Saengerbund I will speak in my next letter, as they are of a nature to demand attention.

CHICAGO, MAY 28. — Since my last letter I have had the pleasure of hearing Mr. William H. Sherwood play two important programmes of piano-forte music, consisting of the following numbers: Chromatique Fantasia and Fugue, Bach; Concerto in A minor, Op. 54, Schumann (orchestral part on a second piano-forte, by Mr. H. Clarence Eddy); Impromptu in A-flat, Op. 29, Etude in B minor, Op. 25, No. 10, Waltz in B minor, Op. 69, and the larger one in A-flat, Op. 34, — all of Chopin; "Moment Musical," of Moszkowski; "Perpetual Motion," Weber-Brahms; "Faust Waltz," Gounod-Liszt; Sonata, Op. 111, Beethoven; Kreisleriana, Nos. 1 and 5, Romance in F-sharp, Op. 28, "Vogel als Prophet," and "Ende vom Lied," Op. 12, — all of Schumann; the "Fire Fugue" of Hindel; Etudes, Op. 10, and Notturmo, Op. 48, Chopin; "Walderauschen," and Grand Polonaise in E major, of Liszt; "Toccata di Concerto," Op. 36, August Dupont; "Lohengrin's Verweis an Elsa," and "Isolden's Liebes-Tod," Wagner-Liszt; and an Allegro, Op. 5, by the pianist himself. As one reviews the long list of difficult and interesting numbers, and considers what a ground they cover, and what a variety of schools and composers they represent, he must fairly acknowledge that to play them all from memory, and in an intelligent and perfect manner, would indeed require an accomplished artist. Such a performer we had in Mr. Sherwood, and it will be with the most sincere admiration that we shall remember his visit to our city. For he not only gave us great enjoyment, but afforded some of our young pianists the needed opportunity of hearing good interpretations of celebrated classical works. I have not seen one adverse criticism, or heard a word, except in approval of his fine performances; and, indeed, our city papers and the intelligent music-lovers have all extended to him the fullest praises for the enjoyment he has given us.

Personally, I enjoyed his fugue playing, and his interpretation of the Schumann Concerto, together with his Chopin and Beethoven selections, the best of all the music he gave us. The brilliancy and difficulty of the Liszt numbers may dazzle for a time, and perhaps half carry one away in the mad whirl of exciting contrasts; but in the quiet moments, when music lingers as a delightful memory, the rich harmonies, the grand melodies, and classic forms of the old masters, seem, after all, the best. Modern invention in musical form may partake of the spirit of the age, and give us a new sensation as the "music of the future" bursts upon our ears, and we may listen with no little delight to its varied novelties; but, after all, the heart goes back to the old masters to find its resting-place, and to reach the fullest scope of enjoyment. Mr. Sherwood played the Liszt music with fire and passion, and his audience seemed carried away by the brilliancy of his performance; but I trust that he will not allow the enthusiasm of a delighted public to tempt him to make intensity his principal aim; for to calm his listeners into sympathy with the lovely compositions of the old masters, even if all applause is hushed into the happy silence of contentment, does more for the advancement of his art, and his own progress as an artist.

The last of the "Hershey Hall Popular Concerts" presented a programme that contained some fine numbers: the most particularly notable being Brahms's Piano forte Concerto in D minor, Op. 15, which was played by Mrs. Clara Von Klenge; the Toccata in F, Bach; and "Morceau de Concert," Op. 24, Guilman, performed on the organ by Mr. H. Clarence Eddy. The Brahms Concerto was played in a very musician-like manner; yet, although it contains some quite interesting music, it did not (to my mind) seem worthy of all the study it must have cost to prepare it for a public performance. With an orchestral accompaniment, it would doubtless be much more pleasing; and I regret that we were obliged to hear it for the first time with only a second piano-forte as a substitute. Mr. Eddy's organ playing is always so artistic in its finish, and we have become so accustomed to hearing him do everything he attempts so well, that not unfrequently his performances are passed over without according to him the high praise so justly his due. On Saturday last he reached his ninety-sixth organ recital, presenting a splendid programme of great magnitude. The principal selections were: "Introduction and Double Fugue, Op. 41, Merkel; Choral Prelude, Bach; Chorus from Sinbad Mater of Pergolesi; "Cantabile" in G minor, Ph. Em. Bach; Largo, of Haydn; Prelude in C. G. J. Vogler; Concerto, Op. 5 (new), E. Prout; an organ sketch, "The Lake," Dr. Spark; "Elegy Fugue," Op. 42, Guilman; and a Duet, "Fest-in-trade," Op. 76, Dr. Volkmar. In the last number he had the assistance of a talented pupil, Mr. A. F. McCanell.

Mr. Carl Wolfsohn brought his series of historical piano-forte recitals to a close last Saturday, presenting selections from the following modern composers: Gernsheim, Tschalkowsky, Grieg, Von Bülow, and Scharwenka. These recitals have afforded the piano-forte student a fine opportunity to become acquainted with a large variety of new works, and also to hear a number of very old compositions but seldom played.

Although the musical season is drawing to its close, we are yet to have the Messiah of Handel from the Apollo Club; Verdi's Requiem from the Beethoven Society; two concerts by Wilhelmj and a number of smaller entertainments, before the midsummer days quiet us to rest. Of these as they approach. C. H. B.

NOTES AND GLEANINGS.

WELLESLEY COLLEGE. — The 52d Concert (fourth series) consisted of an Organ Recital by Prof. C. H. Morse, with the following programme: —

Sonata in B-flat. Op. 65-4 Mendelssohn.
Benediction Nuptiale Saint-Saëns.
Allegretto grazioso Tours.
Passacaglia in C minor Bach.
Christmas Song Adam-Whiting.
Grand Choeur Guilmant.
Adagio, Duo Sonata. Op. 80 Merkel.

(Arranged as solo by C. H. Morse.)

"Star Spangled Banner" J. K. Paine.

The 50th Concert was given Saturday evening, April 26, with Mr. E. B. Perry pianist and Mrs. J. W. Weston vocalist. The 51st consisted of an Organ Recital by Prof. C. H. Morse, with the following interesting programme: Bach, Fantasia and Fugue, G minor, bk. II.; Mendelssohn, Notturmo, "Midsummer Night's Dream," Op. 61 (arranged by Warren); Wagner, Choral, "Meistersinger"; Guilman, Invocation; Gounod, March Romaine; Jensen, Bridal Song, from Op. 45 (arranged by Warren); Beethoven, "Air du Dauphin"; Guilman, March Funèbre et Chant Seraphique (by request).

Suppé's buffo opera, Boccaccio, has met with little success in Leipzig.

Owing to continued indisposition, Mme. Gerster and Mme. Christine Nilsson were again unable to appear last week at Her Majesty's Theatre.

Provided with new and hitherto unused materials, Dr. Bernhard Stave, now of Görlitz, is about to publish a Biography of Chopin. (How many more?)

Wagner has completed the composition of Parsifal, the first performance of which is fixed for August, 1881, at Bayreuth. (Twenty-four months are required for rehearsal!)

Herr von Hülsen, accompanied by Herr Eckert, has visited Hamburg to hear Goldmark's Königin von Saba, with a view to its production at the Royal Opera House, Berlin.

Honors and attentions continue to flow in upon Miss Thurbury since her triumph in Paris. Paedeloup has had a medal struck and presented to her, and the "artistic society" have sent her a magnificent card receiver in bronze. Miss Thurbury recently sang for Ambrose Thomas of the Paris Conservatory, and he has written her a letter such as Patti or Nilsson would be proud to receive. Gounod was to give her a complimentary dinner; and numberless offers from opera managers have been tendered her, which she has declined, insisting that the concert is her true field.

BOSTON, JUNE 21, 1879.

CONTENTS.

SANZIO. Stuart Sterne	97
LETTERS OF HECTOR BERLIOZ	97
PALESTRINA. W. N. E.	99
HANDL AND HAYDN SOCIETY. Report of the President, C. C. Perkins, at the Annual Meeting	100
TALES OF ART: SECOND SERIES. From Instructions of Mr. William M. Hunt to his Pupils. VIII.	101
SOME THOUGHTS ON MUSICAL EDUCATION. II. William F. Apthorp	101
CONCERTS	102
Boyleston Club. — Mr. Edward B. Perry's Piano Recital. Musical Correspondence	108
Chicago. — Milwaukee. — Wilkesbarre, Pa. NOTES AND GLEANINGS	108

All the articles not credited to other publications were expressly written for this Journal.

Published fortnightly by HOUGHTON, OSGOOD AND COMPANY, 220 Devonshire Street, Boston. Price, 10 cents a number; $2.50 per year.

For sale in Boston by CARL PRUEFER, 30 West Street, A. WILLIAMS & Co., 283 Washington Street, A. K. LORING, 369 Washington Street, and by the Publishers; in New York by A. BRENTANO, JR., 39 Union Square, and HOUGHTON, OSGOOD & Co., 21 Astor Place; in Philadelphia by W. H. BAKER & Co., 1102 Chestnut Street; in Chicago by the CHICAGO MUSIC COMPANY 512 State Street.

SANZIO.

BY STUART STERNE, AUTHOR OF "ANGELO."

(Continued from page 90.)

Thus he reached his horse,
Yet mounted not, but bade the docile creature
Follow, as he walked slowly on. For now,
Most loath to think each step must bear him off
Further from her, he loitered by the way,
Noted how grass and flower and budding tree
Were hung with glistening dew, where the sun,
That had crept upward for a goodly space
Behind the woods, since he had passed before,
Had kissed the drops away; watched the blithe birds,
That softly twittering flew from twig to twig,
Full of gay bustle for their new-made nests,
And the swift, busy bee, that crossed his path
In quest of early honey for her queen;
And listened to the lark, lost in the depth
Of stainless blue, so high above she seemed
Only another spark of radiant light,
And her loud, jubilant carol quivered down
But like a far, faint echo to the earth, —
Felt in each fibre of his soul the rapture
Of all the budding, swelling, bursting life
Of spring and early morn. And then he thought
Of the great victory that was his. A week,
A whole glad week, and who could tell, perchance!
She would be near him, with him, — he should see
Her fair young face a thousand joyful times!
His heart o'erflowed with sudden happiness,
And on the forest's edge perceiving then
Two little bright-hued flowers, brimful of dew,
He flung himself upon the ground beside them,
And pressed his face into the sparkling grass,
And kissed in silent, tender ecstasy, —
For, oh, were they not like her sweetest eyes! —
The quivering golden petals.

Then sprang up
And sped far out upon the rolling plain,
And tossed his cap into the sunny air,
And gayly struck his horse's flank, and cried:
"Go, friend, and dream a moment thou wert free,
As thy wild brothers in the far-off East!"
Half startled by the unlooked-for touch, the horse
Broke from him, and in circles far and wide,
The noble head thrown back, the long dark mane
Streaming behind, galloped with playful gambols,
Now near, now distant, round and round the field,
His master watching him with smiling mien.
But suddenly the joyous mirthfulness
Faded from out his face, and, as ahammed
Of all these boyish pranks, he gravely said:
"Enough, enough, good friend, for both of us!"
And calling to the horse, who willingly
Obeyed the well-known voice and trotted up,
He swiftly leaped into the saddle now,
And mutely, without further word or pause,
Rode towards the city. In his ear there rang,
It seemed to him, in changeless tune the words:
O Sanzio, Sanzio, foolish boy! 'Tis not
The first time thou hast known such ecstasies,
Nor all the bitter pangs that follow after!
Wherefore, wherefore! And when and what the end!

He had made good his word, and searched the town
From end to end for Anna, but in vain

No trace of her or of the noble house
That she had served he found, yet none the less
He sent the message out that all was well.
For might not he play that grand lord awhile,
And Nina take the cousin's name and part?
Kind Heaven would surely pardon him this sin,
If sin it were! He vowed by all the saints
No harm should come of this; he looked on her
As a most precious charge, — and oh, he could
Not thus renounce this hope!

So she arrived
On the appointed day, and had been lodged
In a small, pretty chamber, close to where Old Nina had her solitary room;
Yet knew not that the stately, marble mansion
She gazed at wonderingly was Sanzio's home.
For, fearful lest it startle her to learn
The same roof sheltered both of them, he kept
His secret well; and for dear love of him
The good old woman too, what though in doubt
She shook her head with many a troubled sigh,
Betrayed him not, — reluctantly performed
The service he implored as best she might.
And thus the whole glad day was passed with her,
The sweetness of whose presence seemed each hour
A deeper need, that his impassioned soul
Craved with more thirst and hunger; while she too
Beheld him ever, listened for his step,
With fonder joy in her bright eyes.

For now,
While yet the earth and air, the sun and sky,
Were so divinely fair that no frail mortal
Could turn a deaf ear to their siren song,
He came for her betimes; she found him oft
In the great kitchen, waiting patiently,
When she with cousin Anna, hastening home,
Returned from early mass. And then through all
The fresh young morning, and the long bright hours
Of afternoon, they wandered through the city,
He showing her its wonders, and well nigh
As full of gay delight as she herself,
To whom all things were new and passing fair,
And who, like some glad, eager child, drank in
And marveled and rejoiced at all. He led her
To many a stately church and noble palace
That was adorned by the immortal work
Of his own busy hands, — sometimes aglow
In wall and ceiling with rich tints and lines
Of hundred beauteous faces and fair forms,
Angels and saints and cherubs, nymphs and gods,
And sometimes guarding, like a priceless gem,
But one great master-piece with jealous care.
Then he stood by content, and smiling watched
How Benedetta speedily lost herself
In deepest contemplation, often thus
Resting in rapt and speechless silence long,
And then, perchance, looked up at him at last
With shining eyes, and drew a long, glad breath;
And when he pleased to question her, she spoke Freely of all that moved her soul, while he Marvelled with what most subtle comprehension
She reached the finest essence of his art,
And fancied that no loud applause or praise,
Lavished by all the great ones of the earth,
Had ever swelled his heart with such proud joy
As the soft, simple words from those sweet lips,
That were as music to his ear.

And once,
When they went homeward through the streets at eve,
She said to him: "Oh, Sanzio, and to think
Your single soul conceived, your single hand
Poured out before us, all this wondrous beauty!
When I remember it, I venture scarce
To touch your hand or look upon your face.
Oh, you are passing great! Methinks the town,
Nay, all the whole wide world, is filled with you,
And you alone! The very stones and trees,
The sunshine and the winds repeat your name,
Tell of your fame and glory! Ay, see there!"
Pointing to where a flock of snowy doves
Circled above them, "How most fair and pure
They look with their white wings against the blue!
I fancy even they in their glad flight
Are cooling but of you!"

And he, half laughing,
What though he yearned to clasp her, then and there,
Close to his heart: "Oh, no, they surely have Some better and more pleasing song than that!"
And then more gravely, "Nay, my child, believe,
Though God has granted me some power, perchance,
The throne you build for me is far too high!
There's one at least, in this blest land of ours,
As great as I, — nay, greater, thousandfold,
To whom I humbly bend a willing knee,
And call him Master!" Gayly then once more:
"I've never heard the trees and sunshine say
What you, sweet dreamer, now report of them,
But I shall be content, my Benedetta,
If only you will oft and oft repeat
My name to sun and stars!"

Urged by his prayers
She had renounced all colder titles soon,

And shyly first, ere long as quietly
As though it were the wont of all her life,
Called him but simply Sanzio, and with this,
For all her delicate, maidenly reserve,
Warned to a timid yet familiar frankness,
Drew close to him with a sweet, childlike trust,
A tender and undoubting confidence,
That unto Sanzio's fine-strung soul appeared
Sacred as heaven itself.

If, rambling thus,
Sanzio met those he knew, — and he could scarce
Move for ten paces, Benedetta thought,
Ere some one greeted him, and stopped to chat, —
He said she was a distant little cousin,
Come for a week to town to see its sights.
And did it chance to be one of the friends
Out with him that glad day he saw her first, —
She knew them all, and frankly bent her head
In gentle salutation; who stood still
And gazed at them with widely opened eyes,
And a loud Ah! but half suppressed, — Sanzio
Would check them with a finger on his lip,
And an appealing glance towards her. They all
Left them ere long and wandered off again;
But one, Count Baldassar she heard him called,
Would stay and talk awhile to Benedetta,
With such grave kindness that her grateful heart
Went swiftly out to him.

Thus had sped by
The golden hours unbecked and untold,
Two days and three and four; the greater part
Of the brief time, too charily granted them,
Fled like one moment, and yet was the end
Of Benedetta's coming unfulfilled,
And the Madonna waited still in vain
The loan of her sweet face, who had not once
E'en looked upon the canvas from afar,
For Sanzio scarce through all these days had touched Pencil or brush, and Nina, marveling much
At this unwonted idleness in him,
Rejoiced in secret.

But one afternoon, —
The day was not so fair, for showery clouds
Had dappled all the sky, and hid the sun,
And darkened the broad window of his work-room, —
He sat alone and labored long and hard
On his great picture, for to-morrow noon
He must have Benedetta come at length,
Or the last day would vanish unemploy'd.
Ay, but by what device, — how bring her here,
And not betray his secret? Leaning back
To view his work, he puzzled with a smile
Long o'er the knotty question. Then sprang up,
Flung brush and palette down, and stretched his limbs,
And striding up and down, sang half aloud
Snatches of some gay song, and so heard not
A timid tap upon his door; and finding
No answer reached her ear, she who had knocked,
Stood waiting patiently outside unseen,
Listening with gladness to the soft, rich voice,
That rolled so bravely forth the melody
Bearing the burden of the happy words
She easily caught: —

"What were more glorious than the balmy night, Radiant with moon and star?" —
"The rosy morn, dear heart, whose golden beam Breaks o'er the hills afar!"

"What fairer than the autumn's purple tints,
When summer heats are done?" —
"The spring, whose thousand bursting buds proclaim
New life begun!"

He paused, and she made bold
To tap again. "Enter!" he loudly cried,
But turned his picture over to the wall.
And the door opened, and a well-known head
Peered in half timidly, while he exclaimed,
Hastening to draw her in: "My Benedetta!
Welcome, a thousand times!" And she in turn,
"Yea, Sanzio! Ah, methought I knew your voice,
Though I have never heard you sing before,
And you sing well! Yet pray how can it be," —
But suddenly broke off her words, forgot
To end the phrase, as gazing round she clapped
Her hands in wonder and delight, and cried:
"Oh, what a strange, great place! And may I stay
And see it all?"

(To be continued.)

LETTERS OF HECTOR BERLIOZ.

DR. EDOUARD HANSLICK has written an article in the Neue freie Presse upon the letters of Hector Berlioz, which the London Musical World translates as follows: —

A collection of more than one hundred and fifty letters of Berlioz, under the title of "Correspondance inédite de Hector Berlioz," has just been published by Calman Lévy in Paris. Long anxiously expected, it appears very opportunely at the present moment when Berlioz has suddenly become a popular and great man in his native land. To achieve the fame for which he so ardently and so vainly yearned — says Daniel Bernard, the editor of the Correspondance — Berlioz had only to do something exceedingly simple — to die. In Germany Berlioz was looked up to as a genial composer at a time when people in France ignored or ridiculed him; perhaps, on the other hand, we in Germany consider the enthusiasm for him which has now blazed up among the French as something exaggerated and forced. But no matter; his original and powerful individuality exerts the same degree of attraction on Germans and French alike, and wherever people care for music Berlioz's letters, now first made public, will be read with interest.

The purport of the very first letter in the collection is remarkable: young Berlioz offers Ignatius Pleyel, the Paris music-publisher, some concertante Potpourris on Italian melodies. It is a well-known fact that Wagner, too, though, like Berlioz, an opponent incarnate of all music written merely to amuse, and the foe of the Italians, furnished Paris publishers with similar arrangements to earn his living. Why are we less astonished at seeing Haydn and Mozart perform petty mercenary work than at beholding Berlioz and Wagner do the same thing? Because we know the former as the most universal and at the same time most unpretending of all artists; as men to whom nothing human or musical was foreign. Compared with them, Wagner and Berlioz appear one-sided in their idealism, impatient and proud. Many letters, dating from the most glowing years of Berlioz's youth, interest us doubly from being addressed to Ferdinand Hiller. To Hiller, his "dear Ferdinand," young Berlioz pours out more willingly than to any one else his heart, oppressed with a mad passion. The object of this youthful love was, as we were aware, the English actress, Miss Smithson, who at that period knew nothing of her secret worshiper, and did not make his personal acquaintance until three years later (1832), on his return from Italy. The outbursts of despairing love in these letters sometimes border on madness. What a fortunate thing it was, we exclaim involuntarily, that the highly gifted youth should have been extricated as though by a higher than merely human hand from this hopeless amorous distress, and as "first prizeman of the Paris Conservatory" sent, with a stipend from the state, for two years to Italy! What a fortunate thing, — yes, had Berlioz understood and appreciated it in the same way as other mortals! His sojourn in Rome was torture, insupportable captivity; he abridged it almost forcibly to hurry back to Paris, find out Miss Smithson, and marry her. "She possessed," he says, "on our wedding day nothing in the world, save debts; I myself had only three hundred francs which a friend lent me, and I was again on bad terms with my family." The match did not prove a happy one; after some years of mutual vexations and misunderstandings the couple separated.

We are fully acquainted through his Mémoires with everything relating to Berlioz's stay in Rome; the Letters before us add nothing essential. Only the unusually cordial and almost sentimental tone in which Berlioz writes of Mendelssohn, under the immediate impression of their friendly intercourse, came on us with refreshing effect. It stands out very strongly from the cool reserve which Berlioz observes with regard to Mendelssohn in the Mémoires written five and thirty years later. In Berlioz's "Roman captivity" the acquaintance of Felix Mendelssohn-Bartholdy was like a bright ray of light. "He is an admirable young fellow," writes Berlioz in 1831 from Rome; "his talent of reproduction is as great as his musical genius, and that is saying a great deal. All I have heard from him has charmed me; I firmly believe he is one of the highest musical natures of the present epoch. He has been my cicerone here; every morning I called upon him, when he played me one of Beethoven's sonatas and we sang Gluck's "Armida," after which he took me to all the celebrated ruins, which, I confess, made little impression upon me. He has one of those candid souls with which we meet only very seldom indeed." In several subsequent letters, also, Berlioz speaks of Mendelssohn with equal warmth. "Has Mendelssohn arrived?" he inquires of F. Hiller, and continues: "He has enormous, extraordinary, wonderful talent. I cannot be suspected of partisanship in speaking thus, for he has frankly told me that of my music he understands absolutely nothing. He is a thoroughly original character, and still believes in something; he is a little cool in his manner, but I am very fond of him, though, perhaps, he does not imagine so." These are charming words, and honorable to both. M. Daniel Bernard should have taken example by them, instead of most unworthily insulting, in his preface, Mendelssohn's character. Mendelssohn entertained for Berlioz's compositions a decided and unconquerable dislike, which must appear very intelligible to every one familiar with Mendelssohn's music. M. Bernard, however, finds the real ground of this antipathy in the professional envy felt by Mendelssohn, who was "as jealous as a tiger," though he had no presentiment "that Berlioz would one day dispute with him the palm of musical fame." Mendelssohn envious, jealous, — and of Berlioz! It is too absurd. In Germany every one knows that Mendelssohn was in truth a "candid soul," and the French may take Berlioz's word for the fact. M. Daniel Bernard should, on the contrary, have dwelt eulogistically on two facts in Mendelssohn's conduct: in the first place, the genuinely colleague-like and friendly readiness to oblige, which he always, in Rome as subsequently in Leipsic, manifested toward Berlioz; and, secondly, the frankness with which he avowed his repugnance to the musical tendency followed by the Frenchman. Such a manful love of truth should be doubly prized in our age of conventional compliments. And Berlioz himself did so prize it, though not without a bitter taste, which we can well understand, on the tongue for "Mendelssohn," he writes from Leipsic, in 1843, to a Parisian friend, "never said a single word to me about my Symphonies, my Overtures, or my Requiem." In his inmost heart, Berlioz, too, was a true and honest nature. Unfortunate circumstances compelled him unluckily, as the critic of the Journal des Débats, to mask not seldom his convictions; this was difficult and painful for him. For Mendelssohn it would have been impossible.¹

For us Austrians it is interesting to learn that among other persons whose acquaintance Berlioz made in Rome was a talented man named Mr. de Sauer. This was evidently our Joseph Dessauer. "He insists on introducing me to Bellini, though I oppose the project might and main. La Sonnambula, which I heard yesterday, doubles my repugnance to form this acquaintanceship." "Oh," says he, in concluding this letter, which is addressed to Hiller, "you must yourself be in Italy to form any conception of what they here dare to call music!" On every occasion does he give vent to his hatred of Italian music. Frequently, however, in the midst of his rage he remembers that he helped in Rome to found a philosophical club entitled, "Ecole de l'Indifférence absolue en Matière universelle." This joke, beneath which lies concealed a piece by no means to be despised of practical philosophy, reëchoes frequently and long afterwards in what he says and does; only, unfortunately, he of all men was the least fitted really to observe in practice the condition of "absolute indifference." He never ceases to be angry with Rossini for always saying: "Qu'est-ce que ça me fait?"

Through Robert Schumann, who, as a critic, first directed attention to Berlioz, the latter's relations with Germany began to grow more animated. He addressed (February, 1837) a long letter to Schumann, thanking him for the interest he had displayed, and speaking of the pleasant hours Liszt had procured the writer by performing for him Schumann's pianoforte pieces. A few letters from Leipsic, Prague, and Breslau please us by the happy mood in which Berlioz discourses of his personal success in Germany, but they contain nothing new for any one acquainted with the exhaustive travelling-letters included in the Mémoires. We were surprised at the statement made by Berlioz (page 142), that serious steps were taken in Vienna to secure him for the post previously held by Joseph Weigl, the Imperial Capellmeister, then just deceased. The notification that he would not be granted annual leave of absence to visit Paris induced him, we are told, definitively to decline the offer. Unfortunately every trace is wanting which could lead to the corroboration of this strange story. Apart from the fact that Berlioz did not understand a word of German, he could scarcely be considered especially adapted for the post of Capellmeister at the Court of Vienna. During the following years most of the letters are from London, where Berlioz always met with a most flattering reception as an artist, and where, too, he used to do well pecuniarily. He speaks, therefore, of the English and their musical intelligence by no means badly, though

¹ "I wish you could hear the new opera by Billella, the celebrated English professor of the piano," writes Berlioz on the 13th November, 1857, to his friend, A. Morel. "Do not believe one word of the moderate encomiums which my to-day's feuilleton contains concerning it! On the contrary, I had to exert the greatest control over myself to write even calmly about it."

P. S. Billella was not a professor of the pianoforte; nor was (or is) he an Englishman (however "celebrated"); nor is (or was) his name spelt "Billella." — D. B.

he might have been expected to do so. He judges the French public with merciless severity; nay, from his letters we can plainly perceive his embittered feeling as an artist and his wrath against his country increasing year by year. "Did I ever see at my concerts in Paris people belonging to good society, men and women, touched and affected, as in Germany and Russia? To behold nothing around me save stupidity, indifference, ingratitude, or alarm,—such is my lot in Paris. France, from a musical point of view, is only a land of cretins." "In England the wish to love music is at any rate true and lasting." In London he was especially charmed by Wilhelmine Clauss (now Mme. Szvarvady), the pianist, who performed Mendelssohn's G minor concerto with such wondrous purity of style that, despite her youth, she struck him as "the first eminent musician-and-pianist [pianiste musicienne] of the day."

There now appeared a new personage, destined to agitate strongly and painfully the later years of Berlioz's life: Richard Wagner. The letter addressed to Wagner (the only one so addressed in the collection) is dated Paris, September, 1853, and written in the most friendly tone. Still, despite all the reserve regarding Wagner's compositions, there is about it a foretaste of that sharp polemical spirit which subsequently called forth the well-known "Public Letter" to Wagner, and finally blazed up into passionate hostility. It is in answer to a communication from Wagner, who had probably requested that some of Berlioz's scores might be sent him at Lucerne. This interesting document, with the omission of a few immaterial passages, is well deserving a place here. Berlioz writes:—

"MY DEAR WAGNER,—Your letter afforded me great pleasure. You are not wrong in deploring my ignorance of the German language, and what you say about its being an impossibility for me to appreciate your works is what I have said very many times to myself. The flower of an expression fades nearly always under the weight of the translation, however delicately the latter may be made. There are accents in true music which require their special word, and there are words which require their own accent. To separate one from the other, or to give approximations, is to have a puppy suckled by a goat and reciprocally. But what is to be done? I experience a diabolical difficulty in learning languages; I can scarcely say I know a few words of English and Italian. . . . So you are engaged in melting the glaciers by the composition of your Nibelungen! It must be superb to write thus in presence of Nature in her grandeur! . . . That is another delight which is refused me. Fine landscapes, lofty mountain-tops, and the grand aspect of the sea, completely absorb me, instead of evoking the manifestation of my thought. At such times I feel without being able to express. I cannot draw the moon except by looking at her image in a well. I have your Lohengrin; if you could manage to let me have Tannhäuser, you would do me a great favor. . . . Were we to live another hundred years or so, I believe we should get the better of many things and of many men."

The more widely and more loudly Wagner's fame spread, the more violent became the opposition on the part of Berlioz. In the year 1858, he writes of Hans von Bülow: "This young man is one of the most fervent disciples of the insensate school called in Germany the School of the Future. They will not give in, and are absolutely bent on my being their chief and standard-bearer. I say nothing, and I write nothing; people of sense will be able to see how much truth there is in the matter." On the morning after the celebrated failure of Tannhäuser at the Grand Opera, Paris, Berlioz cannot suppress, in a letter to Mme. Massart, a wild cry of joy. And, after the fearful disturbance at the second performance, he exclaims, as though relieved: "As for myself, I am cruelly avenged!" It is something lamentable to see the bitter spirit caused by his own professional fate dulling so sharp a mind and clouding his judgment. Not only is he influenced by the fact that the scene of confusion enacted by the Parisians at the performance of Tannhäuser was a piece of black-guardism planned beforehand, but, in his hatred for the "Music of the Future" he likewise fails to perceive the undeniably close relationship connecting that music with his own. At first it was Berlioz's orchestral works which influenced the younger Wagner; afterwards, inverting the order of things, Berlioz (in his opera of Les Troyens) was influenced by Wagner, if not by his music, at any rate by his principles. His prophetic eye which foresaw that his own music, then neglected there, would one day be appreciated in France, was blind to a similar claim when advanced by an artist connected with him by affinity; blind to the possible future of the "Music of the Future" in France. The time for Der Fliegende Holländer, Tannhäuser, and Lohengrin will come for France as surely as it has come for Italy. Nay, if R. Wagner is not already performed in Paris, political antipathies alone are the reason. Musically the way has been perfectly smoothed there for the composer of Tannhäuser, and by no one more than — by the resuscitated Berlioz himself!

Berlioz's letters, agreeing with his life, become sadder and sadder, more and more miserable, as they approach the end of the volume. He buries his second wife (formerly Mlle. Récio, the singer, who accompanied him on his concert-tours to Vienna and Prague) and is doomed to survive his only son, Louis, who was a seaman, and dies far away on some distant sea. For the last great and unalloyed pleasure of his life he was, according to his own assertion, indebted to Vienna. In answer to Herbeck's invitation he visited the Austrian capital towards the end of 1866 (that is, about two years before his death) to conduct in the large Redoutensaal his dramatic symphony, La Damnation de Faust, previously unknown to the Viennese. Perfectly delighted, and, writing to a Parisian friend, he speaks in these terms of the performance and its brilliant results: "I had three hundred chorus singers and one hundred and fifty musicians; a charming Marguerite, 'Mlle. Bettelheim,' whose mezzo-soprano voice is splendid; a tenor Faust (Walter), such as we do not possess in Paris; and an energetic Mephisto, Mayerhofer. Herbeck, who is a first-class conductor, has doubled, tenfolded, manifolded himself for me. My room is never free from visitors and persons coming to congratulate me. This evening a grand banquet, at which two or three hundred persons will be present, is to be given in my honor. In a word, what can I say? This has been the greatest musical pleasure of my life!" With this bright and harmonious chord we will take leave of the noble and much-tried artist's book, otherwise so full of dissonances.

PALESTRINA.

(From the Programme of the Boylston Club Concert, June 4, 1879.)

GIOVANNI PIERLUIGI DA PALESTRINA was born in 1524. Of his early life little is known except that his family was obscure and his resources very small. Of his intellectual and spiritual life, his works, to those who read them aright, are a full and satisfying expression. He was appointed Master of the Chapel by Pope Julius III. in 1551, and then practically began the work which has rendered him illustrious.

The age in which he lived was a crisis in the history of music. Secular influences had debased that school from which was developing the later German classical school. It was of supreme importance to the future of music that the purity of that school should be restored. In this extremity appeared Palestrina, and by the beauty of his works and the sturdy truthfulness of his musical inspirations, he impressed himself so thoroughly on his own age that the wisest and the best united in styling him the "Prince of Music." He created a style so imposing, so pure and so expressive, that for the long period of a hundred years the Palestrina school held undivided sway over the musical thought of the world. He opened the path, by following which the most beautiful and most touching works have been produced.

The music of Palestrina recalls the heroic ages of history. He is the Homer of musical literature. Simple, yet never trivial; learned, but without pedantry; rich, yet always natural; quiet, but never weak, his music has the characteristics which distinguish the great epics. The bard for the honor of whose birth seven cities contended is not more simple, grand, and irresistible in his poems than is Palestrina in his masses, and the influence of the one in the domain of literature is not more ennobling and permanent than that of the other in the realm of music.

In order to estimate the beauty of Palestrina's music, it is especially necessary that we should know beforehand for what beauty to look, and be possessed with the spirit in which he wrought; for there is no modern standard by which to judge him. In his sphere he stands alone; and so far removed from the spirit of our times that it may be of service to some who are not familiar with his works to suggest what is to be found in them.

We find in Palestrina, then, the profoundest knowledge of musical science employed in expressing with purity and simplicity the fervent emotions of a devout soul. This expression is usually in the form of melodies of the subtlest emotional character, crossing and recrossing, weaving a texture of harmonies as rich as they are surprising and beautiful; a style of imposing grandeur; a perfect adaptation of music to the spirit of the words; an earnest, chaste, and exalted religious feeling, as far removed from gloom and cant as from sentimentality; a repose, as if he were resting on the Rock of Ages.

For the expression of his thought there is required a perfect purity of intonation, an absolute sostenuto, a quiet delivery, and an intense feeling born of pure enthusiasm, and when these qualities are united in the performance, we are borne irresistibly along as if upon the broad, unruffled bosom of a majestic river of pure tone.

It is not possible to overestimate the marvellous effect upon the mind of the study and frequent hearing of such music as Palestrina has left. Grand, refining, and divine, it does not lavishly expose all its wealth to the careless eye; but to the mind that can appreciate, and to the heart that can feel the force of the beauty of truth, it speaks with such persuasive eloquence that even those "who come to scoff remain to pray." His music is musical truth, satisfying the best aspirations of all ages; a Mecca to which shall come in all time the faithful worshippers of the good, the beautiful and true. W. N. E.

HANDEL AND HAYDN SOCIETY.

REPORT OF THE PRESIDENT, C. C. PERKINS, AT THE ANNUAL MEETING.

GENTLEMEN:—I have to thank you this evening for reelecting me president of the Handel and Haydn Society. This is the fifth time that I have received a like proof of confidence on the part of its members, nay, I may say the sixth, as twenty-eight years ago I first served it in that capacity for the space of a twelvemonth. A long time elapsed before I was again called upon to do so, but I can honestly say, that although there was a wide break in my tenure of office, there was never any in the warm interest which I felt in the well-being of the society. This leads me to believe that I need not take up time in making such protestations of attachment to it as might be called for from a younger member, for any words which I might use would serve only to express feelings of whose existence you must be aware, and of whose sincerity I hope you are not inclined to doubt.

At these, our annual meetings, it is customary to take a brief survey of the season, and to compare it with preceding seasons, so far as is necessary to assure ourselves that we have not lost ground in any respect. If the music performed has been of an equally high character, then we may feel that we have not derogated in point of selection from our previous high standard; if the works selected for performance have been studied faithfully, then we may have confidence in the unabated zeal and devotion of the members of the chorus; if we have reason to believe that the oratorios given at our concerts have been even better sung than before, then our minds may be at rest upon the all-important point as to whether the chorus has made an advance towards a desirable though ever unattainable perfection; and, if we find, as in the present case, that the special difficulties encountered in preparing one of the works performed have been successfully overcome, then we may rest assured that we have raised our society to a higher plane than that which it had hitherto occupied. I think that, on examination of our winter's work, we shall find reason to be satisfied and encouraged upon all these points.

The season just closed presents features peculiar to itself, and, as it shows higher musical attainment and better material results, we are justified in concluding, on the one hand, that we did not overrate our ability when we took the Passion music for our chief study; and, on the other, that we were not deceived in believing that we should find the public ready to support us in an undertaking which some persons looked upon as not a little hazardous, considering the great difficulties which the music presented to the chorus, and the demand which its peculiar character made upon the audience for patient and reverent attention. The performance was a widely acknowledged artistic success, and, as the receipts were larger than those coming from any other oratorio given during the season, we may safely conclude that, while in producing such noble music we were acting up to the high standard hitherto adhered to by the society, we were also consulting its material interests, and thus feel ourselves justified in believing that a continuance in such well-doing will not impoverish us, while it must certainly benefit us in every other way. But to recapitulate, in order to dwell for a moment upon the several points indicated; and first, as to the selection of works to be performed. These were Verdi's "Requiem," the "Messiah," the "Hymn of Praise," the Passion music entire, "Judas Maccabæus," and the "Elijah," or Mr. Zerrahn's benefit concert. Certainly no previous year can show a richer or more varied selection than this, including, as it does, the three greatest master-pieces of German oratorio music; a second, and truly soul-stirring work by Handel, and a highly dramatic and effective work by the most eminent living Italian composer. Nor should I neglect to mention that at the miscellaneous concert, when the "Hymn of Praise" was performed, a portion of the sacred cantata by Hector Berlioz, the "Repose in Egypt," was given for the first time in America, together with Mr. Parker's "Redemption Hymn," which was written expressly for our last triennial festival.

My second and third points were, How have these works been studied, and how were they performed? I couple the two, because the answer to the last, admirably carries with it the answer to the second, diligently. Had they not been studied patiently, intelligently and with an earnest desire on the part of all to do their very best, the works in question could not have been performed so effectively as all acknowledged that they were.

Our excellent conductor did not shrink from searching criticism, or weary in requiring frequent repetition, but, in justice to the chorus it must be said that its members were no less mindful of their duty, being ever patient under the first and willing to comply with the last. When we remember that difficult passages abound in the choruses of the Passion music score, we feel that we have a right to be proud of having overcome them so successfully. To have produced the entire work for the first time in America is highly honorable to the society, and to have filled the Music Hall both at the afternoon and evening performance is welcome evidence that the public appreciated the opportunity of hearing music which combines the deepest science with the purest, the most earnest, and the most devout feeling. Of this excellent disposition on the part of the public we must not fail to take advantage, knowing, as we do, that the more such music is heard, the more it will be appreciated and called for. We recognize how much our own appreciation of it grew as each succeeding rehearsal revealed to us some hitherto unseen beauty, and how our enthusiasm increased as its wonders of construction and inspiration were gradually revealed to us. Vividly impressed as we were at the outset by the dramatic power of "Ye lightnings, ye thunders;" moved as we were by the solemn grandeur of the chorales interspersed throughout the work; charmed as we were with the quaint pathos of such airs as "Give me back my dearest master," it was only little by little that we began to perceive the subtle beauty of those ever changing harmonies, and the unending variety of those contrapuntal enrichments, which make the context of these and other gems of Bach's great work a marvel and a wonder to all musicians.

It is human to value most that which it has taken the most trouble to attain, and thus, of all that the past season has given us, we value most the insight which we have gained into the Passion music. Convinced that, no matter how much more study we may give to it, we cannot exhaust its resources, let us look forward to the time when we may again take it up and wrestle with it, as did Jacob with the angel, till it has given us its full blessing. One last word, and I will have done with the Passion music, and this is a word intended to call your attention to the evident improvement of the chorus under its discipline. It was manifest to all who heard the oratorios which followed it that Bach had smoothed the way for Handel and Mendelssohn. For never were the choruses of "Judas Maccabæus" and "Elijah" sung with greater correctness, fire, and effect than at the two concerts which closed the season of 1879.

Our chorus has certainly gained in unity of attack, in nicety of shading, in precision of intonation, and these are the essentials of progress. With a smaller body of singers, all of them picked voices, drilled by such an accomplished musician as Mr. Osgood, the Boylston Club surpasses us in the niceties of chorus singing, but these cannot be speedily attained by a great body of singers like the Handel and Haydn chorus. Our work is epic, while theirs is lyric. We paint frescoes with broad effects; they produce cabinet pictures finished with all the minuteness of a Meissonnier.

In considering the possibilities of artistic improvement and enjoyment in America, I have often thought how much greater they are in music than in architecture, sculpture, or painting. We cannot see the great Gothic cathedrals and learn from them to appreciate the masterpieces of an art to which the epithet of "frozen music" has been well applied; we cannot look upon original Greek and Renaissance marbles, and gain from them an insight into the possible perfections of plastic art; neither can we stand before the pictures of Raphael, and Rembrandt, and Velasquez, until we have penetrated the hidden secrets which their beauty has to reveal to the initiated; but music, like poetry, belongs to us as absolutely, if we choose to possess ourselves of it, as to the inhabitants of the Old World. The masses of Palestrina, the overtures of Handel, the cantatas of Bach, in all their immortal freshness and original perfection, are written down for us as for them, and at the cost of our exertion can be made to deliver to us their myriad messages of consolation and comfort. We are the guardians of those sources of elevated and ennobling enjoyments, and, feeling as we do the responsibility of such a trust, we will not fail to discharge it as the honor of our well-beloved society demands.

We concluded our season with a performance of the "Elijah," for the benefit of Mr. Zerrahn, who for twenty-five successive years had filled the important office of conductor. The conductor, gentlemen, I need hardly say, is the main-spring of our musical watch, and, feeling how much the success of the society has depended upon him, it was most fitting that we should give him a public testimonial of our regard and gratitude. He sent me this morning a letter which I will read to you, that you may see how much he has felt the generous appreciation of his services which the Handel and Haydn Society — and by this he means both the actual members and the lady members of the chorus — have manifested :

Boston, May 26, 1879.

MY DEAR MR. PERKINS : — Supposing that you will be present at the annual meeting of the Handel and Haydn Society to-night, I would request you to thank the members of the government once more for their kindness in giving me that splendid benefit concert, and the members of the chorus for their magnificent singing during the whole evening, as well as for the beautiful presents they have given me. It was an occasion which made me more than happy, and I shall always look back upon it with the greatest pride. Thanking you personally for your kind efforts in my behalf, I have the honor to remain, my dear sir, Yours, very truly,

CARL ZERRAHL.

In conclusion, I beg to offer you my sincere congratulations on the financial result of the past season. For the first time since I have been president, I have neither to announce a deficit nor a mere liquidation of incurred expenses, but, on the contrary, a balance of $1000 in the hands of the treasurer. Let us hope that this is the beginning of a turn in the tide of our affairs, and that other seasons, with like results, are in store for us, which will enable us eventually to carry out many useful projects too long kept in abeyance for want of the necessary funds.

During the season we have given six concerts, including the "Elijah," and have held thirty-five rehearsals, attended by an average of three hundred and forty-seven members of the chorus. The average number of singers at the public performances was four hundred and forty-seven, out of a total of five hundred and ninety-five belonging. Forty-two new members have been admitted to the society, and sixty-seven ladies have joined our ranks. Finally, the number of discharges given and resignations accepted is nine in all. Feeling that this address has already grown to an inordinate length, I shall hastily bring it to a close with an expression of my best wishes for the continued and ever-increasing prosperity of the Handel and Haydn Society, which has now completed its sixty-fourth year of existence.

TALKS ON ART. — SECOND SERIES.¹

FROM INSTRUCTIONS OF MR. WILLIAM M. HUNT TO HIS PUPILS.

VIII.

It is a good plan to stop your work and go to drive sometimes. You see so much, and it makes you want to work, and that's the main thing after all. When you are out-of-doors and see something that you like, put it on canvas in your mind: Think just how you would do it. That will often help you more than if you really did it.

"How shall I wash my picture, that has been varnished?"

Just with water. That won't hurt it; and a potato is an excellent thing for cleaning an oil-painting. Use it with water, as you would a sponge; then dry it with a piece of damp chamois-leather. Not a dry one. You could not dry it with that. Chamois-leather is good because it does not leave any lint.

But I should never alter that picture. You must not get into the habit of allowing outsiders to interfere with your work. It is fatal. It will ruin you as a painter. There are too many poor, miserable creatures, who paint portraits with people standing over them to say: "A little more blue here; some red on her cheeks; and, I should like to have the dress red. No, on the whole, I'll have it green." They meekly receive all that kind of thing, and turn every way that they're asked. And what stuff they paint! The stupid patrons themselves don't like it. You may say: "I'll never do that!" But you will do it. You must, if you don't stop short in the beginning, and determine never to change your work to suit those people. Read William Blake, and see what he would have said to such a proposal! I know it is hard to hold out about such a thing. The very sensitiveness that makes people paint makes them hate to be disagreeable; but you had better get over that as soon as possible. "Twas you who made the picture; no one else; and no one else ought to make alterations in it. You ought to say: 'Take my brushes. No, on the whole, you may buy your own, and see how much you can improve it.' You know, and they do, that they couldn't improve a thing about it. And above all things, never make such a concession for money.

¹ Copyright, 1879, by Helen M. Knowlton.

Did you ever feel that your life-time was not long enough for all the work that you wanted to do? That's the good of teaching other people. You get your life continued in that way.

It did no great harm to cut a hole through your picture; but you ought to have lined the whole thing with another canvas. If you only make a patch large enough it does n't show. As the little girl at the menagerie could n't see the elephant. There he was, towering up before her; but he was so big that she could n't make anything of him. So she still inquired, "Where is the elephant?"

What makes you paint on that horrid book-binder's board? You might have felt like going on with that sketch if the board had not been all out of shape. But it is of no use telling people things like that. It is better to let them learn from their own sad experience. Provide yourselves with good canvases, or panels. And you had better have only two or three different sizes. Then you can more easily have frames for them all, and you can pack them better for sketching. There is no use in having so many different sizes.

You are getting the transparency of that mantle. But there's one thing there that's bigger than transparency! There's human nature underneath that shawl.

If speech is silver, and silence golden, then gabble is greenbacks.

Dwight's Journal of Music.

SATURDAY, JUNE 21, 1879.

SOME THOUGHTS ON MUSICAL EDUCATION.

II.

I HAVE said that exercises in counterpoint are exercises in the technique of composition, as scales, arpeggios, five-finger exercises, and octave studies, are exercises in the technique of piano-forte playing. Yet there is no practice which is purely technical; if it were so, it were practice to little purpose. The æsthetic element creeps in of itself and beautifies the drudgery, if we do not willfully shut the door upon it and leave it outside in the cold. In trying to conquer the weakness or stubbornness of a particular finger which mars the perfect smoothness of our scale passages, we take to the shift of practicing scales with a variety of rhythmic accents, knowing that when we have succeeded in making the unruly finger strike an accent when we please we have taken the first step towards conquering its stubbornness. So scale practice becomes of itself an exercise in rhythm, and an introduction to the art of phrasing. The incipient athlete who begins to strengthen his muscles with dumbbells and Indian clubs, that they may acquire the toughness of fibre necessary to enable him to trust himself on the horizontal bar and enter upon higher athletic exploits, soon discovers that even these preliminary exercises do not consist in the application of brute force merely. With certain poises of the body, the dumbbell can be raised at less expense to the muscles than with others; after a while, the clubs, which at first seemed so unwieldy, almost swing themselves; after the first impulse, it takes comparatively little strength to keep them a-going. His muscle-strengthening practice becomes also a muscle-saving practice, an exercise in economizing strength and in athletic skill. So exercises in counterpoint are not merely dry, mechanical problems which the pupil can satisfactorily solve by writing, we will say, so many notes in one voice against one note in another, in accordance with certain strict rules; the exercise must be written so that it not only fulfills all the requirements of its scheme, but that it sounds well and musically to boot. The more advanced the order of counterpoint is, the easier will it be for the pupil to make his exercises musically beautiful.

Another priceless benefit that the well-directed study and practice of counterpoint and harmony confers upon the pupil is a certain purifying and rendering stable of his musical taste and perceptions. It is here that sound teaching and intelligent supervision becomes of the utmost importance. It is much to be regretted that most of the text-books of harmony in common use are rather text-books in thorough-bass than in harmony proper. They give the pupil all the necessary directions to enable him to write out a figured bass in four-part harmony without making bad fifths or octaves, or very disagreeable cross-relations, but, as a rule, they teach little concerning the art of harmonizing a given cantus firmus. This instruction is generally left to the teacher. I know of nothing more valuable in forming a pure musical taste than practice in harmonizing chorals in pure tonal harmony. By this I do not mean what some theorists call tonal harmony, that is, harmony composed merely of chords that can be formed from the notes belonging to any particular scale (leiter-eigenen Accorde), but what Fétis calls tonal harmony, for an explanation of which I will refer the reader to his admirable treatise on the subject.¹ In this noble exercise (which may be varied by all sorts of contrapuntal devices), let the pupil gradually persuade himself that all the chromatic, so-called transcendental element in harmony is properly nothing more than a sort of brilliant adornment, which can in almost every case be dispensed with; that the simple nature of the choral demands a certain classic nudity in its harmony, and does not admit of the direct simplicity of its progressions being loaded with chromatic and enharmonic ornaments. When the pupil has once trained his ear to feel the beauty and solidity that is inherent in a firmly fixed tonality, so that he prefers strength and decision in harmony (which by no means shuts the door upon variety) to capricious rambling and indecision, he has already reached a point where he can look upon his own musical perceptions with respect and confidence, and where he can begin to apply the technique he has gained by contrapuntal practice to the freer forms of original composition. At this stage of his development no exercise is so fraught with benefit both to his technical skill and his æsthetic sense as the filling out some of Handel's figured (or unfigured) basses in pure polyphonic writing; in other words, writing "additional accompaniments" to many of Handel's airs, which in the original scores are only supported by a figured bass. If any one ask why I recommend Handel's basses in preference to Bach's, let him only train himself up to the point of being able to fill out a Handel bass in pure polyphonic writing so that it really sounds respectably, and then try to do the same thing with a Bach bass! I mistake very much if he does not find his first attempts with Bach singularly disheartening.

¹ Traité complet de la Théorie et de la Pratique de l'Harmonie. Par F. J. FÉTIS. Paris: Brandus et Cie. 11ième Edition. 1875.

It is an almost universal thing for students in any particular branch of the arts or sciences to pursue what is known as "a parallel course of reading" in addition to studying certain textbooks. For the musician and student of composition this "parallel course" is naturally an analytical study of the works of the great composers. The choice of works to be studied with the most benefit is not so easy as might at first be supposed. Evidently the student should choose such works as there is the most to be learned from; but here there are many points which deserve mature consideration. As a general rule, the true classics are to be almost exclusively recommended,—Haydn, Mozart, the earlier works of Beethoven, and almost the whole of Mendelssohn. I do not emphasize the works of these men because they are standard models of excellence merely, but because they are so thoroughly pervaded with the true classic spirit, which, if it means anything, means the exalting of workmanship over material. No one can deny that Sebastian Bach and Beethoven, even in his last period, are essentially classic writers, yet there is a certain quasi-elemental quality in their music which appeals so strongly to the passions and the more potent sentiments that it is difficult really to study it. Their results are so overpowering that one is hard put to it to pay much attention to their methods. And, after all, methods are what we try to study, and all that we can learn. Beethoven, for instance, may fairly be said to have completely turned the heads of half music-writing Europe. So intense is the emotional power of his music that many men have been actually blinded to the classic purity of his writing; nay, more, some enthusiasts have even forgotten that he was a composer at all, and never mention him saving as a tone-poet, a giant, a Titan, or by some other equally resonant epithet. Now remember that no one can learn to be a tone-poet any more than he can learn to be a genius. But one can learn to be a musician. Leave the study of Beethoven's later works and of almost all of Bach until you have made yourself a master of Haydn and Mozart. Look to the later Beethoven sonatas and quartets, and to Bach's church cantatas, for inspiration and musical enjoyment; when you are bent upon analyzing and study, take something else. It is ticklish business at best studying a composer to learn what you may have authority for daring to do; all that one generally learns thereby is what the composer himself could dare, and the probability of its fitting your own case is not great. It benefits you little to know that Beethoven can fly from the key of A major to that of E major by the way of B flat major, unless you have the genius to do something equally original and daring with equal musical success. Upon the whole, it behooves the student to distinguish sharply between that which can be learned from great examples and that which cannot. Studying the great composers in the right way will not in the least destroy the student's originality; studying them in the wrong way inevitably will. Try to permeate yourself with their æsthetic spirit; do not try to catch their manner. If you analyze their works, do so with the purpose of discovering wherein their artistic symmetry and proportion lies, not for the sake of appropriating to yourself any peculiarities of style and manner which may be characteristic of them. And to end with, let my "et delendam esse Carthaginem" be the oft-repeated cry of "acquire technique." Learn how to do things, and practice until you can do them easily. Technique does not stand in the way of originality; if you have really original stuff in you, it will appear doubly original—and worth listening to, besides—if you can express yourself easily and naturally.

WILLIAM F. APTHORP.

CONCERTS.

BOYLSTON CLUB.—The fourth and last concert (sixth season) of this steadily progressive club of singers, under the earnest and efficient leadership of Mr. Osgood, took place in the crowded Music Hall on Wednesday evening, June 4. It brought our Boston musical season practically to a close, although small scattering performances, mostly pupils' concerts, still go on in smaller halls and chambers. It was one of the most interesting concerts which the Boylston Club have ever given, if only by the single fact of its opening with a repetition of Palestrina's Mass for the Dead (Messa per i Defunti), which made so deep an impression a year ago. It was sung a capella as before, that is, without accompaniment, mostly in five parts, the Hostias only being in four parts (soprano, alto and two tenors). To singers who have had no other practice in this school of music, nor even any chance of hearing it, it must have offered very great and peculiar difficulties. In the first place the contrapuntal, polyphonic flow of the interwoven voices, nearly all in long notes, overlapping one another, each melodic voice claiming attention to itself for but an instant and then losing itself in the complex unitary whole, like the swelling and subsiding of the waves upon a gentle ocean, emblem at once of restless life and of repose, must render it exceedingly difficult to measure and keep time, for it has hardly anything like accent. The time, the rhythm, to be sure, in this and all the Palestrina music is ever the same square four-two measure; save for convenience to the eye the bars mean nothing, and it might as well be written without bars. Then it requires such purity of intonation, such a full, even calibre of voice, and such a sustained delivery, so smooth and quiet, so noble and reposeful, and as it were impersonal, as if this music were expressing the eternal, that one wondered how it was possible for these singers to succeed in it so well. They did succeed, however, even better than in the first performance. There was a pure and beautiful ensemble of well-balanced voices, and the effect was heavenly. It was peace itself; you could but yield yourself, heart and soul and sense, to the blissful, holy spell. Essentially it sounded all alike; it might come to a stop at this point or at that, in any portion of the movement; yet you did not wish it ever to leave off; you could listen forever; it was breathing a clearer atmosphere, it was being lifted out of the realm of clouds and commonplace. We do not yet know enough of Palestrina's music to judge whether each composition of his can be called a new and individual creation in the imaginative sense, differing from the others as one symphony of Beethoven, or one play of Shakespeare, differs from another; in other words, whether these compositions have ideal contents (Inhalt) as well as a noble form and style. Open the volumes of his works where you will, one page looks like another. Are there ideas here, musical or poetic? Or is it not rather a grand, an almost superhuman, divine manner of expressing always one and the same idea and feeling,—that of holiness? In this very Mass for the Dead, for instance, we get no sense of mourning or bereavement, nothing of the funereal character, any more than in any of the other masses,—say the famous one named after Pope Marcello. It is all peace, a cheerful, solemn mood of faith and perfect trust; and what else do we find in all this music? Sublime, therefore, as Palestrina's music is, and worthy to be much better known among us, we cannot rank him on a level with such a creative genius as Bach or Handel, in whom the same polyphonic principle has reached a far richer development. The writer of the excellent article which we copy from the programme of the concert, makes Palestrina the Homer of music; we do not quarrel with the parallel; in some sense it is just; yet Homer always has something more to tell than he had told before; Homer is essentially a narrative poet. Palestrina's mission seems to have been, through music, to fill the church with the right atmosphere of feeling; an atmosphere which it is very delightful to breathe, in which we forget and rise above our selfish egos, and realize eternity, feel that the Lord is in his holy temple. This he can do without having much to tell, without fresh and various ideas to communicate, without the imaginativeness and of Prospero. And yet we would not go so far as to say that there is nothing characteristic in the several movements or pieces of the mass, no distinctive features by which we can recognize each one; the fact that, while all were found so beautiful and so impressive, yet everybody felt this more particularly in the Sancus and the Benedictus, proves the contrary. We thank the Boylston Club for so precious an experience as the hearing of such music so well sung, and we hope they will give us much more of the same, and by their example inspire others to the same good work.

The second part of the concert offered a rich variety of pieces, both for male and female chorus separately, and for mixed voices. The only fault was in the too much of a good thing, and this was aggravated by the relapse of the audience into the old (we had thought outgrown) barbarism of encoring half a-dozen pieces in succession. This was the selection:—

- | | |
|--|--------------|
| A Night in the Greenwood | Rheinberger. |
| Mixed Chorus, accompanied by Piano, Violin, Viola, and 'Cello. | |
| On Upper Langbathen | Engelsberg. |
| Male Chorus. | |
| Passage of Spring | Hollaender. |
| Female Chorus. | |
| Trumpeter's May Song | Osgood. |
| Male Chorus with Altos, accompanied by Trumpet Obligato. | |
| Slumber Song | Kücken. |
| Mixed Chorus. | |
| { a. Song of the Summer Birds | |
| Female Chorus. | |
| { b. First movement from Trio in B flat | Rubinstein. |
| Piano, Violin, and 'Cello. Op. 52. | |
| Forsoaken (Folksong from the Carinthian.) | |
| Male Chorus. | |
| Spinning Song | Wagner. |
| From the opera, "The Flying Dutchman." | |
| Female Chorus. | |
| Vocal Waltz | Vogel. |
| Male Chorus. | |
| Anthem: King All-Glorious | Barnby. |
| Solos, Mixed Chorus, and Organ. | |

These were all sung in rare perfection, those for female voices only leaving a delightful sense of pure sweet harmony, and delicate expression. We never heard that "Spinning Song" so finely given. The most important numbers were the mixed chorus by Rheinberger, which was extremely effective, Messrs. Allen, Heindl, and Wulf Fries supplying the string accompaniments, with Mr. Petersilea, as usual, at the piano-forte; Mr. Osgood's "Trumpeter's May Song," which is fresh and bright, with a blithe, buoyant, captivating melody, and the whole effect made romantic and picturesque by the trumpet obbligato, while the blending of the alto voices with the tenors (in unison) lent a peculiar quality of fullness to the tone; and Barnby's Anthem, which has a certain ringing splendor, although its themes seemed commonplace, and its solos tediously long, albeit well sung, the tenor by Mr. Julius Jordan, the bass by Mr. Albin R. Reed; Mr. Sumner accompanied upon the organ. The only instrumental piece, the movement from Rubinstein's Trio in B-flat, was well interpreted by Messrs. Petersilea, Allen, and Wulf Fries.

MR. EDWARD B. PERRY. This gentleman, who is entirely blind, returned but recently from his piano-forte studies in Germany. He has given one or two successful concerts in the suburbs, but hitherto has not played before a representative musical audience in Boston. On Tuesday morning, June 10, by invitation of Mr. Junius W. Hill, of whom he was formerly a pupil, Mr. Perry played, at the Music Room of the former, 154 Tremont Street, to a select and appreciative audience; interpreting such a programme, and in so masterly a manner, that one soon forgot to make any allowance for his blindness. His selections, it will be seen, were formidable for any artist, and very tastefully combined:—

1. Introduction and Rondo, from Sonata in C major, Op. 53 Beethoven.
2. Gavotte Silas.
- Chaconnette Kullak.
- Barcarolle Rubinstein.
3. Preludes in G major and E minor, Op. 28. }
Nocturne in E major, Op. 62, No. 2. } Chopin.
Etudes in F minor and A-flat major, Op. 26. }
4. Etudes Symphoniques, Op. 13 Schumann.

Mr. Perry has a sensitive, clear, often brilliant touch, very sure, clean execution, intelligent accent, phrasing, light and shade, and he plays with feeling and enthusiasm, entering into the spirit of the piece and the composer. In the Beethoven Sonata he reproduced the solemn, thoughtful depth of feeling of the slow Introduction, and the light, bright, rapid fairy Rondo, in which his fingers ran most deftly, to the general satisfaction. He showed himself equally master, through all their contrasts, of those stupendous Variations (Etudes Symphoniques) of Schumann; very few have done it better here. The groupings of smaller pieces were felicitous alike in the choice and in the rendering, which often showed great delicacy of sentiment and touch. Indeed we have seldom passed a summer hour with music more enjoyably; we doubt not that every person present came away convinced that this blind pianist may safely claim rank among the best.

MUSICAL CORRESPONDENCE.

CHICAGO, JUNE 12. — Since my last note, we have had a number of musical entertainments, the most important of which I shall briefly notice. The first in order were two concerts by Wilhelmj, assisted by Mr. Vogrich, "the Hungarian composer and pianist," Mrs. Swift, soprano, and a local tenor, Mr. Charles Knorr. The first concert presented a very poor programme, and even the numbers allotted to the great violinist were of a character far below his notice, and unworthy of so cultivated an artist. The programme called forth the censure of our best critics, and the papers expressed themselves in no weak terms, as being displeased with the music offered. Indeed, the time has gone by when even an artist of great celebrity can present a poor programme in this city without subjecting himself to a well-merited rebuke. At the second concert there was much improvement made in the selections for performance, and the great applause, and the triple recall, that followed Wilhelmj's playing of the grand Chaconne of Bach must have indicated that our musical public is not lacking in appreciation of the best music. I trust that all great artists will remember, when they visit this Western city, that they have to pass a musical judgment that has both a knowledge of, and an appreciation for, what is best in art, and that it is impossible to impose upon us with poor music, notwithstanding it may be finely performed. Mr. Vogrich did not win much praise from either our press or the musicians, and the reason was, doubtless, that they do not care to listen to a "Fantasia on Norma," a "Paraphrase" on Somnambula, even if arranged by Liszt. Mr. Vogrich might have allowed us the honor of making his acquaintance as a composer in something more worthy of his audience and himself than an operatic Fantasia, even if his arrangement of Roberto had a certain kind of merit. The only number that gave us any real pleasure, was his performance of the variations from the "Kreutzer Sonata" of Beethoven with Wilhelmj. In this he manifested a delicate touch, good ideas, and a feeling for what is worthy of regard in music, and it called forth more commendation than ten thousand operatic arrangements could excite. When the great artist bends from his true position in the world of art, his very powers seem to refuse to serve him. To be really great is to be steadfast in what is good and pure.

On the evening of June 5, the Apollo Club gave a performance of Handel's Messiah before a very large audience. They had the assistance of Miss Fauny Kellogg, of Boston, Mrs. Hayden, Mr. William Courtney, the English tenor, and Mr. Myron W. Whitney, also of your city. The performance was sadly marred by a very bad orchestra, which not only played out of tune and time, but with little regard for either chorus or soloists. It was the worst band I have ever heard in an oratorio performance, and we have the new mania for sensational "Comic Opera" to thank for it, for the three theatres that are giving entertainments of this character, had engaged almost all of the orchestral players, and the Apollo Club could only have those who were left. The chorus had studied this oratorio for a long time, and indicated by their singing that, had they had the support of a fine band, they would have given us a very fine performance. It would not be just to pass judgment upon the soloists, for it would be very difficult to sing with fine feeling and good effect with such a bad accompaniment as the orchestra gave them. Mr. Tomlin, the accomplished conductor of the society, is a great admirer of Handel, and I trust that when they give this work again, he may have an orchestra that will do justice to his ideas, and allow the chorus fully to manifest the result of his excellent training.

On the evening of June 4, Mr. William H. Sherwood began a second series of three recitals. I have before expressed my opinion of the artistic interpretations of this accomplished pianist, but I must record a word of praise for this new pleasure he has given us in presenting us with three remarkable programmes of classical music. One great service that Mr. Sherwood has done for us has been in giving our piano students an opportunity to hear a large number of noble works finely performed, and thus creating a good influence for what is worthy emulation. His examples in the production of pure and ringing tones from the piano-forte, and his careful appreciation of the value of a musical forte, in all loud passages, have in themselves conveyed a needed lesson to many of our young players. To recognize the difference between power that produces musical climaxes of tone, from the exaggerations of a noise-giving force, is a valuable reflection for all young pianists. The abuse of the piano-forte by many of our players will never be corrected unless students improve every opportunity of hearing artistic interpretations. Mr. Sherwood in this respect is doing splendid educational work by his concerts in the West, and although he may win golden opinions from the press and public, the results that will follow from his example to students are more than any flattering commendations he may receive. Mr. Sherwood had the assistance of Mr. Carl Wolfsohn, who played the orchestral parts of the great "Emperor Concerto" of Beethoven upon a second piano-forte, and in the Schumann Variations for two pianos, Op. 48.

C. H. B.

MILWAUKEE, WIS., JUNE 16. — Since I wrote you last we have had Wilhelmj here for the third time. He played a concerto of Lipinski, and pieces by Ernst and Vieuxtemps. Taking his three programmes together, I think so great an artist ought to be ashamed that he gave us nothing better.

The pianist at this concert was Mr. Maximilian Vogrich. He played a concert allegro by Henselt, Liszt's Somnambula, and a Fantasia of his own on themes from Roberto. The pieces were all show-pieces, and were played abowly, with immense facility and power, and thundering bravura, and a touch like the kick of a mule. Mrs. Mary Louise Swift sang some light music very acceptably. Artists who give us such programmes as this must not expect to command the respect of sincere people.

Mr. Wm. H. Sherwood gave us two programmes in the same week which were in very marked contrast to Wilhelmj's. Here they are:

- Organ Fantasia and Fugue in G minor (arranged by Liszt) Bach.
- Sonata, Op. 81, No. 3, in E-flat Beethoven.
- { a. Waltz, Op. 34, in A-flat }
{ b. Etude in C sharp minor, Op. 25, No. 7 } Chopin.
{ c. Ballade in A-flat, Op. 47 }
- Toccata di Concerto, Op. 36 August Dupont.

- { a. "Moment Musical," Op. 7, No. 2 Moszkowski.
- { b. Wedding March (Norwegian Bridal Party passing by), Op. 19 Grieg.
- { c. Dervish Chorus (from Beethoven's "Ruins of Athens" Saint-Saëns.
- { a. "Walderauschen" (Concert Etude) Liszt.
- { b. Grand Polonaise in E major }

II.

- XII Etudes Symphoniques Schumann.
- { a. Fugue in E minor (Fire Fugue) Hindel.
- { b. Fugue in G minor Op. 5 Rheinberger.
- { c. Serenade in D minor, Op. 93 Rubinstein.
- { d. "Perpetual Motion" Weber-Brahms.
- (Arranged as a study for the left hand.)
- { a. Nocturne in F-sharp, Op. 15 }
{ b. Etude on Black Keys, Op. 10, No. 5 } Chopin.
{ c. Nocturne in C minor, Op. 48 }
- { d. Polonaise in A-flat, Op. 53 }
- { a. "Lobengrin's Verweis an Elsa," }
{ b. "Isolden's Liebes-Tod," } Wagner-Liszt.
- { c. Tarantelle, Op. 11 Gustav Schumann.
- { b. Grand Octave Study, in E-flat, No. 7 Kullak.

Mr. Sherwood played in such a way that I am not able to see any room for improvement, either in interpretation or technique. His touch is especially admirable, fine, delicate, and infinitely varied. He certainly belongs in the very highest rank of artists.

The pupils in music in Milwaukee College, taught by Mr. John C. Fillmore, and in elocution, taught by Miss Mariana A. Brush, give a choice and varied programme this evening. Judging from the rehearsals, the young ladies are likely to acquit themselves creditably.

J. C. F.

WILKESBARRE, PA., JUNE 2. — A subscriber to your journal takes the liberty of sending with this letter two newspapers containing accounts of a musical festival held at Wilkesbarre, Pa., on the 28th and 29th of May, and also a programme of the order of exercises for both days.

Your journal is so alive to progress in art, at home and abroad, that it may not be out of place to draw its attention to the fact that this festival has given a new impulse to music in the anthracite coal regions of Pennsylvania. In the first place, by preparing the way to yearly efforts of the same sort in the neighboring cities and towns; another Eisteddfod having been appointed for the summer of 1880, at Hyde Park, eighteen miles from Wilkesbarre. Secondly, by showing us what may be done outside of our usual resources; for the material employed in the vocal part of the competitive exercises was drawn mainly from the mining classes, and as they did their work in a creditable manner, it proves that they have some musical ability and knowledge. This being true of such a large element of our population, may we not hope, unless there is a total want of energy, to produce in time great choral societies, and to become an important musical centre? Praise is due to the Mendelssohn society of this place for the first effort in a good cause in the shape of our musical festival.

[The great length of the notices above referred to precludes their insertion here. The mornings and afternoons of the two days were devoted to competitive performances, vocal and instrumental, the competing choirs being largely composed of the Welsh population of the mining districts, who, as in old Wales, are distinguished for their good chorus singing; the evenings were occupied, one by a performance of the Messiah, with piano-forte accompaniment, with Mrs. Granger Dow, soprano, Miss Lizzie Parry James, contralto, Mr. Eos Morlais, tenor, Mr. A. E. Stoddard, baritone, and Prof. D. J. J. Mason, as conductor; the other by a miscellaneous concert of songs, duets, quartets, etc. The judges in the competition were Dr. Leopold Damrosch, Eos Morlais, and A. E. Stoddard. The Rev. Fred Evans, D. D., was the chairman.]

[An expected letter from our Cincinnati correspondent, containing an account of the German Saengerfest, has failed to reach us in season for this number. We are told that it was artistically a great success, though financially it resulted in a loss of about $10,000.]

NOTES AND GLEANINGS.

THE COLLEGE OF MUSIC, of Cincinnati, has published a programme book, which contains the programmes of twelve orchestra symphony concerts and twelve public rehearsals of the same concerts, given in the great Music Hall, in Cincinnati, by the Theodore Thomas Orchestra; also the programmes of twelve chamber concerts given by the College Quartet, which consists of Messrs. Theodore Thomas, S. E. Jacobsen (violins), C. Baetens (viola), and Adolph Hartdegen (violinello). With these there is a list of some one hundred and thirty different compositions played upon the great organ by Geo. E. Whiting (professor in the college), at the Wednesday and Saturday afternoon organ concerts. All of the above concerts have been given by the college between the months of October, 1878, and May, 1879, inclusive. These programmes show the standard of the college. They contain mostly choice and beautiful music, and its performance could not but be of great value to the more than five hundred students of the institution. The college gives notice that students may enter at any time, and that there is to be a summer term, beginning July 7, and ending during the last week in August.

Robert Clarke & Co., of Cincinnati, are the publishers of the programme book, which is for sale at twenty cents.

DAYTON, O. — The eighteenth concert of the Philharmonic Society, with chorus and orchestra, W. L. Blumenstein, director, occurred May 22. Mendelssohn's "Hymn of Praise" was given in the second part, the first consisting entirely of selections from Beethoven, as follows: —

Overture to "Egmont."

Song: "Adelaide."

Miss Annie Miller.

Piano Concerto No. 3.

First movement, with Cadenza, by Carl Reinecke.

W. L. Blumenstein.

Songs: (a) "In questa tomba."

(b) "May Song."

Miss Ida Deam.

Chorus: "Hallelujah," from the oratorio, "The Mount of Olives."

LONDON. — The New Philharmonic Concert of May 24 was notable by the appearance of M. Saint-Saëns in the double capacity of conductor of a new symphony of his own composition, and of pianist in his own fourth concerto (C minor), — the one played here in a Harvard concert by Mr. Preston. There was also an admirable performance of Beethoven's Violin Concerto by Señor Sarasate, a taste of whose quality we have had in Boston. The symphony by Saint-Saëns (Op. 55) is in A minor, is in four movements: (1.) Allegro marcato and Allegro appassionato; (2.) Adagio; (3.) Scherzo, Presto; (4.) Prestissimo. The Musical Standard speaks of it as "an unmistakable success. His compositions evince a great amount of originality, both in thought and design, belonging rather to the French school than the German. The symphony in question is the second of its kind, and almost his last published work. From a very early age, we are told, he began to study the piano-forte and organ, and received lessons in composition; and judging him by the work given on Saturday, he has, we predicate, a brilliant future before him. The orchestration is very skillful and pleasing, and it is full of graceful and striking ideas well worked out. It contains sufficient adherence to rule to satisfy musicians of the old school, while there is an amount of freedom which indicates the inclination to progress and development. The adagio movement is very sweet and delicate, and the prestissimo finale is irresistible. Each movement was greatly applauded, and the talented composer was twice recalled."

THE Marquis D'Ivry's Les Amants de Vérone has been performed at the Royal Italian Opera. The Academy, May 31, says: "It is by no means surprising that so many composers have selected the story of Romeo and Juliet as the foundation of an opera. Of all the plays of Shakespeare this one lends itself most readily to the exigencies of lyrical treatment; and that no musician has succeeded in producing an enduring masterpiece out of such a suggestive theme speaks but little for the ability of those who have at various periods believed themselves worthy to illustrate it. Among the earlier operatic versions of the tragedy was that by Zingarelli, produced at Milan in 1796. In 1825, in the same locale, an opera by Vaconi was heard, and it obtained such high recognition that the final act was afterwards added to the French edition of Bellini's I Capuletti ed i Montecchi. This last saw the light at Venice in 1830, but it is by no means one of its author's best works, and has not held the stage. Other versions worthy of mention are those by Steibelt, 1793; Schwanberg, 1793; Dalayrac, 1793; and Marchetti, 1865. All these have long since vanished. It appears likely, however, that M. Gounod's setting of the tale, written for the Théâtre Lyrique in 1867, will obtain greater longevity. The Southern warmth and intense passion of the tragedy are not well suited to the French composer's dreamy, long-drawn manner, but he has succeeded in writing some very charming music which the world will not willingly let die. The musical antecedents of the Marquis D'Ivry were not such as to warrant the hope that he would succeed where men of undoubted genius had failed, and the first impression on learning that he had set Shakespeare's play was that of amazement at his temerity. We have his assurance, however, that his work was completed before that of M. Gounod, and he has acted wisely in letting this fact be known. It was entirely in consequence of the personal friendship of M. Capoul for the amateur musician that Les Amants de Vérone at length saw the light at the Salle Ventadour a few months since. The French tenor assumed the reins of management for the nonce, and expended considerable pains on the mounting of the opera. At the outset it achieved a partial success, but curiosity was not succeeded by admiration, and eventually public opinion declared itself strongly adverse to the pretensions of the new work. . . . Ambitious as the Marquis D'Ivry has shown himself to be in his choice of a subject, he has evinced no vain desire to impart individuality to his music. He does not hide his poverty of invention under a cloak of eccentricity, and if he cannot extort admiration he avoids all chance of giving offense. There is abundant evidence to prove that he is a cultured and well-read musician, but there is none to show that he possesses a modicum of fancy or imagination. There are a few pretty melodies in the first act, and a delicate little ensemble, "Col novel giorno in ciel," in the balcony scene. But the composer does not develop a good idea when he obtains one, and hence the writing throughout the opera is fragmentary. This weakness is of course especially apparent in the concerted music, where we look for development and the working-up of a subject to an effective climax. In the dramatic situations — such as the quarrel scene, where Mercutio and Tybalt are slain; or at the close of the fourth act, where Juliet takes the potion — there is a painful lack of power and intensity of expression. The music does not heighten the effect of the drama in the least degree. In fine, Les Amants de Vérone is a respectably mediocre work, highly creditable as the production of an amateur, but of no intrinsic value, and therefore quite unworthy of a position on the Anglo-Italian stage."

BERLIN. — As already announced, Spontini's Olympia had been selected for the gala performance at the Royal Opera-house, in honor of the Golden Wedding of the Emperor and Empress, on the 11th June. It was played here for the last time about sixteen years ago, the principal characters being sustained by Mmes. Wippen and Ahna, whose places were now filled by Mme. Voggenhuber and Mlle. Brandt. Olympia was composed for Paris, where it was brought out in 1819, after nine months' rehearsals. It proved a comparative failure; and Spontini readily accepted, in consequence, an invitation to go to Berlin, where the king intrusted him with very extensive powers. All musical matters were subjected to the new-comer's authority, and not a concert could be given without his consent. Olympia was performed here for the first time on the 14th May, 1821; Mme. Milder appearing as Statira, and Mme. Bader as Cassandra. Its success was something extraordinary, and Spontini was called on, — a mark of approbation then quite unusual. The work had had forty-two rehearsals. — Corr. Lond. Mus. World.

HANS VON BÜLOW AT HANNOVER. — The following is a list of works performed in the past season, 1878-79, between October and April, at the "Abonnement Concerts" in Hannover, under the direction of Dr. Hans von Bülow: —

Nine Symphonies: Beethoven, Nos. 6, Pastorale, and 7, A major; Berlioz, Harold Symphony; Brahms, No. 2, D major; Gade, No. 3, A minor; Haydn, C minor; Mendelssohn, No. 3, A minor; Mozart, E-flat major; Rubinstein, "Dramatic Symphony, No. 4, D minor. Also, for the first time, "Bach's Suite, in C major. Nine Overtures, Beethoven, "King Stephen" and "Leonora," No. 1; Berlioz, "Benvenuto Cellini" and "Roman Carnival;" Cherubini, "Wasserträger;" Glinka, "Russian;" and "Ludmilla;" Mehul, "Horatius Cocles;" Mendelssohn, "Meeresstille und Glückliche Fahrt;" Schumann, "Braut von Messina." Other orchestral works: Saint-Saëns, "Danse Macabre" (twice); Tchaikowsky, ballet music from the opera, "The Woywode;" Wagner, "Kaiser March. Concertos with Orchestra, for piano-forte: Beethoven, No. 4, G major (Dr. von Bülow); Rubinstein, Grand Fantasia, in C minor (the composer); Saint-Saëns, Concerto, No. 4, in C minor (the composer); Weber, Concert-Stück (Dr. von Bülow). Concertos for violin: Joachim, Hungarian Concerto (the composer); Mendelssohn, Concerto, E minor (Herr Hünkel); Mozart, Andante, from violin Concerto, No. 4 (Herr Hermann); Raff, Second Concerto, A minor (Herr Hermann). For violoncello: Goltermann, Andante and Finale, from G major Concerto (Herr Lorieberg). Piano-forte and violin: Fantasia in C major, Schubert (Dr. von Bülow and Herr Joachim). Vocal Works: Beethoven, "Meeresstille und Glückliche Fahrt;" Cherubini, Missa Solemnis, D minor; Schubert, "Gott in der Natur" (scored by Bülow).

Those works marked with an asterisk were performed for the first time. Here is prodigious activity and no mistake.

ST. PETERSBURG. — In recognition of the great services rendered by him as Inspector of Music in the Imperial Schools for Noble Young Ladies in this capital and Moscow, Herr Adolph von Henselt has been created by the Czar an Actual Councillor, with the title of "Excellency."

OPERA IN LONDON. — The Tribe correspondent writes (May 17): "It is well for Mr. Mapleson that the success of his opera troupe in the United States was at once brilliant and substantial. Since his opening in London he has been pursued by ill luck, for which he is in no wise responsible; and in these circumstances it must be a comfortable thing to have his well-filled American chest draw from. The first appearances of Mme. Nilsson and Mme. Etelka Gerster have each been announced for two or three successive dates; but neither lady has yet been able to put in an appearance. Others of the troupe have also been ill; and the houses at Her Majesty's Theatre, except on subscription nights, have not been full. Next week, however, Mme. Gerster is promised for certain. She has been detained on the Continent and then shut up here by illness. The public will throw the more eagerly to hear her on Monday; her popularity in London being not less than her popularity in America. Mme. Nilsson's first appearance is now doubtful. Meantime Miss Minnie Hauk has replaced her in Faust; with a gratifying measure of success, the difficulty of the undertaking considered. Mme. Gerster was to have sung last week in La Sonnambula. At a moment's notice Mlle. Van Zandt was called on to take her place. Our young countrywoman is a favorite here, but would not, I suppose, have been cast for so exacting a part as Amina, save for the emergency. Her performance was, nevertheless, a most creditable one. She appeared on a subscription night before an audience of critics, able both to make allowances for youth and inexperience and to judge fairly of real merit. Her reception was cordial, and the good opinion of the house grew better as the evening wore on. Published criticisms have been equally favorable, and Mlle. Van Zandt's position has been distinctly improved. Even a London audience, with all its prejudices for established reputation and its slowness to enthusiasm, was charmed by the youthful grace and winning, simple manners of this young lady. Musical authorities say that her voice and method are both excellent, and that she needs but strength and experience to insure her a brilliant future."

It is related that Frederic Chopin could always quiet his father's pupils, no matter how much noise they were making in the house. One day, when Professor Chopin was out, there was a frightful scene. Barcinski, the master present, was at his wife's end, when Frederic happily entered the room. Without deliberation he requested the roustabouts to sit down, called in those who were making a noise outside, and promised to improvise an interesting story on the piano if they would be quite quiet. All were instantly as still as death, and Frederic sat down to the instrument and extinguished the lights. He described how robbers approached a house, mounted by ladders to the windows, but were frightened away by a noise within. Without delay they fled on the wings of the wind into a deep, dark wood, where they fell asleep under the starry sky. He played more and more softly, as if trying to lull the children to rest, till he found that his hearers had actually fallen asleep. The young artist noiselessly crept out of the room to his parents and visitors, and asked them to follow him with a light. When the family had amused themselves with the various postures of the sleepers, Frederic sat down again to the piano, and struck up a thrilling chord, at which they all sprang up in a fright. A hearty laugh was the finale of this musical joke.

M. SAINT-SAËNS is finishing a cantata for the Birmingham festival of next autumn. Together with this absolute novelty, a comparative novelty in the shape of a cantata by Max Bruch, already given in Germany, but not yet heard in England, will be brought out. M. Saint-Saëns' cantata will not be of great dimensions. Application had been made to M. Gounod for a work of some magnitude, but the composer of Faust declined to compose the oratorio demanded of him unless the festival committee would agree to pay him the sum of £4000.

JOHAN SVENDSEN, whose Symphony in D (Op. 4) was the most important novelty at the concert of Mme. Viard-Louis on Thursday, is the first Norwegian composer whose works have met with appreciation beyond the confines of the northern peninsula. The ability of Svendsen is undeniable, but his growing reputation is partly the result of artistic friendships and connections formed in foreign lands. His octet for strings has been frequently heard here at chamber concerts, and the symphony presented on the occasion referred to contains sufficient merit to warrant its introduction to a London audience. There is a certain commonplace brusqueness in the principal theme of the opening movement, and the plan of the finale is vague and ill-defined. The thematic development of both these movements cannot be spoken of in terms of admiration. But there is much that is charming in the Andante, with its continuous flow of purely melodic phrases; and the Allegretto Scherzando, though crude in structure, is not without individuality of character. The symphony is of course an early composition, and as such is both creditable and interesting.

Mr. Joseph Halberstadt's Dramatic Overture in E minor is a very musicianly work. It is skillfully constructed, and the composer evinces a knowledge of effect, not only in the working of his materials, but in the orchestral coloring, which is full and rich.

The name of Ferdinand Ries is well known to musicians, but more familiarly as the pupil and friend of Beethoven than as a composer. Ries wrote many works; but as he lacked the power of individual utterance, his music has failed to attain a lasting value in the estimation of the public. For example, the piano-forte concerto in C-sharp minor played by Mme. Viard-Louis on Thursday calls for approval merely by reason of the fluency and effectiveness of the solo part. The themes and the accompaniments are wholly without interest, and the concerto cannot be placed even on the same level as those of Hummel. It was excellently played, however, and the applause which followed the performance was a well-earned tribute to the skill of the executant.

M. Saint-Saëns rendered one of Bach's organ-fugues in G minor with admirable clearness and precision; and the audience seemed greatly to relish the grim but unpleasant humor of the French composer's Danse Macabre for orchestra. — Academy, June 7.

BOSTON, JULY 5, 1879.

Entered at the Post Office at Boston as a second-class matter.

CONTENTS.

SANZIO. Stuart Sterne	105
TONI-QUALITY. George T. Bulling	106
MR. BENJAMIN PROUT'S "HIREWARD"	107
THE INFLUENCE OF DISPLAY IN MUSIC. Charles H. Britton	107
TALES ON ART: SECOND SERIES. From Instructions of Mr. William M. Hunt to his Pupils. IX.	100
ORCHESTRAL PROSPECTS	110
FIGHTLESS SCHOLARS	110
CONCERTS	111
Mrs. Anna Mayhew-Simonds's Organ and Piano Recitals. — Miss Henrietta Maurer's Complimentary Reception.	111
MUSICAL CORRESPONDENCE	111
Cincinnati. — Chicago.	112
NOTES AND GLEANINGS	112

All the articles not credited to other publications were expressly written for this Journal.

Published fortnightly by HOUGHTON, OSGOOD AND COMPANY, 220 Devonshire Street, Boston. Price, 10 cents a number; $2.50 per year.

For sale in Boston by CARL PRUEFER, 30 West Street, A. WILLIAMS & CO., 283 Washington Street, A. K. LORING, 369 Washington Street, and by the Publishers; in New York by A. BRENTANO, JR., 39 Union Square, and HOUGHTON, OSGOOD & CO., 21 Astor Place; in Philadelphia by W. H. BOWEN & CO., 1102 Chestnut Street; in Chicago by the CHICAGO MUSIC COMPANY, 512 State Street.

SANZIO.

BY STUART STERNE, AUTHOR OF "ANGELO."

(Continued from page 97.)

So Sanzio joyfully, While the bright, slanting sunbeams, that at last Had burst their cloudy veil, moved on before them, Led her about, showed and interpreted, While she, with glad, untiring eagerness, Listened and looked, — upon the long, gray walls Covered with dabs of color and black lines, That, if one watched, slowly resolved themselves Now into countless fair, fantastic shapes, Then melted back into a strange confusion; Upon the bits of canvas in gay tints, Or the white heads and faces, feet and hands, Hung pell-mell here and there; and yonder stood Two marble figures towering high, though one Had lost its head, the other both its arms. And glancing past them, Benedetta knelt To turn the sheets of paper on the floor, That lay there scattered broad-cast, and scrawled full Of twisted lines and circles like the walls, Till Sanzio told her, laughing, 't was in vain She burrowed there for any hidden gem; Found in one distant corner of the room A curious, wide-mouthed urn of blackened silver, Filled to the top with rose-leaves faintly sweet. Long, long ago, Sanzio related, ere The dear Christ-child was born at Bethlehem, Some unknown skillful workman wrought this vase, 'Mid a great people perished from the earth. Men laboring in the fields discovered it Of late, deep in the ground, — thus it came here. And near it stood a dish of finest glass Shaped like an open lily, where she saw, With bits of scarlet coral, pearly white And delicate pink and amber-tinted shells. Ay, Sanzio said, they lay so many years Upon the shores of the eternal sea, Their little shallow cups had caught at last Some faint reflection of the sunset glory That flooded them a thousand times. A fan Of gorgeous peacock feathers, spreading wide, Nodded above them, and near by, in yet Another corner, Benedetta marked A crimson mantle, and blue, silken robe, A trailing piece of precious cloth of gold, And many more of various hues, that looked Like purple and fine linen, — heedlessly Tossed over dusty chairs.

But, best of all, Sanzio turned kindly, at her earnest prayer, The faces of great pictures from the walls, And showed her much she had not yet beheld Of all his noblest labors, though he said Of this and that, 't was but the first poor sketch; This had been ordered from beyond the sea; And that had crossed the mountains. One of them, A sweet Madonna, seated, with bent head, Her happy arms clasped round the Blessed Babe That nestled on her bosom. Then an image Of that fair Saint who first from heaven drew down The power of music to the thirsty earth, — Amid a group of other stately forms Standing erect and rapt, her purest face Turned upward to a chanting angel-choir.

And yet another, of that gracious Saint Who conquered ill by her sole innocence. She walked alone, — behind her sombre trees, — Her beauteous limbs scarce hidden by the robe Whose folds one slender hand held gathered back From the nude, tender feet, while in the other She bore a branch of palm. Thus fearlessly, The godly peace unbroken on her brow, A faint-rayed halo round the golden head, She stepped upon the pointy, jagged wings Of the fierce dragon, who with monstrous coils, And fiery jaws wide open, rolled and writhed Powerless to right and left.

And so at length, Making their round about the whole wide room, They came to that great picture, half complete, Whereon he labored still, and even this He turned and showed. A heavenly Virgin-mother, Bearing the little Jesus in her arms, And floating upward on light clouds; beside And yet beneath her, other forms, two Saints, A woman, and a noble, grave old man; And further still below, close to her feet, Two marvelous fair child-angels, with small wings, Both gazing up, in rapt, adoring joy, Their sweetest eyes lost in the heavens beyond. And Benedetta when she first saw these Cried out in wonder and delight: "O Sanzio! What rosy limbs, and dimpled little hands! Oh, would that I might hold them in my arms, And kiss their lips and eyes! This right one here, With upturned face, he is like you, methinks!" Then following the little angel's glance, And reverently, yet all unconsciously Folding her hands, she softly said, and spoke As to herself: "And what a grave, wise look, Wears the Beloved Babe on his sweet face! — And I am to be here among all these, — Nay, how should I be worthy of such greatness!" My darling! Oh, I would most joyfully Make all the world your footstool! Sanzio's heart Cried out within him, yet he suffered not The words to pass his lips, but gazed at her With a glad, silent smile. And now, when she Was well content that naught was left unseen, He bade her sit and rest on the small couch Where he was wont sometimes to pause from work, When that grew wearisome, — he standing near On the great tawny lion-skin stretched out Upon the floor, and showing plainly still The outlines of the mighty head and paws. "What is this?" asked she, planting her small feet Where once the full, dark mane had flowed.

He told her,

And how it came from countries far away, Filled with wide deserts, where the sun was hot, And bred strange beasts and birds and flowers and trees. "Fancy," he said, "how dismal for some late Lone traveler, if at fall of night, perchance, He hears a stealthy rustle 'mid the reeds, And sees the gleaming of two fiery eyes, And suddenly, with a fierce, resounding roar, A lion leaps on him and his poor horse, And strikes his teeth into its panting flanks!"

Unwittingly she drew her feet away, A shade of trouble fitting o'er her face. It faded in a moment, and her cheek Dimpled and faintly flushed, and looking up She said, "Nay, I am like a foolish child!" "And would you be afraid in that wild land?" He smiling asked. "No, — yes, — no, not with you, If you were with me there!" And for the first time She of her own free will reached out her hand, And put it into his, who with delight Close clasped and held it fast. But suddenly She drew it back and asked, with earnestness, Returning now at length upon the words She left unfinished when she entered first, — "But tell me how it is I find you here! Anna went out this afternoon, and I, Left all alone, wandered about the house, And curiously peeped into many rooms, Finding them still and empty all, save this. You do not live here? Nay, it cannot be, Methought you came a distance every day, In from the street!"

"And so I did! I flung My cap upon my head," he gayly cried, "And passed through one door out into the street, And by another then as speedily back, Into the house where I have dwelled long years!"

She looked at him in silence. Then again Most gravely, "Mayhap you can tell me, too, Why Anna scarce remembers aught of us, My father and my grandam and myself, Whom she was wont to know and love so well, For when I question her, she shakes her head, Or gives me answers all awry!"

And now

He broke into a peal of merry laughter:

"Dear, innocent, simple heart! Your Anna long Has been at rest in Abraham's lap, I trust, And pray she may be softly pillowed there, For I could find her nowhere!"

But he saw

That in her face his mirth found no response, And sobered in a moment, while she said, — And Sanzio fancied that her lips grew white, — "You told us all was well, and we believed you!"

Then briefly he recounted his device, And added, "Nina's heart is true as gold, And could your mother know she were well pleased" — But she seemed scarce to hear, and suddenly said, "You have deceived us then, — me and my mother; That was not well in you!" Her voice was low, And a strange, shadowy look in the wide eyes She fixed upon his face.

He bit his lip,

Flushing and paling swiftly, then moved off And strode with hasty paces through the room, While he tossed back his hair impatiently; And then returning close to her again, Said, though his voice and eyes were half unsteady, "You give a hard name to a petty fault, And make me suffer heavy penalty, For what methinks may scarce be called a sin!"

She sat in silence, with her eyes cast down, And he went on, — his voice, that had grown firm, Now quivering with so strange a thrill again, That Benedetta started at the sound, — "And if a fault, a wrong, a sin there was, It was committed but for love of you! But for I saw no other means to gain The innocent cause I pleaded. I protest My work in truth has used of you! — and for I must have perished could I not have looked Upon your face again! Ay, Benedetta, Wherefore not tell you now, in simple words, What every breath of life, each rapturous throb In this glad soul, that lives but on your sight, Surely has long ere this confessed to you, — I love you! with a love too passing great, For mortal tongue to utter half my heart!"

Still while he spoke she gave no sign, but bowed Her head still lower, the small, dark ringlets quivering On the white, bended neck, and even now When pausing he stretched out his hands to her, She made no faintest answer, but he saw How the hot blood rushed over brow and neck, And that she shook and trembled like a leaf. But when he would have clasped her in his arms, She sprang up suddenly, broke away, and fled Into the furthest corner of the room, And cowering like a child down on the floor, Her face hid in the hands upon her knees, Burst into passionate tears.

For one brief moment

He stood confounded and irresolute, Then flew to her and knelt beside her. "Love! — My darling Love! — my Bird! — my bright-eyed Fawn! — Wherefore these tears? Will you not answer me, By one small word, — give but a sign!" he cried In passionate tenderness, and would have drawn Her hands from off her face with gentle force. But she resisted, and loud sobs alone Came for reply.

"My Own, my Benedetta, My Queen, my sweetest Saint! — can you not then Pardon, forgive me? Ay, 't is but too true, I love you with the power of all my soul, And 't was my happiness to think, — perchance, — But yet forgive me if I startled you By my too hot and hasty words! Forget That they were ever spoken! For I pray Not now aught other favor at your hands, But that you grant me still a few brief days The joy to look on you as heretofore, — Kneeling to do you homage, — from afar To worship at your shrine, Madonna mine!" He cried again, deep grief and yearning love Mingled in his entreating, pleading voice: But still he sued in vain, still waited breathless For some response.

And so at last sprang up, Turned from her with a gesture half despair, Half swift, impatient wrath, and pressing close The arms he folded on his breast, as though To still the mighty beating of his heart, Said in a strange, cold voice, "Then we must part! To-morrow, with the earliest, I will find Some one to take you safely home!"

And thus

Walked to the window, and stood looking out With stormy brow, and dark, unseeing eyes, And pallid lips so firmly closed and set, As though they could unbend and smile no more; Stood thus in silence for a little time,

And motionless, yet fancied that he heard
Her sobe grow fainter, and then cease, and then
A movement and a gentle step close by,
But would not look around, till suddenly
Two clinging arms were flung about his neck,
And a soft, whispering voice cried pleadingly,
Close to his ear, "Oh, no, send me not from you!
'Twould break my heart, — I love you, Sanzio mine!"

Then he turned swiftly with a joyous cry,
And strained her to his heart in breathless rapture,
And raised the tender, brightly flushing face
She trembling hid upon his breast, and kissed
Again and yet again the dewy lips,
That shyly half, but with glad willingness Yielded themselves to him, and timidly
Responded to his own, and quivered still,
Though a faint smile played round them like a light,
While yet her eyes overflowed with great, round drops,
Until he kissed the swelling tears away,
Remembering the sweet blossoms in the wood,
And she as in a fleeting, happy swoon,
Closing her eyes an instant, laid her head
Upon his breast once more.

Thus arm in arm
The lovers stood a while in blissful silence,
Each hearing but the other's throbbing heart,
While the red sunlight flooded all the world
With a last burst of brightness, — gazing out
O'er the Eternal City's wide expanse,
That stretched far, far below.

(To be continued.)

TONE-QUALITY.

BY GEORGE T. BULLING.

It is a question worth the serious asking, whether the power of tone-quality in musical sounds is as generally recognized by the musicians of our day as it deserves to be. Brilliant and voluble execution, and the startling dynamic effects which characterize many modern musical compositions, are deadly enemies to delicate poetry of tone. True, the blare of sound which, when translated from a score of Brahms, or of Wagner, often falls upon our ears with an impressive, if not with an expressive effect, is a complicated musical sound, but it will take years of ear training to convince us that it does not approximate to downright noise. The comparatively vast resources of modern instrumentation prompt the deeply thinking composer to extravagant combinations of tone-quality, and to strongly contrasted volumes of tone. That this innovation is in keeping with the æsthetic and the intellectual progress of the day, no liberal minded person will deny. Yet, this noisy advance of the army of free musical thought is prone, for the time at least, to crush under foot the musician's delicate and subtle sensibility to tone-quality.

Nor does this assumed fatal facility of the orchestra alone threaten the destruction of the finer and more poetic musical effects. The demand of the people at large is for quantity instead of quality of musical sound. When a grand musical performance is contemplated, the anticipated grandeur is too often measured by the numbers to take part in the performance, and by the consequent amplitude and intensity of dynamic effect to be produced, just as if the attribute of grandeur did not as truly lie in quality, as in quantity, of tone. Monster jubilees and festivals, with their concomitant rhythmic and dynamic effect, produced by the discharge of loaded cannon at the thesis of the measure in the music, and of musketry at the arsis, merely supply outward excitement to the people, instead of inciting them to true inward musical enthusiasm. If you should ask a conscientious musician, after he had attended such a gigantic concert, which numbers of the programme he enjoyed best, he would be very likely to answer in favor of those which were not chorus and orchestra, nor cannon and musketry.

Helmholtz has clearly proved to us that most musical tones contain harmonic upper partial tones, and that the order in which those over-tones occur in a musical sound explains its individual quality. If expressive musical effects are attained through harmony proper, how much more delicate are the effects which may be wrought by the variously combined harmonics in a musical sound. The power of tone is no more to be analyzed than is the power of music itself. You may get an answer to the scientific How? but when you ask Why? it is that quality of tone has such an influence over you, an explanation is as impossible as it is unnecessary. It is sufficient that you should study the function of tone, and the chief rules of its existence. If it were possible to define accurately the effect of tone-quality upon our sensibilities, it would be no difficult matter to translate music into words. Fortunately, there is no prospect of either of these deplorable acts being committed.

One of the reasons why composers regard the orchestra as the most potent means by which to express their musical thoughts is because of the varied tone-quality of the instruments, and the multifarious combinations of which these are capable. Then again, as expression and tone-quality are almost inseparable companions, the orchestra also allows full scope to the former attribute by reason of its power to decrease or increase, at the composer's will, the amplitude of its tonal vibrations. In this connection, the only rival of the orchestra is the human voice, if an instrument of musical expression so specific and essentially different, can at all be considered a rival. An orchestral composition is purely abstract music, and is of a much higher order than vocal music, the sentiment of which is suggested to the composer by the signification of the words which he sets. Yet, as a means of expression, any musical instrument is dead, dull, and imitative, when compared to the cultivated human voice.

The shades of tone-quality in instruments, and in the human voice, are infinitely various, and are the foundations of characteristic expression. The purity, mellowness, and balance of tone in an instrument or a voice constitute its chief excellence. Correctness of intonation is indispensable to the exhibition of a pure quality of tone; therefore, the tempered scales of the piano-forte, or the organ, admit of tones inferior in musical force and purity to those which may be drawn from the violin. The natural quality of a voice is much improved by singing with an efficient orchestral, instead of with a piano-forte or organ accompaniment, because a keener sense of correct and pure tone is gained and maintained by the singer. The clearness and strength of tone which Wilhelmj draws from the violin is greatly to be accounted for by his power of exact intonation. It is well known that the ear is unable to distinguish marked shades of tone-quality in an orchestra playing out of tune. So, too, a note strained in the sounding, until it produces discordant over-tones, is deprived of its normal characteristic color.

The finer shades of tone-quality do not impress all people with precisely the same effect, no more than does music itself. The more striking attributes, such as the sombre and the clear tones, are unanimously recognized, just as the mournful in musical strains may be distinguished from the joyful. But you may depend upon it that the scrupulously exact observer, who informs you that a certain shade of tone-quality implies longing, is sure to meet with an equally exact observer who will prove to him that it means resignation. The innumerable adjectives by which each particular shade of tone-quality in music is qualified by many critics is a fact alone sufficient to prove that the English language is wonderfully rich in epithet. Yet, perhaps it is to be regretted that even this wealth of epithet is not commensurate with the countless shades of tone-quality in music.

Each musical instrument possesses an individuality characterized by its tone-quality. A strain written for the violin loses its inherent character when it is played upon the viola. Still less does its composer recognize it, when it is played upon the oboe. The melody remains the same, but its peculiar character as conceived by the composer is altered. The individual color of tone in orchestral instruments is classed into groups composed of instruments nearest related to each other in quality of tone. The wood, brass, and stringed instruments, are the broader divisions of tone-quality from which infinite varieties of tone-color may be drawn by the genius of the composer. Take any worthy orchestral composition, and in your mind's ear imagine that a part written for the strings alone, is played by the wood. You hardly recognize the music in its new character. Now imagine that you hear this particular part played by the brass; whereupon you are given a burlesque upon the original conception of the music. Hence, then, the reason why a work composed for any instrument, or any group of instruments, loses its color by being arranged in a form which is at variance with its original conception. It would almost be as reasonable to rearrange the colors in the master-work of a painter. An orchestral symphony arranged for the piano-forte is perhaps enjoyable enough in that way, but it is too much like a photograph of a bouquet of flowers — its color and fragrance are missing.

It is not difficult to recognize the characteristic qualities of the various keys in music. Yet, with the musician, these qualities are of a subjective and relative, rather than of an objective and positive nature. It is generally conceded that the key of E major is bright and strong, A-flat major tender and dreamy, C major bold and manly, and so on, but compositions may be written in any of the keys with an effect which will flatly contradict their widely accepted character of tone. Moreover, it is possible to write a pathetic and mournful phrase in a major key, whereas a minor key can be made the vehicle of the gayest of scherzi. But with all this width of argument which is granted us, we cannot rid ourselves of the fact that a composition, conceived and expressed in a certain key, loses a great deal of its intrinsic and characteristic value by being transposed into another key from that to which it by birthright belongs.

MR. EBENEZER PROUTS "HEREWARD."

[All the London journals have more or less elaborate accounts of the new Cantata composed by the musical critic of the Academy, who ranks among the most earnest and accomplished of living English musicians. It was performed for the first time on the 4th of June, at St. James's Hall, by the Borough of Hackney Choral Association, of which Mr. Prout is the Conductor. We select, for the present, the notice of the Musical Standard.]

It is, we believe, the first work of the kind written by him, his other compositions embracing orchestral and chamber music only. It was, therefore, with a great deal of curiosity that the musical world anticipated the performance of his cantata, "Hereward the Wake," founded upon and illustrating the following narrative:—

Hereward, the son of Leofric, Earl of Mercia, and the famous Lady Godiva, had caused much pain to his pious mother, and much annoyance to the neighborhood of Bourne, where she resided, by a series of youthful indiscretions, committed at the head of a band of comrades as lawless as himself. He brings his excesses to a climax by way-laying and robbing Herluin, a priest, against whom he has a long-standing grievance. Herluin denounces him to his mother, who, unable to pardon an offense committed against the church, banishes her son. This scene forms the subject of Part I. Hereward makes his name famous by a number of daring exploits performed during his wanderings, and at length arrives at Flanders, and takes service under Baldwin. At St. Omer dwells a noble lady named Torfrida, whose accomplishments in advance of the age have gained for her a reputation for supernatural power, a belief which her contemplative and mystic character half fosters within herself. She has already become interested in Hereward, through hearing of his fame, but they have not met when Part II. opens. Hereward encounters Ascelin, Torfrida's whilom champion, in a tournament, defeats him, and takes from him the ribbon which he wears as the token of her favor. Hereward brings the token to Torfrida, presenting himself to her in disguise, pretending to be Siward, his own nephew. Her quick perception, however, penetrates his disguise, and she avows her love, to which he passionately responds. Their marriage follows, and the festivities bring Part II. to a close. A short period of happiness and repose is now disturbed by the arrival of a messenger bringing news of the accession of Harold Godwinsson, his triumph at Stamford over Harold Hardrada, the great Norse hero; of the defeat and death of Harold by William of Normandy; of the misery and oppression endured by his fellow-countrymen at the hands of the Normans; and of the occupation of his own ancestral home at Bourne by the invader. Fired by the news, Hereward calls his followers together, sails for England with his wife, clears Bourne of the foe, is elected by the Saxons their commander in the camp of refuge at Ely, and by his own daring, and that of his followers, aided by the wise counsels and inspiring presence of Torfrida, defeats William in a great battle, and defies all the Conqueror's attempts to storm his camp. This victory brings Part III. to an end. Artifice and the treachery of the monks at last accomplish what valor has been powerless to attain. William becomes master of Ely; and Hereward, having cut his way out sword in hand, and having defied the Normans for a long time in the greenwood, is at length induced by the wiles of Alfrida, a noble Saxon lady, and by the offers of William, who is struck with admiration of his bravery, to give in his submission to the Norman king, who restores him his estates, and bestows on him many marks of favor. Torfrida, his wife, persuaded by monkish counsels that her influence over Hereward had been gained by magic arts, and that the same worldly spells had inspired his great deeds, consents to a divorce and retires to a convent. The Norman nobles, inflamed with revenge at past defeats, and jealousy at the favors bestowed by William, conspire against Hereward; and taking him unawares and without armor, slay him, though not till the greater part of their number have fallen before his desperate resistance. Torfrida, hearing of her husband's death, hastens to Bourne, and consoles his mourning countrymen by a prophetic anticipation of the future glories of a country which can boast of such mighty heroes as Hereward. Her prophecy brings the work to a close.

It will be seen that the composer set himself no ordinary task when he undertook to give a vocal representation of these stirring incidents with which the public are more or less familiar by perusal of Mr. Kingsley's graphic historical novel, "Hereward the Wake." Mr. Prout was, however, on safe ground, and completely in his element in his work, especially in the instrumental support given to the voices. The story, as told in the four parts of the cantata, is loosely connected, but sufficiently strung together to maintain the interest of the narrative. After a short introduction, the scene opens with a chorus of Hereward's followers, "Landless and Lawless" (allegro feroce), written with great vigor, and at once indicating the character of the whole work. In this, as in all the music in which Hereward appears, there is a special style which the listener learns to associate with his appearance. This is followed by a chorus, or rather hymn, of Godiva's ladies, "Salve Regina." Then enters the priest with his complaint to Lady Godiva, who, in recitative, condemns her son to banishment, and joins with him and Herluin in a cleverly-worked-out trio. A tenor song, "Farewell my boyhood's home," is succeeded by a double chorus, entitled "Bring forth the beaker," in which appears the most beautiful effect of the work, namely, the combination of a hymn sung by Lady Godiva's ladies, represented by sopranos and altos, and a drinking song given out by the tenors and basses. The novel device was very successful, and to our thinking the chorus was the gem of the performance. Part II. commences with a chorus of Torfrida's ladies, "Bright is the day," in which the pizzicato work of the strings is used very happily. This is followed by a scena, "T is all in vain," a duet,

"Hail, maiden fair," and a bridal march and chorus, "Strike the harp." Part III. introduces a chorus of English, "Mourn, Anglia," the solo of the messenger with the evil news, Hereward's call to arms, and a chorus on board ship, "Wafted by east wind." Then we are introduced to William's court, at Winchester, and are shown the reception of the Wake's reply to the Conqueror's summons to surrender, followed by a "March of Normans." The succeeding scene is the battle, described in soli and double choruses, and closes Part III. The IVth Part is occupied with Hereward's fall and death, containing a recitative and air by Alfrida, "Hail, the might of woman, hail," a trio, "Great Norman, thine is Hereward's arm," a chorus of Normans, "Gleemen lift a tuneful strain," a scena, "Ah! restless is the peace," the attack of Norman knights, and the death of Hereward. Then succeeds a recitative by Torfrida, "What sound is floating," a chorus of Saxons, "Weep for the Viking slain," and the finale, solo and chorus, "A glorious vision." Mr. Prout has proved himself a thorough musician by his treatment of these numbers, and the orchestration is in many places gorgeous in its coloring. That the cantata is strikingly original cannot be said; that it is, strictly speaking, original at all, can hardly be vouched for; reminiscences of well-known phrases frequently occur to the listener's mind, ranging from Handel's well-known style to the modern "Ancient Mariner" of Mr. J. F. Barnett. That it is the work of an intensely earnest musician, possessing intimate and extensive knowledge of the resources of an orchestra, and the capabilities of the human voice, is without doubt. He has been ably assisted in his work by the libretto written by Mr. William Grist; and his conceptions were nobly carried out by the body of musicians assembled. The Hackney Choral Association has reason to be proud of the performance. The composer has spared neither soloists nor chorus—the latter having to touch C in alt. on two occasions, and the former being taxed to their utmost in some of the numbers. Mrs. Osgood sang all the music of Torfrida; Miss Marian Williams the music of Alfrida; the comparatively small parts of Godiva, and Leofevin, a page, were filled by Miss Mary Davies. Mr. Barton McGuckin represented Hereward; and Mr. King, William the Conqueror; and Mr. Prout conducted. The soloists had a very arduous task, but they came triumphantly out of it, and gained great applause. Mr. Prout very wisely and properly resisted numerous attempts to obtain encores, and was satisfied with the gratifying reception of his work as evidenced by the enthusiasm of the audience throughout the evening.

THE INFLUENCE OF DISPLAY IN MUSIC.

BY CHARLES H. BRITTAN.

THERE is an unfortunate aim at display for exterior or vain purposes that sometimes passes into the realm of art, and causes a disturbance which, if not righted, tends to a demoralization of the very principles upon which art rests. This disposition of humanity which cultivates the appearance, and attempts to reach results by the effect of dazzling displays, is an element that is unsound in principle, and calculated to mislead not only those who come in contact with its influence but the very possessor of the trait; for, considering it in its correct relation to ultimate good, it is false in motive and in aim. As a people, the American nation makes appearance a positive element in its character, and cultivates a love for display to such an extent as to make us liable to the charge of superficiality. This very attempt at what is termed in common parlance "keeping up appearances" often leads to a very unsafe method in social regulations as well as in the educational sphere of life. The youth becomes too early impressed with false ideas about his importance in the world, and is at once tempted to reach for general appreciation by the means of superficial acquirements. As a people, I suppose, we are but a half-educated race, and yet we attempt to hide our deficiencies by the unhealthy means of a vain appearance. It is no uncommon occurrence to see important positions in civil, governmental, and educational life filled by the incompetent.

Real culture, when considered from its right standpoint, unfolds to the thinking mind certain principles upon which the very development of its vitality depends; the first of which seems to be a love for the truth. All acquirements in knowledge, the discoveries in the natural world, the progress of art, and the very development of the religious element in the people,—all depend upon the great impulse in the hearts of men that leads them toward the universe of truth, which lies just beyond their present limit of advancement. As the leaf of the tender spring-time flower expands towards the light of the sun, and gains from its warmth the elements of life and bloom, so must the mind of man unfold before the enriching power of truth, until the soul has reached the maturity of a heavenly perfection. Nothing can hinder true advancement so much as the influence which comes from being satisfied with one's attainments. If a flattering world bows in appreciation of some worthy accomplishment, and the hero listens to its seductive praises, until his step falters, and he becomes like the god of old, charmed with his own image, he signs his own death warrant, and all subsequent progress is rendered impossible. And in no department of life is the effect of a love for the superficial in accomplishment so productive of harm as in the art world.

Bringing this characteristic of a love of display into our own domain, namely, the musical world, we can follow its influence for a moment, and perhaps profit by the lesson. The purpose of all art seems to be the cultivation of the Beautiful. In the word beautiful, as used here, we have a higher meaning than that which denotes a mere gratification of the artistic taste of humanity; for it seems to signify a reaching after the ultimate of what is lovely, even to an embodiment of heavenly purity in the noblest forms capable of manifestation. Thus we observe true art is influenced by a higher purpose than that of pleasing by mere displays, but rather aims at a positive good, even to making manifest the power of beauty in works that bear the holy stamp of truth. If we consider the great efforts of the truly endowed composer, we can but note that a love for his art—that is, the beautiful—influenced him in all his endeavors, and that his creations seem to bear the stamp of inspiration so far are they removed from worldly forms and material or financial aims. An intention that contains a love of the beautiful for its own sake becomes a higher motive than one which looks at manifestation as a means of acquiring some personal aggrandizement, and is sure, when reinforced by positive ability and power, to accomplish works of great importance. Art when taken in its highest sense, is as noble a power for the development of all that is good and great in a man as any that civilization can exert.

In the modern use of the word virtuoso (taken in its musical sense) we have an idea which, perhaps in many cases, has too great a bearing upon the technical dexterity of a performer, and not enough upon his connection with the real significance of art. Many critics write fluently upon matters of technique, and offer flattering praises for any wonderful feats of mechanical agility, but look very little upon the relation of the performer with the works which he interprets. Thus we hear more of the performer than of the music which he plays. To attend a concert is in too many instances but to be present at a show of the personal feats of some famous artist, who has won a reputation more from the brilliant manner in which he exhibits his agility, than for real merit as an interpreter of great music. To show his technique, his power, and endurance, seems in too many cases the aim of the performer. Thus a showy piece of a brilliant character is chosen for public performance with little intent but that of making a display of his own dexterity. In piano-forte playing some of the Liszt music of the most showy and brilliant kind is sure to fill the larger part of a programme, where virtuosity,—that is, display,—is the aim of the player. Real art must hide its head when the selfishly disposed performer attempts to make an exhibition of his own qualifications. For true art is something far higher than this, and the thoughtful and devoted follower will sink the very idea of self in his effort to lift his hearers into that inner circle where a sympathy for the beautiful makes a unity of feeling that forbids selfishness. Yet many of our young musicians are led on by the spirit of our age and country, and in not reasoning out for themselves their relation to their art, often commit this sin against the true principles of an artist, unknowingly. Their best friends flatter their octave playing, their wonderful performance of rapid scale passages, and comment with complimentary words upon their power, until they consider displays of technique the essential qualifications of an artist, and make this the aim of their lives. So also the newspaper reporter, in far too many cases, applies this test, technical proficiency, as the criterion for his judgment upon all performances. Not that a perfect technique is to be deprived of its full importance in the classification of an artist's attainments, for it is of all things primarily necessary to his success as a performer. Yet it must not be regarded as more than a means towards the accomplishment of an end. That end is surely the interpretation of the musical ideas in whatever composition the artist may desire to perform. The true artist stands between the composer and the listener as an interpreter, and unless he would sink all idea of self ambition, and lose himself in the spirit of the music, and with faithfulness of aim make manifest the intentions of the author, he is not a sincere musician. The artist who is ambitious to shine for his technique and brilliancy of performance can hardly forget self long enough to find the spirit of his author, as he studies his compositions. He may, indeed, produce the piece with correctness of a technical character, and strive for a brilliant performance, for his ambition for display leads to this, but to seek for that depth of feeling, that refined sentiment that comes from conscientious study, and the truthful interpretation of the composer's intentions, requires a higher motive and a truer love for art. In a love for art, self stands sacrificed, while the artist becomes ennobled, and reaches the mountain height of attainment by the very giving up of himself to the object of his adoration.

It is no uncommon thing to have this vain motive of display tempt these followers after the difficult to commit great sacrileges with the classical compositions of the worthy old masters. We often see on our programmes pretty bits of melodic writing of some fine old composer tortured almost beyond recognition under the name of a modern arrangement, in order to be the means of showing how easy it is for some vain Knight of the Key-board to conquer difficulty. Not long since I heard a gigue of Mozart, which in its natural setting is a beautiful piece of quaint music, as fresh and fairy-like as the dance of some lovely nymph of classic time. In its new form, as arranged by Tausig, its simplicity, grace, and wondrous charm had all fallen before the modern mania for difficult execution, and just to satisfy the love for display of our new school of virtuoso piano-forte players. If we must have these showy pieces to enable the man to manifest his dexterity, at least let him play pranks with his own musical works, and keep the treasured compositions of the masters sacred for those that love them in their old sweet forms. To take liberties with the classic works in literature, and to attempt to deprive some old Grecian bard of his tuneful verses, by altering them to suit modern caprice, would bring out the condemnation of every scholar in the world. To pervert Plato, to alter a word in Shakespeare, or to change a line in Milton, would seem to be an unpardonable sin. Yet are the musical ideas of the old masters any less sacred and their own inherent property, than the thoughts of the literary lights of the world? Has the modern idea of display a right to commit depredations among the classic compositions of the greatest masters in the musical art world, and transform their stately melodies, through the means of variations, into distorted images of their once lovely forms? Every lover of justice should protest against innovations which deprive a composer of his own creations.

Chopin, that master tone-poet of modern time, whose music in many of his numbers is difficult enough for even modern ambition, has not been secure from the inroads of the piratical arranger of the present day, for I heard one of his smaller yet lovely waltzes that it had pleased his fancy to leave in a simple but graceful form, transformed into a work of difficulty to satisfy some ambitious performer. If a love of art had possessed the feelings of the transcriber, a correct taste would have indicated to him that some things are more beautiful because of their very simplicity. Is the timid and tender little violet of the spring-time less lovely, because there are other and more brilliant flowers that bloom in the warmer days of summer? Are there not differences in the forms with which Beauty may manifest herself, and yet be true to her glorifying instinct? The soft and gentle strain of melody that is born of a refined and tender inspiration may be as beautiful as some wonderful burst of harmony that carries awe with its grandeur. There is variety in the world of the beautiful, for one form may be lovely, and another quite as fair, and yet be different. In music it is not alone those compositions that are hard to execute that have a high rank as works of art. The stately, yet graceful and pure harmonies of Palestrina, and the simple little love-songs of Pergolesi, have a charm about them that comes from the real domain of true art, no matter if they differ from that greater depth of feeling grasped by the mighty intellect of a Beethoven.

Can modern musical inspiration surpass the fugal form that Bach developed to such perfection? Modern composers may, perchance, write a six-part fugue, or even one of ten parts, but contrapuntal talent has not yet surpassed even the smaller examples of this famous old master.

There is something beyond a knowledge of musical form necessary to produce works that bear the stamp of greatness, and even the disposition to write a very difficult work will not alone lift it into a high rank as a composition that will bear the test of time, and yet live in the world of art. It seems to me that this spirit of virtuosity that so often rules the young artist, sometimes also influences the modern composer, and in the effort to surpass the old works in regard to difficulty and character of effects, they lower the standard of the art, and die by reason of their own failures. In many of the compositions of Liszt for the piano-forte, it appears to me as if his wonderful talent for virtuoso playing had run away with his fancy, and that few musical lovers outside the rank of those knights of execution could catch the spirit of the mad whirl of notes, as they rush from one climax of difficulty to another, that is found in many of his works. It is refreshing to my mood and taste to turn to some of the quiet simplicity of even Mozart's music, and find there a more genial musical sympathy than any of the "Ungarische Rhapsodien" can excite.

A man of thought must believe in progress, and I have no doubt but that music in her onward development will reach higher degrees of excellence than have yet been obtained by even the great intellects of the past, for this art is yet young, and time is long, and human genius is far reaching in its aims, and will strive for even infinite perfection. But I also realize that talent must be excited by a higher motive than personal display of powers, to ever reach even the noble heights now held by the old masters of other generations. Like Schubert they must be willing to write for a future time, if their own age will not listen; and rest satisfied in the pleasure that creation gives, even if there is no recognition or applause coming from a thankless world to encourage them. The composer that sees in his art full compensation for whatever labor or time he may spend upon it, must have the spirit of genius within him; and that, as it develops into maturity, will bring him a more lasting acknowledgment than any that is born of a passing popularity. So also with the artist. One who dazzles the multitude will win money and a certain kind of fame, but his place may soon be filled by another more dexterous than he. In the real art-world, there is no cessation for the influence that comes from the activity of the conscientious artist, for we have but few honest interpreters who are influenced by a true intention.

In vocal performance, the same love of display is conspicuous among the singers in far too many cases. To win a certain kind of popularity by catering to the varying tastes of a capricious public, seems to be the aim of a large number of our concert singers. This influence even enters into the churches, and the religious worship is too frequently marred by an ambitious quartet, whose effort seems to be that of making a display of their vocal acquirements! Poor, but sensational music, is often chosen for selections that should be devotional, and worthy offerings to the praises of God. The third commandment contains no awe for the general choir-singer, for the name of the great Creator is too often taken for the mere use of vain vocal displays, rather than sung with that reverence that is its due.

Not many months have passed since a ship containing a crew of burlesque singers, was borne to this land upon the tidal wave of sensation. The revelry of their mirthful singing became universally contagious, until no part of the musical world seemed free from its sensational influence. Opera singers, concert vocalists, and church choirs, caught up the songs, until it seemed as if the acme of every artist was to appear in the role of a buffo singer. Even the dignified representative of Mendelssohn's Elijah caught the infectious influence, and began "caroling to the moon," thereby verifying the truth of the adage, that in the musical world things were indeed "at sixes and at sevens." And the golden calf of scriptural fame under his modern form of money, sent showers of gold as offerings of praise to these musical rioters, proving that his influence in the present day, is as seductive as in the olden time. Alas! sensation is the coördinate factor of display.

While we all recognize the value of mirth, and can appreciate the benefit that comes to the people from hearty and fitting enjoyments, and would even approve of burlesques of an innocent order, yet to have the high circles of true art invaded by sensational influences can but be for the time deplorable. In the drama, the modern love for sensation has produced a certain class of plays, of which those of the "society" order are perhaps the least objectionable. But there has been a sad falling off, both in the plays produced, and in the actors educated, since this liking became general. A taste for the artistic in decoration, refinement in social life, purity in literature, the beautiful in painting, sculpture, and music, and the good in every thing, can only become general elements among humanity when the leaders of civilization speak in strong and powerful words against every influence that retards true culture. The musician who would grace his art by his adherence, must bring into its sphere the influence of a general culture. The mind that reflects with a universal recognition of the various interests that attract humanity, is more likely to bring to its own particular work the results of a wide culture, and is able by means of this greater store of knowledge to do more to advance whatever cause may be nearest its endeavor, than one who is narrowed down to a limited observation. Art is universal in its aim, for its purpose is the advancement of the beautiful. Painting seeks to embody the beautiful on the canvas, sculpture to preserve it in marble, and music to pulsate its influence through the medium of sweet sounds. The beautiful in nature is seen in its manifestation, the beautiful of religion in its purity and matchless precepts, the beauty of thought in poetry and in literature, the beautiful in humanity in the love of one's fellow-men, and throughout the whole universe in things seen and expressed in idea is this wonderful influence. The beautiful in the ultimate is the great spirit of God. And in this correlation of mental forces, so necessary to the full development of the perfect soul, will the artist and composer, even like the men in all classes and professions, find the only means to reach that vast height of attainment that shall bring the mind into communication with the vast thought and knowledge of the Infinite.

Out of the busy world, into the atmosphere of pure art, comes the art-student, bringing with him his humanity, energy, and love of the beautiful, and he must be content to leave behind him every element that is sensational or selfish in its desire for personal display, if he would reach that point of excellence that is worthy of a lasting reward. Music's power has within it an influence that will ennoble as well as charm, if one but listens to its pure manifestations of the beautiful, as they are heard in sweet sounds. Its grand harmonies proclaim the infinite. Its gentle songs murmur of love and faith, while its matchless chords will bind together every interest that would ennoble the soul of man, and make him worthy of his immortality.

CHICAGO, MAY 10, 1879.

TALKS ON ART. — SECOND SERIES.¹

FROM INSTRUCTIONS OF MR. WILLIAM M. HUNT TO HIS PUPILS.

IX.

You want work! and then, no work! You can put your model in better in half an hour than you can in a whole day. By rest you get polished and brilliant, and come to your work with a zest which makes you dissatisfied with everything which has not the essence of life. Work that is done by the day is filed down, and has no spontaneity.

You don't work intensely enough. I'd like, for a while, to see no carelessness, no thoughtlessness. Why do you put that line down there? For what? You don't cut velvet in that way; and velvet costs only six dollars a yard. What is velvet compared to your mind?

The best music teacher that I ever saw, Mlle. Michel, would not let her pupils touch a piano except under an instructor. I've heard a little fellow, one of her pupils, play Mozart's music as I never heard it played before. Beautifully regular and child-like — as Mozart was. Mlle. Michel had few scholars and enormous prices. Was in the third story of a house near Montmartre. I have heard Joachim and Klaus play the violin, but they did not move me like those little children playing with their professors. They could not play Chopin, but certain other things that were really beautiful.

Draw that ear carefully. It is permanent; always stays there. It can't laugh or cry. It is permitted to draw the other features with a little less care, because you reach an expression without great work.

It is only science that thinks of grays and half-tints — that the Lord never thought of. There's conscientiousness all through your studies. A little more tranquillity, a little more simplicity, would carry your work along immensely. If you only had a good idiot to work for you!

Lose yourself in looking for the effect that is governing a picture.

There's no such thing as common-place except in your own mind. No such thing as beauty except in your appreciation of it.

Don't rely on getting nature in the position that you want at just the moment when you want to see it. I painted that portrait of a boy standing, when the child was half the time turning somersaults upon the floor.

When the boy turned his head he took his ear with him.

You have put in his head without any body. You could take up his head as it is in your hand, and handle it as you would a ball. That boy's head is of value to him only as it is joined to his body. That interrogation-point (outline of the nostril) is too distinct. I see a beautiful mouth; but you have made it look like 8. 8. 8.

Hold a sheet of white paper behind that head, and see how dark the outline of that face is in light.

Keep your love of nature keen. The moment that you think how to do it, then you don't paint unconsciously. Some of my scholars ought to be able to paint, but they don't care enough.

You feel a great deal of certain parts of a thing. Instead of going to work and getting it all, you work too much on the one part that fascinates you.

Nothing like ambition to multiply lights. Conscientiousness and ambition play the Nick with pictures.

¹ Copyright, 1879, by Helen M. Knowlton.

As many outlines as you like; but have them of the right value.

The "Talks on Art" were written for mere students; but great artists read them. You may say they are contradictory. But they were addressed to different students. Some needed hasty-pudding, some Albert Dürer.

Dwight's Journal of Music.

SATURDAY, JULY 5, 1879.

ORCHESTRAL PROSPECTS.

THE old problem of a permanent orchestra in Boston seems to be approaching an affirmative solution. Two separate manifestoes for the coming season have appeared. One announces, as a matter of course, our long accustomed symphony concerts under the auspices of the Harvard Musical Association. The other, a new enterprise, is a series of popular orchestral concerts, under the lead of Mr. Bernard Listemann, the well-known admirable violinist, who has withdrawn from his traveling companions of the Mendelssohn Quintette Club, preferring to remain quietly, though not inactively, at home.

(1.) THE SYMPHONY CONCERTS left so agreeable an impression the last season, that all the omens look encouraging for their continuance. Everybody speaks hopefully about them. The orchestra, in spite of its few chances of rehearsal, and of remuneration reduced to the standard of the times, showed what good work it could do when animated by the right spirit and enthusiasm. The indefatigable conductor, Carl Zerrahn, really accomplished wonders with the men at his disposal for so few hours during four months only of the year. The programmes seemed to give general satisfaction. The audiences, to be sure, were not large enough, and the season, in spite of rigid economies, resulted in some pecuniary loss, though very small compared with several preceding seasons.

Now the Concert Committee of the Harvard Musical Association speak in a confident tone. Without apology or argument, without any ifs or peradventure, they have issued their circular at this early hour, in which, "encouraged by the interest manifested in these concerts during the past season, both on the part of the musicians and the public," they say they "feel already warranted in promising another series (the fifteenth), of at least eight concerts, in the months of December, January, February, and March next." This circular, which bears the names of the committee in full (J. S. Dwight, C. C. Perkins, J. C. D. Parker, B. J. Lang, S. B. Schlesinger, Chas. P. Curtis, S. L. Thorndike, Augustus Flagg, William F. Apthorp, Arthur Foote, and Geo. W. Sumner), proceeds as follows:—

The orchestra and leadership will be the best that Boston can command.

Of course it is not possible, so long beforehand, to announce the programmes in full; but it may be confidently stated that the proportion of important new works will be larger than usual, with due care that the great old masters shall be richly represented. Among the orchestral compositions which it is the intention to present, may be named the following:—

SYMPHONIES. New: Posthumous Symphony in F, by Goetz; "Symphonie Fantastique," by Berlioz; Second ("Spring") Symphony, by J. K. Paine. — Old: One by Mozart; the Fifth, and another by Beethoven; the great Schubert Symphony in C; the "Scotch," by Mendelssohn; and, possibly, the short one in B flat, by Gade.

OVERTURES: Beethoven, "Weibe des Hauses," Op. 124; Berlioz, "Benvenuto Cellini" (first time); Mendelssohn, "Die schöne Melusine;" Schumann, "Manfred;" Bargiel, "Medea;" Schubert, "Fierabras;" "Rosamunde." More hereafter.

MISCELLANEOUS: One of Handel's Concertos (first time); Schumann's "Overture, Scherzo and Finale;" also (first time), Schumann's Concert-Stück, Op. 86, for four horns, with orchestra; Bach's Chaconne, transcribed for orchestra by Raff; first movement of Rubinstein's "Ocean;" Symphony; three short Marches from "Nozze di Figaro," "Zauberflöte," and "Fidelio;" Introduction to Third Act of Cherubini's "Medea;" Night March (first time) from Berlioz's "L'Enfance du Christ."

Other works may be found desirable and practicable as the concert season approaches. Solo artists, vocal and instrumental, will be announced in due time.

Subscription lists for season tickets, with particulars, will be opened early in the autumn. Meanwhile, any persons eager to lend assurance to the enterprise by an earlier pledge for tickets have only to send in their names to the Chairman (12 Pemberton Square), or to any member of the Committee.

This announcement, it will be seen, is not an appeal for subscriptions, which is left to a later and more convenient period. It is simply a giving notice before entering the accustomed field. Several new signs of encouragement have presented themselves. We will mention only one, and that perhaps the most important, namely: the prospect of a valuable accession to our orchestra; not only have we Mr. Listemann here again, but all the artists of the Mendelssohn Quintette Club will be available during the four months of these concerts, as they propose to confine their traveling to the autumn and the spring.

Now what is further needed for the regular and adequate supply of symphony concerts of the highest order in this musical community, is a much greater frequency of orchestral performances, so that the musicians may be kept in more continual practice together, and so that we may have our local orchestra en permanence. There is a fair chance that this need may be supplied through this new enterprise of Mr. Listemann.

(2.) POPULAR ORCHESTRAL CONCERTS. Mr. Listemann's plan is simply, with a small orchestra, say thirty, of the best musicians of the Harvard orchestra, and at popular prices (fifty cents), to give in some large hall frequent concerts of mixed and popular, yet well chosen programmes, both of classical and light instrumental music, mostly orchestral, but with some instrumental solos. Mr. Listemann himself will wield the baton, and will also doubtless play some solos. Financially the organization will be conducted somewhat on the cooperative system, so that every member may be personally interested in its success. (It is intimated that Mr. L., with a few of his musicians, will give also some chamber concerts after the manner of the "Monday Pops" in London.)

Mr. Listemann's party takes the name of "The Boston Philharmonic Orchestra." From a conversation with him we understand that he proposes to make his concerts popular by giving a comparatively small allowance of symphony music, and more of light, bright, sentimental, in short, popular varieties. But such a man can be relied on to offer nothing which is not worthy and good of its kind, nothing coarse and vulgar, or too hackneyed. With so small a band he will confine himself, so far as symphonies are concerned, to the smaller symphonies of Haydn, Mozart, etc., leaving the larger works of Beethoven, Schumann, and more modern writers, to the larger orchestra. Nor indeed does he intend always to give an entire symphony, but only single movements. Thus the distinction will be quite well marked between these and the Harvard concerts. They need not interfere with one another; and, not interfering, they can only be of mutual benefit. It certainly should be a great gain to our orchestral music, and to the grand symphony orchestra, especially, to have the nucleus of that orchestra made permanent and always kept in practice. And it all tends directly to multiply inducements for good instrumental musicians to settle down contentedly in Boston.

SIGHTLESS SCHOLARS.

UNDER this head the Advertiser describes the closing exercises of the year at the Perkins Institution and Massachusetts School for the Blind, on Tuesday afternoon, June 24th. The education at this school, — which is of a very thorough and comprehensive kind, embracing not only reading, writing, and arithmetic, but many higher branches, as geography, history, ancient and modern, civil polity, literary history, natural history and philosophy, mental and moral philosophy, geology, Latin, and even optics (!) — may be said to be carried on in an atmosphere of music. For music is one of the prime objects of interest among the blind. They have excellent teachers, vocal and instrumental. They are made familiar with what is classical and best in music. You may hear there fugues of Bach upon the organ, sonatas of Beethoven on the piano-forte, and indeed the répertoire is large. And what is learned at all, is necessarily learned thoroughly; for every piece, however long and complicated, has to be acquired note by note memoriter. The concentration of the mind on sounds, and their relations, is naturally close with those who are deprived of sight. In an atmosphere, then, vibrating with harmony, where the young mind is always kept in wholesome, alternating, interesting exercise, and where mutual love and kindness between teachers and pupils seem to be all-pervading, it is no wonder that these unfortunates, as they are commonly regarded, seem to be so bright, intelligent, and happy. Certainly this was the delightful impression upon all who witnessed those most interesting exercises — a sort of Commencement on a modest scale — upon that beautiful June day. But let the Advertiser speak: —

When one sees on the street the apparently blind girl beggar, about whose neck hangs a placard requesting Christians all, both great and small, to take pity on her, the blind mother of six orphans all under nine years of age, the indignation at the imposture overpowers the compassion for the misfortune. But the truly unfortunate and honest blind, such as were gathered in the hall of the South Boston institute yesterday afternoon, appeals to one's sympathies as no asker of alms ever does. It was the close of the school year, and the blind pupils, the girls on the right of the hall and the boys on the left, were present, both to take part and to hear the farewell words spoken. Decorations of ferns, climbing ivy and bright flowers were arranged tastefully about the walls and organ, and hung from the ceiling. About seventy pupils were present; the body of the hall was filled with visitors, including members of the board of trustees, the Boston school committee, and South Boston clergymen. In the gallery, also, were other spectators. Programmes printed in raised letters were distributed by a blind pupil stationed at the door. At half past two the exercises began with Beethoven's Prelude and Fugue No. 3, which was played on the organ by Henry T. Bray, with true insight of the spirit of the composition. An object lesson by three girls and three boys followed. Cubical blocks of one inch dimensions were used, and various combinations made neatly and quickly at the word from the teacher, Miss M. L. P. Shattuck. A composition on the "Effects of War on Nations" was recited by William B. Hammond, — for the reader must remember that he had no eyes. Alice Cary's "An Order for a Picture" was then recited in a clear voice and appreciative manner by Mary McCaffrey, and next came Beethoven's Appassionata Sonata, Opus 57, the first movement (allegro), played by William H. Wade. One peculiarity of the young artist's playing was marked. He played as if he were wholly alone; as if no spectators were watching him; as if he were expressing his own soul in the music. Every note had a meaning which would have been in danger of extinction at an ordinary player's hands, and the accompaniment was more than usual an integral part of the theme. Miss Ella R. Shaw read with her fingers a composition of real delicacy about Apple; but it had the peculiarity of omitting colors from the mention of the good qualities of the fruit. After Arthur E. Hatch's declamation of Macaulay's opinion of the Puritans came Tully's "The Gypsy Maid," sung by Kittie Wheeler in a sweet voice. Little Charlie Prescott's natural-history exercise was full of interest, and then Henry B. Thomas recited Master Wade's composition upon "A Man is What he Makes Himself." The next exercise was Joseph E. Lucier's cornet solo of J. Hartmann's "The Favorite." The player was a master of his instrument, and played with wonderful power and facility. His low notes were especially full and firm, and the double-tonguing passages in the variations on the theme were really brilliant. He was persistently applauded, and gave "Fair Harvard" in response to the encore. He was accompanied in both selections by a blind pianist. The recitation in geology was another well-performed exercise, and the bright little fellow who found the places on the map was a favorite. The lecturer, as he stood behind the table, looked like a professor. Henry T. Bray, who leaves the school now, spoke the good-bye, and the exercises closed with the "bell trio," from Pinafore, by female voices. It was charmingly done. Only three graduate this year, there being no regular class as last year.

At the close, brief remarks were made by Messrs. J. S. Dwight and R. E. Apthorp of the trustees, the Hon. Henry B. Peirce, secretary of the Commonwealth, Dr. Thomas Brewer, Dr. L. D. Packard, the Revs. R. R. Meredith and S. S. Hughson, and Mr. W. T. Adams (Oliver Optic). Mr. Anagnos presided during the exercises, and conducted them.

CONCERTS.

MRS. ANNA MAYHEW-SIMONDS, an accomplished pupil of Mr. Eugene Thayer, the organist, and of Mr. Carlyle Petersilea, the pianist, has just completed a series of six free organ and piano recitals. The former were given at the Berkeley-Street Church, two of the latter at the Meisanoon (Tremont Temple), and the sixth and last in the great Tremont Temple, which was crammed full of listeners on Thursday evening, June 26,—a rare scene for a hot midsummer night! Mrs. Simonds's organ programmes included such works as Handel's fifth and sixth Organ Concertos; Bach's Doric Toccata, St. Ann's Fugue (E flat), and Fugue in C minor, Book II.; Schumann's "Skizzen;" an Ave Maria by Liszt; three Adagios by Volckmar; variations by Merkel, Thayer, and others.

In the first two piano recitals she performed Beethoven's E-flat Concerto (the accompaniment by Mr. Petersilea), and the "Moonlight" Sonata; Chopin's F-minor Concerto and Valse Brillante, in D flat, Op. 64; Mendelssohn's first Song without Words; and Liszt's Fantasias on Lucia and Rigolette. Miss Ellen D. Barrett sang Benedict's "Carnevale di Venezia," and Schubert's "Barcarolle;" and Miss Anna C. Holbrook Rossini's "Di Palpitii," and Rease's "Absence."

Of all these recitals we were only able to attend the last,—that in the great hall with the great audience. The programme was an interesting one:—

1. Concerto, F minor, Op. 16 Henselt.
2. Vocal, Ave Maria Briggs.
3. Valse Caprice, Op. 34 Scharwenka.
4. Quartet in E flat, Op. 12 Mendelssohn.
- (For two violins, viola, and violoncello.)
- Adagio non troppo, Allegro non tardante—
- Canzonetta. Allegretto—Andante espressivo
- Molto Allegro e Vivace.
5. Vocal, a. In Autumn Franz.
- b. Out of the Soul's great Sadness
- c. The Woods
6. Rhapsodie Hongroise, No. 2 Liszt.

The Henselt Concerto was accompanied by the Beethoven Quartet (of strings), and by Mr. Petersilea, who himself first performed this extremely difficult work in Boston in one of the earlier Symphony Concerts. The composition, though it abounds in brilliant effects, as well as in pleasing sentimental passages, lacks sustained inspiration; it was, perhaps, too serious an effort for the author of such felicities as "If I were a Bird." Mrs. Simonds proved herself fully equal to all its technical requirements, having a clear, firm touch, sure and facile execution, while her phrasing and entire interpretation was intelligent and expressive. She plays with enthusiasm. The very fresh, original, and piquant Valse by Scharwenka, which also has its peculiar difficulties, also showed her interpretative faculty in a fine light. We could not remain for the Rhapsodie Hongroise.

The Mendelssohn Quartet was beautifully and artistically played, and with true verve and fire, by Messrs. Allen, Akeroyd, Heindl, and Wulf Fries. The fascinating Canzonetta, so quaint and ballad-like, was enthusiastically encored.—Miss Hallenbeck, a youthful pupil of Sig. Cirillo, has a fresh, clear, rich, mezzo soprano voice, and made a pleasing impression by her singing. Of course Mrs. Allen's rendering of the three Franz songs was a choice feature of the concert; but why was "Aus meinen grossen Schmerzen" translated "Out of the Soul's great sadness"?

MISS HENRIETTA MAURER.—This young lady, formerly a pupil of Mr. Petersilea, attracted the attention of Rubinstein when he was here by the fine promise of her piano playing, and, by his recommendation, she has been studying with his brother Nicholas Rubinstein at the Conservatory in St. Petersburg. A complimentary reception was given her on Wednesday evening, June 25, in Palladio Hall. That being Commencement Day at Cambridge, we could not attend. We have heard high praise of her performance in the following programme:—

- Concert-Stück Weber.
- (Two Pianos.)
- Miss H. Maurer and Mr. C. Petersilea.
- Song, "Les Rameaux" Faure.
- Mr. V. Cirillo.
- Aria, "Il Carnevale di Venezia" Benedict.
- Miss Ellen D. Barrett.
- Piano Solo, "Masaniello, Tarantella" Liszt.
- Miss H. Maurer.
- Aria, "Pace mio Dio" Verdi.
- Mrs. L. F. C. Richardson.
- Violin, "Fantasia Brilliant" Arlot.
- Mr. Wm. Dorn.
- Piano Solo, a. "Nocturne" Chopin.
- b. "Air with Variations" Handel.
- Miss Maurer.
- Song, "Odi Tu" Mattei.
- Mr. Cirillo.
- Ballade, "Guide au bord de la nacelle" Meyerbeer.
- Mrs. Richardson.
- Piano, "Valse de Concert" Wieniawski.
- Miss Maurer.
- Song, "When the Tide Comes In" Millard.
- Miss Barrett.
- Duett, "L'Addio" Cirillo.
- Mrs. Richardson, Mr. Cirillo, Miss Maurer.

MUSICAL CORRESPONDENCE.

CINCINNATI, JUNE 19.—The week of the Saengerfest is over, and, as the excitement is gradually yielding to the comparative quiet which reigns in musical circles, I find time to make short mention of the closing concerts of the College of Music. A sketch of the Saengerfest must be reserved for a special communication. In the eleventh Orchestra Concert a novelty was presented in a symphony of Bach for orchestra and organ. It is a short and unpretentious work, interesting to the musician on account of the peculiar manner in which especially the wind instruments are employed. The second number on the programme was "At the Cloister Gate," Op. 20, by the young Norwegian composer, Grieg. It comprises a soprano solo, a few short phrases for alto solo, and a closing choral for women's voices, with full orchestral accompaniment. Its lyric character throughout was calculated to give Miss Norton an opportunity for doing justice to herself; for her talent thus far seems to lie in that direction. She depicted admirably in the weird strains of the composition the longing with which a woman betrayed in love, and a witness to the murder of her brother by her lover, knocks at the cloister gate, attracted there by the chants of the nuns. Questioned by the nun at the gate she recites the story of her woe, and as the choral sounds from within is admitted. The composition proves the author to be at home in orchestral effects. It is strained throughout, however, and suffers from the habit of constantly playing with harsh dissonances, which like an epidemic seems to have taken hold on the composers of to-day, especially the lesser ones. Mendelssohn's "Scotch" symphony followed. In its transparency and delicacy it is indeed a test-stone for an orchestra; the slightest want of unity in the strings, or heaviness in the wind instruments, is most painfully felt. Notwithstanding these difficulties a very good rendering was given.

A repetition of the second act from the "Flying Dutchman," with the same cast as in the previous concert, was followed by Liszt's illustration of Kaulbach's celebrated painting in the Berlin Museum, of "The Battle of the Huns," for orchestra and organ. It is a very noisy composition, replete with all sorts of effects, but to me by no means suggestive of the picture, which with all its confusion and tumult, even the battle of the spirits of the slain, which hover over the battle-field,—is nevertheless so perfectly symmetrical and, with all its horrors, so idealized as not to be repulsive or bewildering to the eye. In Liszt's composition the grand choral at the close with organ and orchestra is, from the stand-point of effect, wonderful.

In the twelfth and last orchestra concert the college choir made its appearance in a work which almost more than any other is calculated to test the mettle of chorus singers. Bach's Cantata: "My Spirit was in Heaviness," abounds in the most trying difficulties for soloists and the chorus. That it was rendered in many parts excellently, and in others satisfactorily, is high praise for the college choir. Had Bach intended this composition for a large chorus and not for a small number of singers trained under his own supervision, he would surely not have made demands which it is almost impossible to satisfy. Want of space prevents me from speaking of the single numbers of the cantata; the first chorus, however, "My spirit was in heaviness," which in intonation, and especially in style, is the most difficult, is deserving of especial mention for the smoothness and clearness with which it was sung. The soloists were Miss Norton, Miss Cranch, Mr. Darby, and Mr. Hill.

To render Bach's music in good style requires the most thorough musical culture. The numerous mannerisms, which no composer can perfectly disown, are so foreign to our present musical tendency, that only constant, unremitting study of the style peculiar to Bach and his time can enable a singer to amalgamate them with the entire composition so as to make them appear less trivial. Whether it is wise or not to omit and change many of these groups, as is frequently done in editions revised by prominent musicians of the present day, I will not attempt to decide. Miss Norton succeeded in meeting the exacting demands of her part as far as her resources permitted. The constant strain on the voice which the use of the high register brings with it, cannot but disturb the ease and repose which are the primary requisites in Bach's music. There were many praiseworthy points in her singing; the first air especially: "Sighing, weeping" was rendered in a noble and dignified style. The same difficulties appear in the tenor part. Mr. Darby bravely battled with them, and rather successfully too. Mr. Hill, in the trying duet for soprano and bass: "Come my Saviour," sustained his part well, though his voice has not sufficient volume for the large hall. The solo quartets, in which Miss Cranch sustained the alto part, were sung with precision and certainty. I have spoken somewhat at length of the rendering of this work, as it was indeed a very momentous undertaking. The concert and with it the first season closed with a very good and clear interpretation of the wonderful A major symphony, No. 7, by Beethoven, in which the remarkable progress made under the careful training of Mr. Thomas was especially noticeable.

The last one of the series of chamber concerts by the Thomas quartet, presented the following programme:—

- Quartet, E minor Verch.
- Messrs. Jacobsohn, Thomas, Baetens, and Hartdegen.
- Andante and variations, Op. 46 Schumann.
- Messrs. Doerner and Schneider.
- Quartet No. 7, F major, Op. 59 Beethoven.
- Messrs. Jacobsohn, Thomas, and Hartdegen.

Great interest was manifested to hear the Verdi quartet. The remarkable, almost anomalous course which this composer's development has taken, has attracted the most widespread attention and given rise to much comment. The favorable criticisms which even German musicians accorded to this work certainly caused every one to listen to it with predilection. And yet I must acknowledge to have been disappointed. While there are many points of beauty the entire style struck me as being in contrast with what we are accustomed to hear in a string quartet. Intuitively the musician expects a certain breadth and dignity which the classical writers have without exception infused into this form. If the four movements had been designated in any other way than as forming a string quartet, my individual impression would have been more favorable. The first movement (Allegro) is beyond a doubt the most dignified of the four. The Andantino reminds one irresistibly of ballet music. The last two movements (Prestissimo and Scherzo, fuga, Allegro assai mosso) improve on this, but do not strike me as being equal to the first, either in conception or musical workmanship. Of the favorite "Andante and Variations," by Schumann, Messrs. Doerner and Schneider gave a very good rendering. With the celebrated F major quartet, Op. 59, by Beethoven, the first of the "Rasumowski" quartets, this memorable series of concerts closed. When the performances have all been marked by so high a degree of excellence it would be "carrying owls to Athens" to laud the interpretation of this wonderful work. The members of the quartet, Messrs. Jacobsohn, Thomas, Baetens, and Hartdegen, have proven themselves such perfect artists in execution and cultivated musicians in interpretation, that special mention is unnecessary. To the lovers of the highest in music these quartet evenings have indeed been a boon. How deeply they realized this was evident from the enthusiasm with which at the close of the last chamber concert the hearers demanded the reappearance of the artists in order to be able to express their gratefulness.

by renewed applause. A very neat and well arranged pamphlet has been issued by the College of Music, containing the programmes of the orchestra and chamber concerts of the past season, together with interesting miscellaneous information pertaining to the establishing of the institution. It will be a valuable landmark to all interested in the progress of musical culture in the country, and especially in the West. An interesting feature to organists is the list of compositions performed by Mr. Whiting at the organ matinees, a repertoire extensive as it is excellent in point of the character of the works it embraces. The announcement that the organ concerts are to be continued during the summer months with universal approbation. Mr. Thomas, with his orchestra, will appear during the summer months in the Highland house, a most delightful hill-top resort; already two concerts have been given before large and elegant audiences.

CHICAGO, JUNE 25, 1879. — On the evening of June 16, the Beethoven Society gave its closing performance for the season, presenting Verdi's Requiem Mass. They had the assistance of Miss Annie Louise Cary, Miss McCarthy, Mr. Charles Adams, and Mr. George W. Couly as soloists, and a large orchestra, under the direction of Mr. Carl Wolfsohn, the conductor of the society. The performance was given in Haverly's Theatre, and the stage was arranged with a cathedral scene and decorated after the manner of the first representation in the Royal Opera House in Vienna, where the work was under the direction of the composer. The society had taken much pains to prepare the work for performance, engaging the best solo talent, and the result was that the mass received most satisfactory treatment. Miss Cary sang the high and difficult music of the mezzo-soprano part with telling effect, particularly in her solo numbers. In the "Quid sum miser" her high A flat came out with fine power, and indeed the noble tones of her rich voice gave a beauty to the part that was delightful to hear. I know of no singer who gives more universal satisfaction than Miss Cary, for no matter what music she sings, there is an honesty of purpose about every effort, and she stamps all her work with the conscientious intent of the true artist. Miss McCarthy, the soprano of the evening, has a large and telling voice, and as she has had much experience in singing mass music, being a member of a Catholic church choir for a long time, the result of her study was manifest in her fine performance of the part. Mr. Charles Adams unfortunately was not in his best voice, but yet his work indicated feeling, good taste, and the spirit of an artist. He gave the tenor solo "Ingemisco" with fine effect, and his voice was quite satisfying in the high tones, but the effort seemed to deprive him of his best powers for the rest of the evening. Mr. Couly sang the bass part for the first time, and as he has had but little experience in music of this character, it is not to be wondered at, that his success was only a partial one. The chorus was well up in its work, and had the orchestra been a little more subdued in the soft passages, in which the mass abounds, the effect would have been more pleasing. The question of an adequate orchestral accompaniment is one that will have to be met before long in this city, if our musical societies would perform great works with that refinement of vocal finish of which they are fully capable. We need an orchestral organization, under the charge of a good and earnest conductor, which shall devote its energy toward the perfection of an orchestra worthy of the name. Mr. Carl Wolfsohn had a picked number of men in his band for the performance of the mass, but even with good musicians it is quite impossible in a few rehearsals to obtain that balance, and finish of playing, so necessary in a large and important work. I hope that we shall have an organization next season which shall have for its aim the perfection of an orchestra, the study and performance of symphonies, and other orchestral works, and tend to harmonize the elements into a perfect whole. It is time that positive work was undertaken in this direction.

On the evening of June 23, Mr. H. Clarence Eddy gave his one hundredth organ recital, presenting a very remarkable programme, inasmuch as eight of the pieces had been composed expressly for that occasion. Gustav Merkel of Dresden, Faist of Stuttgart, De Lange of Cologne, Rogers of Paris, S. B. Whitney of Boston, each furnished a composition, while our home composers, Gleason, Pratt, and the organist himself, added offerings. The completion of such an undertaking as the performance of one hundred recitals of organ music, without the repetition of any number, deserves more than a passing notice. Looking over the programmes, a full record of which I have kept, I find that there have been one hundred and thirty-five different composers represented. At each recital a selection from Bach has been played, until the concertos, sonatas, preludes, fugues, toccatas, chorals, fantasies, gavottes, and arrangements from larger works, have made the goodly number of one hundred and seven fine compositions of this great master. All his most important organ compositions have been played.

Following the list in respect to the different periods of musical development, we find Handel represented with twenty-three compositions, comprising his organ concertos, the fifth suite, fugues, and arrangements of his overtures, and other works. It may be remembered that his concertos have been rearranged for organ alone, by Schwab and De Lange, having been originally written with an accompaniment for other instruments. Scarlatti's famous "Katzen Fuge" we find arranged for the organ by Mr. Eddy himself, while Mozart has been represented by ten compositions, mostly transcriptions by Haupt, Best, Van Eyken, and Gottschlag. All of Mendelssohn's organ sonatas have been played, his preludes and fugues, and other compositions, numbering some thirty-two selections. Schumann's name is down for fifteen compositions, embracing his fugues on B-A-C-H, "Canonica Studies," and some arrangements of larger works. Spohr's compositions are presented by thirteen numbers, while Haydn's name adds five more. Some transcriptions from Schubert bring his fame to remembrance, while Beethoven's overtures, symphonies, and other works, had been made to meet the requirements of the organ, by good arrangements.

The name of Krebs brings to memory the history of "ye olden time" when music was enriched by the great creations of the forefathers of the art. Palestrina, and Frescobaldi recall the early development of the art in Italy, when music blossomed into being in the "land of song." The organ, in its wide-reaching way, even grasped for the music of Chopin, for four of his compositions were transcribed, and thus enlarged the list of representative men. Coming down to modern time, Merkel, of Dresden, has thirty-five compositions embracing sonatas, single and double fugues, pastorals, fantasies, and other pieces for the organ. His sonatas have been regarded as fine models of modern composition, and are doubtless among the most important works for the organ ever written. Guilmant, too, among the writers of to-day, has a large number of compositions for this instrument, and in this series is represented by thirty-five numbers. The name of Thiele recalls the virtuosic music, his "Concert Satz" in E-flat minor, two in C minor, and the "Chromatic Fantasia and Fuge," besides other numbers, have graced the programmes.

Saint-Saëns, Liszt, and transcriptions from Wagner have presented each in their turn new departures in music. Yet Von Weber was not forgotten, nor the sons of Bach, and the names Rossini, Pletow, and Gade added contrasts of no quiet order. Raff was represented by a fugue, and a grand canon in B flat, while a number called "Winterruhe" (Repose in Winter), gave no suggestion of the "inevitable March," unless the thought of Charles Lamb's "famous fault" called up the idea. Dietrich Buxtehude recalls the state of musical progress in 1650, and Zipoli in 1700; while Dr. Volkmar indicates the culture of to-day by many of his best compositions for this "mighty instrument." Franz Lachner, too, was represented by some pleasing sonatas, while Charles Marie Widor's grand organ symphonies indicated in a masterly manner new possibilities for that instrument. They called forth the high praises of our musicians. Liszt's arrangement of the famous Miserere of Allegri was an interesting reminder of the former generations, and their place in the grand development of the musical art. The pure musical thought of Pergolesi was not forgotten, and selections from his Stabat Mater indicated to us his claim for remembrance. Kühnstedt, and Rheinberger, with Faist, Smart, and Reinecke, bring us to our own day again. Our own country was represented by Buck, Thayer, Whiting, Singer, Carter, Morgan, Gleason, and others. Haupt, the celebrated teacher and musical scholar, had two manuscript compositions performed during the series. Hesse, Van Eyken, Lemmens, Best, Lux, Batiste, Richter, and even Rink by a fugue on "Bach" were on the list. Wely, Schneider, and Hummel made variety again possible. Orlando di Lasso, of the year 1520, was brought to our hearing by an arrangement of Liszt's. The name of Hatten recalled not "The Little Fat Man" but his fine playing of the fugues of Bach, as one of his own found its way into public hearing. Sterndale Bennett and Sir Michael Costa suggest the English school, while the name of John A. West indicates the promise of even a Chicago musician making his way in the wide field of composition.

I have thus passed quickly over the names of some of the composers represented in this series of one hundred recitals, simply to show the magnitude of the undertaking. The total number of pieces played has been about six hundred, embracing the compositions of every school and of the representative men in all countries that have taken a part in the progress of the musical art. To perform such a task week after week, and bring out a fine programme of fresh music each time required great endurance, hard study, and remarkable ability. The uniform artistic character of Mr. Eddy's playing has been a subject of wonder on the part of all who understood the magnitude of the undertaking. He richly merits high praise for what he has accomplished. The list of programmes will also make a valuable catalogue of what is good in organ music for every student and organist.

C. H. B.

NOTES AND GLEANINGS.

THE CINCINNATI SÄNGERFEST. — A taustic and plain-spoken correspondent addresses the following "Anti-Teutonic [and we fear too just] View of the Proceedings" to the Musical critic of the Boston Courier: —

"The programme of the twenty-first Sängersfest of the North American Sängerbund included a street parade, seven concerts, and a picnic. The amount of enthusiasm displayed, in the streets, by the Germans of the city is astounding to the cooler-blooded and more sincere Americans. Everything wears a holiday look. Flags, evergreens, banners and outrageous portraits of the masters are seen everywhere on the outsides of buildings. The parade consisted of 5,000 paraders and was witnessed by 100,000 people. You see it cost nothing to see this part of the show. The Music Hall was about two thirds full at the first concert, and half of those went home before it was over. Let me digress here long enough to say that the Germans of this town are the worst lot of hypocrites (musically considered) there are to be found. They are wild over friends, picnics, beer, and brass bands. But put before them a solid feast of intellectual music, and they won't listen to it, nor pay for it, nor comprehend it when they do condescend to listen to it. Three fourths of the audiences at these festival concerts are Americans; the remainder are Germans of high intelligence naturally, or who have become so by association with Americans. Over a beer-shop you read 'Er nicht liebt wein, weil und gesang,' and so forth. Now this is the position: Wein (beer) comes first, and poor gesang last. In other words gesang has no chance until wein and weil have palled upon the Teutonic appetite. This assumption of superiority in musical matters is founded in ignorance and cultured in stupidity. Let it be plainly understood that the Fest is nothing more nor less than a grand spree, beginning in a street parade and ending in a picnic and beer. The programmes include two large works — St. Paul and Verdi's Requiem. The list of composers runs down to Donizetti, Abt, and a host of obscure German worthies. The programmes are too short in some cases, too long in others, and are always incongruous. The chorus is robust and hearty, and sings pretty well when they know their parts. The orchestra is better and has played finely. The Leonora overture went vilely, but the conductor was at fault. Mr. Thomas has no part in the affair; he fled to Chicago on the opening night and has not since been heard from. Of the soloists, Madame Otto Alaaeben is the bright and expensive star. They imported her from Germany at a cost of $3,000, an error in valuation of just $2,800. She is pretty good as far as she goes, but she don't go far enough. The other soloists are not worth mentioning, aside from Mr. Whitney and Mr. Remmerts, being mostly resident singers. My estimate is made from a strict standpoint, and of course would be greatly modified if seen through the bottom of a beer glass. I can discover no good to art from the affair, and believe that encouragement of such undertakings is more injurious than beneficial. Other festivals held throughout the Union are so far superior to the one under notice that comparisons are absurd. Let me indulge the hope that the progressive spirit of the times may force upon the people a wider education and that such scenes as have occurred at this Fest will not be repeated. Think for a moment, good Bostonians, of a singer coming on the stage drunk, clear through, falling asleep before the audience, and tumbling over into the orchestra. I am so thoroughly a 'Melican man' that I do not believe any American singer would be guilty of such behavior. CHEDAR."

"CINCINNATI, JUNE, 1879."

CINCINNATI, JUNE 27. — The Musical Festival Association, of Cincinnati, has offered a prize of $1,000 for the best musical composition by a native American composer, to be sung at the musical festival in 1880. Mr. Theodore Thomas was appointed by the association one of five gentlemen who are to pass on the merits of the work, and now the other four judges have been appointed and have accepted the trust. The full board is as follows: Theodore Thomas, president; Dr. Leopold Danrooch, of New York; Asger Hamerick, Baltimore; Otto Singer, Cincinnati; and Carl Zerrahn, Boston.

A PRECIOUS PRESENT TO AN ORGANIST. — The following incident occurred at the one hundredth organ concert of Mr. Eddy, of which our Chicago correspondent writes above: "Just before the last number of the programme, Miss Grace Hiltz, in a neat little speech, presented Mr. Eddy, in the name of the pupils and patrons of the Hershay School, with the magnificent edition of Bach's music published by the Bach Gesellschaft, at Leipzig, numbering twenty five volumes."

MR. CARL ROSA's repertory will next year include such operas as Lohengrin, Aida, Rienzi, Mignon, Carmen, and other works, with possibly, as a special novelty, the Taming of the Shrew, of the lamented Hermann Goets.

THE two French composers, M. Saint-Saëns and M. Massenet, have been commissioned by Ricordi, the Milan musical publisher, to set two Italian librettos, which are to be produced in Italy. M. Massenet's score will be on the "Erodiade," by Sig. Zinardini, who also supplies M. Saint-Saëns with the book "Il Macedone," based on the history of Alexander the Great.

Mlle. ANNA MEHLIG gave her morning concert at St. James' Hall (London) on Monday, June 9. The pianist selected for her solos Bach's organ prelude and fugue in E minor, transcribed for piano by Liszt, Haydn's variation in F minor, Field's Nocturne in A, and a Tambourin of Raff. With Herr Strauss, Mlle. Mehlig played the Fantasia in C, Op. 159, of Schubert, she led the piano quintet in G minor, Op. 99, of Rubinstein, and with Madame Faispoff she played the Rondo in C, Op. 73, for two pianos, of Chopin. The vocalists were Mlle. Redeker and Herr Elmblad, the latter singing national Swedish songs.

BOSTON, JULY 19, 1879.

Entered at the Post Office at Boston as second-class matter.

CONTENTS.

SANZIO. Stuart Sterne	113
TOUJOURS PERDRE	114
HOMER VERSUS "PINAPORE"	115
HOW THE FRENCH LEARN TO ACT	116
LETTERS FROM AN ISLAND. II. Fanny Raymond Ritter	117
Vassar Commencement, Pictures, and Physics. — Der Freyschütz and Caspar's Kill . — Open-Air Studies
H. M. S. PINAPORE	118
MUSICAL CORRESPONDENCE	119
Chicago. — Milwaukee.
NOTES AND GLEANINGS	120

All the articles not credited to other publications were expressly written for this Journal.

Published fortnightly by HOUGHTON, OSGOOD AND COMPANY, 220 Devonshire Street, Boston. Price, 10 cents a number; $2.50 per year.

For sale in Boston by CARL FRUEBER, 30 West Street, A. WILLIAMS & Co., 283 Washington Street, A. K. LORING, 369 Washington Street, and by the Publishers; in New York by A. BRENTANO, Jr., 37 Union Square, and HOUGHTON, OSGOOD & Co., 21 Astor Place; in Philadelphia by W. H. BOWEN & Co., 1102 Chestnut Street; in Chicago by the CHICAGO MUSIC COMPANY, 513 State Street.

SANZIO.

BY STUART STERNE, AUTHOR OF "ANGELO."

(Continued from page 106.)

And oh, how sweet

The next glad, busy day to both of them!
When Benedetta came at early morn,
And sat beside the canvas patiently,
Long as he pleased, while Sanzio fell to work,
Now to accomplish at the eleventh hour, —
Nay, but he would not think that they must part! —
All he had left undone. Ere he began,
He hung the fine white linen round her head,
That like a long, dense veil fell down behind,
And draped itself about the graceful shoulders
In easy, flowing folds, and knotted it
Himself about the slender waist in front,
Though Benedetta thought him wondrous slow,
Nor over skillful at his task, so long
His fingers fumbled o'er it. And at first,
When holding brush and pencil in his hand,
He gazed upon her searchingly, now near,
Now further off, — both of them smiled each time
Their glances met, when Sanzio would throw out
Some merry word, while Benedetta flushed
And dropped her eyes, until he cried, "Nay, nay,
Not so, my little Saint! This will not do;
Turn the full light of those sweet eyes on me,
Or I shall have no power to work!" Whereat
They faltered once again.

But when ere long,
Warming to his great task, he gradually
Was ever more and more absorbed and lost,
Until he labored on in silence, grave,
And without further word or smile, sometimes
E'en frowning darkly in his eagerness, —
She bore unflinchingly his longest gaze,
Felt that he scarcely saw her when he looked,
Save as she helped his work.

Thus swiftly grew
Her earnest face from out the canvas, life-like
In form and tint and line, for faithfully
As his unerring, subtle eye beheld,
His master-mind conceived, whose swift commands
The cunning hand obeyed, — he set them down,
Caught all their fairness, and sweet, winning grace.
Only the wavy hair he smoothed away
In simple, shining bands, and on the brow
He mingled with its earthly purity
The mild effulgence of a heavenly light,
And the bright eyes and virgin lips he deepened
With the unutterable tenderness
Of sainted motherhood. Yet long, it seemed,
He could not please or satisfy himself,
But muttered half aloud from time to time,
And set his foot down hard upon the floor,
And twice with one bold sweep destroyed again
A whole hour's labor. But without a pause
Fell ever patiently to work once more,
And so at last threw down his brush, leaned back,
Drew a deep sigh of comfort and content,
And bade her rise and look.

"O beautiful!

Am I in truth so fair as that?" she cried,
"Ah yes, methinks 'tis like, — a very little!"
But in a moment gently shook her head,
Then bowed it, as in swift humility,

Crossing her hands an instant on her breast,
And softly said, "Ah no! — transfigured thus,
It is no longer I!"

No answer came

From Sanzio, save that he cried merrily,
"My bird, you were an angel, to hold out
So long in sweetest patience on your perch!
Soon will I set you free, and let you fly
Where'er you list, until I call again;
But now for few brief moments yet, I pray,
Go back once more!"

And then he speedily sketched

Her finely moulded hands and tapering fingers,
And ere he copied kissed each one, — in vain
Did Benedetta strive against his will,
Draw them away! For irresistibly
He now slid back into his old, gay mood,
And full of happy laughter chatted on,
Till he exclaimed, "Enough and over much!
Sufficient to the day shall be its work;
May but my little Saint with equal grace
Bless me to-morrow!"

And with this sprang up,

Swift whirled her round and round the great, wide room,
In a mad, merry dance; till the white veil
First floated far behind and then dropped off,
And her dark hair, escaping from its coil,
Came rippling down in long, luxuriant waves,
That covered neck and shoulders, face and eyes,
Till laughing, breathless, blinded, she cried out,
"Hold, hold, O Sanzio mine, — I can no more!"

The morrow came, and like the yesterday
Fled but too fast to these who passed again
Long hours together in the sunny work-room,
At whose broad windows, thrown up wide, rolled in
The balmy air and joyous light of spring,
And now and then a twittering bird sped by.
Long, happy hours of sweet, unbroken peace!
For Sanzio prayed that under some pretext
Nina for these few days might turn away
Pupils or patrons, strangers or good friends,
All who were wont to throng his open doors;
But sent her in the afternoon to bring
A neighbor's pretty child. And though at first
The babe gazed all about him anxiously,
With troubled, restless eyes and quivering lip,
The little face grew calm and smiled at length,
When Benedetta gently spoke to him
In low, caressing tones; then crowing loud,
He suddenly stretched his chubby arms to her,
And gladly clasped in hers, and nestling close,
Patting her softly with his dimpled hands,
Soon blinked and shut his bright eyes dreamily,
And dropped into a peaceful, smiling sleep.

The rosy babe folded upon her bosom,
The snowy linen draped about them both,
And the blue mantle gathered over it,
She stood where he had bid her, near his work,
While Sanzio gazed and gazed, and more than once
His steady hand shook, and his eye grew dim,
And all his heart welled up with tenderness,
So passing fair seemed her sweet image thus;
Forgot the unwonted burden that she bore
Grew heavy in her arms, until she moved,
And gently laid it down upon the couch,
Saying, "Nay, I am weary, Sanzio mine,
Pray let me rest awhile!"

They sped away,

Those seven brief, golden days, that were so filled
With mingled joy and labor, Sanzio scarce
Knew the beginning or the end of each,
Knew but that every hour of this brief life
Quickened as with a new, untold delight.
But promptly on the morning of the eighth,
The summons came from home for Benedetta.
Breathless she flew to Sanzio, with the cry,
"Our neighbor is below to take me back,
My mother sends him! Oh, but must I go,
And can it be this happy, happy time
So soon is over?"

He looked up as though

He scarcely understood her hasty words.
"What, go?" he said. "Now? — they have come for you
Before the week is done! Nay, by the Saints,
I cannot let you! — nor my work, nor I,
Can spare you yet for many another day!
Hold, I will haste to tell the messenger,
Leave me to deal with him. I at this moment Happen to come here from my distant home!"
And with a merry glance he seized his cap
And sped away, while Benedetta stayed,
And in the work-room waited his return,
In doubt and fear lest he might not prevail,
And they be parted after all so soon. —
Too soon, oh, all too soon! — For ah, kind Heaven —

He tarried long, she thought, and when at length
She heard his step again upon the stair,
She hastened out to meet him, anxiously

Searching his face, to swiftly read their fate,
And found his beaming eyes lit up with joy.
Mutely he twined his arm about her neck,
And drew her close to him, and softly asked,
"So my sweet Benedetta willingly Stays here with me another little while?"
"Oh, gladly, gladly, Sanzio mine!" she whispered,
Turning her timid lips to meet his kiss,
And fondly pressed her cheek against his own.
But in a moment then with clouded brow, —
"Yet O my Sanzio, 'tis not well, methinks,
To thus deceive my mother!"

"Nay, my Saint,"

He answered gayly, "take no heed for that,
And be consoled, I pray you! All the sin
Is mine alone, and I, a hardened sinner,
Can bear it with my conscience undisturbed!
We do not wrong your mother, and sometime
I'll make it right, dear Love, with her and Heaven!"

The new brief time of grace Sanzio had gained, —
Another week, — rolled by e'en like the first,
What though to Benedetta it appeared
His labor could have missed her, better far
Than he had thought and said. For often now,
After he gazed a moment, he would cry,
"Fly little bird, I'll work alone awhile!"
Yet ever when she had returned from mass,
Where she must go to pray with all her soul
For the forgiveness of their sin, she said, —
Surely she must accept her share of it,
Nor let him bear its burden all alone! —
And coming to the work-room, softly asked,
"My Sanzio, have you need of me to-day?"
He answered, "I have need of you, my darling,
Ever and ever, — in each hour of day!
Come in and sit here with me. Or stand up
And walk about, — be mute, or laugh and talk, —
Do aught and all as it may please you best,
Only be near me somewhere, sunbeam mine,
Whose sole, sweet presence helps me!"

So she roamed

Sometimes about the work-room quietly,
Looking its hundred treasures o'er again;
And sometimes in a corner laughed and played
With the dear babe, — that Sanzio sent to fetch
On many another day, — and when he tired
Rocked him to sleep with a soft lullaby;
Or begging Nina for some piece of work,
Sat plying her swift needle busily,
By the great window gazing on the town,
Distant from Sanzio, yet where he could see her,
As with a very tyrant's obstinate will
He would demand; and ever finely caught
Her fleeting mood from him, inensibly
Attuning all her being to his own,
Silent and grave, or bubbling o'er with sweet
Low laughter and gay words, e'en as she read
The shifting lights and shades within his soul
Reflected on his brow.

One afternoon

She stole away, and for an hour or more
Showed not her face again, till Sanzio rose
To go in search of her, when suddenly
He heard the rustle of a heavy robe,
And a light laugh close to his ear, and turning,
Saw her before him curiously transformed.
She stood and swept him a low courtesy, clad
In the quaint garb of hundred years ago.
A piqued coil upon the delicate head,
That scarce seemed strong enough to bear the weight
Of the tall, shimmering tower, whence a long veil
Flowed down and half concealed the dimpling face
And laughing eyes; her slender form encased
In a stiff, gorgeous robe of blue and silver,
Whose wondrous sleeves hung down so far and wide,
They well-nigh touched the pointed, scarlet shoes,
Peeping from out the garment's hem.

"My Fawn,

How strange you look!" cried Sanzio, laughing too,
While yet a deep delight shone in his eyes,
"Where found you all this gear?"

"In an old chest

In a dark corner of the attic. There
Lay these and other pretty things," she said.
And he, "Oh yes, I recollect, methinks;
They were my great-grandmother's, in her time,
And so came down to me."

"I put them on,

Though mayhap all awry, for I could find
Only the smallest bit of broken glass,
That scarcely told if they were right or wrong, —
Just for a little sport and to surprise you,"
She said again. "Nina once gave me leave
To stir through everything in all the house, —
You are not angry with me, Sanzio mine?"
But looking up at him she had no need
Of other answer than his silent glance,
And went on gayly, "Fancy now I were Some mighty queen!"

And then strode up and down,

And as she moved, listened with childlike glee

To the loud rustle of the rich brocade,
And often turned her head to watch the train
Sweep o'er the floor behind her.

"Aye, you know
You are my Queen, whose kingdom is my heart!
But all this finery suits you wondrous well;
You want but these," he said; and as he spoke
Went to a curious casket carved in wood,
That Benedetta long had marvelled o'er,
Unlocked it with a twisted silver key,
And took a handful of gemmed trinkets out.
Then hastening to her side again, exclaimed,
"Come sweetest, I will play your maid for once!"
And deftly turning down the yellow lace
That rose up stiffly round the snowy throat,
He would have clasped it with a quaint old necklace
Of dimly shimmering pearl, with here and there
A precious ruby, like a drop of blood,
Set in between; but could not please himself,
And took it off to try another one, —
Plain golden beads, strung on a thread of silk,
But shook his head again, unbound this too,
And laid it down, saying in graver tone,
"Nay, it but breaks the beautiful line! 'T is best Simply as Nature made it, — let not us
Attempt to mar her fairest handiwork!"
But Love, take this, and wear it for my sake,"
He added then, and would have slipped a ring, —
A finely wrought, gold serpent, with bright eyes, —
Upon her finger. But she gently said,
And faintly flushing drew her hand away,
"Nay, Sansio mine, I will not! I have this,"
Touching a silver circle, plain and old, —
Sansio had often marked it on her hand, —
"That my poor father gave me long ago,
And need no other!"

"As you will, dear heart!"
He answered, but one moment earnestly
Gazed at her with a puzzled, questioning look.
But suddenly, full of smiling mirth again,
He bowed in mock solemnity, and asked,
"But since I am thus honored, will not now
Your majesty be seated? I must fix
This image, ere it vanish from my sight, —
But this must off!"

He lifted from her head
The heavy coil, then with the words, "Permit
Your happy bond-slave!" led her to a seat,
And tossed the trinkets all into her lap.
"My Princess, pray you look them o'er, at least,
If you'll not kindly take them off my hands,
While I make ready!"

Benedetta passed
The jewels through her fingers; then she thought, —
How sad, oh, how most sad, the form of her,
Who once was gayly decked with these bright things,
Lies crumbled into dust long years ago, —
That the fair eyes, which looked on them with joy,
Are closed and blind in the dark earth forever, —
Oh, may the Saints rest her poor soul in peace!
And suddenly rose, and put the gems away,
While an unwonted shadow lingered still
On the white brow, and in the darkened eyes,
When Sansio bid her turn and look at him.

(To be continued.)

TOUJOURS PERDRIX.

[The substance of the following article, prepared for the German Press by Prof. Franz Gehring, has appeared in the Deutsche Zeitung of Vienna.]

Falstaff. — His thefts were too open; his slyling was like an unskilful singer — he kept not time.

Nym. — The good humor is to steal at a minim rest.

Pistol. — Convey, the wise it call; steal! poh, a foor for the phrase.

THE few whose duty or taste it is to collect, or at least acquaint themselves with the constantly accumulating Beethoven literature, must of course include the multitudinous writings — the toujours perdrix — of Herr Prof. Ludwig Nohl. They know ad nauseam that gentleman's method of dressing his perdrix in all modes; or, to drop the figure, his habit of using the same materials over and over again, in lectures, articles for periodical publications of all sorts, and in volumes made up of such articles. They know also, that, since the publication of Thayer's first and second volumes of his "L. v. Beethoven's Leben," the swarming errors of Herr Nohl's biography of the composer have, in such articles, been silently corrected; and that he (Nohl) rarely if ever loses an opportunity of referring to his book as the great and sufficient authority upon all that relates to Beethoven's history; and, finally, that he is, to a certain extent, justified in so doing, because, in the notes to his third volume, he has corrected a great number of the errors of the preceding two, besides adding an appendix containing seventy-nine (79) "corrections and verifications," — whence derived the reader is not informed.

It is not asserted, nor even intimated, that all, even of these "corrections and verifications," are conveyed (the wise it call) from Thayer's two volumes; indeed, some are from Nottebohm's writings and perhaps other sources; but this fact is certainly striking and significant: that, of the 79, all but the last two belong in the years covered by those two volumes, and just where Thayer leaves him in the lurch (end of 1806), Herr Nohl's appendix ends.

The well-informed reader knows that hitherto Thayer has taken no notice of these "conveyings;" that Herr Nohl has reviewed the first two volumes of Thayer's work to his heart's content, and that Thayer has not retaliated; and that, in a few instances, in which Thayer has deemed it fitting to speak plainly to him, it has only been when he believed (rightly or wrongly) that truth, justice, and good morals demanded it. It is true, that Thayer has never received a penny in return for all the costs and labor expended upon his four volumes on Beethoven and his works; but as he has not written them for money, if Herr Nohl can improve his perdrix by small conveyings from them, to his pecuniary benefit — why not? He has a family to support. Had he remained satisfied with simply correcting his previous errors, he might even have "conveyed" a supplemental appendix to his "Beethoven's Leben" from Thayer's new volume, with the same impunity he has enjoyed for a dozen years past.

But, perhaps in consequence of this impunity, he has begun to "convey," as Falstaff says, "two openly," and Thayer's friends, with one voice, now declare that patience has ceased to be a virtue.

The "rock of offense" is a long article in the Berlin Voss'sche Zeitung under the heading: "The Last Court Organist of the Electors of Cologne."

As C. G. Neefe was appointed successor to Van den Eeden in 1781, and did succeed him the next year, and held the office until he received his formal dismissal in 1796, from the then fugitive elector, Max Franz, the reader naturally supposes him to be the subject of the article, and is curious to know whether anything is added by Herr Nohl to what Nottebohm and Thayer have printed concerning him; but, no; it is upon one who in 1784 was appointed Neefe's assistant, and who in 1792 left Bonn never to return — Ludwig van Beethoven. So, we find the same old perdrix — "Beethoven's youth" — served up again (in the first half of the article), of course with numerous corrections of former errors silently "conveyed" from Thayer. Then comes, however, matter of great interest and value pertaining to the history of the composer's early years, as indeed it must be, since it is copied bodily from an essay written after long and patient study, and bearing throughout every mark of excellent judgment and singular critical acumen, by Dr. Hermann Deiters (then of Bonn, now director of the Imperial Gymnasium in Posen), and printed in the appendix to Thayer's first volume of his Beethoven Biography. That Dr. Deiters is not named by Herr Nohl need hardly be stated; but he does state in a marginal note whence his "conveyances" are made; in what spirit the reader shall see.

"Ludwig said later," so Herr Nohl conveys, "that Pfeiffer was the teacher to whom he in the main owed everything." "So say," remarks Herr Nohl, "the still existing reminiscences of a son of the house in the Rheingasse, who died some fifteen years since — a baker named Fischer, and his sister Cæcilia." The marginal note — to the word "reminiscences" — runs thus: "Formerly in possession of Herr Oberburgomeister Kaufmann in Bonn, and partly published as an appendix to A. W. Thayer's 'Ludwig van Beethoven's Leben' (vol. i., Berlin, 1866), who therefore was as little able to interweave them into his text, as I [Herr Nohl] was in my 'Beethoven's Leben' (vol. i., Leipzig, 1864), so that this sketch [i. e., the article in the Voss'sche Zeitung] is in fact the first complete one on the subject."

Peruse that again, reader, and get its full flavor.

Sir Thomas More, in the author's epistle to Peter Giles which precedes the Utopia, speaks of the "advantage that a bald man has, who can catch hold of another by the hair, while the other cannot return the like upon him." He is "safe as it were of gunshot since there is nothing considerable enough to be taken hold of." Now as to dates and facts, "Beethoven's Leben, vol. i., Leipzig, 1864," by Nohl, is, so to say, very "bald-headed." But think of its richness in other respects! — its grandiose dissertations upon the nature of the German mind (Geist); upon the Rhinelander, and his love for gormandizing; and upon the Rhine wines; its citations from an article on Beethoven's early years, "written with considerable knowledge of the subject, and, some few errors excepted, worthy of confidence throughout, which appeared in a Revue Britannique,¹ not known to Thayer; especially the long passage so flattering to an American upon "the first practical realization of Rousseau's ideas — the first genuine political act of the last century — the Declaration of Independence by the American colonies; and much else, which it never would have occurred to Thayer to weave into a biography of Beethoven. Professor Nohl's force lies, no doubt, in æsthetics. Logic, certainly, is not his strong side; for if the appearance of Dr. Deiters's essay in the appendix to Thayer's volume proves that he could not have woven its substance into his text, a fortiori, he could not have known Nohl's "Beethoven's Leben, vol. i., Leipzig, 1864," since neither in text nor in appendix has he "conveyed" (the wise it call) a word of its lofty philosophy and ethnological wisdom. And yet that gentleman cannot have forgotten that to his request for Thayer's opinion of that volume (end of March, 1864), the answer was in substance, that, owing to the very numerous differences in their views and in their presentations of facts, which had struck him in reading it, he felt compelled to subject his manuscript to another thorough revision.

¹ The joke is, that the article thus eulogized by Nohl was a translation of Thayer's article in the Atlantic Monthly, in 1858, printed as original in the Revue.

Now for a transient modulation into another key.

In the autumn of 1860 Thayer passed a month or two in Bonn, examining and copying from all the old newspapers, court almanacs, and whatever would throw light upon the lives and times of the Beethovens. Time pressed, and without accomplishing his intended search in the provincial archives at Düsseldorf, he went to Paris, where he lost much time in suing for permission to search the old diplomatic correspondence of the French agents at Bonn — a permission finally refused by Louis Napoleon's minister of foreign affairs. Thence he proceeded to London, where he was received and aided in his researches by Neate, Potter, Sir George Smart, Hogarth (son-in-law of Thomson, and father-in-law of Dickens), Chorley, Lonsdale, — all deceased, not to name the still living, — in a manner which he cannot recall to mind without emotion.

Soon after, an offer of employment at the United States Legation in Vienna compelled him to return thither, without visiting Düsseldorf. Nevertheless, he wrought out the first draft of his first volume, and in 1863 was able to place it wholly or in part in the hands of Dr. von Breuning and other friends for their opinions. It found favor, and its author was pressed on all sides not to delay its publication. Why then did two years pass before it was put into the hands of the translator? Simply because he was unable to return to the Rhine until November, 1864, and then for but fourteen days.

The first object of this journey was of course researches at Düsseldorf, the surprising results of which may be read in the preliminary chapters of the book for which it was undertaken.¹ The wealth of new matter there found detained him until the last moment, and he was obliged to return to Vienna, leaving the second object of the journey unaccomplished. This was no other than the examination of the reminiscences of baker Fischer and his sister Cécilia!

"Well, thereby hangs a tale," as Dame Quickly says, which may be read in letters written some fourteen months later. "Mark now, how a plain tale shall put you down," says Prince Hal to Falstaff.

Thayer's removal to Trieste extinguished the hope of any personal examination of the Fischer papers; but he did not despair that, through his friends and translator in Bonn, they might yet be made of use, even though he was compelled to forward a part of his revised manuscript to Dr. Deiters first. Nor was he mistaken. On the 12th of January, 1866, he received a closely written letter of a dozen pages from Deiters, largely relating to the Düsseldorf documents, and then to the Fischer reminiscences. After a general view of them, and the report of a conversation with Otto Jahn upon them, comes a discussion of the use now to be made of them. "You will probably," he writes, "not desire to rewrite these chapters again. I might make such changes in the text as would be needed and insert the new matter; but I might easily make mistakes both in judging of and using it, and the errors would be at your cost. I think, therefore, of again carefully revising the whole and putting it into an appendix, if the plan meets your approval."

¹ See pages xiv. and xv. of that volume for an account of the noble manner in which Dr. Harless and Dr. Deiters completed the researches for which Thayer's time was too limited.

Thayer replied: "Your letter is at this moment giving me great delight. I have not finished reading it, but begin the answer, so as at once to reply to the various questions."

There is nothing to the present purpose in the letter, but the pages devoted to the Fischer matter, and two extracts from them are sufficient.

"So poor old Fischer is dead! When I was in Bonn in 1860, I went to the hospital (my note-book says September 15), to see him, but found his reminiscences (oral) of no value. The next day (I think it was) he came to me at Honecker's, dressed in frock (swallow-tail) and white cravat, I think — at all events in great state, poor old devil! — and brought his manuscript with him. I ordered a bottle of good wine and let him warm his heart with it, and meantime looked over the papers. I thought then that one might find hints at information, but did not consider it of so much value, as you prove it to be. As the old man demanded three (or was it four?) hundred thaler for it, I dismissed him. My conscience would not allow me to steal its contents, which I might have done, I believe, on pretense of wishing to examine it." . . . "While I was reading this part of your letter, I determined to write you and request you to give this new information in the appendix, and was much pleased when I came to the place where you propose to do this."

Why? First, because of the labor involved in rewriting the chapters in which the new matter belonged; second, because it appeared to be too copious to be inserted there in extenso; but principally, because Thayer judged it unfair to deprive Deiters of the full credit of his patient and difficult labor in deciphering, selecting from, and rendering fit for publication these reminiscences.

Is this "plain tale" sufficiently explicit?

During his stay in Bonn in 1860, Thayer usually supped at the Schwann, with Dr. Reifferscheid, now Professor at Breslau, Dr. Binsfeld, now Director of the Imperial Lyceum, Paul Marquand, the learned editor of Aristoxenus, whose early death is so sad a loss to musical science, and other very promising young scholars. Deiters was also occasionally of the party. As Thayer made no secret of his meetings with poor old Fischer, he to this day does not understand how his friend Deiters could have known nothing of the manuscript and have written of it as a new discovery, with the sad effect of leading the unlucky Herr Nohl astray!

The reader will now understand why, for a dozen years past, Deiters and Thayer have read with Homeric laughter that writer's references to the "two late discovery of the Fischer manuscript, portions of which are printed as an Appendix to Thayer's book, and which so cruelly deprived the most laborious researches of nearly twenty years of their ultimate value," — whatever this last may mean.

Herr Nohl has amused himself and doubtless his readers, in his reviews of Thayer's first two volumes, by sarcasms upon the painful regard for "dates and facts" exhibited therein, to the neglect of musical criticism, and for good morals, to the neglect of æsthetics. Now, it is in a high degree flattering to that writer to find how great a confidence this same Professor Nohl places in the correctness of those dates and facts, as is proved by the extent to which he "conveys" (the wise it call) them.

Should Thayer live to complete his work, who can say that Nohl may not honor it — as he did Jahn's "Mozart" — by making it the basis of a brand-new biography of Beethoven!

Apollo and Minerva! Thayer's dry, tedious facts and dates illuminated, sublimed, glorified, by Herr Professor Ludwig Nohl's lofty morality and æsthetics! That will not be the old perdrix.

That will be a work!

HOMER VERSUS "PINAFORE."

[From the Fortnightly Review.]

OLD HOMER is the very fountain-head of pure poetic enjoyment, of all that is spontaneous, simple, native, and dignified in life. He takes us into the ambrosial world of heroes, of human vigor, of purity, of grace. Now, Homer is one of the few poets the life of whom can be fairly preserved in a translation. Most men and women can say that they have read Homer, just as most of us can say that we have studied Johnson's Dictionary. But how few of us take him up, time after time, with fresh delight! How few have even read the entire Iliad and Odyssey through! Whether in the resounding lines of the old Greek, as fresh and ever-stirring as the waves that tumble on the seashore, filling the soul with satisfying, silent wonder at its restless unison; whether in the quaint lines of Chapman, or the clarion couplets of Pope, or the closer versions of Cowper, Lord Derby, of Philip Worsley, or even in the new prose version of the Odyssey, Homer is always fresh and rich. And yet how seldom does one find a friend spell-bound over the Greek Bible of antiquity, while they wade through torrents of magazine quotations from a petty versifier of to-day, and in an idle vacation will graze, as contentedly as cattle in a fresh meadow, through the chopped straw of a circulating library. A generation which will listen to "Pinafore" for three hundred nights, and will read M. Zola's seventeenth romance, can no more read Homer than it could read a cuneiform inscription. It will read about Homer just as it will read about a cuneiform inscription, and will crowd to see a few pots which probably came from the neighborhood of Troy. But to Homer and the primeval type of heroic man in his beauty, and his simpleness, and joyousness, the cultured generation is really dead, as completely as some spoiled beauty of the ball-room is dead to the bloom of the heather or the waving of the daffodils in a glade. It is a true psychological problem, this nausea which idle culture seems to produce for all that is manly and pure in heroic poetry. One knows — at least, every school-boy has known — that a passage of Homer, rolling along in the hexameter, or trumpeted out by Pope, will give one a hot glow of pleasure and raise a finer throb in the pulse; one knows that Homer is the easiest, most artless, most diverting of all poets; that the fiftieth reading rouses the spirit even more than the first — and yet we find ourselves (we are all alike) painfully psha-ing over some new and uncut barley-sugar in rhyme, which a man in the street asked us if we had read, or it may be some learned lucubration about the site of Troy by some one we chanced to meet at dinner. It is an unwritten chapter in the history of the human mind, how this literary prurience after new print unmans us for the enjoyment of the old songs chanted forth in the sunrise of human imagination. To ask a man or woman who spends half a lifetime in sucking magazines and new poems to read a book of Homer would be like asking a butcher's boy to whistle "Adelaida." The noises and sights and talk, the whirl and volatility of life around us, are too strong for us. A society which is forever gossiping in a sort of perpetual "drum" loses the very faculty of caring for anything but "early copies" and the last tale out. Thus, like the tares in the noble parable of the sower, a perpetual chatter about books chokes the seed which is sown in the greatest books of the world.

HOW THE FRENCH LEARN TO ACT.

[From the London Times.]

We have seen that every French boy or girl who has a taste for the stage may get a thorough training at the Conservatoire. The next step of the aspirant is, properly speaking, no step at all; it is a bound. He may pass from the Conservatoire to one of the state theatres — perhaps to the Français — from school to the first theatre in the world. This last is, of course, a reward of very high merit in the classes, as revealed in the public competitions of the students before the élite of the critical society of Paris. The great point to bear in mind is that, whatever the promotion, it is but another stage of the teaching. The French actor is in a sense in statu pupillari to the end of his days. He is coached at the Français as he was coached at the Conservatoire; only at the theatre he gets his lesson from the collective body of his comrades, instead of a single professor. It is a kind of teaching by universal suffrage. There is no such thing recognized as a man's right to a part, to make or mar at his pleasure. He holds it in trust only for the rest of the members of the company, and he is bound in some sort to administer the trust in accordance with their interests and wishes — at least with their judgment in respect of its tendency to promote the success of the performance as a whole.

Nothing can exceed the thoroughness of the rehearsals at the Français. Most of the pieces there are old ones long in the répertoire, yet when they are in course of revival each actor seems to adopt the useful assumption that he has never seen them before. The pieces less known are labored with incessant care. "Ruy Blas," just reproduced, was rehearsed for six or eight weeks. It was first taken act by act, a day for each, over and over again; then came a series of full rehearsals of the entire play without stage costume; then a grand dress rehearsal. It played on the first night just as though it had had a month's run. No wonder — it had really had a run of nearly two, with closed doors.

I went to see one of these rehearsals of "Ruy Blas," without making any choice. It happened to be the third act. On quitting the daylight of the wings for the twilight of the stage — it was about three on a winter afternoon, — I, as a visitor, had first to pay my respects to the company. I accordingly crossed from left to right to reach a rude tent of canvas on the stage, a sort of portable green-room, where the ladies sat in safe shelter from the draughts to wait for their calls. Here I found, among others, Mlle Sarah Bernhardt and the aged lady companion who is always by her side. In another tent, quite close to the foot-lights — in fact, just behind the prompter's box, and therefore commanding a view of the whole stage — sat Got, who was superintending the rehearsal. In front of him, and near the left-centre entrance, was the well-known council table of the third act, garnished with greedy lords whose monopolies devour the substance of Spain. A lamp in each tent and one in the prompter's box burned dimly in the demi-jour.

This was an ordinary rehearsal, and the company was in ordinary dress. Sarah Bernhardt wore a jacket to shield her from the cold of the stage. Febvre (Don Salluste) carried his great coat over his arm, rather, as it turned out, as a property than for any other use. The only approach to stage costume was in the broad Spanish hat with a drooping plume worn by Mounet-Sully (Ruy Blas). The contrast between that and his frock-coat and the rest would have been striking enough if one had had the leisure to attend to it. These three — Febvre, Mounet-Sully, and Sarah Bernhardt (who of course plays the Queen) — are the leading personages of the present cast, and the third act they are rehearsing is about the best in the play.

The rehearsal had begun, but it had been interrupted for a few moments by my entry. I came in, therefore, only for the sag end of that squabble of the corrupt councillors for place and pay which winds up with a friendly distribution of the monopolies on tobacco, salt, negroes, arsenic, ice, and musk. They are disturbed by Ruy Blas, who has overheard them, and who delivers the well-known grand tirade on ministerial jobbing, one of the finest that even Victor Hugo ever wrote. Mounet's

Charles-Quint! dans ces temps d'opprobre et de terreur,
"Que fais-tu dans ta tombe, o puissant empereur?"

was a perfect vocal detonation; it positively shook the hat in my hand. Got stopped him at once from the prompt-box tent: —

"I should certainly say that in a different style. It is a solemn invocation; it requires a change of voice."

"I am quite of your way of thinking," said a gray-haired gentleman who had just joined him from the wing. It was M. Perrin, the administrator of the company, who holds one of the most envied offices in France. He is about as highly salaried as any English prime minister, and in governing the Théâtre Français he holds a post which most of his countrymen think fully equal in dignity to the governing of a department of state. "I am quite of your way of thinking," repeated M. Perrin.

It was a timely reinforcement; for, as it proved, the two together were hardly an overmatch for Mounet mounted on the hobby of this particular inflection. The rehearsal was suspended for a quarter of an hour, while they fought the point. There was a world-wide of critical acumen — I will not say wasted on it, more especially as I mean just the opposite thing — on either side.

"It is a call to wake the Emperor from his death-sleep," said Mounet; "it must be loud."

"It is a reverent appeal," said Got.

"It is almost as solemn as an act of religion," said Perrin.

"I assure you I cannot see it in that light," answered Mounet-Sully. "For me it is a passionate call to the shade of the Emperor."

"But you do not expect to wake the man up, — voyons," said Got.

"Well, try it again," said Perrin.

Mounet-Sully returned to his starting point, and in an instant he was off at the old rate of initial velocity. The windows in the place must have rattled if one had been near enough to hear them.

They stopped him again. It was quite a struggle à la Française, — obstinate insistence on both sides, tempered in its severity by the use of the forms of good breeding. It was evident to any one knowing something of the personal history of the company that what was now going forward was but a continuation of a very long struggle on the part of the seniors to repress the exuberant vivacity of this fiery youngster, — at once the glory and the reproach of their company. At length the contest comes to an end: Mounet lowers his sword — that is to say, his tone — and pronounces the passage in something like the required manner, although occasional flashes show that the level earth on which he now condescends to tread is still undermined with fire.

In what other theatre in the world — in what other company — would a theatrical star of this magnitude bear correcting in his course in this way?

Now it will soon be the turn of the concealed Queen to step forth from behind the arras and announce herself to Ruy Blas. The superb Sarah accordingly quits her tent to place herself in very visible hiding, "R. 2 E." Then her voice is heard, deep and sweet, with twice as much meaning in its lowest tones as in its highest: —

"O, merci!"

Ruy Blas — Ciel! (It is a start of surprise, and, as we may imagine, he is perfect here.)

La Reine — Vous avez bien fait de leur parler ainsi.

Je n'y puis résister, duc; il faut que je serre
Cette loyale main si ferme et si sincère!

She darts out her hand, extending the arm at full length — a gesture peculiar to her in private life as on the stage. She always shakes hands in that way.

Got — I don't like that. You only give him your hand; you ought to take his.

Sarah Bernhardt — I think my way is better; there is more netteté in the action.

She probably means that it is more statuesque, as it certainly is, but is perhaps unwilling to use an illustration from her favorite art. Her acting has always shown that she has a keen sense of the beauty of pose. She gets the full plastic as well as histrionic value of a situation.

Perrin — But what does your text say? Look at the stage direction. Reads: —

"She advances rapidly, and takes his hand before he can prevent her."

Sarah Bernhardt [laughing]. — Very well, then; give me your hand. (Mounet-Sully suffers her to take it.)

Got [to Perrin] — I think just where he wants most energy he shows the least. [To Mounet]. — Your own movements there should be as quick and decided, as full of nervous energy as hers.

Mounet-Sully — Let me alone for the present. I have my own very decided opinion about this scene. I will give it you by and by.

The Queen goes on to tell him how she has admired his superb indignation in the scene with the rapacious courtiers. How comes he to be able to speak as kings only ought to speak — to be so terrible, so god-like, so grand?

Ruy — It springs from love of thee. In serving Spain I serve the Queen. Thy image lends me strength! Strengthened by love, I am all powerful! I love thee! — hear me out! Thou art another's — A king's — though not his bride, his bride-elect. I know it; knowing it, have shunned thy presence, Still loving while I shunned it. I have loved thee As the mariner the star that guides him home; A distant homage and an awe-struck worship. Though low to thee as is the earth from heaven, I loved thee as the blind might love the light He never hoped to look on!

And all uttered — how do you think (by Mounet, above all)? — as gently as the roaring of a sucking dove.

Got (decisively) — It will never do.

Perrin (as decisively) — It will never do.

Sarah Bernhardt — It will spoil the whole scene.

Mounet-Sully — Yet that is how I read it, I assure you. He is overpowered at the thought of his own presumption; he is an earthworm raising his head to heaven.

Got — But he does not think of that while he is raising it. Voyons! what excuse does he give the woman for loving him by meeting her in that timid style?

Mounet-Sully — I know it has never been done in that way before. That is one reason the more for doing it. It gives a new sense to the passage, and, as I think, a truer one.

Sarah B. [laughingly] — I do not think I can possibly dare to love you if you do not set me a better example. Remember the Queen wants encouragement as much as Ruy Blas, and who is to give it her if he fails?

Got — I should certainly deliver it in the most thrilling accents of passion.

Mounet-Sully — Like this, you mean (giving an example in his first manner, the only other one he has).

Got, Perrin, Sarah B. — Exactly!

Mounet-Sully [impatiently, and with mutterings that may mean anything] — But surely you must see how false it is to have him so glib of tongue. I really cannot change it in that way. I wish I could; but you must allow me to be obstinate on this one point. I cannot see it in any other light.

Got [disconsolately] — Very well, then, if you cannot see it.

Rehearsal resumed as follows, to quote still further from the translation, which so pleasantly relieves me of all responsibility: —

Exit Queen by the same entrance she came on at, R. 2. R. Ruy (after a pause). Can it — can it be real? Loved, and by her! 'Tis so!

O Paradise, that opens to my eyes,
And steeps my soul in love's profound repose!
Loved — happy — powerful! Duke d'Olmedo!
Spain at my feet! Its honor in my hands —
My country's honor! Teach me, O Heaven,
How to be worthy of my task! Make me
Worthy to offer her a shield and sword —
The Queen my arm, the woman my devotion!

Perrin — Very fine. Bravo! Only I beg to observe that you are too far up the stage if you mean to be heard by the whole house.

Mounet-Sully — I must begin here.

Perrin — But you need not finish. I should like to see more movement during the monologue (in the original a rather long one). I do not think he could stand still while he delivered it.

Enter Febvre, as Salluste, to surprise Ruy Blas: "Bonjour!" tapping him on the shoulder.

Ruy Blas — Good heaven! I am lost! The Marquis.

Will it be believed that the discussion of this single entry occupies them the better part of an hour? Febvre, Mounet-Sully, Sarah Bernhardt, Perrin, Got, all taking part in it, and with the liveliest interest, often all talking together. The first entry is from the centre, — Ruy Blas standing in soliloquy conveniently near, — his master tapping him on the shoulder, then crossing to the council-table, throwing down his cloak, and taking a seat to meet his astonished stare. "Will it be better to do that," says Febvre, "or to take one's seat first, without tapping him on the shoulder at all, and then confront him with the bonjour, — making that the 'tap' so to speak?" He tries it, and they are unanimously of opinion that it would not be better. "How would it be to throw the cloak to him to hold?" says Sarah Bernhardt. "No," says Perrin, "you discount your effect of the handkerchief later on, which is a much better one." "Would you have him at the centre of the stage or near the wing?" That is the fourth proposition, and I really forget the other.

And all that I have seen to-day is less than a thirtieth part of the declamatory preparation for one piece. Yet we wonder by what magic, by what happy gift of nature, precluding the necessity of labor, the French have become the first actors of the world.

LETTERS FROM AN ISLAND.

BY FANNY RAYMOND RITTER.

II.

VASSAR COMMENCEMENT, PICTURES, AND PHYSICS.—DER FREYSCHÜTZ AND CASPAR'S KILL.—OPEN-AIR STUDIES.

DEAR MR. DWIGHT, — Like a great many other people, I was carried away, towards the end of June, by the flood of oratory, prophecy, white muslin and music that sweeps over the land periodically, "for a few days only," in waves of broiling midsummer weather, and, deserting the island, I attended the celebration of commencement at Vassar, and survived the rendering of many brilliant essays, delivered by charming young women, each one of whom seemed to have passed through ages of extraordinary experience in a score or so of years, and who convinced every man present that he didn't know much in general about anything in particular. And one evening there was a promenade concert on the lawn, with calcium lights creating picturesque effects on the sward and evergreens, when everything would have been delightful with the additional charm of the presence of a few absent friends. The resonance of Gilmore's brass band from the tribune outside, with the lofty college walls behind as sounding-board, was admirable. Among the selections played was a good arrangement from Der Freyschütz, an opera, the woodland melodies and pastoral character of which are so admirably adapted to out-door performance.

The beautiful aria sung by Max (arranged for the band), with the ominous kettle-drum beat, and double-bass pizzicati that announce the coming of the demon Samiel, draped in the bat-like folds of his scarlet cloak, was so suggestive of romantic witchery, that I should not have been astonished had the goddess Fauna rushed over the meadows with her host, or the Wild Huntsman swept through the sky, followed by his tumultuous spectral train, or had the ghost of Caspar, that lyric Iago, stood before me in the moonlight, in dark green hunting dress, a sardonic smile on his pale face, a hooting owl on his shoulder, surrounded by a pallid greenish light, and a circle of fiery skulls. Mill-cove Lake, on the college grounds, is chiefly fed by Vassar creek, originally termed Caspar's kill. Now who and what was the Caspar that baptized it? Some dull, but honest and industrious Dutch farmer? Or was it the direful, artful, diabolically interesting Caspar of Von Weber and his poet, Kind? The original Freeshooter legend is to be found in the Gespersterbuch of 1810; but after all, it is barely possible that Caspar was not shot by the enchanted bullet with which he intended to ruin his confiding friend Max; perhaps he escaped to America, and lived happily ever after, and died in the odor of sanctity peacefully in his bed, on the banks of the kill that for some time bore his name. But if his ghost had appeared on that evening, the lake fed by Caspar's kill would have been a capital place for him to disappear in, faintly illumined by glimpses of the crescent moon, and veiled by fitful shadows from the willow, chestnut, and maple boughs, while the owls in the museum might have flapped their wings and hooted a phantom "uhui," as in the bullet-casting scene of the haunted Wolf's Glen.

Messrs. Matthew and John Guy Vassar have lately presented ten thousand dollars to the College, to be used in erecting a new chemical laboratory on the grounds (in place of the old one within the large building), which, it is expected, will be ready next autumn for the use of the professor of chemistry and physics, Le Roy C. Cooley, Ph. D., a gentleman as able in his profession as he is estimable in his private character. The Messrs. Vassar, having thus displayed so much generosity, and being engaged, besides, in planning the erection of a home for old men in Poughkeepsie, imagination runs riot as to what is to come next. Some fancy it will be a new gymnastic hall, strong, rustic, and picturesque, under cover, yet open to the air when needed, with a heating apparatus for winter, and a solid yet elastic floor. More contemplative minds revel in the idea of cloisters for the studious, in the Anglo-Norman style, — one so suitable for modern educational or ecclesiastical buildings, and not out of harmony with that of the college, — perhaps with tiled floors, vaulted roofs, and stained-glass windows alternating with open arches through which the rose and honeysuckle may swing and sway their fragrant chalices! Chateaux en Espagne! And yet, perhaps not.

The advantages of the school for drawing and painting, and the art gallery, at Vassar, have been lately described as follows, in a local paper, by a gentleman familiar with the subject: —

The art department of Vassar College is presided over by Professor Henry Van Ingen, a native of Holland, whose works in the line of his profession have occasionally appeared on exhibition at the Academy of Design in New York, and in other noted collections. One of his master pieces, the Golden Headed Eagle, hangs in the art gallery, and is very much admired.

The art gallery contains numerous specimens of painting in oil, and, in water-color, and also in fine penciling and crayon sketches, besides the collection of sun pictures, consisting of some three to four thousand copies of the best works of art to be found in Europe, selected by the Rev. J. L. Corning, now of Stuttgart, in Germany.

There are in the Magoon collection specimens of portraiture, landscape, marine views, architecture, — exteriors and interiors, — flowers, fruits, real and fancy subjects, single and composite, ancient and modern; copies of many celebrated paintings by the old masters, and many valuable originals by distinguished modern artists. Among the copies of the old masters is the large one from Raphael, hanging at the south end of the gallery, which cost the generous founder over $4000. This and three others were purchased in Rome by Dr. Jewett, the first President of the College.

Besides the paintings, there is in the gallery a choice collection of casts in plaster, representing some of the most celebrated statuary of Greece and Rome, and some of the best works of modern sculptors.

But what unheard-of audacity, to speak of the advantages elsewhere in America than in Boston, of the study of the arts of design, to a Bostonian? Have you not your own galleries and private collections, and studios and art-schools, your museum of the fine arts, and normal art school, and schools industrial and otherwise, for wood-carving, and modelling, and decorative painting and embroidery, etc., etc.? And poet-painters, and musical painters, and painters par excellence, and Mr. Hunt, that faithful disciple of the noble Couture?

And why linger longer with echoes and representations, while the lovely original, Nature herself, in the rich, ripe, glowing beauty of summer weather, laughs, weeps, sings, blushes, frowns, sighs, beckons, through all the endless changes and seeming caprices of transition? Only here, in the open air, may the artist now truly study, observe, enjoy, absorb, the thousand transient yet immortally enduring influences of the great mother and mistress of all great art, with the abandon of complete repose and confidence. Perhaps he seeks that inspiration, and yet repose, in some sunny glade where the daisies and buttercups dip and rise in waves of white and yellow, and the wild rose eglantine twines her delicate pink flowers amid the elder bushes, and the maple spreads its deep green masses of shadow overhead, and glimpses of the far-off purple hills appear between the parted boughs of oak or maple; or on the firm, pebbled, tawny beach, amid the vast spaces of the gray-blue atmosphere, while the dark blue, foam-fringed sea throbs as if with the palpitations of a Titan heart, and clouds are scurrying landward, and a brisk wind blows in the ships with their swelling sails; and if he be an islander, his yearning for the sea is, for a moment, satisfied; forgotten, for a little while, is the ever-present remembrance of the poignant home-sickness for that great, beguiling, terrible source of strength, and love, and beauty, which no after influence can erase from the soul that has once been smitten with the spell of its vital power! Or perhaps, like some pious solitary, the painter observes atmospheric effect, the musician seeks to evolve the mysteries of harmony; on some mountain that seems to command vast distance, amid a silence unbroken save by the ethereal voice of the hermit-thrush, or the long swell of the ceaselessly rushing wind, where he experiences an impression akin to that awakened within us when listening to the introduction to Lohengrin. He dreams, perhaps, like Wagner, of some ideal, pearly, mystic sanctuary, such as that of the Holy Grail, reflected in opaline waters, overshadowed by iridescent clouds; he feels that pure and yet voluptuous sensation which is felt on very great heights, when the mind is plunged in the reveries of absolute solitude, and yet aware of an infinite horizon, an intense, ardent, yet almost colorless light. And how deep is the witchery of music, when it wakens in the bosom of a shadow-haunted glen, over whose rocky walls a forest fountain falls, while, from wood and water, resounds the deep, deep F, the ground-bass of nature, and all the sweet, organic, supernatural forces seem revealing themselves to us in that undertone; or when song rises from a little boat, rocking under a branching willow, —

The willow tree is the gypsy tree,
And therefore 'tis the tree for me,
As I love the dusky Rommany, and then dies away in silence, while the sinking sun trumpets forth red flouri-hes on every side; green grows empurpled, on the horizon bursts a great harmonious glow, its echoes, orange, saffron, rose, a score of melting tints, are chased away by faint blue shadows; lines tremble, color flies, lost, embraced in the mystery of night; a vaporous veil covers all things with one exquisite, uniform transparency; the crescent moon rises, stars tremble with a glance that seems not ignorant of tears; then, should the voice of song arise again, — some naïve or passionate folk-song, or an art-song, the aspiration of some exceptional poet-heart, — we are touched with so rich, so full, and yet so pathetic a sense of the possibilities of an existence too blest to be experienced on this planet, that we long to break from earth forever here and now! But, with the inconsistency and contradiction of human nature, scenes of melancholy and ruined beauty awaken cheerful thoughts by way of compensation; and, as is just possible, a letter written on a sunken gravestone by the Lido, or dated from a balcony on the grand canal of the Aphrodite of Italian cities, Venice, may be a very gay epistle from

Yours faithfully, F. R. R.
JULY.

Dwight's Journal of Music.

SATURDAY, JULY 19, 1879.

H. M. S. PINAFORE.

Is it not about time that we should say a word, or two about this all-pervading, all-prevailing, most amusing, and extremely clever little operetta? If we have not thought it necessary for us to praise what all the world was praising, it was not from any want of interest in the pretty thing. We have been to see and hear it more times than we dare to name; we have spent pretty freely of our time and our spare (in the sense of meagre) cash upon it, both for our enjoyment and that of younger people, without whom we should not have yielded to the attraction quite so often. We certainly should not have done so had we not enjoyed it. But to an editor there is a sort of luxury, which we, in this case, felt inclined to hug and make the most of, in standing for once in a wholly unofficial, unprofessional relation, either as editor or critic, toward the musico-dramatic phenomenon of the day — a very long day too! Indeed, it doth enhance the charm of music not to feel obliged to write about it; and yet in the end one feels the obligation all the more.

The first thing to remark about this joint product of the wit and genius of Messrs. Gilbert and Arthur Sullivan, is its wonderful, its perhaps unexampled popular success. The immense run it has had in England is eclipsed by its universal vogue in every theatre, both great and small, of the United States. Hundreds of companies, professional and amateur, have been acting and singing it. In the great cities Pinafore has held the stage in half a dozen theatres at once. When we first saw it at the Boston Museum, whence it started on its rounds, we enjoyed it as a pretty, unpretending, fresh, amusing, harmless little thing, easily appreciated, full of pleasant humor, and of melodies of a quite catching sort, yet not flat, commonplace, or namby-pamby, — never vulgar. Closer attention revealed fine musicianship, rich, fascinating, delicate orchestration; everything was characteristic: the mock solemnity of imitated classic recitative, the graceful solos, and the well-constructed duets, trios, choruses, and ensembles; and all felicitously close to the meaning and the rhythm of the half serious, half funny words. Then, too, the mere finding of so clever a performance where you would hardly have supposed it possible, all from the resources of the stock acting company of the little theatre, and finding it so much better than it pretended to be, apparently, lent a peculiar zest to the whole thing. Singing and orchestra were in the main more than passable, in spite of drawbacks, such as the transferring of the tenor part of the hero to a soprano; the acting, too, was good, that of Mr. Wilson, as the K. C. B. inimitable.

Then came a New York company with it to the Gaiety, with several artists for singers, particularly a tenor able to cope with the quite formidable music of the part. When it was announced that there was to be an "ideal" performance of Pinafore in the vast Boston Theatre, and that the unpretending, pretty thing was to be given on a grand scale by the most famous and accomplished of our native singers, we were at first mistrustful of the policy; it seemed like overdoing it, and running it into the ground. But even through that magnifying glass it bore the test, and it took many weeks to satisfy the eager crowds. Since then it has been served up in every theatre and hall; church choirs go about the country singing it; every child sings or hums it; the tuneful images repeat themselves, as in a multiplying mirror, from every wall, through every street and alley. The "craze" is general, and some begin to talk about the nuisance of having to hear music "on compulsion," whether you will or not. We are as easily bored as any one, and shrink from what is commonplace and hackneyed; but when we think how many more pretentious bores and vulgarities under the name of music haunt the air and ruthlessly besiege all sensitive ears, we are easily reconciled to innocent and thoughtless snatches from the Pinafore, which have not the exasperating quality of say "gems" from Il Trovatore, and many more high-sounding operatic titles.

— But to complete the history of this march of progress, we should speak of the most unique and beautiful of all these presentations, namely, the Children's Pinafore, now in its tenth week at the Museum. But that deserves to be a subject by itself. It is too full of matter for feeling and reflection, too suggestive, say of ideal possibilities in the direction of æsthetic, rhythmic, and harmonic social culture, which may supplement the common education of the children of the republic, realizing perhaps the Greek idea with far greater means for it than the Greeks possessed or knew, that it would be useless to begin to treat the subject here. We do not advocate the professional and absorbing employment of young children in such histrionic occupation; yet as we witness it, it looks entirely innocent and happy; and so it suggests the question whether, in a healthier way, as an element in the general culture of the young, the talent which responds so richly and spontaneously in hosts of children in this beautiful experiment may not be turned to excellent advantage. We wonder whether such a thing could have been made so signally successful in any place but Boston, and whether it may not fairly be regarded as a legitimate outgrowth from our common schools, with the attention paid in them to music and the training of the eye and hand in drawing. — But of this another time.

Now this amazing popularity of the Pinafore is something significant. It is easily accounted for. In the first place it indicates a general longing for some artistic entertainment which shall be at once readily appreciable, light, and humorous, yet graceful, clean, and innocent, combining real charms of music, witty poetry, and action. And all this the work supplies. It is extravagant, yet not devoid of sense and meaning. It is fascinating, piquant, and exciting; yet not sensational, in the sense of the modern French novels which appeal to the same taste that finds fascination in a public execution; it is sensuous and highly colored, but not sensual. It is cleverer than the French Opera Bouffe, and doubtless has done much to drive out and occupy the place of that unclean drama of Silenus. Musically and dramatically, or even farcically, it is a thousand times better and more entertaining than those extravaganzas of the "Evangeline" stamp, stuffed full of flat inanities and fly-blown with puns too poor to raise a laugh. In short, though it is but a trifle if you will, it is an artistic, a truly humorous, a musical trifle. It took an artist, a man of some creative faculty, each in his own sphere, to compose it. The music, it is found, wears well; the last hearing is pretty sure to reveal in it some new trait of beauty and of subtlety, some nice orchestral effect, some exquisite fitness of sound to sense. And the libretto!—It is so good, so felicitous a bit of genius in its way, that one will find it in vain to try to alter or improve upon it; every phrase and every word stands once for all, like the song that sang itself. Mr. Arthur Sullivan and Mr. Gilbert are to be congratulated on such joint authorship. They are proving themselves the world's benefactors; long may they continue in the good work, and find the next effort more remunerative to themselves!

In saying all this we do not shut our eyes to a more serious side of the question about this Pinafore "craze,"—a view well presented by a writer in the Fortnightly Review, from whom we copy elsewhere, under the title "Homer vs. Pinafore." While we rejoice that the popular craving for light and entertaining music and scenic action should be met for once by something pure and harmless, something truly musical and truly witty, it must at the same time be admitted that, from the point of view of deep and earnest culture, this cheap idolatry betrays a rather superficial, indolent condition of the general mind. All the earnestness of life being monopolized and taxed to the utmost by life's groveling material necessities and business competitions, it follows naturally that all the reaction toward the free ideal life of art and joy should seek that entertainment which costs no thought, no effort to understand and to appreciate. As it is we must have entertainment; most people are not equal, and few people at all times, to Homer, Dante, or even Shakespeare, or to Fidelio, Don Giovanni, or Gluck's Orfeo. If they must have plays and music which are light, what a godsend is a thing so innocent, so genial, so charming, and so satisfactory in its way as "H. M. S. Pinafore!" We do not say it is a great work. That could only be said ironically.

MUSICAL CORRESPONDENCE.

CHICAGO, JULY 10. — On Thursday evening, June 28, the "Abt Society" gave its last concert for the season, presenting a programme of four-part music. The selections were from Hatton, Gould, Storch, Schubert, Adam, Abt, Kreutzer, and Mohr. They had the assistance of Miss Mantey, violinist, and Miss Arabella Root, a New York soprano. The lady vocalist has not the voice or method for a concert singer, and in her selections added little to the enjoyment of the evening. The programme of the society, however, did not furnish music worthy of the talent and vocal proficiency of the singers, for they are capable of doing greater works, and it almost seems a waste of time and energy for them to devote their powers to simple four-part songs. Of course with beautiful voices, used with refined and tasteful expression, they have been able to give much pleasure to their audiences during the past season; but I trust that their next series of concerts will contain larger and more important works, and choruses that are more worthy of their study and performance. They need a director who will have a positive aim in this particular, and who will not be content until a greater progress has been made toward reaching the highest position that a musical organization of this character can take. A programme may be made pleasing to an audience, and yet contain only good music; and it is a false idea that regards "popularity" as the only test by which an art work should be judged. What is good in music may be made popular if well performed, and by true interpretations brought to the comprehension of the people. We observe the truthfulness of this statement, in the fact that a number of classical works have been made popular, even in the common acceptance of the word. Beethoven's Sonata, called the "Moonlight," Op. 27, has been played so often, in private and public, that every note in the composition is known to large numbers of musical people in every city in the land. This is but an example of how popularity and true art may exist as coordinate factors for the advancement of culture. Novelty may excite a passing interest in the multitude, but only a thorough acquaintance with a work can give complete satisfaction.

I had the pleasure of hearing a remarkably fine performance of Beethoven's C-minor Concerto, with a Cadenza by Reinecke, by a child of thirteen years, a pupil of Mr. Carl Wolfsohn. This young girl, Miss Alice Guggenheime, possesses a remarkable talent for music, and although she has only been under the instruction of her present teacher for two years, has made herself acquainted with a large number of classical works, which she plays with the finish and interpretation of an experienced player. Her touch is firm, and her technique advanced to no small degree of proficiency, while her insight into the real expression and intent of a composition is quite wonderful for her years. If she is allowed to mature slowly, and is advanced in her art by the quiet yet sure pathway that modestly leads up to true excellence, by years of well-directed study, it is my opinion that she will reach a high rank as a pianist. The bud of promise must be protected from the dangerous breath of flattery, if a rich maturity of bloom is to be reached; for many a child of great talent has been retarded in development, by a mistaken direction that forces young natures to the capricious influence that comes from public appearances. Young natures, rich in talent, with every healthy indication of reaching a high rank in the artistic world, must have the most wise direction, if the innocence of a true ambition is not to be turned into a self-retarding vanity that destroys all noble advancement. Even the movements of a great genius must be directed by the wisdom of reason, if the highest point of attainment is to be reached. A brief reflection on the laws of progress, as their workings are manifested in the history of the past, will doubtless prove to the reader the truth of this statement.

I mentioned in one of my former notes that we had great need of some orchestral organization that should have for its purpose the advancement and development of a good orchestra in our city. A society called "The Philharmonic" has been formed, embracing in its membership the leading teachers and musicians of Chicago, which has this aim in view. The society has made a constitution, which states that the purposes of the organization are for the good of the musical art as a whole, and not for the advancement of any person or persons, and it undertakes to give symphony concerts each season, also to support chamber music, and aims at holding triennial festivals some time in the future. This union of the musical elements in our city, if well supported by a liberal financial aid from the music lovers, ought to be able to place the orchestra on a permanent footing, as well as give a greater advancement to the musical art than it has ever had before in Chicago. Each city in our country should advance its home culture in music, so as to be independent of the money-making organizations that pay flying visits for love of gain.

Mr. W. S. B. Mathews directs a Musical Normal School at his home in Evanston, Ill. The advanced circular gives a fine list of teachers, and embraces a course of study that has a most positive aim, and of a higher order than is usual in institutions of this character. Piano-forte and song recitals, with excellent programmes, and lectures on music-teaching, and the voice, furnish the student with the opportunities for extending his musical knowledge in no small degree. C. H. B.

MILWAUKEE, WIS., JULY 11. — The ninth Saengerfest of the Northwestern Saengerbund was held here June 28-30. Four concerts were given, of which the programmes were as follows:

I.

1. Overture to Freischütz Weber.
2. Speeches by the President of the Milwaukee Singing Society, Mr. John C. Ludwig, and Mayor Black.
3. Winkler Balk 15. Sung from Tegner's "Frithiof Saga," Joseph Panny.
4. Soprano Solo and Orchestra. Tenor, Mr. Jacob Beyer.
5. Soprano Aria from "Faust," Spahr.
6. Overture to "Midsummer Night's Dream," Mendelssohn.
7. (a.) "Three Fishers went Sailing" Goldbeck.
- (b.) "Calm Sea" Rubinstein.
- (c.) "Ave Maria" Abt.
8. Male Chorus and Tenor Solo. Arion Society.
9. "Stay with Me," Soprano Solo Abt.
10. Cornet Solo, "Fantasia Caprice" Hartmann.
11. "The Wedding of Thetis" Dr. Carl Löwe.
12. Arrangement of a Cantata from "Iphigenie in Aulis" By the Full Male and Mixed Chorus.

II.

1. Overture, "Calm Sea and Happy Voyage," Mendelssohn.
2. "My Fatherland" Appel.
3. Scene and Prayer from "Freischütz" Weber.
4. Violin Solo, "Fantasia de Faust" Wieniawsky.
5. "The Hero's Resurrection." Male Chorus, with Orchestra Fromm.
6. "Phæton." Symphonic poem Saint-Saëns.
7. Prize Singing. By the Societies.
8. "The Message," Tenor Solo Blumenthal.

9. "The Watch on the Rhine" Wilhelm.
10. Northwestern Saengerbund.

III.

1. Symphony in C minor Beethoven.
2. Soprano Solo, "Erl King" Schubert.
3. "Bride's Song and Serenade." Orchestra. Goldmark.
4. "Thou Everywhere." Tenor, with Flute and Piano obligato Lachner.
5. Solo for Violin. Fantasia Vieuxtemps.
6. Scene and Aria for Baritone, from the "Night in Granada" Kreutzer.
7. "Ritt der Walküren" R. Wagner.

IV.

1. Symphony in B minor Fr. Schubert.
2. Aria for Soprano, "Marriage of Figaro" Mozart.
3. "The Last Skald." Male Chorus, with Orchestra W. Sturm.
4. "Adelaide," Tenor Solo Beethoven.
5. Overture, "Euryanthe" C. M. von Weber.
6. Scene from "Tannhäuser," with Orchestra. R. Wagner.
- (a.) Male Chorus. (b.) Solo for Baritone.
- (c.) Female Chorus. (d.) Mixed Chorus. By the Various Societies.
7. Serenade, for Baritone Lachner.
8. "When the Swallows," etc. Abt.

The choruses were almost all of a light and popular character, the festival being intended, apparently, for social enjoyment, without too great strain on the intellect or emotions. The choruses were all very well sung, the Arion Club doing the best work, however. They sang with admirable finish.

The solo singing compared, in the main, very favorably with the chorus performance. Miss Murphy deserves special commendation for the purity and nobility of her style, and Mme. Rounge-Janke for the dramatic fire with which she delivered the "Erl-King."

Mr. Rosenbecker makes a thin tone, lacking in breadth and power. His execution is not bad, and he seems to be a very good violinist.

By far the most important work of the festival was done by the orchestra, under Chr. Bach's direction. He had enlarged his own band by adding eight or ten men, making forty-two in all, and by dint of vigorous and careful rehearsal brought them into excellent condition. Of course the horns were more or less uncertain, and the flutes sometimes played out of tune, especially in the lower notes; but the performance was, on the whole, very good indeed.

The St. Cecilia Society, an association of Catholic Chorus, held a two days' convention here, beginning June 30. I give only one of their programmes, the only one I heard. The best singing was that of the Palestrina Society, of St. John's Cathedral here. This Society is under the direction of Prof. William Mickler, and is now in excellent condition, well-balanced, and sings with purity of intonation, precision of attack, and good light and shade. This programme probably closes the record of serious musical work for the season:

- Offertory. "Lætetur Celi," 5 mixed voices. Rev. Dr. Witt.
- Choirs of Detroit and Kenosha.
- "Ave Maria," 4 mixed voices G. Arcadelt (1600).
- Palestrina Society, Milwaukee.
- Response. "Accept Simeon," 6 mixed voices. G. P. Palestrina.
- St. Joseph's Choir, Detroit.
- Gradual. "Salvos fac nos," 4 mixed voices. Rev. Dr. Fr. Witt.
- Cathedral Choir of Chicago.
- Motet. "Adeste Fideles," 4 mixed voices. Rev. Fr. Koenen.
- St. George's Choir, Kenosha, Wis.
- Response. "In Monte Oliveti," 4 mixed voices. G. Croce (1600).
- St. Francis' Choir, Milwaukee.
- Antiphon. "Regina Celi, 8 male voices P. Piel.
- St. Joseph's Choir, Detroit, and Seminary Choirs of St. Francis, Wis.
- Antiphon. "Salve Regina," 4 mixed voices. G. P. Palestrina.
- Palestrina Society, Milwaukee.
- "Adoramus," 4 mixed voices Fr. Roselli (1600).
- Cathedral Choir, Chicago.
- Pa. "Miserere" (VI ton.) Falasob. 4 male voices. Rev. Fr. Witt.
- St. Joseph's Choir, Detroit.
- Offertory. "Accendit Deus," 4 mixed voices. Rev. Fr. Schaller.
- St. Francis' Choir, Milwaukee.

Gradual. "O Vos Omnes," 8 mixed voices. Rev. Fr. Witt.
 St. George's Choir, Kenosha.
 Response. "Cenantes illis," 6 mixed voices. Rev. M. Haller.
 St. Joseph's Choir, Detroit.
 Sequence. "Lauda Sion" Gregorian Chant.
 Seminary Choirs of St. Francis', Wis.
 Offertory. "Gloria et Honore," 8 mixed voices. Rev. Fr. Witt.
 Choirs from Detroit, Kenosha, and St. Francis' Church, Milwaukee. J. C. F.

NOTES AND GLEANINGS.

THE Courier of Sunday last informs us that the programme for the sixty-fifth season of the Handel and Haydn Society has been made up, and will be as follows: At Thanksgiving, Handel's Judas Maccabaeus; Christmas, The Messiah; Easter, Jerusalem in Egypt. The fifth triennial festival will be given in May, 1880, beginning May 4 and ending May 9, and including two afternoon and five evening concerts. The list of works will not vary materially from the following: Beethoven, ninth symphony; Handel, Utrecht Jubilate (new), and Solomon; Haydn, Spring, from The Seasons; Hiller, A Song of Victory; Mendelssohn, Saint Paul; Saint Sæns, The Deluge (new); Spohr, The Last Judgment; Verdi, Requiem Mass, and other novelties by modern writers. Spohr's work and Handel's Solomon will be practically new, the former not having been heard here since 1844, nor the latter since 1855.

WELLESLEY COLLEGE. — The Fifty-third concert (fourth series) was given, by the pupils, on Saturday evening June 7, under the direction of C. H. Morse, their professor of music, and Miss A. Louise Gage, their teacher of vocal culture, with the following programme: —

Nocturne in A, No. 4 Field.
 Kreisleriana, Op. 18-1 Schumann.
 Miss Plimpton.
 Duet, "Saper vorrei se m'am!" Haydn.
 Misses Brewster and Richmond.
 Concerto in A (First movement — Allegro) Mozart.
 Miss Telford.
 (Orchestral Accompaniment on Second Piano.)
 Song, "The Garland." Mendelssohn.
 Song, "Thou 'rt like unto a flower." Rubinstein.
 Miss Leonard.
 Allegretto, in B minor (Organ) Guilmant.
 Miss Phœbus.
 Song, "Romance." Rupea.
 Miss Richmond.
 Novelette in D, Op. 21-5 Schumann.
 Miss Hobart.
 Song, "Love Star" Kücken.
 Miss Lewis.
 Adagio from "Duo Sonata," Op. 30 (Organ). Merkel.
 Miss Pratt.
 Concerto, in C minor (No. III). } Beethoven.
 Allegro con brio (Moscheles' Cadenza) }
 Miss A. Jones.
 Song, "The Ara" Rubinstein.
 Song, "Marie" Jensen.
 Miss Brewster.
 Overture to "Tannhäuser" Wagner.
 Misses Telford, Jones, Lewis, and Metcalf.
 The 54th Concert, June 9, was an Organ Recital by Professor Morse, who played: — Sonata, in D, Op. 42 Guilmant.
 1837 (Largo e Maestoso, Allegro, — Pastorale — Allegro Assai.)
 Organ Hymn, "Sancta Maria" Whiting.
 Pastorale, in F Bach.
 Andantino, "Power of Sound" Spohr.
 Overture to "Oberon" Weber.

AUBURN, N. Y. — A series of interesting Organ recitals has been given here in the first Presbyterian Church by the organist, Mr. I. V. Flagler, assisted by Mrs. A. M. Bennett, of Rochester, and Miss May Benton, vocalists, and Dr. Wm. H. Schultz, of Syracuse, violinist. The programmes of the 7th, 8th, and 9th recitals were as follows: —

May 19. — Bach: Toccata in F; Beethoven: Andante from Fifth Symphony; Cherubini: Ave Maria (Mrs. Bennett); Leutner: Fest-Overture, Op. 42 (adapted by Mr. Flagler); Schubert: Serenade (Mrs. Bennett); Batista: Offertoire de St. Cecilia; Verdi: "Ernani, inviolami" (Mrs. Bennett); Soederman: Swedish Wedding March; Liszt: Fest-March.

May 26. — Reubke: 94th Psalm (Organ Sonata) in C minor; Ernst: Elegie (W. H. Schultz); Beethoven: Andante from First Symphony; Bach: Air for violin and organ; Schubert: Overture to Rosamunde; David, Ferd. — "L'Eloge des Larmes" (Dr. Schultz); Salome, T. — Allegro Moderato; Molique: Hungarian Fantasia, Op. 26 (Dr. Schultz); Flagler: Processional March.

June 2. — Bach: Prelude and Fugue in B minor; Schumann: Bunte Blätter, Op. 99, No. 11; Costa: "Turn thou unto me," from Elis (Miss Benton); J. L. Krebs: Concert

Fugue in G; Raff: Fest-March, Op. 139 (arranged by Mr. Flagler); J. L. Rosckel: "A Little Mountain Lad" (Miss Benton); Mendelssohn: Overture to Ruy Blas. The organ, built by Hook & Hastings, Boston, contains forty-three registers, three key-boards, and is blown by hydraulic power.

DETROIT CONSERVATORY OF MUSIC. — The following programmes of piano-forte music, certainly worthy of any artist, were performed in the 12th, 13th, and 14th Recitals, by pupils of the institution, under the direction of Professor J. H. Hahn: —

May 9. — Miss Kate Jacobs was the sole pianist. Bach: Prelude and Fugue in G; Beethoven: Sonata Pathétique; Chopin: Nocturne in C minor, Polonaise in A-flat; Mendelssohn: Hunting Song; Raff: Eclogue, Op. 105, No. 3; Bülow: Quadriglia, Op. 21; Schumann: Concerto in A minor, with a quintet of strings and a second piano for accompaniment.

June 6. — By Miss Mary Andrus. Beethoven: Sonata in C, Op. 53; Henselt: "Liebeslied"; Schumann: "Grillen"; Chopin: Berceuse, Ballade in A-flat; Liszt: Concerto in E-flat, with quintet and second piano.

June 13. — By Miss Nelly Colby. Rameau: "Le Rappel des Oiseaux"; Scarlatti: Bourrée, in B minor; Bach: Prelude and Fugue in F (No. 11, Book I, Well-Tempered Clavier); Beethoven: Sonata in A-flat, Op. 26; Chopin: Nocturne in E, Valee in C-sharp minor; Mendelssohn: Concerto in G minor, with quintet and second piano.

On the 12th, about a hundred of the most musical people of Detroit assembled at Seminary Hall, by invitation of Professor Hahn, and enjoyed a great treat in the following rich programme, interpreted by Mr. William H. Sherwood, of Boston: —

Prelude and fugue, in G-minor Bach-Liszt.
 a. Ballade in A-flat, }
 b. Etude in C-sharp, Op. 25, } Chopin.
 c. Polonaise in A-flat, }
 a. Fugue in G-minor, Op. 8, No. 3 Rheinberger.
 b. Serenade in D-minor, Op. 93 Rubinstein.
 c. Scherzo, Op. 81, extract from a suite Bargiel.
 Concerto in A-minor Schumann.
 The orchestral part played on second piano by J. H. Hahn.

a. Waldezauschen, concert etude Liszt.
 b. Nocturne in F-sharp, Op. 15 Chopin.
 c. Tannhäuser March Liszt.

CHERUBINO of the London Figaro, says he is authorized to state that Mr. Mapleson settled by telegram the engagement for his American season of Miss Annie Louise Cary, the leading artist of Mr. Max Strakosch's company. Mr. Mapleson contracts to pay her $15,000 for five months. The engagement has also been signed for the United States of Mme. Trubelli, the contralto. Signor Magnani, who produced Aida at Cairo, at the Scala, and at her Majesty's Theatre, is now duplicating the scenery, so that Verdi's latest work may be played with scenery from his brush simultaneously on both sides of the Atlantic. Mr. Mapleson has also resolved to further increase the American orchestra, which, under the direction of Signor Arditi, will now consist of ninety players (sixteen first violins and other instruments in proportion), while another dozen artists will be added to the chorus, which, consisting of seventy-two picked voices, will thus be one of the finest opera choirs which has ever visited the United States. In regard to the New York Academy of Music, the directors have agreed to construct seventy-six extra seats on the third tier, a new suit of offices is being made for the director, a new drop curtain is being painted, and in order to obviate the necessity for ladies to wait in draughty corridors, a new crush-room is to be built on the sidewalk, capable of holding three hundred people. The same writer also says that during the forthcoming New York season, Mr. Mapleson will test the electric light as an illuminator for the borders and wings, and that the directors of the Academy have agreed to heat all the dressing-rooms by steam.

FOREIGN.

LONDON. — An enormous audience crowded St. James' Hall to hear the first performance for many years of the famous choral song, in forty real parts, of Thomas Tallis. Written in 1575 to Latin words, this historic curiosity was set to English words in 1830, and performances are still on record, by the Madrigal Society in 1834, and some years ago by Mr. Hullah's choir at Exeter Hall. Only four copies of the work are known to be in existence, one of them being in her majesty's library at Buckingham Palace, the others at the British Museum, in the library of Sir F. Gore Ouseley, and in that of the Sacred Harmonic Society. It was from the copy belonging to the Sacred Harmonic Society that the performance was conducted by Mr. Henry Leslie. Dr. Burney and Sir John Hawkins both refer to this remarkable work; probably the only specimen of its sort in existence. According to these authors, this wonderful effort of harmonic ability is not divided into choirs of four parts — soprano, alto, tenor, and bass, in each — but consists of eight trebles placed under each other, eight mezzo-soprano or mean parts, eight counter-tenors, eight tenors, and eight basses, with one line allotted to the organ.

The several parts of the song are not in simple counterpoint nor filled up in mere harmony without meaning or design, but have each a share in the short subjects of fugue and imitation which are introduced at every change of words. The first subject is begun in G by the first mezzo-soprano; the second medius, in like manner beginning in G, is answered in the octave below by the first tenor, and that by the first counter tenor in D, a fifth above. Then the first bass has the subject in D, the eighth below the counter-tenor, and thus all the forty real parts are severally introduced in the course of thirty-nine bars, when the whole phalanx is employed at once during six bars more. After this a new subject is led off by the lowest bass, and pursued by other parts severally for about twenty-four bars, when there is another general chorus of all the parts, and thus this musical curiosity is carried on in alternate flight, pursuit, attack, and choral union to the end, when the polyphonic phenomenon is terminated by twelve bars of general chorus in quadragesimal harmony. The effect of this marvelous work is, in performance, perhaps more astonishing than pleasing to modern ears, although the sound of the forty separate parts sung at once is truly extraordinary. To properly conduct such a work, sung by the finest of our amateur choirs, was a stupendous task, and Mr. Henry Leslie fully deserves the highest credit for its successful accomplishment. Even in these modern days, when that which is called musical science has made great strides toward finality, this marvelous relic of an Elizabethan age remains unique.

NILSSON'S LONDON HOME. — Mme. Christine Nilsson-Rouxaud and her husband, — the son of a French merchant, who married her after nine years' courtship, — a Parisian of the best type, live very quietly in the house in the Belgrave road which formerly belonged to their old friend, Mrs. Richardson. Singing days, as already remarked, are passed absolutely, save for an hour's drive in an open carriage, in seclusion, and the invitations which descend in showers are firmly but gratefully declined. Singing days being out of the question, and ante-singing days being prohibited for dining-out purposes, it may be imagined that not much time is given to festivity, especially when it is recollected that every spare evening is devoted, not to the opera or to concerts as one of the audience, but to the theatre, English or French. A bust of the late Duchess de Frias occupies the place of honor in the Belgrave-road drawing-room, and its mistress is never weary of extolling the beauty of her friend and the admirable qualities of her excellent father. Beyond this bust and the picture of "Ophelia," by Calamel, the drawing-room contains few works of art. It boasts, however, a wonderful collection of photographs, with autograph signatures, of course, of the crowned heads and other members of the royal families of Europe — the Emperor of Austria, the Empress of Austria, the Prince and Princess of Wales, the Duke and Duchess of Edinburgh, the Queen of Naples, the King of Sweden, and many others, including the Czar. There is concerning this last-named photograph, a story indicative of the sharp line drawn by Mme. Nilsson between the artist-world and les autres, the great by birth or wealth alone. On the last night of her Russian engagement, at the conclusion of the performance she remained on the stage bidding farewell to the other artists, and especially to the ladies and gentlemen of the chorus, to whom she displayed great liberality in the distribution of photographs. In the midst of leave-taking she heard a quick step behind her, and then the voice of the Czar, "Et moi donc," pointing to her hand full of photographs, "je n'en ai rien!" asked the master of all the Russias and of some Russians. Now, the Czar is very chary of giving his own portraits, and the cantatrice at once saw her advantage. "On condition that you give me your picture, you shall have mine," she answered, in her wise manner; and the head of the Romanoffs bowed to his fate with excellent grace.

Mme. Nilsson sets great store by her photographs; but beyond these — beyond even the bust of Victoire Balle; beyond the Cabanel "Ophelia," with its "fey" look; beyond the golden laurel crowns of Russia, Austria, France, and America; beyond all the treasures acquired during a life of unceasing devotion to art — she cherishes the little box containing the earliest musical instrument with which she was acquainted. Opening it daintily and delicately, she will produce a battered and patched specimen of the genus violin — no costly Stradivarius or Guarnerius, no milky-tongued Stainer; but a plain "fiddle," cracked and stringless, a sorry specimen of the most perfect of musical instruments. As she takes it from its retreat, she falls naturally into the position of the violinist, and in a voice of that subtle, penetrating force which constitutes what is loosely called a "sympathetic quality," continues: "I love the violin, and would play it every day if I were permitted to do so; but I am not permitted. It is suspected that the constrained attitude and the powerful vibration would by no means improve either my physical or musical tone for the evening. But I regret the violin nevertheless, and love this one very much indeed; for it is the instrument I played on at fair round the country to help my people to money while I was yet a little child. I am, as you hear, a peasant born, and am proud of it; and the fair head is flung back, the blue eyes throw out a brighter ray, and the soft curls are shaken, as the well-known position of Mme. Normanda Néruda is copied with life-like accuracy. — London World.

BOSTON, AUGUST 2, 1879.

Entered at the Post Office at Boston as second-class matter.

CONTENTS.

SANZIO. Stuart Sterne	121
CULTURE AND MUSIC	122
IN MEMORIAM: AUGUST KREISSMANN. An Address. F. H. Underwood	123
THE SANGERFEST AT CINCINNATI, JUNE, 1879.	124
TALKS ON ART: SECOND SERIES. From Instructions of Mr. William M. Hunt to his Pupils. X.	125
HEARING MUSIC ON COMPULSION	126
MUSICAL CORRESPONDENCE	127
NOTES AND GLEANINGS	127

All the articles not credited to other publications were expressly written for this Journal

Published fortnightly by HOUGHTON, OSGOOD AND COMPANY, 220 Devonshire Street, Boston. Price, 10 cents a number; $2.50 per year.

For sale in Boston by CARL PRUEFER, 30 West Street, A. WILLIAMS & Co., 283 Washington Street, A. K. LORING, 359 Washington Street, and by the Publishers; in New York by A. BRENTANO, JR., 39 Union Square, and HOUGHTON, OSGOOD & Co., 21 Astor Place; in Philadelphia by W. H. BOWEN & Co., 1102 Chestnut Street; in Chicago by the CHICAGO MUSIC COMPANY, 512 State Street.

SANZIO.

BY STUART STERNE, AUTHOR OF "ANGELO."

(Continued from page 114.)

THIS time, when the allotted week had fled,
No word or messenger was sent from home
To summon Benedetta. She delayed
One day, and two, and three, and then grew troubled,
And firmly said, "I must return at once!
I know my mother's mind, — I've disobeyed,
And she is angry with me, and waits now
For me to come without another call!"
And naught that Sanzio's ready wit devised,
No argument or eloquence, availed
To change her purpose. So she came to him
One morning early, with the hasty words,
"Farewell, — I go, my Sanzio! An old friend
Of Nina's journeys on my way to-day,
And I will join her, and am all prepared."

"But you will come again, my Benedetta!"
He cried, and passionately seized her hands.
"Promise, — nay, swear, you will return to me
Soon, soon, — lest you would see me — Oh, my Love,
How can I bear that you and I should part!"
"I will, I will, I promise! If I can
I shall come back to you!" she said; and then,
Ere he could hold her fast, sped to the door,
But on the threshold turned, flew back once more,
And flung her arms about him, whispering, breathless,
"And yet if I should not return, — not soon, —
For should my mother keep me for a while,
I must submit me to the penalty, —
But trust me, surely I will come ere long!
Be thanked a thousand times, Sanzio, my Love,
For all the passing sweetness of these days!"
A fleeting touch, a breath upon his lips,
And she had vanished, seeing not the hands
Vainly stretched out to hold her back.

The hours

To those she left behind, dragged slowly on,
Joyless and long as an eternity.
Old Nina sadly missed the sweet, bright face;
Turned oft and often to an opening door
With the vague hope to see it enter there.
For ah, 't was true enough, she soon had learned
To love her as the apple of her eye!
She, too, had had a daughter long ago,
And fondly fancied she must now have been
As tall and fair as this, if Heaven had not Seen fit to call the dear babe to Himself!
And Sanzio thought in truth, sunshine and spring
Had suddenly faded from the darkened earth.
His labor flagged that day; — the light was wrong,
His hand unsteady, and the canvas warped,
The colors would not mingle as he wished, —
All things seemed somehow out of joint and tune,
Till wearied and impatient he sprang up,
Left hapless work behind, and hastened out
To wander through the silent streets alone.
And worst of all, the morrow seemed to bring
Small hope or promise of aught better things.
And thus a week wore on in undelight
Without a word from her. When suddenly,
As once towards nightfall he flung down his brush,

Resolved to go to her that very eve
And bring her back with him at every cost, —
A light familiar step stole in, and she
Whose image never left him day or night
Threw herself weeping on his breast and cried,
"My Sanzio, I have come to you again!
Now keep me and be kind to me forever!"

Speechless with glad surprise, he held her thus
An instant, when she said between her sobs,
And many pauses in her broken speech, —
"My poor old mother is no more! She slept
So long and late one morn three days ago,
I went to call, but could not waken her;
God in the night had taken her away!
I would have sent for you, but there was none
To bring the message, — and this afternoon
We laid her in the ground! Oh, this great blow
Has come so suddenly, I can scarce believe
I shall not see her more! But oh, the house
Looked so deserted, dark, and desolate,
I could not stay, but hastened here to you!
Ah, she was good to me, and loved me well,
Though she but little showed it, and seemed stern;
And she was all I had! There's no one now
In all the whole wide world to claim and own me!"

But this is joy, not cause for tears, dear heart!
Sanzio had well-nigh cried, but checked himself,
And only strained her to his heart and said,
"O Love, sweet Love, now you are mine in truth!"
Then listened long in silent sympathy
As she related all her mournful tale,
What she had seen and suffered since she left him;
How she had found her mother, as she feared,
Displeased and wroth, but won her pardon soon;
How she had sometimes slightly ailed of late,
Yet ne'er complained, and never spoke of this,
But how she felt well sure that she had died
At peace with God and her, and all the world.
And when her eyes oft filled and overflowed,
Sanzio would soothe and softly talk to her,
As he had comforted a grieving child,
Till she looked up and smiled amid her tears.

Thus bloomed and faded spring's sweet buds and blossoms,
And ripened into summer's golden fruit,
While Benedetta dwelt in Sanzio's home
Long, happy weeks, — happy for all and all;
For, though she often sat alone, and wept
Her grandam's memory much, when Sanzio came
He laughed away the melancholy mood;
And, seeing he grew sad to find her so,
She learned to shed her tears in secret first.
And then at length they ceased to flow. Her heart
Grew lighter, and her smiles came back again,
And the new grief seemed merged and lost, well-nigh,
In the old gladness, — what though sometimes now
She scarce saw Sanzio through the whole long day;
For, taking up the busy life once more
Whose course her coming had an instant stemmed,
He was much absent, head and hands employed
On weighty errands; or from morn till eve
Strangers and pupils thronged the quiet work-room,
All eager for the master's eye and word.
Then Benedetta shyly kept herself
Aloof and hidden out of sight, so none
Guessed at her presence, save the few old friends
Who knew of it before; Count Baldassar,
Kind ever and familiar as of old,
Came to the kitchen-sometimes, — where she stayed
With Nina now, and busily at work, —
And talked to her an hour, and pleasantly
Helped on the slowly moving time. And Sanzio,
With delicate regard and subtle tact,
Honored this shrinking modesty in her,
And never sought to break on her reserve.
Once he had gently questioned her, — a day
That guests were bidden to a merry feast.
But when she looked at him with pleading eyes,
And mutely shook her head, he pressed no further,
And only said, "My poor, sweet, captive bird,
Have patience yet a little while! 'T will not
Be ever thus, — I shall be free ere long
To come to you again, and then, dear heart,
We'll try our wings on many a joyous flight
Through wood and field together!"

Long that night

She lay awake, and from her chamber heard
Far off the sound of laughter and loud song
Ring through the silent house, and sadly thought
That Sanzio's heart was far away from her.
And then, remembering all the love he knew, —
Had she not often from the window watched
How, when he scarce appeared, a host of friends
Thronged round and followed him far down the street, —
She humbly crossed her hands upon her bosom,
And wondered what he found in such as her
To love so well.

But yet the happy time
He spoke of came; for as the days went on,

And summer burned with fierce and fiercer heat
From out a blazing sky of merciless blue
Down on the parching streets and thirsty fields, —
The city grew deserted, friends and pupils
Fled from her withering breath, and Sanzio thus
Was left in solitude; for he alone,
The greatest laborer among them all,
Chose to remain, and suffered not his hands
To pause at their immortal work. And now
Would Benedetta come to him again,
As in those first and sweetest days of all,
Each morning to the work-room, bringing flowers
Wherewith to make it bright.

It long had grown
To seem a simple and most natural thing
Thus to be with him; thrilled her now no more
With something new and strange, a fluttering sense,
Half sweet, half painful, when he kissed her lips,
Or drew her towards him, — ever tenderly,
And well-nigh ever gently. And yet sometimes
A subtle fire burned on his lips; he strained her
With a swift, passionate fierceness to his heart
That made her shrink, and trembling break away
From his encircling arms, while he, without
A single word, but with a strange, dark look,
Turned suddenly from her.

And one dreary night, —
A threatened storm had burst towards fall of eve,
And still the sobbing wind, scarce quieted
From its first fury, moaned about the house, —
She thought she heard a soft, half-stifled sigh
Come through her chamber door, "O Benedetta!"
Startled, with wide eyes straining through the dark,
She sat up listening; silence for a time,
And then again, more softly than before, —
"O Benedetta mine!" She knew the voice,
And fancied it rose up close to the floor.
Sanzio upon his knees! — such image flashed
Swiftly before her, as she trembling pressed
Her cold, clasped hands upon her burning eyes.
Outside the faintest stir, — a gliding step
That crept away as noiseless as a breath
But for the feeble creaking of the stairs, —
Then deepest stillness; so unbroken soon
By any sound save that of the great rain-drops
That now began to fall again, and beat
With gentle patter on the window-pane,
That Benedetta, — burying her face
Deep in the pillows, while a yearning wish
Her mother lived, she wept at home once more,
Stole on her aching heart, — wondered ere long
If it could all have been a troubled dream,
Or some poor little nibbling mouse, mayhap,
Have startled her from sleep. And wondering thus,
Lay wide awake until the early dawn
Crept upward in the skies; knew not that 'neath
The same still roof, a burning, storm-tossed soul
Through all the night had wrestled with itself
In a long, bitter struggle, and that he
Who slowly then at length rose from his knees
Cried with white lips, but firm, uplifted brow,
"My God, what sin there was, it is atoned!"

And when she went that morning to the work room,
The eyes that met hers were so frank and clear
That she cast down her own. "What is it, Love?"
He asked, and took her hands, swift to detect
The unwonted shadow on her face. "Methinks
You have not rested well!" "My Sanzio, — ay, —
Something, I scarce know what, — perchance a mouse, Broke on my sleep, and kept me long awake!"
"A mouse!" he said. "How! — But I cannot let
A naughty mouse dim those sweet eyes of mine!
We must have Nina set a trap for him, —
He'll trouble you no more!"

And after this

He ever proved so kind, so gently tender,
Calling her sometimes, Little Sister mine,
That Benedetta's grateful heart went out
With deeper love each day, and clung to him
In undivided confidence; and life
Flowed on in sweetest, cloudless summer peace
To both of them. Save that one other day
He marked a shade on Benedetta's brow,
And when he questioned her, she said at length,
Though with half hesitating words, "I sat
Below, close to the window, and overheard
Two men that talked together in the street.
They stopped and pointed to this house, and laughed,
And said ill things of us! Of you, — and me!"
"Pooh, Little Sister, is that all your grief?"
He gayly cried. "Then pray you be consoled!
Ay, let them babble to their hearts' content.
What matters unto you and me, dear Love,
The gossip of such idle tongues? Think you
If the blest Saints and white-winged little Angels,
Or your dear mother, 'mid the joys of heaven,
Look down on us, they shake their heads and frown?
Nay, but I tell you they most kindly smile!"

(To be continued.)

CULTURE AND MUSIC.

[From the London Musical Standard.]

Now that the universities have all closed their doors against candidates for musical degrees who will not or cannot furnish proof of having received at least some part of what is usually described as "a liberal education," doubts are beginning to find utterance as to whether those literary qualifications will be of any further use to a candidate after they have served as the first stepping-stone to the acquisition of the degree. These doubts emanate, for the most part, from the same quarters as the complaints about the utility of musical degrees, and it is only natural that they who attach no importance to such degrees should attempt to cast ridicule upon the educational tests by which those degrees must now be preceded. The people who tell us that the science of acoustics has no connection with the art of music will, of course, contend not only that a musician will be no better in any way because he can translate Xenophon and Horace, work all the problems in the first six books of Euclid, or arrive at a rapid solution of a difficult numerical puzzle by means of an algebraic equation, but that he can be fully equipped for his art without a knowledge of harmony and counterpoint. For, if it means anything at all, this is what is involved in the outcry, long ago raised, and recently revived, against musical degrees. This part of the question, however, lies within very narrow limits. A composer, be he great or small, known or unknown, cannot work without harmony, and if it be contended that genius can dispense with counterpoint, harmony, fugue, etc., we can only say that the genius who has dispensed with these requirements has not yet appeared, but, if existent at all, has hitherto wasted his sweetness on the air of some desert unknown to fame. It is absurd in the extreme to talk of writing fugal choruses without a knowledge of fugal rules, or of composing harmonious music without first studying the laws of harmony; and this being so, it is equally absurd to rant against degrees which prove a man's fitness to exercise the calling by which he has elected to live. Every musician who is not a charlatan ought to know the things against which this outcry is raised; the great masters — with the exception of that one wiseacre who strives to show that Handel was not a musician — all knew them; it is impossible to be a musician without knowing them; and a musical degree is a proof to the world that its holder does know them. Less than this a degree cannot be; more than this it does not pretend to be. To sneer at musical degrees seems to us to indicate but little knowledge and less wisdom.

But, on the other aspect of the case, — the advantage of literary culture to a composer, — there is also much to be said. The modern apostles of a musical agnosia think apparently that they have made out a grand case when they have triumphantly asked, in a tone which implies that a reply will never be forthcoming, "What the better will a musician be for knowing Latin, Greek, Sanskrit, quadratic equations, or conic sections? Of what use can these things be to him, either as a composer, executant, or teacher?" Much every way. The advantages of culture to the musician are incalculable; and if the advocates of ignorance could point to a single great musician who was not also an educated man, we should yet contend that education, culture, and acquaintance with other arts, would have widened his views and refined his intellect, and made him to that extent a greater musician than he was. We shall not be astonished at any wild statements which may be made for the purpose of supporting a weak cause; and if it should be alleged that the most brilliant stars in the musical firmament were not cultured men, we should, even after receiving evidence in support of such an assertion — which evidence we venture to think would not be forthcoming — still dare to believe that if they were so great without culture, they would have been far greater with it. We have never heard of musical degrees being despised by those who had by sheer force of intellect obtained them, nor have we yet seen learning or culture derided by those who possessed either.

Culture — the mental discipline which real education ensures — is advantageous in many ways to any one who intends to follow music as a profession. It gives, to begin with, that mental grasp, that grip, that firm hold of a subject, that concentration of mind upon one thing at a time, and that energy of purpose, the absence of which has squandered so many lives, made abortive so many noble resolves, and utterly ruined so much of what would otherwise have been magnificent art-work. The man whose mind has been trained by translating involved Latin sentences, or solving intricate mathematical problems, is accustomed to hard thinking, close reasoning, clear definition, and the tracking out of subtle distinctions; he carries these habits of mind into all his work, and whether he possess a genius for composition or not, he can no more help being influenced through life by such a training than he can alter his stature. His music, as well as his whole life, will bear the unmistakable impress of his culture. The entire man is moulded by it, and he could not, even if he wished it, escape from its benign influence.

The actual benefits which a rigid classical and mathematical training confers upon a man, whether he be a genius or not, are many, and among them are these — power of concentration, which enables a man to bring his whole soul to bear upon the work in hand; clearness of mind, which stamps his mental work, as it were, with the brand of lucid, logical, sequential thought; reserve power, which helps him to lay hold of suggestions or inspirations at the moment of their advent even though that may not be a fitting time for their elaboration, and lay them by for future use; and an exalted standard of perfection, which, by excluding low aims, effectually prevents him from frittering away his powers upon work which is unworthy of him. Now, if these advantages are bestowed by culture, — which no cultured man will for a moment doubt, — it becomes necessary, in order to avoid confusion of thought, to point out what genius can and cannot do for its possessor. Men of genius, especially musicians, are coming to be looked on from an art point of view much as the apostles of Christianity are too often regarded from a religious point of view, as exalted beings who had pleasures, did work, and lived lives quite beyond the ken of common mortals. These ideas are not healthy, and do grievous injury to art and to religion. Those apostles were "men of like passions with ourselves," who had to live pretty much under the same conditions as other men lived, and do their work amid the ordinary, common relationships of every-day life. The same is true of any one of the great composers. The part which "genius" (as the word is commonly understood) took in the production of any inspired musical work was not nearly so great as most people seem to imagine, while the influence of those qualities of mind which we have indicated as the result of culture, and which are not peculiar to men of genius, was far greater than many are prepared to admit. Genius no doubt originated the divine melodies of Spohr's "Power of Sound," or Beethoven's B-flat Symphony, or Mozart's "Jupiter" Symphony; but it was not, we think, genius which developed the "form" in which those deathless works are cast, seeing that "good form" is found in many works which do not contain one spark of genius; and it was certainly not genius which enabled these composers to write correctly for the instruments in an orchestra, or to mould their divine thoughts in a shape which should render them intelligible to the ordinary mind. Genius can suggest, in a vague way, — at times a very vague way indeed, — thoughts which are without doubt inspired; but genius alone does not and cannot enable its possessor to benefit the world by his inspiration. It is here that the work of genius ends and that of culture begins; and when details have to be considered, ways and means found out, and practical ends accomplished, unaided genius is powerless, and even inspiration sinks baffled if it cannot fall back upon those mental qualities which only culture can bring to perfection. Men of genius are numerous; and we speak in all earnestness when we say that thousands are the recipients of inspired ideas of whom the world never hears, because they have not received that culture by which alone their genius can be made manifest and their inspiration utilized for the benefit of their fellows. It is inexpressibly painful to think of what the world loses when her men of genius are not also men of culture. Inspiration comes to one and to another, here and there, and genius is born in more men than the world knows of; but it is only when it finds a cultured mind that it thrives and grows. How much good work is lost because men lack concentrative power, clearness of thought, reserve force, and high ideas of perfection! The great masters of music were all inspired men; but they were more than this — they were cultured men, trained thinkers, logical reasoners, systematic workers; their works prove this beyond all controversy. If they were not all trained by means of Latin, Greek, or mathematics, they were trained by means which produced the same results. Had it been otherwise, they could not possibly have left behind them those works which have shed upon their names an undying lustre.

Whatever position a musician may be called to fill, he will be a better man if he be a cultured man, even though he have no more culture than is implied in the preliminary literary test which is now the indispensable first step to a musical degree at the three universities, — not because so much Latin or Greek will effect certain results, but because the mental effort necessary to attain those languages trains the whole mind, brings a man, so to speak, within his own grasp, subdues his mind to his will, and gives him that self control which is the best preparation for the work of life. If he is to be a cathedral organist, his culture will widen his views, and make his dicta on art-matters respected as well as worthy of respect. If he is called to act as a parish organist, he will carry with him into the service of the church a delicacy and refinement which will be of priceless value to sacred art. If he be a conductor, his trained mind will act like magic on those who place themselves under his guidance and obey his bâton. If he is a teacher only, he will be free from that rudeness which too often marks the unlettered musician, and renders him contemptible in the eyes of those who employ him only because there is no other teacher. And if, in any of these positions, he have genius as well as culture, he will be able to bring to bear upon his inspired thoughts a clear, logical, well-trained mind; he will be able to use to advantage those odd minutes which are all that most men can in these days spare for composition, and he will, above all, be saved by his cultured intellect from composing anything "common or unclean," or falling into the deadly snare of writing down to popular taste.

"Sæpe stilum veritas iterum quæ digna legi sint
Scripturus, neque te ut miretur turba labores,
Contentus paucis lectoribus."

Nothing so much as culture will give to an inspired composer that divine satisfaction in his work which will enable him to be "content with few readers," and confident in the verdict of posterity. It is culpable folly to despise culture, and to try to convince musicians that they will be no better for their learning, seeing that no man, whatever his genius, unless he be aided by those powers of mind which culture (and not genius) must develop, can prevent his inspired thoughts from being lost in eternal silence.

IN MEMORIAM: AUGUST KREISSMANN.

ADDRESS BY F. H. UNDERWOOD.

[On Friday evening, June 13th, the Orpheus Musical Society, of Boston, held at its rooms a memorial service in honor of its first conductor, AUGUST KREISSMANN, who died in Germany March 12, 1879. The exercises, which were private, were very impressive, consisting (1) of the singing, by the Orpheus, of the German Grave Song, "Du unten ist Friede." (2.) An address by F. H. Underwood, Esq. (3.) Part-Song: "Ueber allen Gipfeln ist Ruh." (4.) Address in German by Dr. B. De Gersdorf. (5.) Agnus Dei, from Cherubini's Mass, for male voices. Mr. Underwood has kindly furnished us the manuscript of his address for publication.]

We are met to do honor to the memory of August Kreissmann. The elder members of the Orpheus Society do not need to be told what manner of man he was. To those who knew him he was more than a name. But new generations press on; the glad and eager eyes of youth look forward and not backward; and after the lapse of a very few years, when the most beloved and honored among us passes away, we come to realize the terrible truth of the Roman poet: Pulvis et umbra sumus. We are dust and a shade.

To brighten the fading lineaments of our lamented friend, and to restore for the time the semblance of life to his person and character, it may be allowed briefly to recount something of his history and of his work in the world.

He was born in 1823 in Frankenhausen, Thuringia; probably in humble circumstances. He studied music at Rudolstadt, and had learned to play the bassoon. The Princess Caroline, of Schomburg Lippe, had observed his bright face, his look of intelligence, as well as his proficiency, and, finding that he had also a fine voice, became his patroness.

He went to Bueckeberg, where he soon came into society and was recognized as a rising man. There he studied history and languages, as well as music and harmony. There, too, he found powerful friends in the family of Langerfeldt, two of whom are members of our society to-day.

In 1844 he went to Leipzig and entered the Conservatory, where he remained a diligent student for two years. He next passed two years at Milan for the purpose of perfecting his vocal training. Upon returning to Leipzig he married, and shortly after sailed to America, arriving in New York in 1849.

The Princess Caroline died in 1843, but the Prince, who was himself interested in the young musician, continued the payment of the allowance she had granted him up to the time of his leaving Milan.

The patronage of the great only aided in the development of Kreissmann's artistic nature; it is hardly necessary to say that no culture can create a poetic soul. The sense of beauty, the instinct of grace, the perception of symmetry and fitness, are inborn: and they will manifest themselves, whether in the tones of an orchestral player, in the natural voice and untaught mastery of a singer, in the forms of a sculptor or wood-carver, or in the fine lines and harmonious colors of the painter.

Kreissmann was born an artist, and felt in his soul the overpowering influence of the ideal in art. It was fortunate indeed that he was assisted in his early days; but it was the world's good fortune as much as his own. The Princess was one of the instruments of Providence.

Upon his arrival in New York he had the good fortune to make the acquaintance of Dr. Lowell Mason, then at the height of his reputation and influence, and through him was introduced to the musical public. He attended musical conventions as a solo singer under Dr. Mason's management, and after a time came to Boston.

Here his true musical life began. Here he became known to those who loved music for music's sake; and he brought with him the freshest and finest songs then known. From him the Boston public first heard the incomparable beauty of Schubert, Franz, and Schumann, the more mundane graces of Abt, and the immortal strains of the "Adelaide" of Beethoven. The classic forms, the perfect accompaniments, — all that makes the typical German song the interpreter of thought and emotion, — were first revealed in any large way to the Boston public by August Kreissmann. It is a trite but significant phrase, but he became the fashion. People who had starved upon the inanities of modern psalmody, who were tired of the forced brilliancy of Italian opera, and were disgusted with the commonplaces of British composers, found in the overflowing fountain of German song the sources of the keenest and most lasting pleasure. Directly or remotely the musical knowledge, feeling, and capacity of every person in this region has been affected in this way.

Before the time I am speaking of we were confined to indigenous music, — much as one speaks of domestic cigars and native wine, — to fragments of opera imperfectly rendered, and to English ballads and glees. I am not depreciating the music of other nations, and I do not consider that Germany, by any means, has the monopoly of vocal art or composition. But it was from Germany that we learned that a song, whether for a single voice or in parts, was a composite idea, — that words and music, thought and form, melody and accompaniment, should be parts of one whole.

Whatever was best in musical society became friendly to Kreissmann. To count the names of his friends is to mention the musical families of Boston. The Chickering, in particular, were his ardent supporters; and the Dwights, Schlesingers, Dresels, Uphams, Apthorps, Loringa, and many more, were constant and devoted to him.

Here was the sphere of his activity. German by birth and training, he became a Bostonian to his heart's core. He left his native land at maturity, upon completing his studies, and only returned there when disease had totally incapacitated him for labor. It was a second transplanting of a full-grown tree. His own country, therefore, knew but little of him. Boston was his heart's home, and Boston knew him.

He was largely occupied with church music, and sang at first in the Rev. Mr. Coolidge's church, at the corner of Harrison Avenue and Beech Street, since demolished. Afterwards, for a considerable period, he led the choir at the Rev. Edward E. Hale's church. This situation he resigned on account of ill health. Subsequently he sang at St. Mark's, and later at Brookline. All the time he was engaged in composing or adapting anthems and motets for the services. Though he was not in any sense a great composer, his work was marked by an original vein of melody, by refined taste, and religious feeling.

During his season of greatest prosperity he lived at No. 14 Hudson Street, where he gave lessons and entertained his musical friends. Those were his happiest days, — days of active and contented labor, crowned with success, and devoted to dear and enduring friendships. Equally free from penuriousness and prodigality, he lived a life of serene pleasure, cheered by the thought that his modest savings would render his last days comfortable.

In this period he had many pupils whose voices and style he formed, and who yet remain with us, glad to acknowledge their obligations to the master.

We are chiefly interested, however, in another sphere of his activity. Within a year after his coming to Boston he began to drill choruses, both mixed and male voices. A society of male singers, called the Liederkrantz, was organized, and met for some time at Pfaff's Hotel. Afterwards it was called the Männerchor. Finally, in 1854, all the eligible members were brought together under the name of Orpheus.

You can see them in that most interesting old photograph in the steward's room. There are to be seen in youthful bloom Kreissmann, Weissbein, Langerfeldt, Heidenreich, Housman, Engelhardt, Gems, Isador Eichberg, Esbach, Roeth, Hetzer, Schraubstaedter, whom you will recognize as the fathers of the society. Some are dead, and some are far away. God preserve and long continue with us those that are left!

The Orpheus was the first among societies of the kind in America. Now every city boasts its club, all modeled from their prototype. Kreissmann was leader and first tenor. He arranged or composed their music. He was an assiduous and skillful drill-master; and being himself singer as well as conductor he accomplished unexpected results with scanty numbers. He was able and courteous, never swerving from principle, but maintaining his leadership with rare and exquisite tact. All this he did freely, for the love of art; wholly unselfish, because he toiled for the pleasure and improvement of others, and without a thought of reward.

In those days there were no cabals or whisperings; none were absent or tardy; the society was compact as the Greek phalanx. Rehearsals, as well as concerts, found every man in his place, proud of the growing renown of the society, and entirely loyal to its self-sacrificing and energetic leader.

There were not then many skilled and accomplished male singers in Boston, and the formation of the Orpheus was a work requiring patience. Since that time music has been taught in common schools, and the knowledge and practice of the art are widely diffused; and it has been an easier task to form an Apollo or a Boylston chorus. The infancy of the Orpheus was in the day of small things.

When we hear the magnificent concerts of these later and much larger societies, and when we honor, as we ought, the ability, liberality, and taste which have called them into being, let us not forget the labors of the pioneer conductor that made these grander successes possible.

"Other men labored, and ye have entered into their labors." I confidently, therefore, call upon the members of whatever societies are highest in renown to join with us in doing honor to the memory of August Kreissmann.

Our friend came to this country in his early manhood, but in truth he was always young. With sound physical health and steady nerves, he had more than the usual exuberance of feeling; and this was not expended wholly on his art; his joyous spirit and sunny smile irradiated every circle in which he moved. Hence he was, more than most musicians, a positive force and a controlling influence in the musical world. There are many fine natures that have not the faculty of communication. There are many musicians to whom the laws of harmony and the æsthetics of music are matters of familiar knowledge, who yet preserve a cloistered privacy, and whose powers are known only to a few most intimate friends. However profound these men may be, and however worthy of admiration, they cannot hope to wield any extended influence nor to enjoy any general appreciation. There are distributors of musical as of literary thought, men who interpret the ideas of the great masters, and bring their conceptions within the popular apprehension. These men have something more than the possession of power; their natures are magnetic, and they kindle the hearts of pupils and friends with their own enthusiasm. This, I think, was the supreme quality of our friend Kreissmann. When he stood in his place as conductor, every person within reach felt his commanding influence. Those who looked at his earnest eyes and his strong compelling gestures felt that they must sing; and when, after rehearsal, he took his place with the first tenors, his voice sounded like the call of a chieftain to battle. Those who heard him, however, and particularly those who knew him, need not be reminded that the power of the man was not the result of mere animal vigor. He did not revel in noise. He had the finest appreciation of what was lovely, tender, and pathetic; and the strains of his chorus could be as soft as the west wind on a tranquil summer evening.

In this hurried sketch you will observe a man of fine physical powers, with attractive features and presence, with a voice that was noble by nature and refined by art; with a generous, unselfish heart; with singular enthusiasm in his profession, fortunate in every musical undertaking, gathering around him troops of devoted friends, living a pure and simple life, exerting an influence unparalleled before his time, and leaving behind him a memory of love and reverence.

What could I say more? He lived, and he loved. He followed the path of duty and performed his appointed tasks.

It was not necessary for him to have reached the coveted bound of threescore and ten in order to have filled out a perfectly rounded life.

In the summer of 1865 his health began to fail. He tried the effects of medicinal springs, but with little result. The physicians could do nothing for him. He was reluctant to give up, but as the symptoms became more urgent he began to think that a change of climate might be beneficial. At all events a season of rest amid the scenes of the fatherland would be a relief. He had accumulated a modest competency, — so he supposed, — though by what mishaps and mismanagement (not his own) that property was scattered and lost, need not be related here. He went to Germany in 1866, and was for a time, I believe, at Carlsbad, where he obtained temporary relief.

The following year he returned to this country in improved health, though still feeble and a sufferer. The struggle continued for some years between the strong will and the insidious disease. He gave lessons when he could, and strove to be cheerful and to think of himself as getting the better of the enemy. For some time he was one of the corps of the Boston Conservatory. But he was not improving, nor even holding his own. His infirmities increased, and he was sinking almost to helplessness.

In 1873 he went to Germany and settled in the little principality of Gera. He did not know that he had gone to meet his fate. He taught as long as his infirmities would permit, but was compelled finally to desist; and I am afraid we must say that his later days were passed in gloom, if not in actual want. When his condition became known here, friends hastened to send him relief; and plans were in progress which would have placed him in easy circumstances. But death came, and with kindly touch ended his sorrows with his life, and left him in the long repose to which we are all tending.

All we can do is to be silent in the presence of the great mystery, — a mystery as inscrutable now as when the first man obeyed the resistless summons.

We know we shall not again look upon his bright and cheerful face, nor listen to the beloved tones of his voice, nor again clasp his friendly hand.

Affection may picture him in the Elysian fields, joining in the melodies of the immortals; but with our finite faculties we have no ears for the sounds beyond sense. All that remains to us is the noble image which arises in thought's interior sphere at the sound of his name.

He is at rest.

Warte nur, warte nur! balde Ruhest du such.

THE SAENGERFEST AT CINCINNATI, JUNE, 1879.

In matters of musical criticism, when circumstances tend for the time to prejudice or bias one, it is doubtless conducive to an impartial opinion that a period of time be permitted to elapse before venturing to express it. While, therefore, the following remarks on the "Sängerfest" (a word which may now be called an Americanism in the vocabulary of Cincinnati journalists) may seem to be somewhat belated, I hope they may yet prove of interest to some of your readers, as they have been postponed with the object of making them more reliable and free from all extraneous influences. It is certainly a pleasant custom to celebrate extraordinary feasts of song; in which hundreds participate, with festivities which assist in creating enthusiasm and make the people more susceptible for the art-repast in store, provided the necessary preparation for the latter is not made impossible by the social pleasures of the former.

When thirty years ago the humble foundation was laid for the "North American Sängerbund," it was certainly not intended that the social features at the biennial feasts should in any way interfere with their artistic success; for the different clauses of the constitution and the by-laws all testify to an earnest desire to make the musical features the chief end and aim of these gatherings. There is a trait in the German character called Gemüthlichkeit, — this word alone can express it, — which, when well directed, is a great help toward concentrated action, but when unbridled is inclined to lead to excess. This tendency soon became prominent at the "Sängerfests," and proved a decided drawback to the efforts of those who were interested in carrying out the original object of making them instrumental in furthering the progress of musical art. In Cleveland this was so unpleasantly evident that steps were at once taken to remedy the evil, and, as the sequel proved, with the best success. At the "Sängerfest" in Louisville, a mixed chorus for the first time took part, and the measures instituted to secure attendance on the rehearsals gave it a new musical importance. When Cincinnati was decided upon as the place for holding the next festival it became evident to every one that, in view of the remarkable musical and pecuniary achievements at the May festivals, no effort must be spared to uphold the dignity of the gatherings of the "Sängerbund," by making this one, at least, an artistic success. And it is a pleasant duty to chronicle that this end was gained.

Mr. Carl Barus, who was elected musical director, left nothing undone to insure thorough preparation on the part of the societies attending. So strictly were his injunctions obeyed that a large and influential society of male singers was refused permission to participate, having been found insufficiently prepared. At the Reception Concert the usual formalities of transferring the banner of the "Bund" were dispatched as rapidly as possible. Mendelssohn's St. Paul was then performed under the able direction of Mr. Otto Singer, by a chorus of singers from Cincinnati only. It was a promising inauguration of the series of concerts. The choruses, especially of the first part, were sung with spirit and precision. The volume of sound was quite sufficient to produce a powerful effect in the vast hall, while the balance of the parts, and in consequence the tone-color, was very good. The opening chorus was rendered with such spirit and enthusiasm as to put the audience into the happy frame of mind so essential to keep up the energy of the singers and the interest of the listeners. The short dramatic choruses, which form a characteristic feature of the oratorio, were given with intense effect. In the second part there was a perceptible falling off in spirit and accuracy, owing, doubtless, in a great measure to the late hour and the growing restlessness in the audience. The soprano solos were sung by Mme. Otto-Alvsleben, who, at the recommendation of Carl Reinecke, had been engaged to come from Dresden as "prima donna" for this festival. Her voice is phenomenal neither in quality nor quantity, but she uses her resources so artistically that nothing appears wanting. Her phrasing is most excellent, evidently the result of long and serious study; her vocalization very good, as was shown in her singing of the bravura aria from l'Etoile du Nord, in one of the matinées. In the recitatives her declamation was admirable. Miss Josie Jones-Yorke, one of the alto-soloists of the Carl Rosa Opera Company in London, made the most possible of the little allotted to her in the oratorio. In the arioso, "But the Lord is mindful," she proved herself possessed of a beautiful voice, well-cultivated, and of a thoroughly artistic conception of the music. The impression she made was deepened by her singing at a subsequent matinée. Mr. Bischoff and Mr. Remmert are so well known that it is scarcely necessary to say that they were fully equal to their parts in the oratorio.

The programme of the second concert contained, as principal numbers, "German Battle Vow and Prayer," by F. Möhring, for bass solo and male chorus; "Easter Morning," F. Hiller, soprano solo and male chorus; and in the second part, "Paradise Lost," by Rubinstein, for solo voices and mixed chorus. There were about 800 male singers on the stage when Mr. Barus appeared at the conductor's desk. From such a number the audience had a right to expect a grand volume of sound; but when the first chord after the instrumental introduction burst forth, not a few of the thousands of listeners looked at each other in utter astonishment. Such an overwhelming tone-wave had never rolled through the immense hall. The effect was indescribable. Trumpets, trombones, and tubas were completely drowned; the robust, powerful German voices alone were heard. It was repeatedly said by persons qualified to pass judgment that such a male chorus had never been heard before in this country. Mr. Remmert, in the bass solo, displayed his powerful voice to the best advantage. In the "Easter Morning," Madame Alveleben sang at a disadvantage when the irresistible power of the male chorus is considered, but, nevertheless, she succeeded in bringing her part into the prominence given it by the composer, and in bringing out the original effect which the peculiar combination of a soprano-solo with male voices produces. Notwithstanding the size of the chorus, the singing was throughout precise and accurate, and in some passages remarkable for the dynamic gradations observed. The selections from Rubinstein's "Paradise Lost" introduced the "full mixed chorus," made up of societies from Louisville and Indianapolis, in addition to the local singers. Some parts of the composition are commonplace, others very interesting. In all the choruses Rubinstein's peculiar talent for making effects with masses is noticeable. The performance was very satisfactory, and, although after the singing of the male choruses, it was difficult to hold the interest of the audience, it was duly appreciated. The solo parts were in good hands, having been assigned to Miss Heckle, a Cincinnati singer, recently returned from a year's study with Stockhausen in Frankfurt, Mr. Bischoff, and Mr. Remmert.

The musical event of the festival to which every one looked forward with the greatest interest was the performing of Verdi's Manzoni Requiem. For months this work had been most carefully rehearsed with the chorus; and the orchestra, too, had been carefully prepared for the difficult task which the composer has allotted to it. With a large, well-trained chorus, an orchestra sufficiently numerous to execute the full score without omitting any one of the instruments or substituting one for the other; finally, with eminent soloists, an excellent rendering was to be expected. And the expectations were realized.

Verdi's work is one which, if justice is to be done to it, must be spoken of at length. The occasional predominance of the opera composer over the evident desire to preserve the church style in the mass makes it of very unequal merit. The perfect control, however, over all the resources of the solo, chorus, and orchestra, which is shown on every page, must be admired. In many places the scoring is almost audacious, bordering on the very extreme limits of what is beautiful in art, while other passages are treated with the greatest moderation and taste, at the same time with perfect originality; for instance, the "Quid sum miser" with the bassoon accompaniment. But in the space of this letter it is impossible to give even a superficial idea of the character of the work. The difficulties which in the course of the composition are thrown on the soloists, chorus, and orchestra are numerous, and frequently almost impracticable. While they were generally successfully surmounted, there were features in the performance which were most admirable. The "Dies Iræ," the weighty bass passage with the syncopations in the other parts of the "Rex tremendæ," were sung with thrilling effect, while the "Sanctus," which the composer calls a "fugue for two choirs" (it is nothing more than a fugato), and the closing chorus, likewise a fugue, received a correct and transparent rendering. The soloists were Mme. Otto Alveleben, Miss Cranch, Mr. Fritsch, and Mr. Whitney. In the solo parts the mass presents the greatest difficulties; not only are the voices constantly employed in their widest compass, but in modulation there is an arbitrariness which makes perfect intonation and the preserving of the pitch extremely uncertain, as, for instance, the solo quartet, à capella, "Pie Jesu." It speaks well for the artistic conscientiousness of the soloists that, almost without exception, the ensemble parts were sung faultlessly in every respect; evidently they had been carefully prepared. The excellences of Mme. Alveleben's singing, her perfect control of the voice, her fine declamation, and her artistic discrimination in producing effects, for which the mass presents such ample opportunity, became more than ever before evident. The mezzo-soprano part, which is really the most important of the solo voices in the mass, was rendered by Miss Cranch in most admirable style. In addition to perfect vocalization and pure intonation in the most difficult intervals, there was a dramatic intensity and genuine feeling pervading her singing, which created a profound impression. The duet "Recordare, Jesu pie," for soprano and mezzo-soprano, marked the climax in the performance of the soloists, and worked up the audience to the highest pitch of enthusiasm. The understanding of the two singers in every respect, in breathing, phrasing, dynamic changes, was perfect, and produced a most delightful effect. Mr. Fritsch was at his best. He never sang in Cincinnati to better advantage, although the tenor part is very exacting. Mr. Whitney, in the bass solo, "Confutatis," had occasion to display his beautiful voice and the dignity of his style, while in the ensemble number he, as well as Mr. Fritsch, showed praiseworthy moderation.

I cannot close this short sketch of the evening concerts without making favorable mention of the orchestra. While the nucleus consisted of local musicians, the best available talent was engaged from neighboring cities, and the number swelled to about 110 pieces. Especially noticeable was the size of the string orchestra in comparison to the wind instruments. The effect was most excellent. The brass instruments, even in the loud-est passages, never became unpleasantly prominent; the coloring was always subdued by the mass of strings, a feature which made a most favorable impression on me.

Of the three matinées I will not speak in detail, as they offered nothing of special interest. Besides the soloists already mentioned, there appeared on these occasions Miss Friedenheimer, of Louisville; Miss Balatka, daughter of the well-known director, Hans Balatka, now of Chicago; Mr. Andres, with an organ solo; Mr. Carpe, in the E-flat piano concerto of Beethoven; and Mr. Michael Brand as 'cello-soloist, — the last three from Cincinnati. The musical success of the Sängerfest was beyond a doubt highly satisfactory, and will doubtless assist materially in raising the standard of the coming festivals. The next one is to be held in Chicago in 1883. The deficit, which entails on the subscribers of the guarantee fund a loss of twelve per cent. on their subscriptions, will be covered without much difficulty. Mr. Barus, the musical director, and all those connected with the preparing of musical as well as business affairs, can rest satisfied with the result. M.

CINCINNATI, July 15.

TALKS ON ART. — SECOND SERIES.¹

FROM INSTRUCTIONS OF MR. WILLIAM M. HUNT TO HIS PUPILS.

X.

THE finest shadows of things are seen by painters. Talk about mathematics! They don't develop a person like painting.

You must love a thing in order to go on. L. T. comes down to the sea-side and finds a little atom of a thing, — a new moth. That moth is a success. If people would only sing the little note which they are intended to sing! J—— sings her note. She has such love that I think she will leave after her things that will excite an emotion that some smart things do not. She has individual expression; lives and communes with nature.

It has got to be from your heart's-blood, if it's only two marks on a shingle.

I can feel enough in that apple-tree (sketch) to last three months, but I am too volatile to pass my time so. I see a sunset, a twilight. I can't carry both into that apple-tree; but if I live long enough I may put something into that apple-tree, and do it in five minutes.

A great deal has got to be done materially in order to render things æsthetically.

Very few who paint have any idea of subtle expression. Ingres could not bear Rembrandt. At the time of Rembrandt his contemporaries thought little of him. They thought more of some of his scholars.

Plenty of people admire Jacque; but I would not turn my head to see the best Jacque that ever was put on canvas. I don't like his works. They are masks. There are very few things that fascinate me. Among the pupils' sketches I see things that make me feel that they have a power that is not developed.

A picture is not necessarily complete in itself. When the time comes another person will come, who will take that up and go on farther.

I like Millet's work, and I like that of a baby

I hate conveniences. That's my pet economy. I don't generally have conveniences. Once I was at Berville's shop in Paris, and he wanted me to buy a box of materials for charcoal-drawing. I didn't want it a bit. But he kept pressing it upon me, and at last I took it because I could not hold out any longer. I give you my word, that box was the beginning of all the charcoal-drawing that's been done in America; of my having any class in fact. I took it down into Brittany with me, and liked it very much.

¹ Copyright, 1879, by Helen M. Knowlton.

I had hardly ever used charcoal before; and when I made sketches they were on scraps of paper, and easily lost. This little box kept my things together, and interested me in that way of drawing.

The people who live by accumulated wealth, with which they do nothing, are a set of lugs. The community carries them. Every time they die there's a song of angels. If people respected themselves there would be no such class, for they are made such by being bowed down to. It's the giving muscles that we ought to use, not the grasping. Paralysis means having all the muscles turned in one direction.

I own all the greatness in Europe. I remember the best pictures. They are mine; but I'm willing those old kings should take care of them. If you see a flower, pick it and smell of it; that flower is yours.

The individual is nothing. The men who built the pyramids are dead; but the pyramids stand.

Unconsciousness is superior dignity. Assumption of superiority is the one thing that arouses my indignation. I have a feeling of respect for a certain kind of humility. I believe, with Rousseau, that every one we meet is superior to us in some respect. I can't see the first brutal thing in what is called the brute creation. Every human being has the elements of the animal creation.

There's a call for everything that's fine; but there is n't a market for so much competition.

Dwight's Journal of Music.

SATURDAY, AUGUST 2, 1879.

HEARING MUSIC ON COMPULSION.

Music is an excellent thing, in its place. But too much of a good thing is not good. At all times and seasons, but especially in summer, one hears perforce a never ceasing medley and Babel, or at least a general hum, of instruments and voices, loud blasts of brazen harmony (or discord), or half finished periods and phrases, idle scraps and bits of melody, mere haunting echoes of tunes so popular that they persecute us everywhere and turn the musical sensibilities into a source of torment, — things which we must hear and cannot escape, and yet to which we almost never listen. Now music to which one does not listen is of very doubtful benefit. It only distracts and dissipates the mind; it confuses and bewilders, calls the attention off from other things, without commanding any real, full attention to itself. Music, which is merely incidental to something else, to something which makes a more direct appeal, had in most cases better be left out altogether; its presence is impertinent, irrelevant to what is going on. Only when it is in itself the main thing, the direct, objective point of interest, does it really speak to us, or do us any good, while in the way of musical culture it is worse than nothing; it begets a habit of listless inattention to that which, if it be of any account, is certainly entitled to a full and careful hearing, — not an involuntary hearing with the ears alone, but a considerate hearing with the mind, and with a yielding up of heart, soul, and imagination to its influence. Musical babble is unedifying. It spoils the appetite for music that means something; tends to bring on musical dyspepsia.

This text comes round with summer. Bands in the streets and gardens and on every steamboat, hand-organ grinders, whistlers of Pinafore, keep the air full of melodies that cross each other in all directions, to some of which, could you select, you might listen, in safe seclusion and get the good of them; but such "Stille Sicherheit" is seldom found. We would be choosers both of the what, the how, the when, and the where; — then we can listen; but "on compulsion? No!" Yet on the simple ground of general cheerfulness, we all like this tuneful Babel well enough; no one would have the air emptied of the commingling, crossing sounds; they incite a general disposition to enjoyment, to free, rhythmic, genial life, a good reaction from the old Puritanic narrowness and stiffness. It is all well enough in that sense; only it hardly counts in the sense of musical culture; it does not elevate the taste in music, nor does it prove us to be a musical people. The regular provision, whether municipal or private, of open-air concerts for the people in the cool evenings, on the Common and the smaller parks and squares, is really commendable. To these throng young and old, obedient to the desire to hear and listen to good music of its kind; we doubt not, most of the crowd try to hear, and give their best attention to the music that is offered, though it be merely music by a band, and by a band all of brass, and it may lead to something better.

With the inevitable out-door summer music we have no quarrel; we only take from it the suggestion of our present topic, which is hearing music "on compulsion;" and we wish to speak of certain forms of this, which we think may be capable of remedy. It is not for the first time that we allude to them.

(1.) Here is a recent experience. It is the great annual academic festival at our oldest university, whom so many of us call Alma Mater, and delight to honor. It is a grand sight, — a thousand of her sons, age after age, in long procession winding through the shady grounds, and entering that vast dining-hall, to take their seats at table. Nowhere, probably, can you see such a number of such men assembled at a banquet; in such a gathering the humblest shares the inspiration of the whole. But during the half hour (nearly) which it takes them to get all seated, the band, to whose martial strains they have been marching, having found its way to a high-arched gallery at one end of the resounding hall, continues all the while its loud, ringing, stunning march, with full fortissimo of brazen monster tubas and shrill cornets; the terrible rimbombo making it impossible for the guests and classmates to converse with one another, or even think, all are so crazed by the unmeaning, utterly irrelevant, tyrannical, oppressive noise. In some such scene, years ago, may Holmes have been moved to pray for "silence, like a poultice, to heal the blows of sound." Such occurrences are common on all such occasions. And though the band, a portion of them, may then take gentler instruments, as violins and 'cellos, to play interludes between the speeches, it is commonly with no plan of any fitting of the music to the word or topic, but all at random, like the music that we hear in theatres between the acts. And this for an audience of educated men, of men of culture and refinement, who have been trained to a sense of fitness and of taste in all things! One would say that such a dinner party would demand either music after a carefully studied programme, fitted to the other exercises and calculated to enhance their meaning and idealize and somewhat perpetuate their influence, or else to be relieved from the presence of the disturber. Harvard has her Musical Professor at last, and her musical classes, her fifty or more earnest students of the theory of music. Is it not time that she begin to treat the music of her festivals as an element of some significance beyond the mere timing of the march to dinner and relaxing the strain of attention to speeches dry or eloquent? Should not her music set a worthy example of selections and performance, classical and tasteful and inspiring? Now it is no better than one hears at a political rally in old Faneuil Hall; indeed, the latter is more relevant to its occasion, since it brushes up old patriotic tunes. This is one way in which we become victims to the music of compulsion.

(2.) But nowhere is the infliction quite so flagrant as in theatres. You go to see and hear a play, a drama humorous or tragic, and you have to hear something else which you don't want, which is simply a bore and a distraction, which breaks the spell of the good acting, and rudely interrupts the continuity of the drama, will not let you talk with your neighbor, or even think the matter over to yourself, but leaves you scatter-brained and with a headache. In this respect a thing like Pinafore, which turns it into an opera, and makes the music paramount, the element that chiefly claims attention, is a real blessing; and even to the poorest opera we can grant one virtue, if it had no other, namely, the silence of the orchestra between the acts. For the music commonly played while the curtain is down is wholly irrelevant, and even in a vulgar sense, impertinent. It has nothing to do with the play, either as preparation or continuation and improvement of its mood and its effect. It is a rude assault upon the ear and sense just when one requires a little rest and silence; it keeps up what seems an endless and relentless repetition of a dance tune or hackneyed sentimental melody; and when the ambitious cornet-solo man begins to caricature the death-song of Edgardo, or to imitate a flute and revel in all sorts of florid variations, it is enough sometimes to drive one to despair. The appeal is to the lowest taste in the audience, and is sure to elicit much clapping of hands, while it fatigues and sickens those of finer culture.

In the best German theatres for the spoken drama, there is no music between the acts, and no orchestra is present, except when pieces like Goethe's Egmont, or the Midsummer Night's Dream are presented, for which composers of genius, like Beethoven and Mendelssohn, have made music specially adapted to the play, and such as to render the illusion more ideally complete. Without any real interruption of the drama you can relax attention for a moment, and look round or talk with friends, and find yourself fresh for the next installment of the play, with brain not distracted, brayed as in a mortar by coarse, senseless, tedious noise called music. We are sure many persons would go to a good play oftener than they do, were this the practice in our theatres. But if there be music, let it be for music's sake, a thing that claims attention on its own account, and worthy to be listened to as such; not flung at our heads while we are cornered and cannot escape it. In an opera, however light, like Pinafore, it cultivates the common taste; we do not think the musical entr'actes of the theatre, as a general thing, do that.

(3.) The very diffusion of musical taste and knowledge, so desirable in itself, has this uncomfortable side to it. It compels us, — not absolutely, not directly, but yet practically, through our sympathies, our interest in concert-giving debutants, whose name is legion, through a good-natured disposition to encourage, to recognize and duly appreciate all degrees and kinds of real merit — to attend concert after concert, in season and out of season, and sit through lengthy programmes of all sorts of compositions by all the old and new composers, when one had much rather stay at home and make a little music by himself, or find an hour for once to study music, or take a walk or chat with friends, or go to a scientific lecture, or a reading, or a play, — in short, to anything rather than the nine hundred and ninety-ninth concert of a season still protracted into the midsummer heats and dog-days. This compulsion, to be sure, chiefly weighs upon musical editors and critics, who, because they have undertaken to give such notice as they can conveniently of the more significant phases of the advancing cause of music, seem therefore to be held in duty bound to make discriminating (and that means in too many cases flattering) reports on everything that passes in the way of musical publication or performance. The most unsatisfactory aspect of all such expected, and therefore half-compulsory, listening and reporting ("criticising," if you please) is that it uses the poor editor and critic as an involuntary advertising medium! But his is not the only class that suffers; all who have a name in the community for musical enthusiasm, taste, or knowledge, are more or less appealed to in the same way to listen to the new comer, to subscribe to, or at least accept a complimentary invitation to, the complimentary concert of the newly arrived singer or instrumental virtuoso, or the exhibition recital, matinee or concert, of such singing and piano teacher's pupils in their turn. It is a penalty we all pay for our love and taste for music. It has its pleasant and its irksome side. We do not know that there is any remedy to be found for it, or that it would not be surly and unamiable to seek one. We must make up our minds to hear much that we do not wish to hear, much that is good intrinsically, but not good coming in the wrong time, when we can only hear with ears, not listen heart and soul, simply as the consequence of happening to be somewhat musical.

We might pursue the theme indefinitely; but these specifications will suffice to show how Music, often welcomed as a heavenly visitor, may also be a persecuting bore, to none so aggravating as to the victim who is the most truly musical.

THE "RUTH BURRAGE ROOM." — Mr. B. J. Lang has furnished to the Boston correspondent of the Music Trade Review the following interesting description of a little practical scheme, successfully put in practice under his (Mr. Lang's direction), for the benefit of earnest young pianoforte students. We had long been intending to make some account of it ourselves; but since the New York paper has the start of us, we are glad to borrow, hoping that by so doing we may lead some to avail themselves of the opportunity so generously and wisely offered. Mr. Lang writes: —

"In the upper story of Chickering & Son's building, accessible by an elevator, there exists a tastefully furnished room, containing two concert grand piano-fortes and a beautiful mahogany case containing every piece of music that exists for two piano-fortes, two players, and for two piano-fortes, four players (eight hands). Every symphony, concerto, overture, suite, etc., etc., to the extent in value of about three thousand dollars, is there, conveniently bound, with catalogues complete. Under appropriate rules for the convenience of the beneficiaries, this room is absolutely free to all, even without the asking. That this wonderful place is in constant use from morning until night, and has been from the moment it was inaugurated until now (nearly two years), is a matter of course.

"From whence came all this?

"A few years since there died in Boston a lovely girl of twenty-two (a fine pianist herself), a daughter of the Hon. A. A. Burrage, who, on her death-bed, expressed the wish that the little property of which she was possessed should be given, under the direction of Mr. B. J. Lang, to deserving musical students. The before mentioned collection of music was purchased with Miss Ruth Burrage's money. The Messrs. Chickering & Sons allowed Mr. Lang to construct the room, and to retain it free of rent for the purpose, so long as they (the Messrs. Chickering) occupy the building; and, furthermore, do generously supply, free of cost, the two grand piano-fortes.

"Consider what delight one can get from this place. Have you two grand piano-fortes? Have you a hundred and fifty volumes of music for those two piano-fortes? This is a very expensive sort of music, while it is not just what one cares to own year in and year out. This attractive place is called the "Ruth Burrage Room." May this little description lead some generous mortal to carry out the same idea in some other of our musical centres."

The rules attached to the use of the room are simple, and not hampered by red tape:

"This room, with its piano-fortes and library of four-hand and eight-hand music for two piano-fortes, is intended for the use of persons who play such music tolerably well at first sight.

"For the convenience of those who may use it, and the preservation of its valuable contents, the following rules are established:

- "1. The hours for the use of the room are from 9 A. M. to 5.30 P. M. only.
 - "2. The names of all persons using the room must be entered in advance in a book kept for the purpose on the third floor of the building.
 - "3. One hour or two hours at a time may be engaged by a party of two or four persons, by entry of the names of the party opposite the hour or hours decided; but such entry is never to be made more than seven days before the desired time.
 - "4. No party is to have the right to engage more than two hours in any one period of seven days.
 - "5. The same hour or hours, week after week, may be secured by the entry of the names of the party on their arrival each week for the same hour or hours in the following week.
 - "6. One hour on each of two days may be taken instead of two hours on one day, if preferred.
 - "7. Parties are to assemble on the lower floor, in order that the elevator may be used once only to reach the room. They are expected to use the stairs in descending.
 - "8. On reaching the room, umbrellas and clothing should be left on the rack provided for the purpose outside the door.
 - "9. The best care must be taken of the music; it must never be taken from the room, and never used as a seat, and the corners of the leaves must not be turned up.
 - "10. The pianos must be carefully treated, and be closed on leaving the room; the music must be returned to its proper place, the book-case locked, and the keys of the case and of the room put into the place assigned for them (unless the party having the next claim to the room stands ready to take them), and the window-shades drawn down.
- "Implicit obedience to these rules, or to others hereafter established, is required from all who may avail themselves of the benefits of the room."

MUSICAL CORRESPONDENCE.

CINCINNATI, JULY 15. — The close of the winter term of the College of Music was preceded by six examinations of the pupils under instruction. Five of these examinations were semi-public, while the sixth took place before a very large invited audience in Music Hall. The numbers consisted in vocal solo and ensemble numbers, and solo selections for the violin, cello, and the organ. Space will not permit of any enlarging on all the performances of the different students; of two I will only make mention, that of Miss Funck and of Master Bendix, both pupils of Professor Jacobson. The former played the Fantasia-Caprice of Vieuxtemps, not only very smoothly in execution, but in a style which was more that of an artist than of an amateur. Master Bendix, in the first movement of a concerto by Viotti, showed himself very proficient both technically and in point of taste.

The convention of the National Association of Music Teachers, which gathered here on July 1st, was not largely attended. Mr. De Roode, of Lexington, acted as president. The programme was carried out to the letter. The essays read were by Mr. Parsons of New York, "The Relation of Music to Morals;" by Madame Seiler of Philadelphia on the "Physiology of the Voice;" by Mr. Krehbiel of Cincinnati on "The Sacred and Profane Influence in Musical Development;" by Mr. Van Cleave now of Cincinnati, on "Realism in Music;" and by Mr. Mees of this city on "Instrumentation, its Origin and Development." The last paper was illustrated, through the kindness of Mr. Thomas, by his orchestra, in a concert at the Highland House, in which selections from the works of Bach, Handel, Haydn, Mozart, Beethoven, Liszt, Wagner, Berlioz, and Strauss, were performed in chronological order. At the afternoon session Mme. De Roode Rice of Chicago, gave a piano recital with an excellent programme, and Mr. Sherwood, of Boston, created genuine enthusiasm with his rendering of a long list of classic and modern compositions.

THE Netherlandish Society for the Promotion of Musical Art celebrated its fiftieth jubilee in Amsterdam, May 23-25. The works performed were: Handel's Joshua; a Mass by Verhulst; "Der fliegende Holländer," by Richard Hol; the third part of the oratorio Bonifacius, by Nicolai; and the Ninth Symphony of Beethoven.

NOTES AND GLEANINGS.

THE NEXT OPERA SEASON. — Mr. J. R. G. Haasard writes home from London to the New York Tribune: "Mr. Mapleson's plans for the next season in America are still vague, and I presume that they will be governed by circumstances not altogether within his control. Mme. Gerster will certainly return; I believe there is no doubt that we shall have Campanini, and Galassi also; and you have probably learned that Mapleson has captured from Strakosch no less a prize than Miss Annie Louise Cary. Here is an admirable quartet to begin with; but a double set of singers is needed for a good season, and negotiations with the others are incomplete. Mr. Mapleson informs me that he is making strenuous efforts to secure Nilsson. Nobody believes that he will succeed. Mme. Nilsson is engaged for next winter in Madrid, and I presume that neither she nor the manager is anxious to pay the forfeit of £3000 to which she would become liable by accepting the American engagement. Nilsson and Gerster would do well together, for their special rôles are entirely distinct. Del Puente will doubtless return, and among the less important members of the troupe are Mlle. Ambre and Mlle. Lido. I am sorry to say that there is more or less uncertainty about our enjoying Sig. Ardit's services again this year, for he, too, is wanted at Madrid. Sig. Musio has made several engagements for Mr. Max Strakosch's next season in the United States, of which, as you know, the dramatic soprano, Teresa Singer, is to be the principal attraction. The tenor is Petrovich, a Russian, who was the first representative of the "King of Lahore" when Massenet's opera was performed in Italy. The baritone, Storti, — Italian, of course, — made a name, I believe, at Milan, where he sang with Mme. Sasse in the "Guarany" of Gomez. Castelnary, the French basso, is not unknown to fame; he has lately been heard in the "Mefistofele" of Boito. I wish I could add that Sig. Musio had engaged himself as conductor of the troupe; but there is no such good news. Pantaleoni, the baritone, who sang with the Strakosch company last season, is about to join Mapleson here. Mr. Max Strakosch has just arrived in London, and you will doubtless soon hear of his further arrangements."

From the same letter (London, July 5), we learn: "A German vocalist who has taken a distinguished rank here is Henschel, the bass, distinguished especially as an interpreter of German songs, and remarkable alike for the beauty of his voice and the purity of his method. A man of varied accomplishments, and a favorite in society, he is in general request. He steadily refuses to give lessons, but to this rule he has made a solitary exception in favor of our young countrywoman, Miss Lillian Bailey of Boston, who sang not long ago at one of Dr. Damrosch's concerts in New York. I heard her at a private assembly the other night, with Henschel at the piano, and was charmed and astonished at the progress she has made since she came abroad. Herr Henschel tells me that he intends to visit America in 1880. Miss Thurny is in London, singing frequently at private concerts and universally admired. The reports of her brilliant successes in London and Paris were not in the least exaggerated. She has lately received a letter full of compliments, constituting her a perpetual member of the French Association des Artistes Musiciens, and signed by Gounod, Ambroise Thomas, Jules Massenet, Victor Massé, H. Reber, and others well known to the world. She is engaged for the Hereford, Bristol, and Gloucester festivals, after which she will return to America, probably in October. Several managers are in treaty with her for the United States, but she has not yet closed with any of them."

In addition to the promises for orchestral concerts made by the Harvard and Philharmonic organizations, the Euterpe promises this year to give its subscribers a rare treat in the way of chamber music for strings mainly. A series of eight concerts is proposed, and a plan is in contemplation which may give Boston musicians an opportunity to improve the record of this association over that of its initiatory season. The field for the association is one which offers rich attractions for its members, and, with such acknowledged ability at its head, the Euterpe can hardly fail to win a high position among the musical organizations of the city.

Notwithstanding all these attractions, Boston is also to enjoy the presence of the Mendelssohn Quintet Club during a large part of the season. Only two concert trips are contemplated by this organization during the season, one in October and November, the other in April and the late spring, thus affording an opportunity for it again to become a standard feature of the home musical season during December, January, February, and March. Its membership will be made good by the addition of artists of established reputation, whose names will be duly announced, and the long and honorable record of the club will be fully maintained during the coming season.

While the instrumental concert field will be thus richly provided for, the home opera season will be one of the leading features in the attractions of the coming month. The "Ideal" company will fill a month's engagement at the Boston Theatre, beginning late in September, or early in October, and present Pinyfore, Fatinitza, and possibly a third opera during the season. By the withdrawal of Tom Karl, who goes to fill an engagement with the Emma Abbott Company, a change will be made in the Ralph and the Corresponent in the two operas, Mr. W. H. Fessenden assuming both rôles in place of Mr. Karl. Mr. M. W. Whitney resumes his place as Captain Corcoran in Pinafore and assumes the rôle of the Russian General in Fatinitza, materially strengthening the cast of the latter opera. Mr. Frothingham continues as the Ideal Deadeye in Pinafore, and assumes the rôle of Steipann in Fatinitza, again strengthening the cast of the opera. Miss Adelaide Phillips will assume the rôle of Battercup, as originally planned in the organization of the company, and will assume the dual rôle of Fatinitza and Vladimir, in which she made such a pronounced success upon the first night of the season. It will be seen that all these changes go to strengthen the company in both operas, and a successful season seems to be a certainty. — Boston Herald.

THE repertoire of the Maretzka opera company for the coming season will include Car and Zimmerman, by Lortzing, which will be called The Two Peters, an ingenious and sprightly work, known principally through orchestral arrangements; Rabodon, by Gloraz; La Colombe, of Gounod, which will be called The Dove; Grisar's original Doctor of Alcantara, the French name of which is Bonaire; M. Pastalon; Sleepy Hollow, the new opera by Max Maretzka himself, and Fatinitza to fill in.

POPULAR ORCHESTRAL CONCERTS. Mr. Listemann's Boston Philharmonic Orchestra, of about thirty of our best musicians, has issued a prospectus, from which it appears that the first venture will consist of five concerts, beginning in the latter part of October, at the Music Hall, their programmes to include the following among other works:

Beethoven: Symphony in F, selections; overture, "Egmont"; overture, "Leonore No. 3."
Schumann: Symphony in D-minor, selections; overture, "Manfred."
Raff: "Lenore Symphony" selections.
Spohr: Overture, "Jessonda."
Mendelssohn: Overture, "Midsummer Night's Dream."
Wagner: Overture, "Tannhäuser."
Bach: Air and gavotte.
Schubert: Unfinished symphony in B-minor.
Liszt: Preludes; Hungarian rhapsodies; polonaises in E; "Faust" symphony, Gretchen movement.
Mozart: Overture, "Magic Flute."
Weber: Overture, "Oberon"; "Invitation à la Danse."
Saint-Saëns: "Danse Macabre"; "Le Rouet d'Omphale."
Tchaikowski: Andante for string orchestra.
Accomplished vocal and instrumental soloists will contribute to each programme.

SYRACUSE UNIVERSITY. — A Commencement Musical Soirée of the College of Fine Arts was held in the Wieting Opera House on Monday evening, June 23. We presume it was under the direction of our old friend William Schultze, the musical professor of the university. Pupils of the institution, with their teachers and musicians of the place, took part in the following programme: —

Concerto in C, for three Pianos, two Violins, Viola, Violoncello and Bass Sebastian Bach.
Salutaris Pecher.
Pieta Signora (Prayer) Stradella.
Homage to Handel, Grand Duo for two Pianos, Moscheles.
Pur Dicoiti Lotti (1690).
Sul Campo Della Gloria, from Belisario Donizetti.
Capriccio Brillant, for Piano, with Quintet Accompaniment Mendelssohn.
Songs: (a) La Violetta, (Romance) Mozart.
(b) O Lac (Meditation) Niedheimer.
Hymn, "I come to Thee for rest!" Otto H. Wenzlawski.
Vocal Duet, "Vieni" Luzzi.
Ave Maria Cherubini.
Rondo Brillant in B, for Piano and Violin F. Schubert.

ORGAN RECITAL. — Mr. Charles H. Morse, Professor of Music at Wellesley College, gave a recital on the great organ of the Boston Music Hall, on Saturday, June 14, with the following programme: —

Pasacaglia in C minor Bach.
Organ Hymn, "Sancta Maria" Whiting.
Benediction Nuptiale Saint-Saëns.
Sonata in D. Op. 42 (Largo e maestoso, Al-legro — Pastorale — Allegro Assai.) Guilmant.
"Air du Dauphin" Roedel-Best.
Andantino from the Symphony, "The Power of Sound" Spohr.
Overture to "Oberon" Weber.

FOREIGN.

M. MASSENET'S "IL RE DI LAHORE." — The following is a portion of an elaborate article in the London Times of June 30: —

"Masset's new opera, the Italian version of which was played for the first time in England at Covent Garden on Saturday night, may be judged from two very different points of view, and the amount of merit granted to it will vary accordingly. If we look in an opera for the emanation of highest dramatic pathos combined with striking originality of melodic invention, and in connection with it of formal development, we most certainly shall be disappointed in Massenet's work. If, on the other hand, we are satisfied with flowing, though not very deep or very new, melodies expressive of the sentiments common to heroes and heroines of the lyrical stage, with admirable musical workmanship aided by gorgeous scenery, — with a work, in short, after the model of the grand operas as established by Meyerbeer and Halévy, the Re di Lahore will command our approval and in parts our admiration. But before speaking in detail of the music it will be necessary to give a brief outline of the story which it serves to illustrate. Nair the heroine, a priestess of Indra, has inspired an unholly passion in Scindia, the all-powerful minister of Alim, King of Lahore, who claims her hand from Timur, the high priest. In the conversation between the two men which ensues it transpires that Scindia suspects Nair of receiving the visits of a stranger in spite of her sacred vows, and when questioned by him, Nair herself confesses her strong but pure love for a youth who, at the sound of the evening prayers, enters the temple nightly through a secret door. Scindia promises secrecy and forgiveness on condition that the girl will follow him as his wife; but this Nair firmly refuses to do, whereat her disappointed lover denounces her to the priests and priestesses, who assemble at the sound of the sacred gong. Death will be her punishment; but before it is inflicted the companion of her guilt must also be discovered, and for that purpose the priestesses intone the evening hymn, at which signal the secret door opens and lets in King Alim himself. The state of affairs is now entirely changed, and Nair from a culprit is converted into a royal bride. Even Timur, the priest, cannot oppose the will of his sovereign, who, to pacify the gods, promises at once to do battle with Mahometan armies invading the kingdom. Thus, among warlike and festive songs, closes the first act, Scindia only vowing secret revenge. In the second act we are in Alim's camp. A battle has been fought, and the King's army is beaten and he himself wounded to death. This opportunity Scindia uses for sowing treason among the fugitive soldiers: who, abandoning their King, proclaim him ruler of Lahore. Only Nair refuses to forsake the unfortunate Alim, and it is not till after his death that by force she is compelled to follow the usurper. In the natural course of things, Il Re di Lahore would now be an opera without a hero and a tenor. But such a contingency had to be avoided at any price, and M. Gallet, the librettist, not satisfied with a single deus ex machina, accordingly introduces a whole system of heavenly machinery. When the curtain rises for the third time we are in the heavenly abode of Indra, the supreme god, who is surrounded by minor deities and the spirits of the blessed. The songs and dances of hours and other celestial maidens enliven the scene, which seems to draw inspiration from the Koran rather than from the Vedas. Alim, whose spirit is soon discovered approaching the throne of Indra, alone refuses to take part in the universal joy. Amid the beauties of Paradise he remembers Nair, and his ardent prayer is to be once again united with her. This prayer Indra grants, and in the fourth act Alim, restored to life, is at Lahore to thwart the designs of the treacherous Scindia, who is just on the point of crowning his success by the possession of the unwilling but powerless Nair. A stormy meeting of the rivals ensues, before the assembled people, and Alim is saved from the wrath of the tyrant by the priests, who give him shelter in the temple of Indra. Here, in the fifth and last act, he has a secret meeting with Nair, but their plans of flight are frustrated by the vigilance of Scindia, who enters the temple followed by his soldiers and threatens Alim with second death. Rather than become the tyrant's wife Nair seeks destruction by her own hand, and, according to Indra's decree, her lover joins her in death. In the final tableau the pair are seen according to the abode of bliss, while the baffled Scindia, according to the English version of the libretto, "regards them with deep emotion, then prostrates himself, hiding his face in his hands." The weakness of this plot from a dramatic point of view is at once apparent. The characters are little more than shadowy conventionalities, the celestial interlude is obviously introduced for the purpose of scenic display alone, and the air of unreality pervading the whole is intensified when the resuscitated Alim appears among the living people in his own form as if nothing had happened, and continues to act and to suffer exactly as he had wont to do. But perhaps it is unfair to judge by the canons of common sense a libretto which contains at least some effective situations and no end of opportunities for celestial and terrestrial marches, pageants, dances, and other attractions of the operatic stage. That on these the success of the work must to a great extent depend, the management at Covent Garden had fully recognized, and nothing more splendid, and, for the greater part, more tasteful, could be imagined than the way in which the piece is put upon the stage. The dresses throughout are gorgeous, and a perfectly dazzling effect of color and light is produced by the scenery and the grouping of dances and figuranti in the third act, where Indra's abode is represented. To sum up, M. Massenet's opera, although not a work of genius proper, is one of more than common merit, and contains all the elements of at least temporary success. The reception it met with augurs well for its immediate future at Covent Garden, a circumstance no doubt largely due to the excellent performance and mise-en-scène."

THE great novelty of the Rhenish Whitsuntide Festival, held this year at Aix-la-Chapelle, was the performance, under the direction of the composer, of Max Bruch's new cantata of The Lay of the Bell. There was a band of 125 and a chorus of 400, so that the cantata was accorded, on the whole, a better chance than it had at its previous performances at Cologne and Berlin. Schiller's fine poem has before now tempted musicians, who have performed their work with more or less success. Zelter, Hurka, Bartels, and Lindpaintner have set The Lay of the Bell to music, the setting by Romberg has long been popular, and Herr Carl Stör of Wiesmar, a few years ago, wrote music intended as an accompaniment to, and in illustration of, the declaimed text of Schiller. Carl Stör's work gained a good deal of success in Germany, and it has also been performed at the popular concerts of Brussels. The Lay of the Bell of Max Bruch is, however, of larger dimensions, and is far more ambitious than its predecessors; while a special point has been made by the division of the poem into recitatives for such parts of it as are didactic and philosophical, and into solos and choruses for such portions as are merely descriptive. The opinions of the German critics as to the effect of this division are by no means unanimous. Some of the critics aver that it gives great variety to the ensemble without detracting from the unity of the work. Others, like the Cologne Popular Gazette, regret that the composer has not treated the declamation in the modern spirit. The paper quoted is, indeed, of the opinion that "the verses of Schiller, which are, according to Moritz Hauptmann, music of themselves, ought not to have been treated with the dryness of the ancient recitative, although it is true that Herr Max Bruch obtains great effects by the contrast which his melodious solos and magnificent choruses afford with these arid recitatives." The work is said to be well scored; but some of the critics aver that it is not remarkable from the point of view of originality, and lacks the grandeur and the power of inspiration with which Schiller's poem is so strongly impregnated. At the Rhenish Festival the chief part was undertaken by the bass, Staudig, who shared the honors with the composer-conductor, Herr Max Bruch. — Boston Courier.

HANDEL IN ITALY. — The first performance in Italy of Handel's oratorio, Israel in Egypt, which took place at Rome on the 30th of May last, is an event of more than ordinary interest in the musical world. The Maestro Mustafa, Director of the Società Musicale Romana, to whom the merit belongs of having been the first to introduce The Messiah to Italian amateurs, has now rendered a similar service to his countrymen with regard to the great choral masterpiece just named; and to judge by the comments made on the occasion in the Roman press, there can be no doubt that he has found an audience fully prepared to appreciate the noble music of the great representative of musical Protestantism. The work was most carefully rehearsed, and its production was looked forward to with the keenest interest by the musical public, the performance being attended by the élite of the artistic and even the fashionable world. The execution is spoken of as highly finished, the well-trained choir consisting of upwards of 100 singers, and the orchestra numbering sixty performers; the solo portions of the work were rendered by the following artists, namely, Signore Alari and Borghi del Puente (soprano), Ricci de Antonis (alto), Signori Cotogni (tenor), Capelloni and Calzanera (bass.) All the Roman journals refer to the event at some length, giving sketches of the composer's career, and expressing the belief that the introduction of Handel's compositions into Italy will mark an epoch in the musical history of the country. As regards the effect produced upon the audience by the performance, the Osservatore Romano remarks as follows: "Every one appeared to be listening with profound attention and reverent wonder to those gigantic choruses, those sweet arias, those imposing fugues with which this classical oratorio of the great German master abounds. At every pause of the performance the universal admiration broke out into long-continued applause, thus doing homage to the celebrated master and bestowing also a well-merited reward upon the Maestro Mustafa, and all those who assisted him in the rendering of the work. Some of the most prominent numbers were re-demanded and had to be repeated." The Italian version of the English words is the joint work of Signori Guido Guidi and Girolamo Caldani. There have been several repetitions since the above first performance, each time before numerous audiences, and the interest taken in the work by the public appears as yet unabated.

MR. ARTHUR SULLIVAN, who has just been created Mus. Bac. by Oxford University, is a very great favorite with the undergraduates of that institution. At the granting of degrees the other day, the chief event was the descent from the upper gallery of an immense pinafore. Then followed from the undergraduates one of the most popular of the Pinafore choruses, which was received with tremendous and general applause, checked, alas! in the bud by a stern proctor.

M. MERMET, author of "Jeanne d'Arc," has, it is said, finished an opera, the words and music of which are both by himself. Its subject is "Bacchus," and its plot deals with the conquest of India by the wine-god: a paraphrase, it has been suggested, of "Drink." The new opera will, however, hardly be of much use to London impresarii, as a leading feature of it is a number of wild beasts. Fancy Signor Fancelli as Bacchus and Madame Nilsson as Hebe singing with the roaring of a lion obligato! — Figaro.

BOSTON, AUGUST 16, 1879.

Entered at the Post Office at Boston as second-class matter.

CONTENTS.

SANZIO. Stuart Sterne	129
THE DEVELOPMENT OF PIANO-FORTE MUSIC, FROM BACH TO SCHUMANN. Carl Van Bruyk	180
MUSICAL INSTRUCTION IN GERMAN SCHOOLS. Dr. W. Langhans	181
TALKS ON ART: SECOND SERIES. FROM INSTRUCTIONS OF MR. WILLIAM M. HUNT TO HIS PUPILS. XI.	133
SINGING CLUBS: REPORT OF THE PRESIDENT OF THE CECILIA	183
THE THEATRICAL "TREMOL" FIEND	184
SCHOOL OF VOCAL ART IN PHILADELPHIA	185
MUSIC IN CHICAGO: SEASON OF 1878-1879	185
MUSICAL CORRESPONDENCE	186
NOTES AND GLIMPSINGS	186

All the articles not credited to other publications were expressly written for this Journal

Published fortnightly by HUGHTON, OSGOOD AND COMPANY, 220 Devonshire Street, Boston. Price, 10 cents a number; $2.50 per year.

For sale in Boston by CARL PRUEFER, 30 West Street, A. WILLIAMS & CO., 283 Washington Street, A. K. LORING, 369 Washington Street, and by the Publishers; in New York by A. BENTANO, JR., 39 Union Square, and HUGHTON, OSGOOD & CO., 21 Astor Place; in Philadelphia by W. H. BOWNE & CO., 1102 Chestnut Street; in Chicago by the CHICAGO MUSIC COMPANY, 512 State Street.

SANZIO.

BY STUART STERNE, AUTHOR OF "ANGELO."

(Continued from page 121.)

The summer still stood in its blaze of full-blown glory, proud, triumphant, and undimmed, but at that point of over-ripeness, when its golden floods no longer rise and swell and forward press with eager, joyous life, but seem to pause satiate, an instant, — rest content to glass and contemplate their own imperial pomp and gorgeous beauty; then insensibly glide on towards russet autumn, till they hang suspended o'er its edge so close, one hour may bring its blight; perchance in one night more all these rich splendors rock to their swift fall. Now often when the day's fierce heat was spent, Sanzio and Benedetta wandered off, bearing along their simple evening meal, to some fair garden, or some breezy hill shaded by spreading trees. "Let Cousin Anna," — He often called her so, and ever glanced at Benedetta with a merry eye, — "Give us our basket," he would cry; "to-day we'll run away from her!"

Thus did she glide in through his door one afternoon, saying, "Come Sanzio mine, 'tis time to go! The sun fast rolls his golden chariot towards the sea, As you have taught me; on these sultry days it is not well that you should toil so hard!" But paused, not finding him before his work, and glancing round perceived him stretched full length upon the lion skin, and fast asleep. Yet was he fairly sleeping? She stole up and softly knelt beside him, fancying she saw the faintest shadow of a smile hover about his lips, and the fine eyelids quiver half imperceptibly. Yet no! He lay and stirred not, resting like a child; His cheek upon one hand, the other arm thrown careless o'er his breast, that rose and fell with quiet, long-drawn breathing. By a touch light as a gentle breeze, she pushed away the soft, brown hair fallen o'er his brow, and sat gazing most earnestly on that well-known, beloved, beauteous face. Was she deceived, — Or did she mark in truth a change in it? A change so subtle, that perhaps no glance save hers had noted it! Had that grave look His brow wore ever, deepened into sadness, — Was there a dim, dark shadow 'neath his eyes, And round his lips a trace of age, a faint untimely line of grief and resignation, — Had all the joyous life and power of youth withered away from him? She could not tell, But suddenly, yet timidly bent down And kissed those grave, sweet lips, — the first time thus All of her own free will and wish. But scarce Had touched them ere she saw, — too late, alas! To speedily now draw back again and fly! — They broke into their wonted, sunny smile, And his eyes opened, while his clasping arms Held her an instant thus, close to his heart. Then with a merry laugh and springing up, He cried, "And so I fooled you, and you came

To waken me so sweetly! Well, I own I had grown weary past my wout with work, And while I waited for your call, dear Love, Had flung myself down here. But come, in truth It is full time to go!" The Saints be thanked! Was Benedetta's fervent, grateful thought, As she looked questioning up into the eyes That brightly smiled an answer to her glance, — Surely I was deceived! Here is no trace Of what I fancied!

They set out, and hastening To leave the streets behind, passed through the gates, And soon gained Sanzio's favorite spot, — a hill Crowned by two mighty oaks, that cast their shade Far down the slope, to where tall olive-trees Mingled the sober silver of their leaves With clumps of bright-green willows, and near by, Upon another hill, a towering pine Reared high its mournful, solitary head Into the smiling heavens.

"Oh this is good!" He cried contentedly, and here again Stretched himself on the ground, — the swelling moss Close to the foot of the great stems. "Dear heart, Sit here and be my pillow for a while, I'm but an idle, lazy boy to-day, And good for naught, you see!" But when once more She gently chid, and said he toiled too hard, He lightly laughed her off.

Thus he lay long, His head upon her lap, and silently Gazed up into the specks of stainless blue That high above shone through the giant crowns, Or at the fleecy cloudlets floating past And melting into air, and when a breeze Stirred in the branches, said, "Hark, Love, I hear The rushing swell of the eternal sea!" Or turned and watched a wandering, lighter breath Kiss Benedetta's faintly tinted cheeks, And blow the wavy hair upon her brow To closer and closer ringlets, and asked smiling, "What does he whisper in your ear, that new Gay lover, hovering round you?" Then at length He hummed a careless tune.

"Oh, sing me that!" It is a pretty song," she cried; "surely The same I heard, yet heard but half, the day I first knocked at your door!" "I sing?" he asked; "Methinks 't were better I should hear your voice!" She shook her head. "I cannot sing," she said. "O Sweet, have I not oft?" — "Nay, Sanzio mine, I can do naught but twitter like a bird, — Sing you, I pray!"

So, leaning on his elbow, He caroled forth in his clear, mellow voice: —

"What were more glorious than the balmy night, Radiant with moon and star?" "The rosy morn, dear heart, whose golden beam Breaks o'er the hills afar!"

"What fairer than the autumn's purple tints, When summer heats are done?" "The spring, whose thousand bursting buds proclaim New life begun!"

"Oh, and what sweeter than old love, that still Brings back in memory's bliss The snowy arms that clasped me, the red lips That once returned my kiss!"

"The hope of new, my soul! — the downcast eye, The gently heaving breast, The blushing cheek, and fitting smile, that say Thou shalt be blest!"

And when he ended and gazed up at her, She said, but with a gathering pensive shade On brow and lips, "The song is fair enough, — And yet so strange! — old love and new, — methinks That love is ever old and ever new!"

"And so you never knew it, — this old love?" He questioned as he fixed upon her face A searching, earnest gaze. "You are well sure No other's image dwelled in this dear heart Ere the glad day when it was given to me?"

"O Sanzio mine, how can you ask!" she cried, And eagerly stretched out her hands to him; But suddenly, ere he could seize on them, Drew back, and asked with drooping head, "And you?"

"My little one," he said with gentlest graveness, — But yet his eye fell, and he ventured not To touch the hands that she had listlessly Clasped in her lap, — "our paths lay far apart! I have been tossed about on many seas, — My heart and life are not so white as yours! Ay, I have loved, — you ask, and would the truth, — Loved, — many others, in the years gone by!"

He turned his face away, and could not see How the swift blood rushed over cheek and brow, Then ebbing slowly, left her white, e'en to The quivering lips. A moment she sat mute, Then asked again in a low, tremulous voice, Yet bent an eager glance on him, "And now?"

"Now," he cried out, "Oh, now and evermore, But you and you alone, my Love, my Saint!" And fervently seized on her garment's hem, To press it to his lips. — "I humbly pray Forgive me, my Madonna, what I sinned Before I knew the sweetness of your service; I swear that I will avenge from it no more!"

She gently shook her head, with but the words, — "Call me not thus, — it is not well! I have Naught to forgive you, Sanzio!" And a pause Then fell between them.

"Little one," he said In lighter tone at length, and looking up, — "Know you that many friends would have me wed, — Plot what they call my happiness? A great And powerful patron, ay, a sainted man, Is pleased to offer me his brother's child. In truth I'm much beholden to His Grace, But fancy this poor bride will have to wait Her bridegroom long!"

She faintly flushed again, But made no answer. Something in this silence Fretted and stung him; he tossed back his hair With an impatient fling, and struck his foot Upon the yielding moss. Then with his cheek Still resting on his hand, he shook his head, And long lay gazing up into her face, With puzzled eyes, and wonder in his soul. Deep down in that young, calmly-throbbing heart, That lay yet dreaming in unruffled peace, Like some still lake beneath unclouded skies, Was there not hid the possibility, The promise, of fierce, toiling, bitter storms? Or would she live and bloom and fade away But like some exquisite, sweetest, half-blown blossom, That never ripened to full flower or fruit, Withering in the fair bud? Who might foretell? She loved him, — ay, he could not question it, And yet even he had surely found no path To reach her soul, quicken and wake in her That slumbering fuller life in all its power! And thinking it he drew unconsciously A heavy sigh.

"Nay, Sanzio mine," she said, "Pray wherefore do you sigh, and shake your head, And look so strangely at me?" And she turned Half shyly from his gaze. But suddenly Her sober eyes lit up. "Oh, see," she cried, "What a most beauteous flower right here below!" And springing up ran half-way down the slope. But in a moment had returned, and now Bore in her hand a shining, full-blown lily That trembled on its slender stem; while he, Seeing her thus amid the sombre trees, Thought of his Saint, who held the dragon bound.

"Ay, this is passing fair, in truth!" he said, Taking the flower that she held out to him, "And what a faint, fine fragrance!"

Sitting near,

She watched him gaze upon it tenderly, And lose himself with far-off, dreamy eyes, Deep in the stainless, golden-hearted cup; Smiling at first; — but gradually the light Faded from lips and eyes, — a shadow crept Across the face that darkened more and more, Until a melancholy, stormy frown Sat on the brooding brow, and the set lips Seemed to shut in a bitter wailing cry. And suddenly he closed his fingers down, And crushed the lily in his palm.

"O Sanzio, — Oh, my sweet flower!" she cried, and would have caught The broken, drooping thing he tossed away. But startled ceased and stayed her outstretched hand, As he with a fierce gesture hid his face, Upon the ground beside him.

"Love, forgive!"

He said then, looking up with calmer brow, And half arising, — "It is better thus! Oh, it is well, believe me, — passing well, For her to perish in her strength and beauty, Untouched, unchilled by withering blight and frost! They whom the gods love die in early youth, Said that old people perished long ago, And they said wisely! Ay, to be cut off" — And as he spoke his voice rose more and more, — "In the first flush of life and love and joy, In all the fullness of unbroken power, In the glad morning while the dew is fresh, — Never to know the burning heat of noon, The shadows of gray eve, the slow decay Of dreary autumn, — never to behold The shining splendors of the world grow dim

And fade below the sky; — never to feel
The chill of disenchantment in the blood,
The weariness of disappointed hope,
The sickness of the soul, when golden fruit
Turns to pale ashes on the parching tongue, —
The thrill of ecstasy, the living glow
(Of thousand sacred fires, fall flat and cold,
The pulses of the blood that once throbb'd high
Sink to the sluggish beat of feeble age, —
But have the sparkling cup dashed from our lips
Ere its intoxication stales and palls,
Ere we can drain it to the bitter lees, —
O gods, that were rare privilege and grace,
And thus to die were to have lived in truth! "

And as imploring those invisible gods,
Or as once more to drink in thirstily
The last full light of day that faded fast,
He turned his face up towards the sinking sun,
With a strange rapture radiant in his eyes.

"And must those shadows come, — to all of us?"
Asked Benedetta, venturing at length
To break the long, deep silence that had fallen
When he concluded.

"So all things proclaim, —
To all of woman born! Ay, and I know,
I feel it here!" and saying it, he pressed
His hand a moment on his heart. "And sometimes" —

"Sometimes?" she questioned eagerly again,
As hesitating he broke off.

"Methinks
Those shadows have begun to fall for me!
Even as the blind can dimly feel the light,
So upon me who see, steals a vague sense
Of coming darkness!"

Yet even while he spoke,
There lingered such a brightness in his face,
That Benedetta, recollecting not
Her fancies as she gazed on his feigned sleep,
Cried out, "O Sanzio mine! Nay, you are like
The proud, rich, golden, ever-joyous summer,
In all its glory, teeming with" — And then Remembering, suddenly paused.

"And you," he said,
And with unutterable tenderness,
Too deep for other fond caresses but this,
As in a silent benediction, laid
His hand upon the head that meekly bowed,
As though receiving it, "you, my Beloved,
Are like the dewy spring, the rosy dawn,
That no fierce noon, no scorching summer sun,
Has ever touched, — within whose purest heart
Lie folded countless, infinite promises
Of fragrant blossoms and sweet songs of birds! —
God keep you thus! God keep you thus forever!"
He once again exclaimed most fervently,
And gazed a moment deep into her eyes.

"But here, my Sanzio," Benedetta said,
And passed her hand, as he withdrew his own,
With a light touch across his brow, "here sits
So strange a look, — grave, deep, and sad, — a shade
I would so gladly banish!"

"Would you, Love?"
He gently asked; "press your dear lips here then,
And mayhap that will help it!"

She leaned over
And softly kissed his brow, but shook her head;
"No, 't is there still," she said, "'t is ever there!"

Then as she glanced across the hills, where now
The red sun hovered like a burning spark
That swiftly vanished, — "Hark, methinks I hear
The vesper-bells sound from the cloister, — ay,
'T is time for evening hymns!" and clasped her hands
In a brief prayer, but soon cried cheerily,
As if to break the spell that hung on him,
"And time for us to have our little feast!
Come, Sanzio mine, you've tasted naught since noon,
And must have need of it!"

And from their store
Gracefully brought him, on a spreading leaf,
A downy, deep-red peach, and a rich cluster
Of swelling, pale-green grapes. "No, not for me,"
He said, and gently put her hand aside,
I cannot, Love, — nay, pray look not so grieved,
There is no cause! But take them you, dear heart,
And that will do me good!"

But yet she too
Scarcely put one golden berry to her lips,
And sad and silent shut the lid again
O'er their untasted feast, but left the fruit
Upon the hill-side in the moss. "Perchance
Some bird or bee were glad," she said, "to find
This banquet spread for them."

Then stealing close
To Sanzio's side, she whispered, "And those others, —
Those that you, — did they love you, even as I?"

"Ay, — even as you, — yet differently," he said,

But looked not up, nor turned his face to hers,
"Better, — and yet I fancy not so well!"

A look of questioning pain passed o'er her brow,
And her lips parted as to speak once more,
But he, like one who thinks aloud, went on, —
"Ah, yes, I bear a weight of grievous sin,
Most humbly I confess it! Yet I know
That unto me too much shall be forgiven,
For I have loved much, — as the Saviour once
Said unto her who loving sinned and fell!
Know that this last great passion of my soul,
Our sweetest, purest love, my Benedetta,
Shall wash my spirit clean of many taints!
Look," he cried suddenly, rising to his feet,
And stretched his arms up towards the wide-spread skies,
Now flooded with a gush of blazing gold, —
"In blinding glory such as this, the Lord
Rose up transfigured from the hill to heaven!"

Silent, for neither spoke, but hand in hand,
They took their homeward way at length; but once
Sanzio said, pointing to the skies again,
Whose radiant flush had faded in gray shadow, —
"Thus passes all the glory of the world!"

(To be continued.)

THE DEVELOPMENT OF PIANO-FORTE MUSIC, FROM BACH TO SCHUMANN.

FROM THE GERMAN OF CARL VAN BRUYCK.

AMONG all the arts, music is the only one whose development into a higher, self-sufficient art (according to the manifestations we so far possess of it), belongs entirely to modern times. This fact of history, as well as the fact that this art has unfolded its highest, richest bloom on German soil, appears significant enough, but is not to be entered into here. What even the most prominent, most comprehensively cultivated people of antiquity, the Greeks, may have possessed (we know very little of it), can in no way be compared with that art, whose first germs developed themselves in the so-called dark medieval times, to grow up, in the course of a few centuries, to that wonderful tree which now, with thousand branches, stands before our astonished gaze, and, like a Christmas tree overshadowing the world, is hung with fruits of every kind.

The many kinds which the totality of this art embraces, when divided according to the reproductive means required to bring its productions into outward manifestation, may be rubricated in three classes: purely vocal, purely instrumental music, and that for whose execution the instrument lent to man by nature (although developed first by culture), must be combined with that invented by him.

Vocal music reached certain high steps of development much earlier than instrumental music, — a phenomenon easily comprehended with a little reflection. Already in the sixteenth century the art of music had climbed up to a summit of perfection, and especially in Italy, where as such it has remained, unreached by later times; other summits formed themselves by the side of that; and there is no question that the art element in later centuries, above all in the German countries, including Austria, has developed itself much more universally and freely; but the outlook one enjoys from that summit is so sublime, so wonderful, that one is glad to return, even from the Dhawalagiris, which have formed themselves later, as well as from the friendly hills and valleys which lie imbedded between them, down the more or less connected mountain chains to that particular one to which he himself belongs.

But in these centuries, — down to the seventeenth, in the beginning of which the proper development of the Opera falls, — music as art stood altogether in the service of the church; as all art development in its beginnings is closely connected with the religious cultus, which in one of them, the so-called plastic art, early bore the most perfect and the ripest fruit. The great composers of the fifteenth, sixteenth, and even most of those of the seventeenth century, had all devoted their artistic activity mainly to the church. In choral song that epoch shows its peculiar grandeur and beauty. The instrumental music produced in those times will not compare in artistic importance with those grandiose, magnificent creations, although they moved within the limits of a narrow style. Instruments, to be sure, were used in various ways even at that time to accompany the choral song, but mostly without any independent significance (even in Handel's oratorios this is small¹), and the coöperation of several instruments in a higher musical art work was yet unknown.

Only when music became more emancipated from the church, only when the solo singing of the drama was developed, did instrumental music first begin to put forth its blossoms, destined in due time to ripen to such astonishing fruits.

One single instrument has a literature of earlier date to show, one which still retains its artistic importance, namely, the organ, which properly is not a single instrument, but rather a true pandemonium of pipe instruments combined into an organic whole. It is natural that in those times the organ, among all instruments, should have maintained the greatest artistic importance; for, inasmuch as art stood mostly in the service of the church, it is readily comprehended that the most cultivation was devoted to that instrument for which the church alone afforded room. The organ, too, as an instrument, had already reached a high degree of development, while the clavier still lay in the swaddling clothes of infancy; the "piano-forte" of to-day was not then even born; and it received its name from the fact that upon it the tone can be produced in all degrees of strength at pleasure, which was utterly impossible upon the old claviers, or "clavecins;" these permitted a crescendo and de-crescendo quite as little as the organ. The organ and clavier (or piano-forte) are the only instruments which suffice by themselves, alone, to bring a complete musical work of art to a complete outward manifestation. Hence their study is the most rewarding, most important, for musical culture, while their literature is by far the richest in an artistic sense.
In the latter respect, to be sure, the clavichord and the more modern piano-forte have far outstripped the organ, — a natural consequence of the whole art development, which (as it happens everywhere and always in the course of time) lost more and more the severe earnestness, the tendency to the solemn and sublime, which characterizes the earlier stages of art, and for which the organ seems to be by far the most appropriate art instrument; a

¹ The writer seems not to have read and weighed what Robert Franz has written about Handel's accompaniments.
— Ed.

natural consequence also of the fact that the piano-forte, after it was once invented and had reached a high development, offered an incomparably wider field of play, admitted of the finest shades of touch, and was available for all modes of expression which the modern art requires; whereas the organ, by its very nature, must remain restricted to a more narrow sphere, the more severe the style in which it is treated, and can never reach the many-sidedness of expression accorded to the piano-forte.

After these introductory remarks, which could not be avoided, I turn now to my special theme, the development of piano-forte music from Sebastian Bach, that grand master of the art, who in himself alone summed up the development of whole centuries, and went immeasurably beyond it, down to Robert Schumann, the most genial representative of the youngest art epoch. This I would characterize in outline, so far as it is practicable within the very narrow limits of a single lecture.

The history of every art shows certain form developments similar to those we recognize in natural history; only that in the former, the process of origination and of resolution passes infinitely more rapidly than in the latter. Certain forms grow up and reach a high point of development; then lose themselves, or resolve themselves into new forms shaped out of the same elements. Within these shifting forms the whole artistic (indeed the whole human) sum and substance of the feelings and ideas of every epoch, — so far as such may be more or less sharply marked off, — comes to expression; but this, the farther art progresses (in an ascending and descending spiral line!), becomes more and more individualized, whereas in the earlier stages the masters of the art show comparatively slight individual differences, just as in the earlier, simpler stages, the human type exhibits less variety. All the earlier art shows a certain hardness, since it is still wrestling with the material; but finally, when this has become entirely soft and ductile, so as to receive all impressions, it melts away in luxurious delicacy. Imagination as well as feeling in the earlier art epochs appears still fettered by the severe labor which the understanding has to perform, and which claims the whole artistic energy, until at last the collective art material has acquired such softness as to render the moulding of forms mere play to the more gifted artist. Now for the first time the imagination develops its full power and becomes the energizing factor in the plastic processes of art, until finally it acquires supreme control, and in its glowing heat melts all the strictness of form, which nevertheless remains the foundation of all genuine art, in its crucible.

(To be continued.)

MUSICAL INSTRUCTION IN GERMAN SCHOOLS.

BY DR. W. LANGHANS (OF BERLIN).

"A SCHOOLMASTER must be able to sing, or I will not look at him." Such are the words of Martin Luther, which, together with many another pithy saying of the reformer respecting the necessity of a musical education for the young, have not been spoken unheeded by his own country. It is true that the present age, with its one-sided bias in favor of the development of the purely mental faculties, has little in common with the enthusiasm with which musical art was cultivated in German schools during the sixteenth century, when a Johann Walther (then capellmeister of Frederick the Wise, and musical coadjutor of Luther in his reform of congregational singing) was enjoined, according to the provisions of the Sächsische Schulordnung, "to devote three hours to musical instruction weekly, as well as two hours to the practice of singing." "Besides which," continues the document referred to, "he shall give instruction three times a week, at his own house, to the singers employed in the choir, and finally, during the weeks preceding Christmas, Easter, and Whitsuntide, he shall practice singing with the boys in the school daily at the hour of noon." Compared with this, the musical instruction included in our modern school-system, amounting as it does to no more than two, or, at the most, three lessons during the week, occupies a somewhat subordinate position, and more especially in the higher class public schools, where purely mental training is gaining from year to year greater predominance. But even there the results obtained by the existing musical instruction bear sufficient evidence of an intelligent appreciation of the art, both on the part of the pupils and their teachers. As an example of this may be quoted the well-known Gymnasium "zum grauen Kloster" at Berlin, an institution which in its scientific activity need not shun comparison with any other German grammar-school, and which at the same time assigns a prominent place to the conscientious cultivation of music. Here, more effectively than in any other of the fourteen similar educational establishments of the capital, the ultimate object of vocal instruction is kept in view, namely, to kindle among all the pupils a sense of appreciation of good, serious music, and to develop as far as possible their susceptibilities of the idiomatic, rhythmical, and harmonic relations of vocal compositions. This desired end is sought to be obtained by theoretical instruction and the practicing of standard vocal pieces by both old and new masters; and the high aims in this direction of the institution in question, and the noble results which it has already achieved under the zealous guidance of its musical instructor, Professor Heinrich Beller-mann, will be sufficiently apparent from the following extract taken from the Annual Report of the Gymnasium.

In the lowest form (Sexta) the rudiments of harmonic and rhythmical proportions are taught in conjunction with musical notation, while scales, solfeggios, chorals, and easy songs (Volkslieder) are practiced in unison and their structure explained, the entire class either singing together at a convenient pitch, or the altos and sopranos alternately. In the next form (Unter-Quinta) the pupils are specially divided into sopranos and altos, with whom chorals, songs, motets, psalms, etc., by different masters (such as Palestrina, Graun, Marcello) are practiced unisono in each division separately. In the two second singing classes proper, easy two-part songs, chorals, and motets are introduced; whereas in the first or choral class compositions for four, five, six, and eight voices, by masters of the sixteenth and following centuries, are being practiced a capella, besides other works written with orchestral accompaniments, especially the choruses from Handel's oratorios, which never fail to exercise a stimulating influence upon the pupils. But the principal portion of our time remains devoted to a capella singing, so that every singing lesson in which the full chorus is assembled is at least commenced by a four or five-part choral, or a motet written in the severer style. The only instruction book in use is Beller-mann's "Anfangsgründe der Musik für den ersten Singunterricht auf Gymnasien und Realschulen" (seventh edition), which is intended for the younger pupils only, as a brief guide in their study of the elementary part of the art, and which contains moreover a number of simple solfeggios and hymn-tunes. The music in use at the Gymnasium is either printed or copied out in separate vocal parts, it not being considered advisable to adopt the compressed score, or rather piano-forte arrangements, given in nearly all the collections of songs and chorals published expressly for school purposes, and by which the clear perception of the melody to be sung by him is unnecessarily rendered more difficult to the pupil.

But neither the excellent method alone, nor the ability of the teachers (Professor Beller-mann being assisted in the vocal instruction by another of the staff of masters, Dr. Müller), nor the seventeen hours of teaching during the week, can sufficiently explain the extraordinary success attending the vocal study at the Gymnasium "zum grauen Kloster;" its ultimate reason must be looked for rather in the older artistic traditions associated with this institution, which exercise a direct influence upon all connected with it, including even those who have no immediate sympathy with the cause. For it cannot, unfortunately, be denied that the majority of leading pedagogues in this country, trained as they are in the dominant utilitarian principles of the age, occupy an indifferent and even hostile position with regard to art-instruction in schools, to the development of which many obstacles are, as a matter of fact, though not avowedly, presented on their part. It is owing to this opposition that, with the exception of the institution referred to, scarcely one of the Berlin State grammar-schools may be said to produce such satisfactory results, vocally, as the ability and zeal of the respective teachers — without exception professional musicians of eminence — would entitle us to expect. On the other hand, a better chance of success is offered wherever the singing-master also takes part in other branches of instruction which are considered more important by the ruling caste of philologists, a combination which is, however, met with in smaller towns only where there is a want of able resident professors. Thus at Torgau, a town of some 10,000 inhabitants, Dr. Otto Taubert, professor of ancient languages, and at the same time vocal instructor of the local Gymnasium, has succeeded in forming a choir among his pupils scarcely inferior to that of the "graue Kloster" of Berlin, and the occasional special performances of which invariably attract a numerous audience, including visitors from the larger neighboring towns. It is owing to the exertions of this in many ways gifted teacher that the ancient musical glory of Torgau has gained fresh lustre in our day; for it was here where the spirit of Protestantism found its earliest musical expression in the founding of the first municipal "Cantorei-Gesellschaft" (1530), and where, a hundred years later (1627), the then novel art-form but lately discovered in Italy — namely, modern Opera — was first introduced upon German ground by the production at the Court of the Elector, Johann Georg I., of the Opera "Daphne," fashioned after the Italian model, with the text written by Opitz and the music by Schütz.

The present flourishing condition of singing at the Torgau Gymnasium proves at least this, that the twofold capacity of a teacher placed as it were between art and science, anomalous though such a position be in this age of specialism, is nevertheless not without its distinct advantages, inasmuch as it invests the singing-master at a school with an authority which, but for his double voice in the council of professors, he would not otherwise possess, and which enables him to resist the elements adverse to his cause existing among the general teaching body. And this leads us to the middle and lower class schools, the "Real" and "Volksschulen," of which the former in some cases, particularly in the larger towns, possess a specially appointed singing-master, while the latter have to shift without. If nevertheless the condition of school-singing is comparatively and on the whole more satisfactory in these than in the higher-class establishments, the reason must be sought for in the fact that the state, which regards art-instruction at the Gymnasia with perfect unconcern, exercises a direct influence upon vocal development in the Volksschule by exacting a certain degree of musical capacity on the part of its teachers as a condition of their appointment. All teachers of elementary schools (Volksschulen) emanate, it should be added, from Government training colleges or seminaries, in which music is taught as an obligatory branch of instruction, embracing not singing only, but also piano-forte, organ, and violin playing, as well as theoretical instruction, comprising harmony, simple counterpoint, and the elements of composition. Not that the future teacher of the Volksschule is expected to impart all his musical knowledge to his pupils; these are merely taught to sing; and as regards the theory of the art it is considered sufficient to make them acquainted with the notes, the intervals, and the rhythmical division. But the musical proficiency obtained in the seminary will not fail to prove of considerable service to the elementary teacher in another direction. A certain familiarity with piano-forte and organ enables him to combine, in the smallest places or in villages, the office of organist with that of schoolmaster. His violin, on the other hand, is of the utmost importance to him in his singing lessons, where the aid of some instrument is indispensable, while in most instances it is difficult to procure a piano-forte—to say nothing of the additional advantage over the latter instrument possessed by the violin in its capacity to produce absolutely true musical intervals, which the mechanism of the keyed instrument is incapable of, and the playing of which, moreover, necessitates the teacher's remaining in one place during the lesson, while with violin in hand he is able to move about the school-room and thus more easily to maintain discipline among the pupils. Taking into consideration, together with the above facts, the circumstance that the obligatory attendance at singing lessons, prescribed by the state on principle for all schools alike, is far more rigorously enforced in the Volksschule than in the Gymnasium, we need not be surprised if, as already stated, the results of the teaching are on the whole more satisfactory at the former branches of our system than at the latter. It should not be overlooked, however, that it is also far more practicable to insist upon the vocal instruction of all pupils in the Volksschule, seeing that compulsory education is only extended to the completion of the age of fourteen, i. e., before the period of the mutation of the voice has commenced, which in the case of the scholars at the Gymnasium causes frequent interruptions of vocal study. Thus in the humblest village-school songs for two voices may constantly be heard, while not unfrequently also three and four-part Lieder will be correctly rendered by the children. In this respect Berlin again takes the lead, where in 105 schools more than 80,000 children are being instructed at the expense of Government. Respecting the musical influence of these schools a striking exhibition was presented last year to the public of the capital, on the occasion of the inauguration of the hundredth local elementary school. Among the festive proceedings in connection with the event was included a musical performance instituted and conducted by Rector Th. Krause, one of the few pedagogues who have to the fullest extent acted upon the maxim laid down by Martin Luther which we have placed at the commencement of this article. The performance referred to consisted of the rendering, on the part of 1,200 pupils and 300 of their teachers, of a psalm composed by the conductor, and executed with the utmost purity and precision. The occurrence has attracted public attention to the great merit of Rector Krause, whose exceptional capacity as a musical pedagogue is more-over well known, and the desire is very generally expressed that he should be raised from his position as director of the leading Volksschule of Berlin to an office which would afford adequate scope for the exercise of his eminent talents.

Such an office, however, would have to be specially created, since it does not yet, unfortunately, exist in Germany, namely, that of a "General Inspector of School-Singing." A certain control is indeed exercised by the Government over musical instruction in public schools, in the first place by the School Council (Schulrath), among the members of which one at least invariably possesses a sound musical knowledge, and, in the next instance, by the musical instructors of the training colleges who have passed the state examination, and upon whom also devolves the duty of periodically visiting their respective provinces for the purpose of inquiry into the condition of school-singing and reporting thereon to the Government. The latter, moreover, possesses an additional guarantee for the proper carrying out of the existing regulations in favor of vocal instruction at schools in the so-called "Institut für Kirchenmusik." This institution, founded in the year 1822, and connected with the Royal Academy of Arts, has for its object to convey such additional musical instruction to organists, cantors, and other professional musicians, as would enable them to take positions at the higher educational establishments of the country, special preference being given to pupils at the seminaries who have shown manifest talent for the art, and to whom an opportunity is thereby afforded for its more extensive cultivation. Thus the tendency of the institution in question is one of almost ideal excellence; but the sphere of its activity is unfortunately limited to insignificant proportions as long as the subsidy derived by it from the state amounts, as it actually does, to no more than about 9,600 marks (not quite £500), the professors giving their services gratis. In spite, however, of its pecuniary restrictions, upwards of ninety cantors and organists have during the past ten years reaped the benefits offered by the institution; and the great merits of its zealous director, Professor Haupt, have met with at least an indirect recognition on the part of the Conservatoires of Vienna and Prague, who, in the reorganization of their respective organ-schools, have adopted the institution conducted by him as a model. Considering, then, that the above-mentioned insignificant sum, together with the moderate salaries paid to the musical teachers at the government seminaries (2,400 to 3,000 marks, besides free residence, their number being 121), make up the sum total of the direct state grants for the purpose of vocal instruction at schools, it seems not unreasonable to anticipate a further extension of government subsidies for the appointment of well-paid inspectors of this branch of national education, whose first duty it would be to remove the manifold defects in the prevailing system, with which the existing supervision has proved itself unable to cope, and to prepare the way for the adoption of a universal method of vocal teaching in German schools (so constantly insisted upon at the periodical meetings of the General Association of German Musicians), which would serve as guidance alike to the teachers of the Volksschule and to the directors of the military choirs established throughout the entire German army. This question, though not as yet taken up by the state, has at least advanced a step nearer to its solution by the recent publication of a work entitled "Tafeln für den Schulgesang-Unterricht" (Tables for Vocal Instruction at Schools), by the Berlin organist Hermann Hauer, the excellence of which for practical purposes may be inferred from the fact that it has already been introduced into 400 schools. Nor have the members of the General Association of German Musicians, nothing daunted by the all but indifferent attitude of the Government, been remiss of late in their zealous advocacy of the cause of reform of school-singing; and it is only a few weeks ago that a pamphlet was issued, at the expense of the Association, from the pen of Albert Tottmann (the leader of the reformatory movement in this direction in Saxony), pointing out in an able and eloquent manner the importance of this branch of popular instruction in its hygienic, psychological, and ethical aspects. The suggestions contained in this pamphlet demand the greater attention, since they are the result, not of abstract theoretical speculation, but of an extensive practical experience, the author having been for years the highly successful vocal professor at one of the leading girls' schools of Leipzig, the periodical musical performances of which bear witness to his great ability as a teacher of singing. His example, in fact, as well as the no less successful activity of Musik-director Alexis Holländer, of the Victoria Girls' School at Berlin, furnish moreover sufficient evidence of the capacity of female youth, provided it be ably instructed, to vie with the male in the production of valuable artistic results.

The southern states of the Empire, though more productive in musical talent than the North, have as yet remained considerably behind the latter in matters of organization and general practical results as regards vocal instruction in schools. Much activity has, however, been displayed of late years, especially in Bavaria, with a view to a general reform of school-singing. In this respect valuable service has been rendered by F. Grell, of Munich, whose admirable collection of Volkslieder was introduced some nine years ago into all Bavarian Government schools. At Munich, obligatory vocal instruction at the elementary schools has only been adopted since 1869. Before that period, however, there existed at every school a so-called "central singing class," which all the pupils were enabled to join upon a small extra payment. Although obligatory singing lessons have now rendered the majority of these institutions superfluous, there still exists at Munich a "Central-Singschule," founded more than fifty years ago, where children from all parts of the town may receive vocal training. At the annual public examinations of this establishment choral compositions for four and more voices by the best masters are sung (with the assistance of the choristers from the Opera for the tenor and bass parts), and the general excellence of the performances furnishes unmistakable evidence of the earnestness and zeal with which the vocal study is conducted. Similar results are to be expected of the Bavarian elementary schools, where Grell's method of teaching, already adopted in principle by the Government, is gradually becoming more generally introduced. This method has much in common with that of the vocal instructor of the Berlin Gymnasium, "zum grauen Kloster," H. Bellermann, of whom mention has already been made. Grell's system insists upon combining instruction in speaking with the singing lesson during the first years of study. The healthy development of the vocal organs being moreover essential for the successful cultivation of the oratorical faculties, singing is to be taught as an art, that is, according to scientific principles, particularly as regards the formation of the voice, the pronunciation of the vowels and consonants, etc.; and this cannot fail to prove, in its turn, a most valuable aid to the pupil in his reading lessons, while facilitating also his study of orthography. Not till after the third or fourth school-year is the pupil allowed to sing from notes, the subsequent course of musical instruction being dependent upon the number of lessons placed at the disposal of the teacher during the week; but, according to Grell's opinion, vocal instruction at the elementary schools should be confined to two-part or at the most three-part singing. A vocal instruction-book from the pen of this excellent musical professor, and wherein his method is more fully expounded, will be published during the present year.

The foregoing observations may suffice to complete our sketch of the condition of musical or more especially vocal instruction in German schools. That the existing organization is, on the whole, a satisfactory one will scarcely be denied. But this well-developed organism lacks as yet a central motive power, and will continue to do so as long as the state fails to recognize the perfect equality of music with purely mental culture as a means of education—above all at the Gymnasias or state grammar-schools, from whence a newly awakened art-appreciation would naturally spread to the elementary schools also. If, therefore, the authorities can be brought to perceive the necessity of elevating the musical faculty at state establishments to the position indicated, or of the preliminary introduction at least of a universal system of vocal teaching under the supervision of able, professionally trained inspectors, Germany will doubtless continue to maintain the great reputation in matters musical which she enjoys outside her boundaries. If not, our neighbors will anticipate us in the adoption of these essential national measures, and will ere long have superseded us in the matter of school-singing. For every nation represents in itself the general type of humanity, upon which—apart, of course, from individual distinctions—the Creator has bestowed his gifts with an impartial hand. And if by chance one of the civilizing nations has remained behind in the development of this or that element of human culture, the reason must be sought for, not indeed in the want of natural ability, but rather in unfavorable outward circumstances. All that is needed, then, is the determination to remove these obstacles and to choose the proper remedies, and it will follow as a matter of course that what has hitherto been neglected will speedily grow into healthy existence; and the results thus obtained will not compare unfavorably with the best achievements of any other nation.—London Musical Times.

TALKS ON ART.—SECOND SERIES.¹

FROM INSTRUCTIONS OF MR. WILLIAM M. HUNT TO HIS PUPILS.

XI.

WE are so delighted with the idea of Equality in this country that we try to subject Art to it. We try to teach everybody just the same thing. If something grows up above the common, we find it out at once and promptly smash it. Our motto ought to be Equality and Imbecility.

¹ Copyright, 1879, by Helen M. Knowlton.

People look at pictures, not to enjoy them, but to find out something clever to say about them. They roll up a great ball of opinions, like a boy's snow-ball, and there is nothing accomplished in it. It is about something, but it is nothing. And everybody admires them on that account.

"Then you think that people's ideas are more liberal in Europe?"

Yes, about Art. When I was a boy of nineteen I sent my picture to the Salon. They took it and hung it well, and the older artists said, "Bravo! you're going on well!" That kind of thing does n't happen here. They really love Art there for itself. But here, although there's plenty of ambition, there's little love. If Paganini were to appear, people would listen to him with their mouths open for a few days, and then not care to hear any more. But request him to give their children some lessons! And when the girls had learned to hold the bow in the right hand and bend the elbow, they would think they knew as much as he.

People like better to be first than second. Have you ever noticed how the wild-geese fly? The leader is always some way ahead. He feels it proper to keep the others at a little distance. And there are plenty of people like him in this country. But they are more apt to be cold in their backs than in front. They can't have too many warm friends behind, but they don't want anybody before them.

What are called weaknesses are often helps to character. Strength, without any weakness at all, is too hard; as hard as diamond or steel. And you don't make an impression with mere hard force. That smashes a hole, which is not what you want.

I believe that the natures of animals, tigers, monkeys, and all, come together in man.

I believe in production, in doers and doing. The poverty of to-day comes from the fact that people leave producing and go to cheating each other. All the result of production is invested in locomotives and in telegraphs. To get them, money is taken from the people and put into the pockets of the corporations.

Taine suggests; Ruskin dogmatizes. Taine does n't pretend to give receipts. The cook-books are full of receipts for making bread, but not one woman in a thousand can make good bread.

"Rousseau's idea of finish!" He had a receipt for it, but he spoilt his whole existence by using that kind of finish. The definition is good, but the picture is spoilt.

It don't take many of Ruskin's "added truths" to make a lie.

Keep all that you feel for your work.

Remember why.

A bird is finished when he can fly.

Memory-sketch every day.

Don't put in too much detail! What's that stuff they put into scalloped oysters?

"Mace?"

Yes, mace. Detail is like that.

It took Coleridge to teach Allston, with his gentle nature, that real criticism should be the judging of a work by its qualities, and not by its faults.

If there's such a thing as Eternity, there's such a thing as Inspiration.

Dwight's Journal of Music.

SATURDAY, AUGUST 16, 1879.

SINGING CLUBS: REPORT OF THE PRESIDENT OF THE CECILIA.

THE numerous choral and part-song clubs which have sprung up within a few years have become an important phase of the musical activity, and we may say musical culture,—at all events here in Boston. The earliest and simplest organizations of the kind were little social knots of singers, who contented themselves with English glees, and found great delight in Callcott, Bishop, and the several generations of such clever writers. Then it became not uncommon for small circles to meet at one another's houses for the practice of the Mass compositions of Haydn and Mozart; lovers of religious music naturally seeking some such means of escape from the dry, humdrum monotony of the old psalm tune—a type multiplied in infinitum by the money-seeking makers of continually new "collections;" for at that time the German chorale, with the wonderful harmony of Bach and others, had not begun to be known here. Then came the part-song clubs, at first confined to our German fellow-citizens, who, under the general names of Liedertafeln, Männerchöre, Männergesangsvereine, or more special titles, such as Orpheus, Arion, etc., made us acquainted with the many beautiful German part-songs,—above all those by Mendelssohn and Weber,—and who sang them with such fervor that all caught the spirit, and the English glees went out of fashion.

No doubt much love of vocal harmony was kindled and spread far and wide by these clubs of German part-song singers. But with persons of refined musical taste the charm of this, too, soon began to pall. In the first place, the four-part harmony of mere male voices of itself was sure to grow monotonous after the first hour of listening, and then the crowding of mere tenor and bass parts within such narrow compass reduced the range of possible variety of composition within such limits that the type became virtually exhausted; within the few ever recurring forms of sentimental love songs, spring songs, war songs, etc., all began to sound alike. With the combination of male and female voices, with the choir of "mixed" voices, the range became incalculably wider, and the repertoire of interesting and inspiring choral music, representing all the individuality of the masters of real creative genius, was not likely to run short.

Now choral societies of mixed voices are the order of the day, and those which have taken the lead among us, like the Cecilia, the Boylston Club, and others that might be named, are unmistakably a great help to the cause of music in an artistic sense. They are strong enough in numbers, and yet sufficiently select in quality of voices, sensitiveness of ear and faculty of reading at sight, to make it possible to bring out really important works by the best masters, and to do them justice. Such things as Schumann's Paradise and the Peri, or his Manfred and Faust scenes, Mendelssohn's Walpurgis Night and Midsummer Night's Dream, Handel's L'Allegro ed Il Pensieroso, even the Cantatas of Sebastian Bach, the Masses of Palestrina, are but a few of the great works which may be done and have been done in this way. These clubs also, by the nature of their organization, contain a certain guaranty of disinterestedness in what they do for art; they make not merchandise of art; there is no speculating impresario to dictate what they shall or shall not sing; they do not sell tickets, they sing to invited audiences and in a friendly atmosphere; their treasury is kept full by subscribing "associate members," and sympathizing volunteers and backers, who delight to "assist" at concerts and rehearsals.

One important element, however, for a long time was wanting to the completeness of such performances, and that was the orchestra. Such works as we have above named do not convey the intention of the composer without that; the orchestral accompaniment is part and parcel of the work, nay, is of the very soul and spirit of the work, with such masters, just as much as the voice parts. In some of the club performances of the last two years this want has been tolerably well supplied, and those singers who once complained of not being able to hear their own voices behind the mass of instruments, have become gradually but surely converted to a faith in orchestral accompaniment. In one or two instances a work has been given first with orchestra with triumphant effect, and then repeated (on grounds of economy) with nothing but piano-forte accompaniment, and the second performance fell so flat that everybody felt that the orchestra must be a sine qua non from this time forward.

Fortunate is the club which has such wise management and guidance, especially such a president, in these questions of selection and performance, as the Cecilia, which has now completed its third year. The annual report of its president, Mr. S. Lothrop Thorndike, made at the annual meeting in June last, is so full of good suggestions, worthy of the thoughtful consideration of all vocal clubs, that we cannot forbear presenting the entire document to our readers. Particularly must we commend all that he says about orchestral accompaniment, and about the importance of the study of the vocal works of Bach and Handel.

For the third time, contrary to my expectation of last year, I have the honor to present, as President of the Cecilia, the annual report of its affairs.

The active membership has been somewhat larger than in previous years, and the attendance more satisfactory. Few resignations have occurred, and few dismissals for lack of attendance or other causes. The vacancies have been readily filled from the large number of applicants for admission.

The rules regarding constancy and punctuality have been, in accordance with my recommendation of last year, more strictly enforced than before, and the result is very encouraging.

The Club has given six public performances. One programme was presented November 25 and repeated November 29; a second February 7, repeated February 10; a third April 21 without repetition; and a fourth May 8.

In our selections we have followed the course indicated in my last report, and have in the main carried it out. One or two works there mentioned have, it is true, necessarily lain over for another year. Art is long, and time (at least the time of the average concert season) very short indeed.

For our first pair of concerts, given with piano accompaniment, we had an attractive programme, comprising Rheinberger's "Toggenburg" ballad, for the first time in America; a chorus from Liszt's "Prometheus;" a march and chorus from Beethoven's "Ruins of Athens;" a quiet and beautiful part-song, by Hiller; one of the Bristol prize-madrigals, in which Mr. Lealie has followed so well the spirit and form of the old madrigalists; four of the Italian canons of Hauptmann, the same which gave so much pleasure two years ago at the Harvard Concerts; Mendelssohn's song, "By Celia's Arbor;" and two piano pieces by way of overtures, — one being an eight-hand arrangement of the Allegro of Mendelssohn's Italian Symphony, and the other "Les Contrastes" of Moscheles. Tempting as this programme was in promise, in performance it was somehow a disappointment. Much pains had been taken to make it varied and interesting in selection and arrangement. The music had been carefully rehearsed, and was well conducted and sung. The piano pieces were given with great life and effect. Still it is to be feared that both singers and audience felt the evening, as a whole, to be dull and spiritless. The reason is hard to find. One critic suggests that the laudable effort for variety had been a little too obliging. But variety can hardly be overdone where all the components are good and well combined and contrasted, and the quantity not excessive. Another says that the concert needed an orchestra. But none of the vocal pieces were written for an orchestra except the Liszt and Beethoven numbers. So we must fall back upon atmospheric influences, and conclude that the moment was, for some unknown cause, inauspicious. This reflection is the familiar consolation when the best-laid plans go astray, — an experience which often occurs to persons who try to entertain their fellow-mortals, whether by a concert, a ball, or a dinner.

Our second pair of concerts contained but two numbers, each of them of the best: a half of Bach's "Ich hatte viel Bekümmernisse," and the whole of Gade's "Crusaders." For an account of the first performance of this programme with orchestra, the excellence of the choral and orchestral work, and the admirable singing of Mrs. Adams and Mrs. Noyes in the first piece and Miss Gage in the second, with Dr. Langmaid and Dr. Bullard in both, I must refer you to the local critics, the ablest of whom pronounced this the Cecilia's finest concert thus far, in the course of its three seasons. The repetition had to be given, on the score of expense, with accompaniment of piano and organ, and the contrast with the previous evening was depressing, — another occasion to point the moral that it will not answer to divorce works wedded to instruments from their lawful alliance, and a hopeful sign, in that the violence done was felt by every one in the hall.

Of the third programme (the fifth performance of the season), the first half consisted of twenty-one numbers from Handel's "L'Allegro ed il Penseroso," which were sung, says a pleasant newspaper criticism, "in a way to show the fascinating composition in so favorable a light that none save the most inveterate Handel-hater could have listened to it uncharmed." Handel's orchestral score was, of course, reinforced by Robert Franz's additional accompaniments. For the solos we were indebted to Miss Mary A. Turner, one of the best pupils of Madame Rudersdorff, and to Mr. George L. Osgood, so identified with the cause of good music in Boston, and with the production of this particular work on both sides of the water. In the second part of the concert Miss Welsh repeated, with female chorus, her capital rendering of Rubinstein's "Nixie," this time with its exquisite orchestration; Mr. Wilkie sang "Il mio tesoro" most creditably, and the Club sang the new prize glee, "Humpty-Dumpty," and Gade's lovely "Spring-greeting."

The fourth programme (the sixth performance of the season) presented the entire musical setting by Mendelssohn of Shakespeare's "Midsummer-Night's Dream," the play itself being read by Mr. George Riddle, the Harvard teacher of elocution. It was scarcely a performance by the Cecilia as a Club; but, if we may believe the unanimous voice of our associates and invited guests, it was one of the most charming entertainments which could possibly be offered. The orchestra, under Mr. Lang's able lead, gave their numbers better than they have ever been given in Boston, the solos by Mrs. Hooper and Miss Gage and the fairy choruses were admirably sung, and Mr. Riddle's reading, in all the various phases of the text, — heroic and sentimental, elfin and comic, — showed him a master of his profession. His sympathy with and adaption to his musical accompaniment were especially noteworthy. And so our third season ended joyously and delightfully, leaving us, I am sure, encouraged and inspired for our future work.

Pardon me a word or two upon a subject which I have already mentioned in previous reports. We have given during the season music by both Bach and Handel. Many of us have doubtless been obliged to justify this course in answer to the inquiries of our friends. The answer is and must be always the same. We sing this music because of its intrinsic worth, — a worth which sounds through and above the figures and fashions in which it is dressed. The figures in vogue in the day of Bach and Handel are strange to us now. The fashion of the dress is past. Perhaps — who can tell? — some day it may come up again. But whether it returns or not, the music which underlies it must always have its word to say to him who has ears to hear. Garrick, a century ago, used to play Hamlet in a laced coat, knee-breeches, and full-bottomed wig; but beneath the formal clothes and wig was still the Hamlet of Shakespeare.

And it is no longer necessary to speak quite so apologetically as awhile ago in defense of this old music. It finds a growing interest among performers and listeners. Music-lovers, not only in Germany, but in England and America, are devoting to it labor and zeal. Mr. Henry Leslie's choir constantly sings cantatas by Handel and Bach. A Bach choir of amateurs was formed three years ago in London, which sings Handel and Palestrina as well. And here in Boston the Boylston Club, among its many notable good deeds of the past year, has responded to an imperative demand for a repetition of Palestrina's beautiful Requiem, and the Handel and Haydn Society has drawn together an immense audience, which sat through a long afternoon and evening, all attentive and many spell-bound, under the immortal strains of the Matthew-Passion of Sebastian Bach. All this is significant of a real awakening interest; for our people do not go to concerts in a spirit of antiquarian curiosity, but to be delighted and edified by that which appeals to the living tastes and sympathies of the present. It shows that these old composers belong to what Carlyle, in the best definition of a classic ever given, calls "that select number whose works belong not wholly to any age or nation, but who, having instructed their own contemporaries, are claimed as instructors by the great family of mankind, and set apart for many centuries from the common oblivion which soon overtakes the mass of authors, as it does the mass of other men."

I cannot forget, when venturing to pass judgment upon the musical work of ourselves or of others, that I am only an amateur speaking to amateurs. My criticisms may seem crude and inadequate to those whose very life is music.

They may ask what this man can know of the real merits of the questions upon which he presumes to speak. So, perhaps, to such as these, the whole study and performance of a club like ours seems as to us the singing of the public-school children or of a country choir. Let us therefore be modest, and submit ourselves to our spiritual pastors and masters as implicitly as we may. It is good for us to be worshipers even in the outer courts of the temple, and to catch broken glimpses of the mysteries that are passing within. For most, if not all, of us music must be a small part of our weekly occupation. We are busy in our shops or offices or factories or farms. Our life is spent not so much in living as getting means to live. But every man who has any aspirations above the mere drudgery of the world manages to find time in every week for a life somewhat truer and higher than his bread-and-butter earning existence, — one in his books, another in his pictures, another in his church, another in his garden. And it augurs well for the musical progress of the age that so many men and women, and more every year, find satisfaction and delight in devoting the leisure they have won and the culture they have acquired to the pursuit of music, not as an amusement but as an art. We do not hope or expect to become artists; but we do hope and expect to grow day by day in taste, appreciation, and musical feeling.

The Treasurer's report is most satisfactory, and shows the Club still in good financial condition. But the report is a sad one to receive, for he who should have presented it has left us. When our season was nearly over, — but a few weeks ago, — Thomas Franklin Reed set out upon a short voyage in search of health. He found, instead, his death two weeks after landing at Para. Associated with this Club from its commencement, associated with many of us for a much longer period in pursuits of business, or art, or social life; commanding the respect of every one by his fidelity to duty and his executive ability; winning the love of all who knew him by his genial and affectionate nature, — he has left a void not easy to fill.

In accordance with usage, I have to submit at this meeting any suggestions for the future. We shall, of course, follow the same general plan as heretofore, giving as great a number and variety of things, both new and old, as our time and means will allow. We have in our library, untouched, or scarcely touched, the Faust and the Manfred of Schumann, one of the shorter cantatas of Bach, and many part-songs, madrigals, etc. We have also under consideration the Odyseus of Max Bruch, and a repetition of his "Fair Ellen." The detail of the coming season can hardly be stated now, but must be left for future announcement. One point, nevertheless, must be decided speedily. The experience of two years has confirmed us, both active and associate members, in the belief, alluded to in this and previous reports, of the constant, or at least frequent, necessity of an orchestra. An orchestra costs a great deal of money. Shall we meet the demand by raising our assessments, or shall we give admission to a greater number of associate members, and let each member be content with a somewhat smaller number of tickets than during the last two years? This subject I submit to your careful consideration.

In conclusion, I beg to express to you my sincere thanks for the constant support and kindness shown me during my three terms of office, my best wishes for the continued success of the Club, and my full belief that it has before it a long career of usefulness and honor.

THE THEATRICAL "TREMOLLO" FIEND.

IN speaking, in our last number, of the bore of having to hear so much irrelevant music between the acts of plays in all our theatres, we forgot to mention a still worse infliction, which has grown into a theatrical custom of late years, namely, the uneasy interference of the orchestra all through the play. A year ago we alluded to this vicious, vulgar, unartistic practice, in about the following terms: —

This modern way, particularly in harrowing sensational dramas, though it is no longer confined to these, of setting up a nervous tremolo pianissimo accompaniment in the strings at every entrance of a dark or mysterious personage, or at the approach of any critical moment, or throughout a very sentimental and pathetic scene or passage, is simply an abomination and a nuisance. It is a vulgar trick of effect, reducing tragedy and comedy alike to cheap melodrama. It is not really music; it is only a senseless irritation of the nerves, intolerable to any sensitive and refined listener, be he musical or not. Why do they do so? What good end is gained by it? Does it make the tragedy more tragical? the villain of the plot more terrible? the meeting or the parting, however fateful, of the lovers, more heart-rending? No; it only tempts you to exclaim, like Othello: Silence, those dreadful violins! This pestilent accompaniment, this quivering, quaking undertone of nervous dread or mystery, this hysterical tittering tremolo of strings, so utterly uncalled for, only robs the scene of any semblance of reality. If the scene be one to thrill and make us shudder, we don't want the shuddering done for us in the orchestra! And while we fight that off and shrink from it, as from the hum of persecuting insects, our sympathies are withdrawn from the play itself. It is as if the people in the pit or gallery should begin to sing, and hum, and whistle; until it is suppressed, you only think of that annoyance, and not of what is passing on the stage. Why strive to turn the play into a quasi opera, a thing neither fish, flesh, nor fowl? All these cheap arts of heightening the effect, only enfeeble it, and vulgarize the whole performance. We do not wish to be told when we must thrill with awe, when we must tremble with expectation. These signals are officious and impertinent. If the play itself be not "the thing to catch the conscience of the king," will your cheap advertising dodge of "tremolo" be apt to do it?

—In the opera, of course, the case is different. There music is the chief element of expression; there music is principal, and employs all its means of voices and of instruments to prepare the hearer's mind, and to intensify expression. But this vague, creeping tremolo, these whispered indefinite hints of melody, — mere pale ghosts of music, — really express nothing; nor can we imagine any feeling, any state of mind which they can fitly accompany, unless it may be, possibly, the so-called "stage fright" of young, nervous actors, unaccustomed to the foot-lights.

These soft volunteer accompaniments seem to be a sort of impromptu burlesque Wagnerism; they treat you ad nauseam to ever recurring "Leit-motiven," though of a most impalpable and flimsy texture. We fancy the great Richard would hardly care to see himself so caricatured, his crack invention so abused.

But after all it is a fashion, and, like all fashions, it will pass away. We do not know to what length it has been carried, or whether even Shakespeare is still held sacred. So far as our own limited experience goes, we do not remember to have encountered this tremolo fiend in the murder scene in Macbeth, or where Banquo's ghost rises, or lurking behind the ghost in Hamlet. But the tendency at present seems to be all that way. Heaven save us from the fiend!

SCHOOL OF VOCAL ART IN PHILADELPHIA.

—Mme. Emma Seiler, to whose zeal and energy this now flourishing institution — almost a College of Music in itself — owes its origin and its success, writes us at the end of its fourth year as follows: —

"For the first time we had a graduating class of pupils who had passed through the full course of four years, as the school has existed only since 1875. Some of the graduates already have positions in academies in other cities as singing teachers, some will be retained in the school as such, while others of them prefer to remain longer and to go on farther with their studies.

"The number of the pupils this year was again larger than in the previous year, showing an increasing interest in the school on the part of the public.

"During the last year there was added to the other branches of musical studies a class for the Rudiments of Music and Sight-Reading; also an orchestra was formed and taught for the purpose of affording pupils a chance to practice singing in operas and oratorios with orchestral accompaniment. For the next season classes for all instruments have been arranged, and advanced pupils will have the advantage of playing in the orchestra.

"Among the operas performed during the last winter, upon my improved stage, were: The Water Carrier, by Cherubini; The Night in Granada, The Eliazir of Love, etc. In the oratorio class were studied Mendelssohn's Hymn of Praise, The Seven Sleepers, by Loewe, etc.

"Especially in the weekly concerts of the school could be observed a constant progress of the pupils. The monthly concerts, open for the friends of the school, were more and more favored with appreciative audiences, and many more tickets were asked for than could be granted. Several quartet clubs were formed. One of them, 'The American Ladies' Quartette,' is now on a concert tour, and is received everywhere with much applause. Some of these young singers are so far advanced in composition that they compose very pretty original quartets, and harmonize the songs for their own use. Some of the pupils had last winter successful operatic engagements, others have reaped praise on the concert stage, while the church choir class has taken a leading place.

"My constant thought and care is to improve the school, notwithstanding the increase of labor it will give to the already great task of faithfully overlooking the work, while engaged in teaching the greater part of the day. But I hope that my strength and health will last until I have raised the school to the ideal I carry in my mind, and till I have educated valuable teachers who can carry on the work when my strength and myself are gone."

MUSIC IN CHICAGO: SEASON OF 1878-1879.

THE Chicago Sunday Tribune (July 27) contains the following remarkable exhibit of a year's music-making in that enterprising city, from the pen of Mr. George P. Upton: —

During the season, which commenced June 1, 1878, there have been 347 concerts and 327 representations of opera. The concert programmes include 2919 numbers, representing 542 different composers. The total number of performances, concert and opera, is as follows:

Pinafore representations	162	Schubert Institute	4
Other operas	165	Apollo Club	4
Eddy organ recitals	40	Werrenrath	4
Turner Hall	33	Amy Fay	3
Hershey School	31	Litta	3
Church concerts	29	Pratt Symphony	3
Personal testimonials	21	Chicago Orchestra Sym-
Charity concerts	11	phony	3
Tennesseans	10	Abt Society	3
Musical College	8	Athenaeum	3
Beethoven Society	8	Remenyi	3
Wilhelmj	6	Miscellaneous	108
Sherwood	6
Germania Maennerchor	6	Total	664
Kellogg and Cary	4

THE PROGRAMMES.

For the last six years Mendelssohn's music has been given more frequently than that of any other composer, but in the season of 1878-79 Schumann heads the list with 115 numbers, Chopin is second with 104, Mendelssohn third with 98, and Beethoven fourth with 94. The other prominent composers follow in this order: Liszt, 90; Schubert, 87; Bach (Sebastian), 76; Handel, 46; Mozart, 43; Rubinstein, 40; Meyerbeer, 34; Lecocq, 34; Wagner, Gounod, and Abt, 37 each; Verdi, 36; Weber, 35; Johann Strauss and Dudley Buck, 34 each; Donizetti, 30; Merkel, 29; Franz and Raff, 28 each; Flotow, 27; Suppé and Sullivan, 25 each; Guilmant and Hattori, 23 each; Benedict, 21; Battiste, 19; Rossini, 18; Ambrose Thomas, 17; Pratt, Planquette, and Macfarren, 16 each; Wieniawski and Gottschalk, 15 each; Volckmar, Haydn, and Ernst, 14 each; Vieuxtemps, Koelling, Belfe, and Goldbeck, 13 each; Bach (C.), Cowen, De Beriot, Lemmens, and Knecken, 12 each; Brahms, Silas, Smart, Kullak, and Wallace, 11 each; Bizet, Campana, Hiller, Pease, and Soedermann, 10 each; Spohr, Saint-Saëns, Raudegger, Offenbach, Bellini, Costa, and Blumenthal, 9 each; Auber, Bishop, Gumbert, Field, and Rheinberger, 8 each; Tours, Thiele, Schreiber, Best, Reinecke, Mason, Lachner, Jensen, Hamm, Henselt, Garrett, Faure, and Barnby, 7 each; Bocherini, Conradi, Luzzi, Loeschhorn, Molloy, Mercadante, Rosenbecker, Tschalkowsky, and Ulrich, 6 each; Widor, Vogel, Taubert, Schultze, Sponholtz, Ritter, Rink, Resch, Millard, Mills, Masse, Levy, Lux, Lassen, Kreutzer, Kuhnstedt, Hesse, Hoffmann, Hernemann, Gluck, Gade, Gleason, Grieg, Faust, De Lange, Dow, Bille, Calkin, Braga, Dans, Bradbury, Adam, and Archer, 5 each. In addition to these there have been twenty five represented by four numbers; twenty-nine by three numbers; seventy-one by two numbers; and no less than 286 composers have had but one representation on the programmes of the year.

OPERA SEASONS.

There have been ten opera seasons (exclusive of "Pinafore" seasons), as compared with five last year. The first was the Di Murka season at Haverly's, July 8, 9, and included two performances; the second, the European operabouffe season at the New Chicago, Oct. 28-Nov. 2, including eight performances; the third, the Strakosch season at McVicker's, Nov. 11-23, including fourteen performances; the fourth, the Tracy Titus season at McVicker's, Dec. 30-Jan. 4, including seven performances; the fifth, the Hess season at Hooley's, Jan. 6-11, including eight performances; the sixth, the Mapleson season at Haverly's, Jan. 13-25, including fourteen performances; the seventh, the Oates season at Haverly's, Feb. 3-15, including fourteen performances; the eighth, the Strakosch season at McVicker's, March 17-23, including seven performances; the ninth, the Hess season at Hooley's, April 7-12, including eight performances; the tenth, the Aimée season at Haverly's, June 23-29, including nine performances. In addition to these, the Rice party has given two seasons of burlesque opera at McVicker's and Haverly's, and an amateur troupe gave The Doctor of Alcantara, May 8, at the West End Opera House. The operas performed have been as follows, including the number of performances: Don Pasquale, 1; Girofle-Girofla, 9; Masked Ball, 2; Faust, 5; Aida, 1; Traviata, 2; Mignon, 4; Lucia, 4; Carmen, 5; Martha, 2; Trovatore, 3; Favorita, 1; Chimes of Normandy, 15; Fra Diavolo, 1; Bohemian Girl, 1; Martina, 1; Bonnambula, 2; Le Nozze di Figaro, 1; Rigoletto, 2; Magic Flute, 1; Puritani, 1; Huguenots, 2; Le Petit Duc (new), 21; La Marjolaine, 1; La Perichole, 1; Der Liebestrank (new), 1; Paul and Virginia (new), 3; Rose of Castile, 1; Doctor of Alcantara, 1; Cinderella, 4; Mme. Favart (new), 3; Les Brigands, 2; La Jolie Parfumeuse, 1; Grand Duchess, 1; Fatinitza (new), 16; and Trial by Jury, 4. In addition to these the following burlesques have been given: Robinson Crusoe, 11; Babes in the Wood, 13; Horror, 4; Hiawatha, 4; Piff-Paff, 3; and a burlesque of Pinafore, 5.

"PINAFORE."

How deeply seated the "Pinafore" craze has become may be inferred from the following statement. It has been performed 162 times, the various seasons and number of representations in each being as follows:

Boston Pinafore Company	January 27-February 1	8
Amateurs	February 24-March 8	14
Amateurs	March 17-23	7
Duff Troupe	March 24-April 12	23
Pauline Markham	March 31-April 5	9
Amateurs	April 29-May 3	7
Pauline Markham	May 19-24	7
Madrigal Troupe	May 26-June 1	7
Comic Opera Company	May 26-July 5	33
Juvenile Troupe	June 2-14	16
Church Choir Company	June 9-July 26	32
Total		162

FIRST APPEARANCES.

During the season the following first appearances of professional artists have been made in this city. Sopranos: Mrs. E. A. Osgood, Catarina Marco, Mlle. Litta, Catharine Lewis, Mme. Sinico, Mlle. Robiati, Marie Stone, Etelka Gerster, Mlle. Lido, Mme. Koelling, Gertrude Franklin, Maria L. Swift, and Florence Ellis. Altos: Mme. Lablache, Laura Joyce, Mme. Galimberti, Florence Rice-Knox. Tenors: Sig. Romati, Westberg, Las Zarini, Grazi, Franceschi, Frapoli, and Gillandi. Basses: Remmerts, Foli, McDonald, Thierry. Baritones: D. V. Bell, Makin, Bragan, Panteleoni, Moranski, Galassi, and Werrenrath. Pianists: Leila W. Graves, Max Pinner, Walton Perkins, and Max Vogrich. Violinists: Wilhelmj, Remenyi, Zeline Mantey, Kaiser, and Otto A. Schmidt.

IMPORTANT WORKS.

The following important works have been performed during the season:

Symphonies. — For organ, C minor, No. 1 D, No. 2, E minor, No. 3, F minor, No. 4, of Widor, by H. C. Eddy; C minor, No. 5, Beethoven, D minor, No. 8, Schubert, and the "Italian," Mendelssohn, by Pratt's Orchestra; B flat, No. 1, Schumann, op. 11, Burgmuller, "Pastoral," Beethoven, "Battle Symphony," Beethoven, Rosenbecker's Orchestra.

Miscellaneous. — God in Nature, Schubert, Apollo Club; Ninety-first Psalm, Meyerbeer, Apollo Club; God in the Tempest, Schubert, Apollo Club; Phaeton, Saint-Saëns, Chicago Orchestra; Orpheus, Liszt, H. C. Eddy; Walpurgis Nacht, Mendelssohn, Beethoven Society; Acis and Galatea, Handel, Apollo Club; St. Paul, Mendelssohn, Apollo Club; Les Preludes, Liszt, Pratt's Orchestra; Frithjof, Bruch, Apollo Club; Odyseus, Bruch, Beethoven Society; Die Trunzung, Piutti, H. C. Eddy; Fable of the Fairest Melusine, Hoffmann, Beethoven Society; Elegie, Raff, Beethoven Society; Song of the Spirits, Hiller, Beethoven Society; Messiah, Apollo Club; Manzoni Requiem, Beethoven Society.

In addition to these works there have been given 4 concertos, 4 sonatas, 2 preludes and fugues, and 1 trio of Mendelssohn; 3 sonatas, 2 trios, and 2 fugues of Merkel; 4 concertos, 1 toccata, 19 choral preludes, 9 fugues, 1 gavotte, 2 trios, 2 preludes, 1 sarabande, 2 choral fantasies, and 1 adagio of Bach; 1 fugue of Thiele; 1 concerto and 1 fugue of Liszt; 1 concerto, 2 sonatas, 1 fugue, 2 trios, and 2 quintets of Raff; 1 trio of Gleason; 2 sonatas of Rubinstein; 1 quartet and 3 sonatas of Rheinberger; 1 trio and 2 sonatas of Mozart; 1 trio of Haydn; 2 trios of Schubert; 4 sonatas and 1 fugue of De Lange; 2 trios of Ambrose Thomas; 1 trio of Durand; 1 trio of Brull; 1 fugue of Guilmant; 1 fugue of Richter; 1 sonata and 2 fantasies of Lemmens; 1 fugue of Bernard; 1 concerto, 3 fugues, and 2 quartets of Schumann; 1 fugue of Buxtehude; 1 fugue of Krebs; 3 concertos, 16 sonatas, and 3 trios of Beethoven; 1 fugue of Rinck, and several minor compositions in this department of chamber music.

SUMMARY.

The remarkable progress of music during the past six years may be best appreciated by the following comparative statement:

	Concerts.	Operas.	Numbers.	Composers.
1873-1874	133	69	865	198
1874-1875	134	69	1,486	284
1875-1876	237	79	2,008	300
1876-1877	270	99	2,322	461
1877-1878	298	64	2,618	464
1878-1879	347	327	2,919	542

MUSICAL CORRESPONDENCE.

PRINCETON, IND., AUG. 6. — As your Chicago correspondent has accepted an engagement to give instruction in a "Normal Music School" during part of the summer vacation, he takes the liberty of sending you a communication in regard to the workings of the school, as well as upon the state of music in this part of the country.

Princeton is one of the oldest towns in this State, having been settled in 1812, and is regarded by its people with no little veneration, not only on account of its age, but because its citizens possess a high degree of culture and a love of refinement, which alone are representatives of the true kind of growth. In matters of education the little city seems progressive, and its schools afford good opportunities for the youth to prepare himself for his battle with the world.

Musically, there has been an attempt at organization, for I find a choral society, numbering some eighty voices, which has had a regular conductor for the past year, and has devoted itself to the study of four-part songs and choruses. The Normal School for the study of music, if rightly conducted, becomes an important factor in the development of the musical talent of the West. For scattered through these smaller towns are numbers of music teachers who have little time, and, in most cases, not money enough, to come to the large cities during the musical season, and keep themselves abreast with the progress of the world. Thus we find a seeming necessity for these different musical elements, — from the large cities and the smaller inland towns, — to mingle with each other, imparting and receiving instruction, as the case may be. Oftentimes misguided talent is given a positive start in the true direction of development, and the seeds of a correct taste planted, which, after a season, bring forth fruit worthy of real art. Choral organization also follows, and a better idea of what class of music is worthy of study is given the singers than they ever had before, until they learn to love the grand choruses of the oratorios, and an incentive is given them to go forward in the direction of true musical progress.

In this present school, there are four instructors, one of whom, Mr. J. P. Weston, comes from Boston. The others, Mr. B. F. Peters, Mr. Crozier, and the writer, are from Western cities. We number some seventy-five private pupils, with a larger number in classes, and an evening class of some eighty singers, which engages in the study of oratorio choruses and other choral work.

It is one of the pleasing features to me to observe that whenever good music is given in the song and piano-forte recitals it seems to meet with appreciation and excites interest. The student who had devoted his time to commonplace music seems to find in the works of the old masters a new and wonderful field for study, and is induced to reform his touch that he may, in time, be able to make Mendelssohn's "songs without words" sing under his own fingers; while a sonata of Beethoven will often excite musical interest to such a degree that a long course of technical Etudes are undertaken with the aim of reaching the grand music of this master as a reward for the persistent study.

When musical talent is dormant for want of an opportunity to manifest itself, it is the duty of every true musician to give it what aid he can while it is under his influence. In regard to vocal music, I think that the American people have more material in good voices than we are yet aware of; for I have been pleased to find that the average voice of the chorus singer in these country places has a native quality which, even with a short training, makes it far from disagreeable. There are far more soprano than alto singers, while the basses far outnumber the tenors; but the average quality of the voices is much richer in tone than one would suppose.

I must mention one young lad who came to us from the far-away farming districts. He had never seen a piano-forte until he came to this school, but had given himself what home study he could through the aid of a little portable organ that was in his father's house. I found, to my astonishment, that he could read vocal music at sight, and, more than this, could name any note that was sung to him, having a correct ear for positive pitch. I sang a number of impromptu exercises to him, asking him to name the notes, which he did without any mistake. Upon questioning him, I found that he was fond of music, and that when he learned that our school was to be near to him (a matter of thirty miles), he had taken the trouble to earn the money to enable him to be one of the pupils. Yet his taste for music had led him to do much of the hard work — of learning to read correctly at sight — unaided at home. What a lesson of industry such a picture is, and what an example to many city students, who fritter both their time and opportunity away, refusing to music that sincere and persistent effort that alone will enable talent to ripen with something approaching perfection. The real accomplishments of art and culture must be bought with patient work and conscientious endeavor.

C. H. B.

NOTES AND GLEANINGS.

ALBERT WEBER, the New York piano manufacturer, who died on the morning of June 30, came to America a poor lad, and by his own indefatigable industry and enterprise gained a high reputation among the piano manufacturers of this country, and amassed a fortune estimated at $500,000. He was born in a small town in Bavaria in 1829. His father was a doctor, and it is not known that either his father or his mother had even ordinary musical taste and talent, but the son played on the organ and on the piano at four years of age. He was almost equally quick in his other studies, and when he was hardly sixteen was graduated at the Gymnasium. It was his aim to be a school teacher. In his seventeenth year he came to America, and finding that music teaching was a lucrative calling, obtained pupils and went to work. Then he conceived the idea of becoming a piano manufacturer. He learned the trade of Mr. Van Winkle and Mr. Holder, manufacturers of that time, and while working with them continued to give music lessons in the evening.

In 1853 he had saved $1,000, and concluded to start in business for himself, hiring rooms at No. 103 West Broadway. For a few months he had had a room in White Street, where he repaired pianos. His growing establishment was burned to the ground in 1854, the year in which he married a Port Chester lady. He next took a store at No. 165 West Broadway, where he enlarged the business to the production of four or five pianos a week. In 1865 he moved to Broome and Crosby streets, and was soon making six pianos a week. This was then considered a large business, but now the manufactory turns out forty a week. While he was in Broome Street he built, in 1868, the manufactory in Seventh Avenue, which, in 1876, was enlarged to a frontage of 262 feet on Seventeenth Street, and of 104 feet on the avenue. About 400 men are regularly employed, and the yearly product is now between 1,800 and 2,000 instruments. Mr. Weber gave his personal supervision to the manufacture of 14,500 pianos.

He left Broome Street in 1869 for the present spacious warerooms at Fifth Avenue and Sixteenth Street. Besides being his business headquarters, these rooms were also places of social gathering for musicians and singers, and several reunions were held there. Mr. Weber belonged to the Lotos, Manhattan (Arcadian while it existed), and Palette Clubs, and was also a member of the Liederkrans and Arion Societies.

Mr. Weber always ascribed his first marked success in business to the rivalry which early grew up between him and another firm, and which was carried on to the last, his competitors in business having served papers on him in a suit for alleged infringement of patent only a few weeks ago. He was tireless in his work, frequently giving his time to it from eight in the morning till one o'clock at night, especially before his reputation was fully established. His aim always seemed to be to make the next piano better than the last. The business will go forward as heretofore, with the exception that Albert Weber, the son, assumes the proprietorship.

WE learn that the late lamented Lewis B. Munroe, Dean of the School of Oratory in Boston University, is to be succeeded in that function by his widow, who is a sister of the singer, George L. Osgood, and is said to be fully qualified for the important work.

THE Children's "Pinafore" is still running every evening at the Boston Museum.

A GRAND sacred concert was given Sunday afternoon at Gale's Pond, in Berlin, Mass., by Mme. Erminia Rudersdorff and a number of her young lady pupils. The affair was a benefit entertainment in aid of Edgar Larkin of Hudson, who was the contractor for building Mme. Rudersdorff's barn at Lakeside, which was demolished by the tornado of July 16.

THREE is a talk of Mr. Gye invading the United States in rivalry to his great competitor, Mapleson. Gye has been in America, and while his main object was to look after Albani's interests, he managed to spy out the land and make notes. His company is intended to include Patti, Albani, Scatchi, Valleria, and Zare Thalberg, but this arrangement will depend a good deal on Patti's engagement in Paris.

FOREIGN.

THE arrangements for the Birmingham Festival are now completed, and it has been settled that the novelties shall be produced as follows: Herr Max Bruch's cantata, "The Lay of the Bell," has been fixed for the first evening programme on August 26; M. Saint-Saëns' "The Lyre and the Harp" will be produced on the following Thursday evening, and Sir Michael Costa's "Date Sonitum" will be given on Friday morning. The artists will be Mesdames Gerster, Sherrington, Patey, and Trebelli, Miss Anna Williams, Messrs. Lloyd, Cummings, Mass, Vernon Rigby, Santley, and Henschel, Sir Michael Costa being the conductor. The chief items of the programme of the festival at Hereford are given below, and the leading vocalists will be Mesdames Albani, Patey, and Enriques; Misses Emma Thursby, Anna Williams, and De Fontblaque Messrs. Cummings, McGuckin, Santley, and Thursley Beale; the Cathedral organist, Mr. Langdon Colborne, being the conductor.

THE full programme for the Hereford Festival has not yet been settled, at any rate so far as the daily choral services in the Cathedral and the secular concerts in the Shire Hall are concerned. In the Festival proper, the "Elijah" is fixed for the first day, September 9; on the Wednesday a miscellaneous programme will include Purcell's "Te Deum" in D, the first two parts of Bach's "Christmas" oratorio, Handel's "Esther" overture and "Zadock the Priest," Spohr's 84th Psalm, and the "Pignus Futuri" from Mozart's Litany in B-flat. In the evening, Mendelssohn's 95th Psalm and "Hear my Prayer," and Rossini's "Stabat Mater," will be given. On the Thursday the programme will include Sullivan's "The Light of the World," and Haydn's "Imperial Mass;" and on Friday the "Messiah" will be given. The symphonies selected for performance at the Shire Hall are the "Scottish" and the "Kreica;" and the Festival will conclude on September 12 with a chamber concert. A new organ has been erected for these performances by Messrs. Brindley and Foster, of Sheffield, and the orchestra, under Mr. Langdon Colborne, will be led by Mr. H. Weist Hill.

POOR HENRY SMART (we copy from Figaro July 12) has not long enjoyed the pension of £100 recently bestowed upon him out of the Civil List. On Sunday night, to the great grief of a wide circle of friends, and to the deep regret of all lovers of genuine music, he passed away at the mature age of sixty-six. Henry Smart came of a truly musical family. His uncle, Sir George Smart, and his father, one of the most respected members of our metropolitan orchestras, must both have imbued him with a taste for music. Therefore, although we find him early in life apprenticed to the law, it astonished no one that he threw up his articles and joined a band of honest art-workers who have done much to place our country in the position it now occupies in the musical commonwealth. For Henry Smart was no creature of the hour, content to write for publishers in the false or debased style demanded by the fashion of the moment. If his works are not phenomenal, if he attained less celebrity than some of his contemporaries have done, he had the proud satisfaction of knowing that he never deviated from the true principles of high art. Henry Smart's more important compositions, his opera, "The Gnomes of Hartzburg," his cantata "Jacob," and his "Bride of Dunkerton," the last written for the Birmingham Festival, are scholarly works; but it is for his church services, his organ pieces, and his songs that he will be chiefly remembered. His morning Service in F, "The Lady of the Sea," "From Greenland's Icy Mountains," and "Haste, ye Maidens," will live when many of the more ephemeral works of some of his better known contemporaries will be forgotten. As an organist, Henry Smart had few, as an extemporizer, probably no equal in this country.

ACCORDING to L'Art Musical, among the new works M. Vaucorbeil has before him, for the Paris Opera, are Gounod's "Le Tribut de Zamora," Massenet's "Herodiade," Ambrose Thomas's "Françoise de Rimini," Salvayre's "Richard III.," Godard's "Une Conjuración de Fiesque," Lalo's "Le Roi de Lys," Diaz's "Benvenuto Cellini," Guiraud's "Le Feu," Meyer's "Sigurd," Massé's "Cleopatra," and Offenbach's "Contes d'Hoffmann." The director is also pledged to revive an opera by Gluck.

LEIPZIG. — The operas performed here during the month of May were: Boccaccio, by Suppé, three times; Norma twice; Lortzing's Undine, twice; and the following ones each: Mozart's Seraglio, Nozze di Figaro, Zauberflöte, and Don Juan; Meyerbeer's L'Africaine; Verdi's Troisvire; Neusser's Der Rattenfänger von Hameln; Wagner's Der Ring des Nibelungen, all four parts. There were eighteen opera nights.

THE Leipzig Signale, in its report of the annual examinations at the Conservatory of Music, speaks of a string Quartet and an Overture by Mr. George W. Chadwick, of Boston, as among the best specimens of original composition offered by the pupils. We translate: "The Quartet by Mr. Chadwick shows, together with natural and healthy invention, an already respectable power of plastic form." . . . "Of the Overtures, we must pronounce that by Mr. Chadwick, to the American legend of Rip van Winkle, by far the best; it presents fresh subject-matter, well articulated form and structure, and skillful orchestration."

THE Sacred Music Association of Cologne, under the direction of Professor E. Mertke, lately gave a performance of Cherubini's Requiem.

A PERFORMANCE of Verdi's Requiem has been given in the Scala, Milan, in aid of sufferers from the inundations of the Po and the eruption of Mount Etna. Verdi himself conducted.

BOSTON, AUGUST 30, 1879.

Entered at the Post Office at Boston as second-class matter.

CONTENTS.

SANZIO. Stuart Sterne	137
THE DEVELOPMENT OF PIANO-FORTE MUSIC, FROM BACH TO SCHUMANN. From the German of Carl Van Bruyck	137
THE BRAIN IN PIANO PLAYING. W. S. B. Mathews	139
THE SALEM MUSICAL FESTIVAL. Edward Handick	139
A WORD OF WARNING. The Perils of Young American Girls in European Cities	141
TALKS ON ART: SECOND SERIES. From Instructions of Mr. William M. Hunt to his Pupils. XII.	141
BOOK REVIEWS	141
The Philosophy of Music. — Tanagra Figurines.
HERMANN GOETZ: HIS CANTATA, "NEMIA"	143
MUSICAL CORRESPONDENCE	143
DeBance, O. — Philadelphia.
NOTES AND GLEANINGS	144

All the articles not credited to other publications were expressly written for this Journal.

Published fortnightly by Houghton, Osgood and Company, 230 Devonshire Street, Boston. Price, 10 cents a number; $2.50 per year.

For sale in Boston by CARL PRUEFER, 30 West Street, A. WILLIAMS & Co., 233 Washington Street, A. K. LORING, 369 Washington Street, and by the Publishers; in New York by A. BRENTANO, JR., 39 Union Square, and Houghton, Osgood & Co., 21 Astor Place; in Philadelphia by W. H. BOWEN & Co., 1102 Chestnut Street; in Chicago by the CHICAGO MUSIC COMPANY, 512 State Street.

SANZIO.

BY STUART STERNE, AUTHOR OF "ANGELO."

(Continued from page 130.)

THE autumn with its falling, russet leaves,
And clouded suns and chilly rains, had come,
And then the winter with brief, dreary days,
And long, dark nights, storm-tossed and starless oft, —
And Benedetta lingered on and on;
Nor she nor Sanzio questioning earnestly
How long, how short, glad life might thus endure,
He well content she never uttered now
The words that first had sometimes startled him,
"I cannot stay here ever, Sanzio mine!"
But when the quickening breath of early spring
Stirred in the air with infinite sweet promise,
She said one day, "My Sanzio, let me go Back to my home for but a little while!
My heart has hungered long to see once more
The dear old spots I know and love so well,
Where we had passed so many happy years,
Grandam and I, and where she lived and died,
And the good neighbors that were kind to us, —
I pray you, say not no!"

Sanzio looked grieved,
And then, not full of cheer as once before,
But with grave earnestness, he said, "But, Love,
You must come back to me, for you have grown
More than the joy and sunshine of my days;
You are a part of all my deepest life!"

She promised with a willing heart, and went;
Yet tarried two whole weeks, but sent a message:
"The neighbors are most kind and have much work,
That keeps me, but I shall be with you soon.
I love you, and I dream of you all night!"

She came at length, but even then she said,
"I fear me much I must away once more,
Though it is sad to leave you, Sanzio mine!
This is a busy time out in the woods,
And it is surely right that I help those Who ever proved our friends!"

He made no answer,
And, glancing up, she read in his deep eyes,
The light of that unutterable joy,
Some new, immortal work had kindled there.
Was it but this, perchance, and the swift flush
Of gladness on his brow, at sight of her,
Wherefore she marked not now a strange, deep change
In his beloved features? "Come!" he said,
And led her to the work-room, and before
A fresh, great canvas there.

A group of figures
Upon a hill, and in their midst the Christ,
Who rose, with upturned face and outstretched hands,
Into the heavens that opened in his path,
Floated and borne aloft by waves of light
That streamed about Him, fed as from a spring
From out his form and countenance divine;
Shedding a golden radiance all around, —
No great a glory that the few elect
Who had drawn close about their Master's feet

Shrank back affrighted from the blinding glow,
And hid their faces. Further still below
Other disciples, and with them a woman,
Who, kneeling, pointed to a struggling boy,
Possessed by demons.

Benedetta long
Stood rapt and speechless, and with bated breath,
Gazing upon the Saviour, for she seemed
To see naught else; then suddenly bowed her head,
And, covering up her face, began to weep, —
Not in loud sobs, as Sanzio heard her first,
But with a moaning, low, heart-broken sound,
That pierced him to the soul. His own eyes filled,
As tenderly he drew her trembling form
Close to his heart, and gently asked, "My Own,
My Benedetta, — nay, wherefore these tears?"

She could not answer for a moment; then,
Raising her head, said slowly, "Oh, my Sanzio,
It is so passing great and beautiful,
My feeble lips scarce dare to give it praise!
But yet I know not! — when I saw it first
A strange, swift pain seized on my heart, a pang
That would not pass, but sharpened more and more,
Until at length it drew these foolish tears.
I pray you, forgive me, — it is over now!"

And, growing calm, she turned to look again
Upon the wondrous work, yet lifted not
Her eyes this time to the Redeemer's form,
But, pointing to the kneeling woman, asked,
"And who is this?"

His brow contracted darkly;
"It is the face of her," he said, and spoke Unwillingly, she fancied, "whom I knew, —
It seems to me it was long years ago, —
Ere you had come. And I have put her here,
As one who even on an hour like this,
Filled with the glory of the Lord, breaks in
With the unhallowed, jarring sounds of earth!"

"Yet she is passing fair!" said Benedetta,
And sighed, and then was silent.

"See," he said,
When she prepared at last to bid farewell,
"What I have carved for you, while you were gone;
Take it, dear heart!" and put into her hands
A crucifix of finest ebony,
Hung by a delicate silver chain.

A look,
Long, deep, and tender, thanked him more than words;
She kissed the cross and hid it in her bosom,
And promised she would surely soon return.
And thus they parted.

Sanzio, left alone,
Took up his brush again, resolved to work,
But laid it down ere long, with drooping hands
And a strange, sudden sinking of the heart.
A deep, unutterable weariness,
A sense of bleakest, hopeless desolation,
Crept like a numbness, clogging every limb
With leaden weight, up from his very feet,
And slowly spread itself o'er heart and brain.
Was this, — he thought and shuddered as he felt
An icy stream pour through each shivering vein,
While his brow burned and throbbed, — was this, great God!

The chill of disenchantment in the blood,
Before whose stony eye the ecstasies
Of love itself should wither and grow dumb, —
Within whose poison breath should fade and die
The light and glow of all things beautiful?
The ecstasies of love, — where were they now,
Where all the splendor of those proud creations
The whole wide world applauded? He glanced up
At the great canvas and about the room;
The glory of the Saviour was no more, —
Pale, dim, and colorless, the works he wrought
Seemed blindly to return his gaze. His head
Sank heavily upon his heaving breast.
Oh, wherefore, wherefore, cried his inmost soul,
All this hot toil and effort, — all this straining
Up rugged paths, beneath a burning sun,
With thorn-pricked, bleeding feet, and with the pangs
Of a great thirst no spring could quench? Wherefore
All fret and fever of this fleeting life?
Even they, his noblest works, to whom he gave
All his best heart's-blood, freely, joyfully,
And with it, as he fondly fancied once,
Immortal life, — even they should perish soon,
Crumble into gray dust and barren ashes.
Oh, he had said too well, that ancient king,
All was but emptiness and vanity!

He turned to rest his head upon his arm,
And as he closed his eyes he thought once more, —
Thus passes all the glory of the world!

(To be continued.)

THE DEVELOPMENT OF PIANO-FORTE MUSIC, FROM BACH TO SCHUMANN.

FROM THE GERMAN OF CARL VAN BRUYCK.

(Continued from page 131.)

As the chief representative of the older piano-forte music appears indisputably SEBASTIAN BACH, that altogether extraordinary, wonderful, one might say fabulous, artist and genius, who by his productions — truly giant works — throws into deep shadow almost all that has been done before him and beside him upon German soil; and one may say that whoever has studied his works has fairly taken up into himself the sum and quintessence of all that German art down to his day was able to accomplish. The centre of gravity of Bach's gigantic, phenomenal art activity lies not, to be sure, in his very numerous and extremely pregnant and significant piano and other purely instrumental works (the piano in his time was still a very meagre instrument), but in his Cantatas (mostly for the church, of which he has written more than two hundred), his great Passion-Music (more than one), his Motets, and I may add his Organ compositions, which are unexampled in their grandeur; but even in the former field he stands altogether above all that was produced before and during his day. These works, too, although some things among them appear antiquated (as is also the case with some of the Cantatas), will hold their immeasurable artistic worth so long as there shall be a musical art at all, and the capacity to appreciate and comprehend it.

It will be understood, of course, that even on this field much that was excellent and important had been achieved already before Bach (he had, for example, in the person of an uncle, Christian Bach, a very significant forerunner in the Cantata); for even the greatest genius never can create entirely ex ovo an art complete and perfect in itself. Wherever we behold any art at a high stage of progress, we may confidently assume that a long period of development has gone before, even if nothing at all be known to us about it. Thus Shakespeare, for example, as a dramatic poet far surpasses all that has appeared in modern times, even on British soil; yet he had several very remarkable, nay important, predecessors, who, much as he excelled them, and genuine to the inmost core as his incomparable magic works appear, yet were not without influence on his development. But I believe I do not err when I maintain that in case of need one may safely ignore all that was produced before and during Bach's time in piano-forte music (which is our special theme), and yet gain from his works alone a complete idea of the condition of the whole art development of that time, besides something more that is altogether peculiar to Bach's own genius.

We may here and there find some single little form worked out to a more perfect finish, as in the productions bequeathed to us by Domenico Scarlatti, Couperin, and some others; we may compare the "Suites" which we possess by Handel to those by Bach; but one will hardly be able to maintain and prove that Bach's piano works (and here I speak of these alone), taken together, on the whole have been surpassed, or even equaled, by any one of his predecessors or contemporaries.

Instrumental music hitherto has developed only two great art forms, namely, the so-called Suite and the Sonata. The Concerto belongs essentially to the latter art form, and is distinguished from it almost solely by the one peculiarity that it usually consists of only three movements, whereas most sonatas have four. The so-called Fantasia (by no means a modern invention, but already occurring with Bach, — one needs only to remind himself of that grand example, his "Chromatic Phantasia") shows by its name that in it the composer to a certain degree dispenses with that greater strictness of form, to which otherwise he is more or less bound; indeed, the second part of the Bach Fantasia just named consists of a Fugue of as strict and measured form as the great master has composed. I speak here, first of all and chiefly, only of the larger art forms, in which the artistic development properly completes itself, and pass by for the present the numerous smaller forms, of which I will give special prominence only to the Variation. I could and would also omit discussion of the Fugue, inasmuch as this form is not peculiar to instrumental music, but is also very much employed in vocal music. Yet I must consider it expressly, not only because it is one of the highest (as well as the strictest) forms of art, but because precisely in the Fugue has Bach achieved the most incomparable success, — because in it he, and he alone (one might almost say), is a "specialty;" and on this field, to borrow an expression from "world expositions," he stands in a certain manner hors de concours, somewhat as Beethoven stands in the symphony, Schubert in the Lied, Shakespeare in the modern drama (modern as contrasted with the antique), and Walter Scott in the romance.

The "Suite" is an art form which developed itself in the course of the seventeenth century, perhaps somewhat earlier. One feels almost tempted not to recognize it for an art form in the higher, stricter sense; at all events, in this regard it stands far below the more lately developed "Sonata;" for in fact it consists merely of a succession (a suite) of smaller musical pieces, originating mostly from old dances (known by the names, Allemande, Sarabande, Gigue, Lourd, Bourrée, and many more), and naturally retaining their rhythm; but they appear so far idealized through art that for the most part they would have satisfied the real dancing wishes and requirements of our ancestors as little as the sonata-minuets, the art-waltzes, or the Ländlers of our day. But anyhow this first larger, broadly laid out form, although not distinctively an art form, and very far from perfect, shows the original and intimate connection of all instrumental music, as on the one hand with song, so on the other hand with the dance. But those little tone-pictures, of which they used to string together five or six into a quasi-whole, by no means show that artistic mastery of form, that rich and ample build, which distinguishes the larger "movements" of the later sonatas, nor that inner organic connection which characterizes the master-works of the latter kind, particularly those which sprang from the lofty soul of Beethoven. But the greatest disadvantage of the Suite, as compared with the later Sonata, is that all the single movements of which it is made up play in the same key, and so wholly lack the rich variety of modulation which distinguishes our Sonata both as a whole and in the single parts. In spite of all this, however, the Bach Suites (as well as those by Handel, which are almost their peers) contain a fullness of most precious pictures. Fugues proper do not occur in them; yet even in them Bach uses the fugued form in many ways, for that was the universal art style of the period. But many pieces are found even here of the most simple structure, of the most graceful melodic charm, of an enchanting and (especially in the Sarabands) deep sentiment, nay, of the most delectable, transporting humor; for, indeed, we may remark this by the way, Bach, next to Beethoven, is the greatest humorist in the realm of music (a side of him which perhaps is the least generally recognized); and he confirms the old truth, that the richest fullness of this quickening and refreshing gift of God is apt to dwell within the most deeply earnest natures, of which we have such an illustrious and far-shining example in the domain of poetry in Shakespeare.

One other art form might be named alongside of the Suite and the Sonata, which, historically, should be inserted between these two, as standing somewhat nearer to the later Sonata; and yet, on the whole, it is to be counted more decidedly with the Suite tribe, I mean the so-called Partita, of which we possess several by Bach, and which in grandeur far surpass the Suites. An anthology of the most magnificent tone-pictures might be made up of these alone.

But Bach appears complete in all his greatness, with a mastership never again reached, or approached but from afar, in his celebrated "Thirty Variations," and his still more celebrated fugue-samples under the name of the Well-tempered Clavichord, each of the two parts of which contains 24 fugues, introduced by preludes, in all the major and minor keys; this stands unique in the whole literature of musical art. I can properly forbear to add more to the praise of this astonishing double work, inasmuch as I have already done my part towards it in a larger writing, especially devoted to this work, which appeared twelve years ago in book form from the press of Breitkopf & Härtel. Bach as a fugue composer (speaking, of course, always in the general, and without wishing in the least to draw too near to the master creations of earlier or later times) is as unique and in certain respects incomparable (hors de concours) as Beethoven in his Sonatas and Symphonies, Schubert in his Songs, and Mozart "whilom" (bislang)¹ as an opera composer. And the same mark (of the very highest creative energy) characterizes in like manner each of these corypheuses of music in his own respective field, — this, namely: that every one of their creations appears completely individualized, so that no one of them is like another, either in outward form or spirit, and each (with vanishing exceptions) presents itself as a special, clearly distinct organism. If one wishes to form a conception of what a fullness of the richest, liveliest play of fancy, soul, and feeling this fugue form, so frequently condemned as 'T and dry, can take up into itself, let him gain it, as he can and will if he have any susceptibility, from the study of this imperishable work, — in which, moreover, little as one might expect it, the great humorist not seldom takes up the word. To be sure, this study, in whatever way pursued, has its difficulties, and presupposes a considerable preparation, as well theoretical as practical.

Strictly taken, his Well-tempered Clavichord cannot properly be classed with the pianoforte literature, at least in so far as Bach in his conception of it hardly thought of its execution on the "clavichord." Rather do these two-, three-, four-, and five-part fugues seem quite ideally conceived (with the Preludes, which precede them, the case is different, to be sure); they might be executed just as well, and even better, by stringed instruments, since the strict separation of the single, individual voices (parts), with their strictly polyphonic leading, is well-nigh impossible on the piano; when each voice is assigned to a particular instrument, it comes out more clearly and appreciably; and then the technical execution is subject to no such great difficulty as on the piano, which presupposes, at least in the tied (legato) style, a high degree of virtuosity, since it not only requires great fluency, with perfect independence of the several fingers, but in the over-rich polyphony of the movement and the limitations it induces often calls for the most ingenious fingering, to say nothing of the broader and higher artistic conditions implied in a satisfactory rendering. (Already Mozart, led probably by the recognition of this fact, had transcribed some of these fugue pieces for bow instruments; and I have myself followed this example, having, through Breitkopf & Härtel, published eight of them in such an arrangement.)

And just as this fugue work stands universally recognized for something unique and alone in the whole art literature of music, an imperishable monument of a gigantic mind, to which the most complicated tone combinations were an easy play of fancy, so too we may boldly claim as such a unicum the above-named set of Variations, in spite of all the great and splendid works which later masters have produced in this form. A large part of these Variations is wrought in polyphonic canon form, this quite in the manner of Bach, through all the intervals, from the prime to the tenth. And with all the astonishing art with which these pictures are executed, at the same time what ease, leaving all this expenditure of art scarcely perceptible! What grace! What overflowing life and spirit! What deep feeling! This work is at the same time one of the most beautiful and most euphonious of the wonderful, sublime master. For, we may remark in passing, pure beauty, sensuous beauty of sound, is one of the qualities comparatively most seldom found in the otherwise so astonishing, powerful, and in many ways transporting and enchanting creations of this incomparable genius. The indescribably high, inward, and profound enjoyment they afford to listeners who are susceptible is often more of the intellectual, spiritual sort, and such as stirs the inmost soul, rather than such as gratifies the ear with that pure euphony which springs only from the equilibrium of all the art factors; whereas in Bach, generally speaking, the technical element preponderates, though in the most thoroughly inspired form. On the one hand, his delight in the technical, in pure musical forms, on the other, the lofty, mighty sweep of his ideas, rendered him less susceptible to that sensuous euphony which we find so ravishing in the works of his great followers. And his, too, was the stand-point of the whole art culture of that time.

¹ Is this an ironical compliment to Wagner? — Ed.

(To be continued.)

THE BRAIN IN PIANO PLAYING.

I HAD not long ago a conversation with my friend, Dr. J. S. Jewell, one of the best informed men regarding mental and nervous action that this country contains. He tells me that the nerves of sense-perception terminate in the cortex (or outer coat) of the brain, every kind of sense-perception having its own group of cells. These groups of cells in different parts of the brain communicate with each other by means of commissural fibres. Ideation (as I understand him) is supposed to be the result of a comparison or reaction of the impressions of one cell or group with another or others, carried on by means of these connecting fibres.

In fetal life the cortex of the brain is scarcely, if at all, occupied by cells, and in childhood but sparsely so. Every added thought or knowledge signifies the addition of new cells and the connecting fibres necessary to coördinate the ideas composing the knowledge, or to coördinate the motions if the new acquisition is a matter of mechanical skill. Such an addition to the thinking material of the brain is the physical accompaniment of every advance in knowledge, as, for instance, the acquisition of a strange language. This kind of growth goes on with more and more difficulty as the individual advances in life and nutrition falls below current demands. Hence the difficulty of learning when one is old.

Passing with mere mention the corollary that this view makes the mind the stimulant and in fact the creator of the thinking organism, I call attention to the light it throws on certain well-known facts pertaining to piano playing:—

(1.) Technique acquired in childhood is of a much more satisfactory and complete kind than that first obtained after the body has approached maturity. (Because, in childhood, nutrition is ready in large surplus, and there is as yet plenty of spare room in the upper story for finishing off new apartments.)

(2.) So also in regard to the practical mastery of rhythms. Whoever studies Mason's Piano-forte Technique carefully will observe a certain want of correspondence between the chapters on rhythm and the practical exercises among the scales and arpeggios. The defect, if defect it be, happened in consequence of the practical exercises having been first written with a view of including only the most useful forms for practice. But subsequently, in preparing the explanatory chapters on rhythm, I discovered that all direct rhythms (i. e., all rhythms arising from the uniform subdivision of the units) could be reduced to twos and threes, and that therefore they must be built up out of twos and threes. For although a smart pupil might well enough leap at once into the very midst of things and play a rhythm of nines and twelves without difficulty, I was constantly finding pupils unable to compute, for example, sixes as two threes, though perfectly able to compute them as three twos. The difficulty evidently is in not being able to compute in threes. It is therefore necessary for them to play for some time in triple measure, counting "one, two, three," and afterwards "one," omitting to count the two and three, until the triplet is established as the unit of measurement. Now in this process very curious inabilities appear. For example, this very day I had a pupil unable to play the scale in triplets. After some time in counting one to each tone she became able to play triplets counting only "one" with the first note of each triplet. I then tried to have her play the scale in sixes, but she made it "sixes and sevens" by putting in four in place of the second triplet in about every alternate measure. I then tried to have her play triplets, saying "two" as she struck the first note of each. This she was entirely unable to do, although I directed her to try it, counting "two and a" with each triplet, as well as in figures "two, two, three." The two demoralized her completely. Her mathematical instinct seemed to cry out, "Two in three you can't." Now when I get her able to play triplets, counting only "two," I shall carry it on until she can play them counting "three," "four," and so on.

Rhythmic accentuation and the accompanying computation Dr. Jewell thinks is done from the cerebellum. Pupils having difficulty with these rhythmic computations have in general a defective sense of number, and experience similar difficulty in arithmetic and mathematics generally.

Those who have not thought of it will be surprised to observe how much of the climax in great works rests on rhythmic foundations. That is to say, in orchestral works especially one finds that each repetition of the theme brings with it a higher rhythmic motion; so that it is not unusual to find a compound rhythm wherein the leading voice has one tone to a unit, one part of the accompaniment two notes to one of the melody, and another part three or four to one of these. In Beethoven's Sonata in C minor, Op. 111, there is a three times three of this kind, that is, an accompaniment in triplets, and another in triplets to that.

(3.) This also throws light on the process of learning a new piece. Every concert player or advanced teacher knows that a difficult piece is not to be taken up and mastered at a gulp. But it is repeatedly practiced for a while, and then laid aside for a time; and in this way only is it to be brought to thorough finish. Now this signifies, evidently, the fact that a piece containing something essentially new requires new cells, or at least new communicating fibres in the brain. These are established more and more completely with each new study of the piece, until finally it is fully mastered and belongs to the common stock of every-day music-thinking.

(4.) This also shows why new ideas are not more readily received, no matter how true they are. Indeed, I am not sure but a false idea is more easily received by the generality. For a lie goes dodging about the brain, helping itself to any line of communication, while poor honest truth has to wait until slow-moving conservatism builds the needed bridge. Folks can't think new thoughts all at once. They have n't the tools. Schumann's music had to wait for a generation to be built with brains to receive it, and Wagner has fared much the same.

And to wind up with an illustrious example, the Lord of Life and Glory has been all these six thousand years or more trying to get up a pattern of human brains in which truth and honesty would always keep the track, while lies and cheating would always go into the ditch.

(5.) Habit has a physical basis.

W. S. B. MATHEWS.

CHICAGO, ILL., 1879.

THE SALZBURG MUSICAL FESTIVAL.

[From the Vienna Neue Freie Presse.]

It is not raining! This will suffice for every one who knows Salzburg. It is tantamount to reminding him of one of the most beautiful sights on earth. The splendid town, exciting the ecstasy or the rage of all travelers, according as it glints in the sunshine or sulks in eternities of rain, lies to-day stretched out luxuriously under a clear blue sky and a bright sun. At a very early hour I felt impelled to ascend the Capuzinerberg, that enchanting rock, which, as the inscription carved in stone announces, was assigned as a retreat by an undoubtedly rich and probably unhappy archbishop to the "paupero ac felici Cappucino." While wandering about on the hill of the poor and happy Capuchin monk, and reveling in one view after another, I was thinking of anything but the Festival concert. Or at any rate, I thought that we ought to greet thankfully any motive, and consequently the present musical one, which brought so many human beings, with a sense of the beautiful and a longing for freedom, out of their hot work-rooms and the "crushing narrowness of the streets," and enable them to drink in, with full draughts and to their hearts' content, the beauties of such a landscape. If, after such a delightful day's work, you feel inclined to gratify yourself and others with some music in the evening, translating, so to speak, into tune the impressions of nature you have enjoyed during the day, all the better. This landscapey-picturesque point of view, whence the Salzburg Musical Festival is beheld as the goal of a musical pleasure trip, is not only the most inviting, but perhaps the only one, for any person writing an account of the proceedings. Quite in keeping with the character of an artist's country outing were, to begin with, the concerts with which some members of the orchestra delighted certain small towns, as they passed through them, so to say, on their pilgrimage hither. Thus, for instance, Schantel, the player on the French horn, and Moser, the harpist, gave a most crowded concert at Waidhofen on the Ybbs, the feat being rendered possible by the existence there of a zealous Liedertafel, admirably trained by Friedrich Schiffner.

A critic bound merely to supply the Viennese public with new and interesting musical information respecting this Festival, which includes nothing but well-known compositions executed in the well-known manner, would have finished almost ere he began. He would simply have to copy out the programme, and add in a tone of unclouded satisfaction: "Everything went off without a fault and also without rain." At the first concert on Thursday evening, the members of the Vienna Philharmonic, under Hanns Richter's experienced guidance, performed the overtures to Die Zauberflöte and Manfred; Schubert's B minor Symphony of two movements; and Beethoven's Seventh. Herr Joseph Hellmesberger (the hereditary prince) played with uncommon elegance and correctness Bach's Violin Concerto, so often — nay, almost exclusively — selected by him. Mme. Clementine Schuch-Procha chose two Mozartean airs, one of which (from Idomeneo) moves in a simple and expressive cantilena, while the other (that of the Queen of Night) contains the most brilliant specimens of scale and staccato bravura in the highest notes. The lady's voice sounded full and fresh through the hall, which possesses excellent acoustic qualities, and her artistic delivery, remarkable for its good taste, elicited a storm of applause. The arrangements in the spacious but somewhat bare Aula of the Salzburg Gymnasium were the same as they were two years ago, and perfectly satisfactory. The applause could not have been warmer or more prolonged. The attendance, however, especially in the foremost and dearest reserved seats, was unfortunately not so numerous as it should have been on the occasion of such a pleasing event, simply of incalculable value to Salzburg, as the performance of the Philharmonic. That a large portion of the local nobility and of the high clergy should omit to seize the opportunity of proving their sense for art was an especial subject of regret.

The second concert (Friday's) failed, on the whole, to go off so successfully as the first, and could hardly be heard to the end without a considerable feeling of weariness. In the first place, a summer's evening is not favorable to grand concerts; the heat soon becomes oppressive, and the artificial illumination, struggling with the daylight from without, looks dull and gloomy. Of all the pieces in the programme, by far the strongest impression was produced—as on so very many previous occasions—by Beethoven's Leonore Overture, No. 3. Coming immediately after this fiery stream of tone, Mozart's Concerto for Two Pianos was inevitably too pale. It is pleasing society-music, for the most part conventional in purport, and of a style of virtuosity long since left behind; at any rate, the first movement would have been quite sufficient in so very long a programme. The charming concerted playing of the Brothers Thern could not prevent the work in its entirety from wearying the audience, the more especially, as there was rather a good deal of Mozart played in succession: the Piano-forte Concerto in three movements, Susanna's "Garden Air," which Mme. Schuch-Proska repeated by desire, and the E-flat major Symphony in four movements. To these must be added Beethoven's Violin Concerto, so nearly related in form and expression to the style of Mozart. Herr M. Graun, the Concertmeister, exhibited astounding dash and lasting power in two grand cadences, but unfortunately often fell foul of pure intonation. During the whole Festival Richard Wagner was represented by only two short pieces: the prelude to the third act of Die Meistersinger and Hanns Sachs's monologue, "Was duftelt doch der Flieder." Including as they do so many more important and more effective compositions by Wagner among their stock pieces, the members of the Philharmonic might have been expected to make a more appropriate selection. Hanns Sachs's monologue belongs, it is true, to the purest and most characteristic scenes of the opera, but in a concert-room is very unthankful for the vocalist and not very intelligible to an audience unfamiliar with Die Meistersinger. Still more unintelligible, when torn out of the opera, must be the short prelude to the third act. But supposing the two pieces to be once set down for the second concert, the prelude ought most undoubtedly to have been given immediately after the monologue, and thus they would have mutually explained and enhanced each other. Why Herr Richter inserted between these two Meistersinger fragments an air by Mozart and Beethoven's Violin Concerto is not very clear to us. The singer charged to give the Hanns Sachs monologue was Dr. Emil Kraus, formerly a member of the Imperial Opera House, Vienna, and now first baritone at the Cologne Theatre. He acquitted himself of his difficult and not very thankful task in a masterly manner. We found his voice stronger and more ringing, and his style more expressive, than during his Vienna engagement, and the capital is most truly a loser by his secession. He would be a valuable acquisition not merely for the Opera House, but for oratorios and concerts in Vienna.

The third and last concert of the Festival was restricted to the domain of chamber-music, pianoforte compositions, and songs, the orchestra taking no part in it. Two ladies—the Countess Spaur, a virtuosa on the harp, and a Mile. Brünnicke, a concert-singer from Magdeburg—sent apologies for their absence through indisposition, so Mme. Schuch-Proska reigned even more than on the previous evening as undisputed queen. After giving two well-known songs by Schumann and Mendelssohn, with pleasing expression, but a not over-intelligible style of pronunciation, she was led on, amid continuous applause, by Dr. Kraus, with whom she sang the duet "Reich' mir die Hand, mein Leben," from Don Juan. This piece, not included in the programme, and, so to speak, something extempore, was naturally welcomed here above all places with unbounded satisfaction. Dr. Kraus achieved, too, with his songs (Brahms, Robert Franz, and J. Sucher) complete success. The string-quartet was represented by Herren Grün, Karl Hofmann, Zöllner, and Giller, of Vienna, and the piano by the Brothers Thern, who executed, in masterly fashion, on two pianos, Schumann's Andante with Variations, Beethoven's Turkish March, and a Waltz by Chopin. This matinée was of a more unpretending and more homely character than the two evening concerts; it seemed, however, to satisfy the audience none the less for that, but, on the contrary, to suit their taste exceptionally well.

A grand musical gathering, with concerts on three days, and festive arrangements of every description, may certainly with perfect justice be entitled a Musical Festival. But the local organ of the "International Mozart Institute" is in error when it claims for that Institute the merit of having been the first "to pave the way for naturalizing in Austria musical festivals such as have long been living realities on the banks of the Rhine, in Germany." The Salzburg Festival has neither the character nor the importance of the German meetings. These are carried out by the combined efforts of all the musical resources of an entire province. For instance, all the orchestral and vocal associations of the surrounding country coöperate in the musical festivals of the Lower Rhine, which are held alternately at Düsseldorf, Cologne, and Aix-la-Chapelle; every musician or amateur is ready with his voice or his instrument, and the different choral unions, of which the female members, married and unmarried, belong to the best classes, study all through the winter the oratorios chosen for the following Whitsuntide. On this account the German Musical Festivals are important events for the whole population, and a means of national musical education of incalculable value. Here in Salzburg, on the contrary, the coöperation of home-artists and amateurs is entirely wanting; as at the first, so at this second, festival, there appears to have been a certain marked intention to exclude local instrumentalists and singers. As long as the so-called "Way-Paver" does not employ local executants and complete the programmes by grand choral music, we can properly speak only of Philharmonic Concerts given in Salzburg by the band of the Imperial Opera House, Vienna, supplemented by two or three soloists. The inhabitants of the Rhenish Provinces take part themselves in the performance, while the Salzburgers listen to others,—that is the difference. When Baron Sterneck succeeds in musically educating the population of Salzburg—nationally, and not internationally—we will willingly call him a "Way-Paver" for Mozart. The "International Mozart Institute" has, on the occasion of this second Musical Festival, issued a report, carefully and zealously prepared by its secretary, Herr Johann Ev. Engl. The report is headed by a biography and portrait of the president of the "International Mozart Institute," Baron Carl von Sterneck, Imperial and Royal Superior Finance Inspector, on the Retired List, for Salzburg. Then comes an exhaustive statement of the financial position of the Institute from 1869 to 1879. Two years ago I frankly expressed in these columns certain misgivings caused in my mind by the exceedingly numerous and high-flying—but at the same time obscure—plans of the association. It was therefore with all the greater interest that I took up the last report, which of course shows officially what, after ten years' existence, the "International Mozart Institute" has realized of its lofty plans,—what it has positively effected.

I own that, from the strong tone of self-satisfaction taken by the "Mozart Institute," I expected some important practical results. But though the minute accounts of the Festival-Report afford evidence of astounding and indefatigable zeal on the part of the committee in making the "International Mozart Institute" known and famous throughout, and even beyond the limits of Europe, they leave us in a romantic semi-obscure as to what we really owe the Institute. We are informed that a fully empowered agent of the Institute undertook two long "canvassing journeys" through Germany; that a second such agent went as far as Paris, London, and Egypt; that "applications were made to the directors of German railways for free traveling in the service of the Institute;" and that "artistically ornamented applications were sent to reigning princes that they would be pleased to subsidize the Institute." Recourse is had to "advertising placards for watering-places, hotels, and railway stations;" "honorary diplomas in artistic envelopes" to Baron Hofmann, Minister of State, to Count Benst, and others; "petitions to the Embassies and Consulates in Germany, Holland, Italy, and America," etc. We may well congratulate the "International Mozart Institute" on the zeal, on the persevering and courageous efforts, of its accredited agents and canvassers, who have already gathered in some fine, ringing crops. The Institute succeeded even in getting up a concert in London, with the coöperation of Mme. Patti. It possesses now a capital of nearly 23,000 florins. But in the financial returns for the last ten years we have not found the slightest hint that as much as a single kreutzer has been expended for "the support of poor musicians." Yet this humane task is, "with the foundation of a Conservatory," set forth as the most important of the many missions of the "International Mozart Institute." We fear that the epithet of "International" will be fatal, and with its boastful sound everywhere prove prejudicial to the dearest and most necessary national interests of the Institute. As the "appeal" announces, the association is to become a "Schiller Institute" for musicians. But the gentlemen know very well that the Schiller Institute cares only for German poets and authors, and never thinks of assisting also the authors of England, Spain, or any other foreign country. The Schiller Institute confines itself to one object, which it keeps well in view and consistently follows. Nor does it think of organizing prize competitions, or of erecting an International Theatrical Academy at Marbach, simply because Schiller was born there, and because, in addition, the surrounding country is beautiful. The project of establishing in Salzburg (side by side with the already existing public school of music, the Mozarteum) a new and independent Conservatory, an "International" Conservatory in the grand style, is based on a strong self-delusion of the committee, and there is something downright childish about the reason assigned (at page 59 of the pamphlet), that "by its wonderful position, placed by Humboldt on an equality with that of Naples and that of Constantinople, and its cheapness, Salzburg offers the Conservatory the most favorable conditions of success." It is only a large town, possessing an opera-house, an active concert system, and a considerable public fond of music, which can attract and retain the elements of a good Conservatory, and offer guarantees for the highest art-education of the young musician. This subject must be mooted again in these columns, because it occupies a first place among the international fancies entertained by the founders of the Salzburg Institute. But there does not seem to be any hurry, and I think I may quietly reserve for future years the continuation of my strictures. EDOUARD HANSLICK. — Lond. Mus. World.

A WORD OF WARNING.

THE PERILS OF YOUNG AMERICAN GIRLS IN EUROPEAN CITIES.

[From the American (Paris) Register.]

Two very able letters in the New York Herald have recently called attention to the peculiar trials and temptations attendant on the career of a female student of singing in Milan. The accomplished correspondent evidently was well acquainted with the facts of the case, and set them forth in a vivid and effective manner. Yet it does not need a residence in Milan itself to awaken the American dweller in Europe to a sense of the very striking objections that exist to the sojourn of a young American girl, alone and unprotected, in any of the large cities of continental Europe. To send a young girl to any one of those cities to study singing under these conditions is simply to place her on the high road to perdition. She may not journey to that dreadful goal. We are proud to say that there are many brave hearts and pure souls among our young girl students of singing that can encounter unscathed the perils of even so terrible an ordeal. But those perils exist, and, instead of ignoring them, it is the duty of all those who become acquainted with them to point them out and render them visible to the eyes of those who may be called upon to encounter them. Our American girls, possessing the traditional beauty of their nationality, and with their frank, free ways, gained in the one land on earth where innocence is its own safeguard, and the weakness of womanhood is its own best protection, are peculiarly unfitted to cope with the ways and wiles of European cities. An American gentleman, for instance, who was long a student of singing at Milan, once told the writer of these lines that there existed in that city a band of men who made it their business to sit in front of the cafés of that city to watch for the newly arrived American girls, as a hunter watches for the pheasant or the stag that he intends to slay. And these men being, as a rule, handsome, accomplished, and fascinating, they are all the better prepared to hunt down their prey.

Let us imagine the would-be prima donna as she comes abroad, alone, unguarded, armed only with her fair face, her fresh, young voice and the inexperience of her twenty years. These years have probably been passed in the tranquil seclusion of some New England town or Western village. She has been the star of the principal church choir, and the reigning musical sensation at all the tea-parties. Her voice is considered equal to that of Nilsson by those who have heard the Swedish songstress, and consequently are well prepared to give an opinion. It is thought a shame that such talent and such gifts should be left undeveloped. Sympathizing friends make up a purse for the young singer, or some one wealthy amateur generously undertakes to defray the expenses of her musical education. She comes to Milan, and without preparation or transition she finds herself at once swept into the whirl of the corrupt, brilliant life of a great European city. Poor, frail, helpless bark, launched rudderless and captainless upon a stormy sea, what wonder is it if disaster and wreck overtake it? And her little store of money is just so much bait to have the pirate crew of impresarios and teachers set all sail in pursuit. It is, too, an undeniable fact that the manners and habits of American girls, innocent as their harmless freedoms of speech and manners may be, are such as to repel the best classes of Italian women. The respectable Italian girl, of the middle classes especially, is bred up in almost Oriental seclusion, surpassing in that respect even her French contemporary. She sits in the house knitting stockings or studying her breviary, and she looks with reprehension on the fair-faced, free-mannered foreigners, with their gay attire and coquettish ways. Thus are the new-comers shut out from companionship that might aid them in learning the ways and manners of the stranger land. On the contrary, they are thrown in contact with a fast set, both from England and the United States, who have come to Italy ostensibly to study, but in reality to have "a good time." And the consequences of such association can better be imagined than described.

We repeat that we do not mean to say that there are not many American girls who go to study music in Milan, and who, nevertheless, pass triumphant and unscathed through all the trials and temptations of their career. We can, on the contrary, point with pride to such ornaments to their sex and their chosen profession as Mme. Emma Albani, Miss Thursby, and Miss Abbott. But the fact remains the same as set forth by the Milan correspondent. They are patent to any resident in Europe who is interested in the career of his or her young countrywomen who go to that city to study music.

TALKS ON ART. — SECOND SERIES.¹

FROM INSTRUCTIONS OF MR. WILLIAM M. HUNT TO HIS PUPILS.

XII.

WHAT are you doing?

"Trying to draw that tea-pot."

There's a great deal of time wasted in trying.

"But I can't get it right."

Make up your mind that you can't get it right. Don't try to get it so very exact. At the same time you need not try not to. You can't do your best when you're trying. You act as if this were your last chance for redemption. Make a joke of it, — a recreation.

It is n't what you see, but what you feel, that will make your work interesting. You can look at a thing and see it, but that's nothing. You can look at something which may give you an emotion. That's feeling!

Facts don't amount to anything. Cyclopedias are full of them. It's an individual's expression of a thing that's interesting.

Paint as if putting on plaster; here, there, there. Let it lie. Then unite with a clean brush.

You could paint that face in fifteen minutes if you knew what to do, which shows what tremendous margin you can allow your mind without taxing it. If you know the form of that face you can draw it. See how you draw from memory! You don't think of that sonata which you heard yesterday afternoon. We always move one peg along. You can sit and look at that face and learn just as well as if you had charcoal, oil, water-color, varnish, and a frame. A great saving of time and materials. Look at it half an hour every day, and you could paint it. If you gaze at a thing with any kind of thought you get an impression.

¹ Copyright, 1879, by Helen M. Knowlton.

Perfect simplicity of expression! In this country only martyrs attain to it. Abraham Lincoln had it. John Brown had it. I saw the latter refuse oysters once at a party, because "he was not hungry." I said to a friend, — and Brown was not celebrated then, not having been hanged! — "There's something remarkable about that man! Did you ever know a man to refuse oysters at a party because he was not hungry?" He did not take champagne because he was "not thirsty." Held the glass as you would hold a doll for a baby. Was not going to gorge himself, — a man with such a destiny and such a work before him!

You could draw that spinning-wheel so that it would make you buzz to look at it. It ought to sing with the play of light and color. Millet would have done it with the utmost simplicity, but with extreme care. Draw it, in every detail, with perfect accuracy, and then simplify it. Make it look fat.

That portrait was painted almost wholly with terre-verte brulée, which is so neutral that if you add white you get a tender yellow. It has the umbery quality, like the shadow of gold. Harmonizes with anything. Can work it into everything, it is so tender and sympathetic. You can change it to almost everything.

It takes no longer to make a memory-sketch than to tie up your shoe-strings; and it is just as much an object for you to draw as to put on your shoes.

You keep your hands going, going. If you knew how to paint as you know how to make an 8, you could do it.

I don't believe in the modern French school. The true French masters came in a great wave, which began with Géricault, and ended with Daubigny. All the facile doing of the men of to-day counts not at all, and never will. It is merely a mercantile development. These men might have painted differently. It is this looking after perfection that I tell you not to do. Do what you do while you do it! with thumbs or elbows. There's going to be painting that is perfectly simple, — the simple expression of simple forms. To do this a man must be tremendously strong.

Dwight's Journal of Music.

SATURDAY, AUGUST 30, 1879.

BOOK REVIEWS.

THE PHILOSOPHY OF MUSIC. By WILLIAM POLE, Mus. Doc., Oxon., etc. Boston: Houghton, Osgood & Co. 1879.

THIS handsome duodecimo of 316 pages contains the substance of a course of lectures delivered at the Royal Institution of Great Britain in February and March, 1877. It is an attempt to construct a philosophy of music upon the basis of the important discoveries of the profound German physicist Helmholtz, as embodied in his great work "Die Lehre von den Tonempfindungen," etc. (The Doctrine of the Perception of Musical Sounds, considered as a Physiological Basis for the Theory of Music.) Dr. Pole has evidently a scientific turn of mind, is skeptical of mere traditions and conjectures, trusts no idealisms, but follows Helmholtz's critical method of inquiry in getting at the natural facts and laws which underlie the questions and the practices of musical art, being particularly bent on finding the division line between what is dictated by natural laws, and what must be relegated to the vague region of æsthetics. We could wish that he were a little clearer in his definition of æsthetics, and that he had also entered into the possibly fruitful inquiry, whether that also has not its philosophy, its natural laws. Indeed, from the way in which he dismisses several questions, we rather get the impression that he uses the term æsthetic as tantamount to arbitrary, and mere matter of shifting taste and custom. Be this as it may, the book is full of valuable suggestion and instruction; and in a singularly clear and readable way presents the history of these inquiries, sums up the results of what others have written, such men as Ramcau, Hauptmann, etc., and is really a complete, though brief, survey of all that is essential to an intelligent general idea of that very subtle, complicated art called Music.

He treats the subject under three heads: I. The Material of Music, i. e., musical sounds. II. Elementary Arrangements of the Material, i. e., the selection out of the infinite variety of sounds, and the arrangement into scales of such sounds as may be available for use. III. The Structure of Music, including Melody, Harmony, Counterpoint, in fact, musical composition of whatever form.

Under the first head he enumerates the important works on Acoustics; shows how sound is produced, transmitted, and perceived; what are the special characteristics of musical sounds, their pitch, their strength, their individual character (color, timbre), explaining this last from the grand discovery of Helmholtz, his doctrine of "overtones" (harmonics); ending with a very interesting chapter on the theoretical nature of the sounds of all the various kinds of musical instruments, including the various qualities of human voices, matters upon which Helmholtz has shed a vast deal of light. We cannot see how all this portion of the task could have been more satisfactorily executed within such limits.

Part II. treats, of course, of musical intervals and scales; traces the history of the musical scale; inquires into the theoretical nature of the diatonic scale (both the ancient and the modern), and to what extent it is founded on natural laws; discusses the Greek and the Church modes, the modern tonality, and the modern diatonic scale as influenced by harmony; the chromatic and the minor scale, systems of temperament, etc., ending with a chapter on Time, Rhythm, and Musical Form.

In all this there is much that is sound and excellent; but it is just here that we meet with symptoms of what seems to us an undue leaning to the skeptical and empirical way of dealing with the question. We say the question, for the true theory of the musical scale is the question whose solution solves all the other questions here involved. Now the author, while he cautions us against the one extreme of supposing the succession of sounds in the scale to be entirely empirical and arbitrary, speaks of the opposite error of "deducing all the notes of the scale from harmonic relations," and seems to find sufficient ground for calling this an error in the fact that scales existed before harmony was known. He admits the natural origin of two intervals, the octave and the fifth; but declares that the other steps are "irregular," and "were originally settled by artificial means." They may have been originally settled so; practice in most matters precedes theory; instinct gropes its way to uses long before the laws underlying them can be determined. But does this prove that the musical scale — our modern diatonic scale — is not founded in natural laws of sound? What is the beautiful law of "overtones," then, good for? The scale is a trinity; all its tones spring from three roots (to use a term to which Dr. Pole seems to have an unreasonable aversion). Those three roots, or fundamentals, are indispensable to any music; without them no unity, no musical progression, melodic or harmonic, is possible. Every melody must have its central tone, or tonic, or keynote; but melody must move, and its first step must be to some tone, which is either one of its own simplest harmonics, or one of the harmonics of its fifth or dominant, or of that tone of which it is itself in the same way the fifth, that is, the subdominant. Now the first overtones of the tonic give us the third and fifth of the scale; those of the dominant give the second and the seventh; the subdominant, with its overtones, gives the fourth and the sixth. There we have all the tones of the scale. Why is this not a natural origin? All that strikes us as artificial or empirical about it is the limitation of the scale to the conveniences of use. It were easy to imagine a much lengthier scale of many more degrees by taking in the higher overtones. It would facilitate the right understanding of the matter if we would write our scale differently; i. e., if, instead of rising from C to its octave, we should put the keynote in the centre and go from F, subdominant, up to C, then from C up to G dominant. This is music reduced to the simplest practicable system. But the semitones (chromatics, accidentals) have equally a natural origin. For in the first place we must never forget that all melody implies harmony. Now, if in passing from the tonic harmony, or centre of rest, into a tone belonging to another root, as the dominant, say G, we conclude to stay there for a while, making that the keynote and centre, then comes in an accidental; the seventh must be sharped; or if we pay F a visit and abide there, we need a flattened fourth, and so on from key to key until we have all the semitones and the chromatic scale. The old Greek scales, or modes, were only gropings after the true ideal scale which is founded in nature. As Goethe saw in a fish only a sheathed man, not having got its legs and arms out, so the Greek scale, lacking the semitones while harmony remained unknown, was only an imperfect, "sheathed" scale, waiting to get its legs and arms out, or its means of freer movement and of modulation. Really its several "modes," Lydian, Dorian, etc., were all one scale, only beginning at different points, and that the same as our diatonic scale, but unavailable for modulation. This may not be a scientific (for we are no scientist), but it does seem to us to be a rational, a natural, a simple explanation of the matter. Of course we can only touch upon one or two of the questions arising in this part of the work.

Part III. is after all the most important, treating as it does of the actual structure of music, — musical art as such. • Its chapters on Melody (which it rightly calls the oldest form, but how can he say the "essential basis" of music?); on the history of Harmony, its theoretical rules and systems, its elementary and its compound combinations, or chords, with Helmholtz's physical theory of consonances and dissonances; on Harmonic Progressions, etc., are all extremely valuable, although we might still take issue here and there with the empirical spirit to which we have already alluded. For instance, the rule forbidding parallel fifths and octaves in the progression of parts in harmony, which all musicians hold to be so essential, and which is commonly taught among the first things in the treatises on harmony, is here ignored until almost the very end of the book; and then, scarcely regarding the simple and obvious reason for the rule, which is that such fifths rudely break off the relations of tonality, he seeks in vain for better reasons. In regard to octaves he finds a good enough reason in the fact that these add nothing to the musical statement, — are a sort of musical tautology, we might say. But it is strange that the author cites a series of fifths (triads upon each note of the scale), and asserts that there is no reason in nature why they should not sound agreeably, and that in fact it is all a matter of habit that we do not find them quite as pleasing as any other chord progression! Indeed, it seems to be our author's cue to oust nature wherever it is possible, and put the whole responsibility for the rules and practices, the forms and the results, of music upon the shoulders of the æsthetic element, the taste of periods and peoples, and the inventive genius of the composers. And for this he claims justification and ground of pride when he says, near the end of his summing up: "One thing, when well considered, ought to further the acceptance of the [these] "philosophical views; namely, how much they tend to exalt the art of music, and the merits of the great composers. The ordinary belief, that everything that a great musician writes ought to be 'accounted for,' i. e., brought into conformity with some imagined natural rule, is no very complimentary tribute to his genius; it is infinitely more ennobling to believe, as the philosophical theory leads us to believe, that the musical forms are really the outcome of the composer's own art, — the offspring of his prolific imagination." A pleasant thought, indeed, and creditable to the author's sincere musical enthusiasm; but does it prove that science and imagination, any more than science and religion, ever need to quarrel? Law may cover all the ground, and still imagination will have "ample room and verge enough." Genius asks no limitary favors in the race.

But it is in his chapter on Counterpoint that our author appears to best advantage, and has our fullest sympathy. He pays a noble tribute to the transcendent worth and beauty of that old art of weaving independent (or rather individual) melodies of the four or more parts into a wondrous web of harmony, which Palestrina, and then Bach and Handel, carried to a pitch of almost divine perfection. And he mourns over the neglect into which this highest style of composition has fallen in our day. Especially would we thank him for the pregnant sentences which he translates from Hauptmann's Letters to Hauser, of which we have room at present only for this one: —

"The true meaning of harmony is, that it arises from a combination of melodies sounded simultaneously. This, which was the most important thing in olden times, is now neglected. In good modern writing, the bass is indeed given good relations to the melody, but the middle parts are filled in with rubbish simply to complete the chords. The lifted pedal will then bind the whole into a compact mass, but any organization in it is out of the question. I have nothing to say against all this, but would rather have nothing to do with it."

In conclusion we can only say, that these lectures by Dr. Pole on "The Philosophy of Music" form a book which no intelligent student of music can afford not to read and ponder.

TANAGRA FIGURINES. Boston: Houghton, Osgood & Co. 1879.

A FASCINATING subject, very pleasantly and instructively handled. Every lover of art, who has seen those charming little clay figures (twenty-two of them) presented to the Boston Art Museum by T. G. Appleton, Esq., must have felt a keen desire to know more about them, of their date and origin, the age and people that produced, the motive that inspired them, and the uses for which they were intended. It is, as the author says, "a singular and hitherto unsuspected branch of Greek art, but newly divulged, and already popularized in Europe," that is here investigated. About one thousand of these figurines have been taken from the two thousand tombs which within the last forty years have been explored in the old fortified town of Tanagra, in Boeotia, and distributed through the Museums of the Louvre, of Berlin, and of Great Britain, as well as in private collections. They are the admiration of all who have seen them. Little realistic figures of from six to twelve inches in length, full of grace and beauty, bearing the marks of having been originally colored and even gilded, showing the costume and the airs and manners of their place and time, they speak unmistakably of a period of high development in plastic art. And indeed Tanagra, although Boeotian, — a name that has become a byword for what is rustic, dull, and stupid, — stood on the borders of Attica, near Athens, near Thebes and Aulis (!) where the Greeks embarked for the siege of Troy; and these miniature examples of ancient "picto-sculpture" were coeval with the high period of Attic sculpture between three and four centuries before Christ.

It is singular that in all this time Thebes and Athens were in chronic warfare, and Tanagra was frequently their battle ground; but the artistic tie with Athens was none the less strong. Several other things are singular about these little images. One thing is, that nearly all of them are female figures, and draped; only a very few are nude, or semi-nude, or figures of men. Then they are nearly all so realistic; they seem like portraits of actual people of the time, as you might meet them in the streets, in the very costume that they wore, their curious heart-shaped fans, strange parasol-like coverings of the head, their life-like attitudes, their way of folding their arms under the dress, etc. In only a few instances is any ideal design apparent, anything mythological, emblematic, or patriotic. These few suggest to the author the question whether possibly they may not all be memorials of some great national religious festival. But the strangest trait in common with them all is, that they are nearly all cheerful in expression. "Tanagra figurines are often very pensive, but grief, and all dark passions, are banished from their company. It is strange not to find in the house of death anything kindred to the legends of Niobe and Laocöon, no armor or implements of war where the din of armies resounded so familiarly. Even the Huntress Queen appears with an empty quiver, and Eros, the laughing, winged boy, comes quite disarmed. Search through the entire known list of Tanagra ceramics, and you will not find a note discordant with the expression of peace, gladness, sportiveness, tempered with a mood of pleased attention, or repose. Do not all these figures appear as if forming parts of some dramatic combination, either as actors or as spectators in a joyful celebration?"

Whatever the solution of the enigma, we must all be thankful to the authoress — who, we are told, is a Boston lady who has resided much in Paris — for the valuable information and the fine description which she has embodied in this attractive little volume. It contains good photographs of thirteen of the figurines.

HERMANN GOETZ: HIS CANTATA, "NENIA."

THE genius of this lamented young German composer seems to be more and more recognized abroad, especially in London. First we heard of him through his comic opera on Shakespeare's "Taming of the Shrew," which we believe Carl

Rosa will introduce into his next season's programme. Then came his Symphony in F (posthumous), admired and played repeatedly in Germany and England, and which it is the intention of the Harvard Musical Association to present in our next season of symphony concerts. This was followed by various works of instrumental chamber music, all mentioned with praise in the London musical journals. More recently a couple of choral works have been produced and published there. The first, a psalm, "By the Waters of Babylon," and now "Nenia," set to a short lament in hexameter and pentameter verses by Schiller, have excited such attention that our own Boylston Club thinks of performing one or both of them next winter. The latter is reviewed in the London Musical Times as follows: —

NENIA (Poem by Schiller). For Chorus and Orchestra. Composed by HERMANN GOETZ (Op. 10). The English version by the Rev. J. TROUTBECK, M. A. Novello, Ewer & Co.

When, some short while ago, this work was performed at a concert given by an amateur choral society, we dwelt at such length upon its character and merits that very little remains now to be said. We could not, however, refuse a formal review to a thing of so much beauty and worth, while the fact is incontestable by anybody who has seen this music that public attention cannot, in reason, be too persistently denuded for it. Of one thing we are sure, which is that no amateur who heard Goetz's Psalm, "By the Waters of Babylon," at the initial concert of the London Musical Society, will fail to turn to the work now before us with eager expectation and high hope. The cantata is worthy of the psalm, as the psalm is worthy of any genius vouchsafed to us in modern times. In both there are surprising power, masterful knowledge of technical means and effect, and that incommunicable and inexplicable something which constitutes the quality of greatness. Alas! that we so early lost this master of music, and did not know what a treasure we possessed till after he had been called to rest from his brief and ill-requited labors. But this, in our art, is the real "old, old story," — one that will probably go on till the end of time.

The cantata sets out, after a lengthened and most attractive orchestral prelude, with the motto of the whole work, "And the Beautiful must Perish," enunciated by the chorus in unaccompanied harmony, and followed by a contrapuntal movement, "What vanquishes men and immortals?" Here the conspicuous freedom with which Goetz wrote under such conditions is fully asserted, but the music is never open to the charge of being merely scholastic. Like a true master, Goetz ever kept in view the highest function of his art as an expression of feeling, and could subordinate all things to it. The chorus closes with a repetition of the "motto," and then a tenor solo, quasi recitativo, followed by another for alto, and yet another for bass, makes reference to a case from classic lore in which no power could redeem the dead from the grave. One is reminded here of the grace and beauty with which Mendelssohn illustrated the tragedies of Sophocles; and, indeed, the whole work proves Goetz to have been no stranger to the form and spirit that composer may be said to have invented in "Antigone." At the close of the recitatives we have a chorus in C sharp minor, "But forth she came from the sea," which is from first to last instinct with charm. It would be impossible for us to convey in mere words an idea of the pure loveliness here found. One thinks of Mendelssohn at his best when reading these pages, while all the time conscious of an element which only Goetz could have supplied. The chorus is long extended, but not too long. We can afford to linger over such beauty, and even then feel regret that "the beautiful must perish." In due course, the chorus leads directly to a kind of epilogue (also choral), wherein we find consolation for the evanescence of noble and lovely lives. "Yet a death song upraised by the lips of affection is glorious," sings the poet, adding, "He that is mean and base passes unwept to the grave." Here Goetz draws together all his energies for a supreme effort, and the result is grand. What earnest, exalted, and expressive music have we now! It is both strong and tender, like all great things in art. Take, for example, the passage, "He that is mean and base," etc., wherein, by the way, we see another reflection of Mendelssohn's spirit. We know but little that is more powerfully true to poetic purport than this, but, indeed, a like observation is applicable to the whole cantata, which should henceforth be a precious possession in the hands of English amateurs. If it be said that we have written a rhapsody instead of a review, our only answer is, that everybody who makes the acquaintance of this work will admit the inevitableness of a rhapsody, and grant the needlessness of a review.

A NEW symphonic composition, Francesca da Rimini, by Bassini, was performed at the thirty-third Popular Concert in Turin.

MUSICAL CORRESPONDENCE.

DEFIANCE, O., AUG. 16. — The Musical Institute in session here this summer, under the direction of Prof. S. H. Blakeslee and J. B. Leslie, assisted by Mrs. Ida B. Blakeslee, Mrs. J. B. Leslie, Prof. George A. Andrews, and J. M. Blakeslee, closed on Friday, August 8, with a concert, presenting the following programme: —

PART I.
Von Bree's German Cantata "Saint Cecilia's Day."
PART II.
Violin, De Beriot's 6th Air De Beriot.
Mr. George Andrews.
Solo, "Spring Flowers" Reinecke.
Miss Vic Bevington.
Violin Obligato.
Mr. George Andrews.
C-minor Concerto (Beethoven), with Cadenza . . Reinecke.
Mrs. Ida Blakeslee.
Orchestral part upon second piano.
Mr. George Andrews.
Vocal Solo, "Waiting" Millard.
Mrs. F. G. Brown.
Violin Obligato.
Mr. George Andrews.
Piano Duet, "Invitation à la Danse" . . . Von Weber.
Mr. and Mrs. Leslie, Mr. and Mrs. Blakeslee.
Chorus, Soldiers' Chorus, "Faust."

For us this was a pretty solid programme; but its admirable execution rendered it very enjoyable. The Cantata, with a chorus of sixty voices, supported by two pianos, and with Mr. S. H. Blakeslee as director, went off finely from the first to the last note.

Mr. Andrews in his "6th Air" showed himself a thorough student, a master of his instrument.

Of course the great event of the evening was the C-minor Concerto with the Cadenza; first, because it was the first time such a composition has ever been performed in this city; and second, because the selection showed the lady's splendid technique to the best advantage. The Concerto was played in a beautiful and artistic style, and the Cadenza with a steady repose, yet a fire and determination fully worthy of it, while the octave passage was terrific (!)

The work throughout the entire term has been most satisfactory. The membership in the various classes averaged in voice culture, 40; sight reading and psalmody, 40; harmony, 30; teachers' class, 20; chorus, 65; pupils in private classes, 42. Surely this marks an epoch in our musical history. "The Philharmonics" begin regular practice September 1.

PHILADELPHIA, AUG. 20. — A new horror has appeared in the musical world. As if amateur and church choir opera companies had not degraded performance and criticism to a sufficiently low level, we must have added to our list of horrors this new one of the "Baby Opera Troupe," brought out under the management of the American padrone, Mr. J. T. Ford, at the South Broad Street Theatre.

The "Baby Pinafore" paid so well that it has been followed by a "Baby Fatinitza," and there is no setting limits just now to the future family of Baby Operas. As long as the public supports by its presence, and the press indorses by its criticism, these crude and unwholesome performances will doubtless continue, for the only question to be answered is, does it pay? All this indicates a low taste in the public, and an ignorance in the critics, which is as inexcusable as lamentable. There may be "millions in it," but there is also a crowd of evils — moral, artistic, physical, and educational — which should demand a halt! in such enterprises from our philanthropists, moralists, teachers, and physicians.

Some little flurry has visited our quiet town in these dog-days over the removal of the "Permanent Exhibition" building ordered by the Park Commission. The general verdict with reflecting minds is that the Park Commission has done right. The "Exhibition" has never enjoyed the confidence or sympathy of our public, and has now degenerated into a mean show on Sundays and a doubtful ball on Wednesdays.

Carl Santy with his military band has had a successful season at the Mûnnerchor Garden Concerts given nightly, and will continue a few weeks yet.

The festivals of the Swiss, Turners, and Bavarians have given great delight to the participants, but did not develop anything new or interesting enough in music worth chronicling in this correspondence.

Aimée's Opera Bouffe Company is announced at the North Broad Street Theatre; Alice Oates' troupe at Arch Street Theatre, but no important movements in music have yet been made known publicly. There may be a local orchestra established either by a revived Musical Fund Society, a rejuvenated Germania Society, or perhaps by a grand combination of talent, wealth, and influence, the locale to be the Academy of Music. This latter movement is yet in embryo, but, if it is started, will be attended with a prestige sufficiently powerful to give it a good send-off, and surround its entertainments with success and éclat. More cannot be said at present, as circumstances may change the programme.

The small value of the critiques in our local papers, with a few noble exceptions, has taught the musical portion of the public that they must resort to the journals devoted to this specialty for a truthful and exhaustive treatment of art subjects, and hence there is, with us at least, a more generous support of such enterprises. Among professional ladies and gentlemen this class of journals has grown in appreciation, and has become to them a necessity. AMERICUS.

NOTES AND GLEANINGS.

MR. MAX STRAKOSCH has completed his arrangements for the fall and winter season of Italian opera in the United States. They promise a series of representations of unusual brilliancy. Mr. Strakosch's prima donna drammatist is Mme. Teresa Singer, an artist whose Italian career has been remarkably successful. Mme. Singer's last engagement was fulfilled in Rome, and the dilettanti of the Eternal City—who make up the most critical audience in Italy—were unanimous in their admiration of the latest representative of Norma and Aida. The soprano of the company is Signorina Bianca Lablanche, a young prima donna of American birth, who has won great distinction in Italy, and especially in Naples. Mlle. Litta, the prima donna soprano, whose brilliant début in Paris caused Mr. Strakosch to secure her services for America last year, has been re-engaged for the approaching season. Mlle. Anna de Beocsa, a very gifted and beautiful songstress, whose progress in her art has been continuous since her first appearance in London, is the contralto of the company. Mr. Strakosch is quite as well provided for in respect of male artists. Signor Ricardo Petrovich, a performer of European reputation, heads the list of tenors, which includes, besides Signor Baldanza and Signor Lazzarini, two young and promising singers. Signor Storti and Signor Gottschalk are the baritones, Signor Castlemar the baritone basso, and Mr. Carl Formes the principal bass. The novelties announced are Boito's Mefistofele and Goldmark's Queen of Sheba, and the repertoire is also to be enriched by several of the grand compositions of the old school, which are become almost unfamiliar in the New World, as Mme. Singer is the first dramatic songstress who has been heard there for a good many years. — London Musical World.

SINGING is one of the healthiest exercises in which men, women, and children can engage. The Medical Wochenschrift, of St. Petersburg, has an article based upon exhaustive researches made by Professor Monassein during the autumn of 1878, when he examined 222 singers ranging between the ages of nine and fifty-three. He laid chief weight upon the growth and absolute circumference of the chest, upon the comparative relation of the latter to the tallness of the subject, and upon the pneumonometric and spirometric condition of the singer. It appears to be an ascertained fact from Dr. Monassein's experiments that the relative, and even the absolute, circumference of chest is greater among singers than among those who do not sing, and that it increases with the growth and age of the singer. The professor even says that singing may be placed physically as the antithesis of drinking spirituous liquors. The latter hinders, while the former promotes, the development of the chest. While milder forms of catarrh are frequent among singers, bronchial catarrh is exceedingly rare. The mortality of singers from phthisis is unfrequent. Bright's disease, on the contrary, is not unfrequent among them, which is also the case with non-drinkers. Nervous and impatient mortals, whose tempers are set on edge whenever the young woman next door seeks refuge in well-meant but too vehement song, will do well to bear in mind that singing is to be commended as a valuable prophylactic for persons who are phthisically inclined!

THEATRICAL ORCHESTRAS. — The following "remarks" are from the Philadelphia Bulletin: "The lover of dramatic art who likes to think, amid the warmth of this summer weather, that playwrights and managers and actors are hard at work preparing for his entertainment treats which he will richly enjoy when the cold winds of autumn come, and when the air of the city, now tremulous with torrid heat, shall be full of frostiness, experiences a pang as he remembers that all the leaders of the theatrical orchestras also are making toilsome preparations for the season. And not only are these persons hunting among the comic songs and the comic operas for airs which they will work into medleys with dreadful variations, but there is an awful possibility that the men who play the cornet are filling themselves with wind at the sea side, and that the drummers are gathering health in the mountains, or mayhap acquiring new strength of muscle by performing gymnastic evolutions at the Turners' picnic. The editor of Dwight's Journal of Music recently urged that 'even to the poorest opera we can grant one virtue, if it had no other, namely, the silence between the acts.' It is possible to conceive of a theatrical orchestra which might under certain conditions contribute something to the pleasure of an evening that is spent in a theatre. There might be a collection of skilled musicians who should produce, under good leadership, music which should be so nicely fitted to the sentiment of the drama as to contribute something to its interpretation. It is, however, likely that even such an orchestra would often do more to mar than to help the entertainment. But the ordinary theatrical orchestra is not first-rate in quality, and the music with which it supplies the public is insolently independent of any of the motives of the drama. There are honorable exceptions even in this city, but the practice of managers is to procure the cheapest orchestra that can be had, and to reduce the number of players so far that the leader is compelled first to beat time a little and then to fiddle a little, so as to help to swell the harmony. As a rule, the music supplied by the leader is selected with special reference to the tastes of the third tier. If 'Sweet By-and-By' is popular upon the street, he will serve up 'Sweet By-and-By,' first as a solo for the cornet player with superhuman lungs, then as a duet for the flutes, and then as a theme for the violins; then he will take 'Sweet By-and-By' and ravel it out, and twist it around, and double it up, and frill it with trills, and run it up the scale and down the scale, and bang it out with the cymbals, and rattle it off upon the drums, winding up with a grand crash upon all the instruments. If all the boot-blacks are whistling 'Grandfather's Clock,' he will serve that dismal tune up in more ways than those in which a French cook can dress a dish of hash, and he will troll it out with an obligato of heels from the audience in the gallery. 'Pinafore' hardly reached this country before the leaders of the theatre orchestras dashed at it, disemboweled it, and tooted and twanged and thumped its melodies night after night between the acts of comedies, farces, tragedies, burlesques, extravaganzas, and sentimental dramas; and we venture to say that half of the leaders have been sweltering all the summer with efforts to devise new combinations of those old melodies: to construct new infernal machines to pop and jingle amid the rattle of the music, and to invent contrivances which will persuade the small boy up-stairs to rest a moment from the crunching of the peanut, and to express his delight by a more vehement whistling upon his fingers. The writer of this once went with a highly-gifted musician to a theatre to see a great actress in a great drama. The music between the acts was singularly poor and inapt, and when the musician was asked how he endured it, he said, 'I made up my mind not to listen to it.' Possibly the majority of persons who have musical sense and musical knowledge make an effort to get by the difficulty in the same manner."

FOREIGN.

HANDEL'S WILL AND OTHER RELICS. — The London Musical Times of August 1 has the following report of a remarkable auction sale of the "Snoxell Collection," including Handel's will and many Handelian relics:—

Messrs. Puttick and Simpson have recently sold a remarkable collection of curiosities under the above title. At the first day's sale (June 9) they disposed of the miniatures and enamels, more than 300 lots, including a few portraits of deceased musicians. On the second day about 200 lots of paintings and medallions, bronzes, china, etc., were sold. Many of these were interesting to musical amateurs, notably an oil-painting by Wollgang, representing George Frederic Handel; although the resemblance to other portraits of Handel was not striking, the picture was engraved almost immediately after it was painted, and it was therefore interesting to compare the somewhat scarce engraving with its original. On the third day of the sale nearly 200 lots of "mechanical automata, musical instruments, Handelian relics, clocks and watches, ornamental ornaments, etc.," were brought under the auctioneer's hammer. A more extraordinary collection of articles it would be difficult to find—automaton rope-dancers, musicians, life-size performing organists, piping bullfinches, a phoenix pecking her breast and feeding her young with blood, dancing bears, magicians, flying birds, drummer-boys, performing elephants, and "The original anvil and hammer of the Harmonious Blacksmith from which Handel composed his celebrated air." It was somewhat depressing to find this worn-out piece of imposture and monument of enthusiastic ignorance and credulity still in existence, and it was wonderful to note that it sold for £13; but as the purchasers were Messrs. Maskelyne and Cooke, well known for their clever feats of sleight-of-hand and deception, it is to be hoped they will be able to turn the miserable lump of old iron to profitable account. We would suggest that they should arrange to have Handel's celebrated air performed on the anvil with a trumpet obligato by Fanfare. The fourth day's sale included musical instruments, statuary, theatrical dresses, jewelry, etc. The books, music, and engravings were sold on several succeeding days; and finally, on the 21st ult., the autographs and manuscripts were dispersed. Great interest was attached to the last day's sale, as it had been announced that Handel's will, in his own autograph, would be included in the catalogue. It was very generally known that Mr. Snoxell had been for years the possessor of this relic of the great composer, reference having been made to it by M. Schmecher in his life of Handel; much speculation was therefore rife as to whether the coveted prize would be bought by some of our national trustees, or whether the German Handel Society would secure it, but it was purchased by Mr. W. H. Cummings for £53. How it came to pass that various national and local institutions allowed such an opportunity to slip, it would be vain to inquire. The will is wholly in English, and is entirely in Handel's handwriting, with a fine bold signature, "George Frederic Handel," the date of the document being June, 1750; this is followed by a codicil dated August, 1756, not in Handel's autograph, but the signature, which is his, "George Frederic Handel," as before, at once suggests why he did not write the codicil himself—it is the signature of a blind man. A second codicil, signed by Handel, gives color to the supposition that at the date, March, 1757, he had partially recovered his sight; in a third codicil, dated August of the same year, the signature again appears as if written by one quite blind; and a fourth codicil, dictated and signed on the 11th of April, 1759, only three days before he died, is subscribed in a faltering and feeble hand, "G. F. Handel." This last is witnessed by Rudd and Handel's amanuensis, J. Christopher Smith; and it is interesting to note that by this document, made almost in articulo mortis, the "Royal Society of Musicians," of which Handel was a member, received a legacy of one thousand pounds, and instructions are given for the expenditure of a sum "not exceeding six hundred pounds," to erect a monument in Westminster Abbey.

The last day's sale included the inventory of Handel's household goods taken immediately after his decease: this curious document was also bought by Mr. Cummings. Handel's watch, with his name engraved on the case, was bought by an anonymous purchaser.

Mr. Snoxell, the late owner of the properties we have enumerated, was an amateur violinist, and was for many years associated with the Sacred Harmonic Society in that capacity. He also essayed to become a composer, but, judging from a published volume of his compositions now lying before us, succeeded but indifferently in his endeavors; for, although fairly free from error, they are wanting in interest, and exhibit no indication of talent.

ON June 26th a new Lobengrin was presented in M. Candideus, the American tenor, who had previously a remarkable success as Florestano, in Beethoven's Fidelio. M. Candideus proved himself the best Lobengrin ever seen on the stage in England. He executed high notes with ease and certainty, and without the slightest tendency to tremolo; and his phrasing was of the most finished kind. He was warmly applauded, and he must be considered a most valuable addition to Her Majesty's Opera. — Observer, June 28th.

MISS CLARA LOUISE KELLOGG will soon leave London for Italy, returning before the winter sets in. She purposes remaining in Europe for some time, and will probably turn her attention to oratorio.

HERE BITTER, the new German minister of finance, is well known as the author of several valuable works relating to music. In 1865, he published his book entitled, Joß. Seb. Bach; in 1866, Mozart's Don Juan und Gluck's Iphigenie; in 1869, Ueber Germinius, Handel, und Shakespeare; in 1872, Beiträge zur Geschichte des Oratoriums; and also in 1872, Verbesserte Uebersetzung des Don Juan. From this list it will be perceived that the new minister belongs to the classical school, and is no follower of the music of the future. In 1875, it was he who called into existence the Schleswig-Holstein musical festivals. Herr Bitter is decorated with the Iron Cross and several other orders.

LEIPZIG. — During the recent series of operatic performances given at Leipzig by the company of the Hamburg Stadt-Theatre, much enthusiasm was created by the production of Handel's opera Almira, the earliest of the composer's many similar stage works. Almira was written at Hamburg in 1704 to German words by Feustking, and was produced on the Hamburg stage (then the leading one in Germany in operatic matters) in the following year. The successful revival of the work in our days is the more noteworthy as testifying to the vitality possessed by a species of music generally regarded as obsolete.

RATISBON. — The general congress of the Cecilia Societies of Germany was held this year at Ratisbon on the 4th, 5th, and 6th of August. The object of these societies is to effect a reform of the music in the Roman Catholic churches, and to bring it back to the more severe style of which Palestrina and his school are types. It is the usage at these German annual meetings to perform some specimen works, both of the more important and minor kind, of the earlier church composers; and as the number of singers is always considerable, and all have been well trained, the effect of ensemble, which is one of the great features in these works, is always sure to be well rendered. There were choral services and other performances of church music both in the forenoon and afternoon of the 5th and 6th of August in the Cathedral of Ratisbon, and the Dominican Church and the Church of St. Emmeran. The chief selection of music of the early composers was on the afternoon of the 6th.

PARIS. — M. Halanzier resigned his functions as director of the Paris Grand Opéra on the 15th ult., having concluded the performances given under his régime with Meyerbeer's Les Huguenots on the previous day, when he took leave of the personnel of the establishment. His successor, M. Vancorbell, inaugurated his new office by a performance of Halévy's La Juive, in the presence of the president of the republic and a crowded audience. M. Grévy, on the occasion in question, had a prolonged interview with the new director, in the course of which he assured him of the lively interest he took in the conduct and prosperity of the leading lyrical stage of France.

BOSTON, SEPTEMBER 13, 1879.

Entered at the Post Office at Boston as second-class matter.

CONTENTS.

SANZIO. Stuart Sterne	145
THE DEVELOPMENT OF PIANO-FORTE MUSIC, FROM BACH TO SCHUMANN. From the German of Carl Van Bruyck	145
ARTHUR SULLIVAN	148
MUSICAL CLUBS OF HARVARD: THE PIERIAN SOCIETY	147
THE ORIGIN OF ENGLISH OPERA. John Gay and his "Beggar's Opera," the Forerunner of "Pinafore"	148
TALKS ON ART: SECOND SERIES. From Instructions of Mr. William M. Hunt to his Pupils. XIII.	149
SAVES THE MUSIC HALL!	150
MUSICAL CORRESPONDENCE	151
St. Louis. — Milwaukee.
NOTES AND GLEANINGS	151

All the articles not credited to other publications were expressly written for this Journal.

Published fortnightly by HOUGHTON, OSGOOD AND COMPANY, 220 Devonshire Street, Boston. Price, 10 cents a number; $2.50 per year.

For sale in Boston by CARL PRUEFER, 30 West Street, A. WILLIAMS & Co., 233 Washington Street, A. K. LORING, 369 Washington Street, and by the Publishers; in New York by A. BRENTANO, Jr., 39 Union Square, and HOUGHTON, OSGOOD & Co., 21 Astor Place; in Philadelphia by W. H. BOWER & Co., 1102 Chestnut Street; in Chicago by the CHICAGO MUSIC COMPANY, 512 State Street.

SANZIO.

BY STUART STERNE, AUTHOR OF "ANGELO."

(Continued from page 137.)

Again the new young Spring,
With happy, sunlit eyes and golden hair,
With garlands crowned and scattering flowers before him,
Had come into the world and filled the air
With balmy odors, and from out his hand
Let fly his singing birds to build their nests,
And with his joyous voice and smile made glad
Even the gray, old streets. And yet a cloud Hung darkly o'er the city, every heart
Was grieved and heavy as with coming tears.
For, as upon the wind's invisible wings,
Had the sore news gone forth and swiftly spread, — Sanzio, the pride of all the land, beloved
Of high and low, lay ill of some hot fever,
So ill, that soon the wise men, hastily called
To learned council, drew their shoulders up,
And gravely shook their heads.

From morn till night
Were his familiar doors besieged by those
Who asked with eager lips for latest news,
And poor old Nina most unwillingly
Must leave at last the care of her sweet boy
To the good sister from the Hill, who came
To tend and soothe and help, while she herself
Answered the questioners, and suffered none
To enter, save perchance a few old friends
And first among them all 't was Baldassar,
Who flew to Sanzio's side, and for an hour
Sat chatting near him, with a cheerful brow,
Concealing 'neath his wonted gayety
A heart that bled at sight of that dear face,
So changed from what he knew it once.

"One thing, —
One thing before you go, my best of friends!"
Said Sanzio as he rose to take his leave,
"Send for my little sister, so," but marking
That a faint smile passed o'er the other's lips
And he drew up his eyebrows, he cried out
In a deep voice quivering with earnestness,
"Nay, Baldassar, pray you doubt it not!
I swear to you even by my soul's salvation,
And as I hope for everlasting life,
She was no more to me than this! — though scarce, —
Perchance if she, — if I, — yet let that pass,
It matters little now, and sinks away
As other earthly things! I tell you, friend,
She is a flower of such fine exquisite mould,
Of such divine simplicity and grace,
Such sacred innocence and purity,
Methinks the breath of passion stained and marred
The heavenly fairness of her virgin heart,
It were a pity and a sin" —

"Sanzio,"
Said Baldassar most gravely, "I believe,
Surely believe you on your simple word,
Without such solemn pledge! Eternal life
Is what men call on in their dying hours" —

"Then is it time for me!" said Sanzio softly.
But Baldassar, heeding not, went on,
"And then, please God, are yet far off for you!"
And then more lightly, "Aye, the hours when we Give up our sullied souls to some kind priest,

To purify and make them fit for heaven, —
But you have yet full time enough!"

"That hour
Has come for me, friend!" Sanzio said again,
Gentle yet firm. "Wherefore would you deceive me, E'en were that possible! I am not quite Unready nor unwilling to depart.
But send for Benedetta, — I would see
Her sweetest face once more! Send for her soon, —
At once, — methinks I have not long to wait!"

"I will ride out to her this very eve,
So with the early morn she may be here."

"Thanks, thanks, my Baldassar! And then, I pray,
Nay, I beseech you, by the generous love
You ever bore me, — by the undoubting faith
Our friendship ever knew, — when I am gone
Watch o'er her you, and have a care of her
To whom the last love of my life was given!
I have no friend but you to whose pure hands
I venture to confide this priceless charge.
This too you promise?"

"Aye, with all my heart!
Yet no, my Sanzio! — You and I will yet
Have many a long, glad ride across the hills!"

Sanzio shook his bowed head. "I nevermore
Shall ride across the hills!" he said unfaltering,
Yet with a shade of sadness in his voice,
Though Baldassar would not be dismayed,
And parted from him with a brave, bright smile.
But when he closed the door and wandered off
Down the long corridor, he suddenly paused
With heavy feet, and covering up his face,
His strong frame shaken by convulsive sobs,
Cried out, "Great God, I fear he speaks the truth!"

The morning came, and with it Benedetta.
As she sped breathless up the well-known stairs,
She met a holy father, and in haste
Received his benediction; then flew on
To Sanzio's chamber.

He lay back, awake
But weary, on the cushions of his couch.
Yet turned his head and mutely greeted her
By a faint, happy smile.

Without a word
She hastened to his side, sank on her knees,
And clasped in hers, and kissed the burning hands
That looked so white and fine. He suffered it,
Still gazing down upon her tenderly,
For one brief moment, then he gently drew
One hand away to lay it on her head,
And said in husky tones, —

"My Benedetta,
My blessed one! Oh you were wisely named!
To me you were in truth a messenger
Sent down from heaven, — the peace and hope and help
Of a life brief in years but long in sin!
Thou purest star that ever smiled on me,
Thou sweetest dream of all my wayward days,
My own, my sister, — more than friend or love, —
Would I could tell thee in a single breath
All thou hast been to me. — what deep content,
What joy untold, I draught from the fresh spring
Of thy dear love!"

And through the whole long day,
Though he spake little more, he fixed on her
Eyes strangely radiant, yet so firm and calm,
That Benedetta, full of trusting hope,
Thought, surely, surely he will soon grow well!
As many times she clasped her hands in prayer.
But when she asked him once, he only said,
"Love, that shall be as the dear Lord decrees, —
He ordereth all, and ordereth all things well;
His will be done!" And thus the anxious hours Crept slowly by.

(Conclusion in next number).

THE DEVELOPMENT OF PIANO-FORTE MUSIC, FROM BACH TO SCHUMANN.

FROM THE GERMAN OF CARL VAN BRUYCK.

(Continued from page 139.)

HAVING thus briefly spoken of the Suite, the Partita, the Fugue, and the Variation, I have yet to say a few words about the Sonata and the Concerto, the consideration of which will lead us immediately to the next following art period.

As the name of that earlier form, the Suite, points to a French, so does that of the later Sonata point to an Italian, origin. In fact, the most prominent piano compositions we possess by Italian masters of the Bach period, those of Domenico Scarlatti, are already entitled Sonatas, without bearing the least resemblance in their spirit, style, or whole form and structure, to that art form which since the Haydn-Mozart epoch has become the standard for the idea of the Sonata. They are in great part genial compositions (of only one movement), pervaded mostly by a fiery, nay, a bold and reckless, almost extravagant spirit, too often hurried away into nonsensical musical jokes; yet often, on the other hand, they show a very fine and tender feeling. They form, for that epoch, a striking, even an isolated and remarkable phenomenon, the like of which, at that time, had not come to light on German soil. By their individuality and by the artistic value they possess in single instances, they belong to the little which has kept itself in vogue out of the Italian art productions of this kind.

The name "Sonata" seems at its origin to have had no characteristic signification, but only to have been invented in order, generally, and without designating thereby any precise form, to distinguish instrumental from vocal music. Thus, for example, even with Bach we find very short (though most masterly) compositions — of which I shall speak hereafter — entitled "Symphonies." And so, too, we meet with a not inconsiderable number of Bach's works — important ones — which he has superscribed as Sonatas: six for piano and violin (which might well take the highest place among all), the same number for the violin and the violoncello alone (the first in the highest degree remarkable), several for the organ, also for the flute and viola-digamba with piano. But even these Sonatas, although of several movements, distinguish themselves from the Suite only through the smaller number of movements (two Allegros and an Adagio), and through their on the whole more earnest and severe style, while in them the polyphonic, mostly the fugued style, predominates, and the lighter dance form seems to have departed. But in their structure these Sonatas, too, are wholly different from the later art form, while their several movements all have, as in the Suite, the same key.

Of Bach's Concertos, of which we possess some for the piano, as well as for other instruments, — among them the most powerful, at any rate the best known, is perhaps the one in D minor, — we need but repeat in general what has been expressed already.

Hence it only now remains to mention a series of thirty little piano compositions, which Bach has left us under the title of "Inventions" and of "Symphonies," since Bach probably wrote them for the definite end of serving for the instruction of his pupils, as even the aforementioned six Partitæ, which in their fully free and purely artistic mould betray not the slightest intention of any use in school, are included under the extremely modest general title of "Pianoforte Practice." Of that series of compositions, the so-called "Inventions" are written purely in two, the "Symphonies" in three parts, mostly in contrapuntal, even fugued, style; the latter particularly (perhaps called "Symphonies" on account of their richer fullness of sound) are true cabinet pieces of fine, soulful work, inspired by all the Muses and the Graces. I simply mention them because they, together with the Partitas and a Concerto known as the "Italian," which contains a most remarkable and wonderful Adagio, to which I shall return again, seem to have been written by Bach with the same express purpose with which later authors have composed their Etudes, which, for the most part, wear their pedagogical design quite unmistakably upon their forehead, and in many cases have no further artistic significance.

It is well known that Sebastian Bach, who, taken all in all, so far as the purely musical faculty of form, especially of combination, is concerned (though by no means in this direction alone!), may be called the mightiest tone-master of all times, properly concludes the epoch of the so-called strict, contrapuntal style, which also in Italy was already, in the seventeenth century, approaching its dissolution, and concludes it in the grandest way conceivable. Music, under the influence of the new mental and moral direction of the times, as we have before remarked, was stepping more and more out of the service of the church, and in so far as it still remained within it was losing more and more that lofty earnestness, that serious sentiment, with which the earlier masters were inspired. At the same time the fondness for the play of tone combinations, as such, exhausted itself; and composers strove for greater freedom both of form and movement. Bach himself, with his high, profoundly earnest striving, filled with the very soul of art and of humanity, stood there in his time and upon German ground entirely isolated. Nor, with all the lofty fame which certainly surrounded him during his life, did he by any means acquire the popularity which other composers, far inferior to him, although remarkable, like Telemann and the opera composer Hasse, won. On the whole, we may designate the truly German (ur-deutsche) art of Bach as the highest triumph of the Christian spirit, which lived in this exalted genius in all its purity and deep inward beauty.

It is an interesting fact that one of Bach's immediate offspring, one of his numerous sons, all destined and educated by him for art, Philip Emanuel Bach, had a great influence on the change of form which music, particularly instrumental and piano-forte music, underwent. It seems to us, indeed, as if more of the powerful spirit of the great father were transmitted to another of these sons, the unfortunate Friedemann (who was by no means a "Friedensmann," or man of peace), than to the thoroughly gentle, and, so far as I can judge, rather weak Emanuel, — at least, in comparison with the rock-splitting, fiery spirit of Sebastian. Of Friedemann we possess, among other things, some exceedingly attractive, deep-souled so-called "Polonaises;" but under this name we must in no sense think of such music as we know in Chopin's Polonaises. But Emanuel, being of a firmer and more balanced character than his erratic brother, reached a purer ethical, as well as artistical, completeness in himself. While, with happy talent, he struck into a new direction, of which the elements, to be sure, lay all prepared before him (largely through Kuhnau, the predecessor of Sebastian Bach in the Thomas School at Leipzig), he became of great importance to the further development of art, particularly by the fact that through his efforts the youthful genius of Haydn was first inspired. Following the path which he had opened, Haydn developed into the great artist that he was; so that he can be designated as the "father" of the new art period, which embraced, besides himself, Mozart and Beethoven as its chief representatives; although Haydn himself, in his amiable way, so full of filial piety, used to say in his later years, "He [Emanuel] is the father, and we are the — boys." He would not pass himself off for the Emanuel, or Immanuel, of the new art, but claimed this title for the other.

In fact, the amiable "Sonatas" of Emanuel Bach, even to this day valued and respected, in spite of their rococo character, approach essentially the form now in vogue, although this reached its last formal development through Haydn; and then, first through Haydn himself, but finally through Beethoven, the form was filled with an ever higher, freer, and more mighty spirit.

As in the seventeenth century the "Suite," so in the eighteenth the "Sonata," became the reigning larger art form in instrumental music, and in piano-forte music especially. I do not enter here into a description or a characterization of it, because it is generally well known; it is described at length in numerous theoretical works and treatises (for example, in Dommer's "Musical Lexicon"), and it is not difficult to deduce its characteristics through analysis of actual specimens. Only so much must I here remark: that in this new art form strict contrapuntal work retreats more into the background, and free melodic invention comes more to the front; that the polyphonic gives way to the homophonic style, the contrapuntal to the harmonic treatment; and that the great law of contrast comes in play not only in the working out and richer modulation of the single movements, of which the Sonata commonly counts four, but also in the alternation of keys (of course related ones). Thus greater freedom and a much wider field are given to imagination, to the plastic faculty; and now soul and feeling, which also demand expression in tones, as well as the more intellectual ideal life, no longer held in check within the narrow limits of the earlier art, can resound and vibrate with full power. The forms as a whole become wider and broader, in detail softer, more flexible, more beautiful; the spirit that pervades the tone-pictures takes an ever freer, bolder flight. In the highest productions of this new art, the purely musical working or shaping is scarcely noticed or considered, although it is not less great, nor has it changed its nature, and it still remains the main thing, at all events the foundation; for now the forms have become altogether an expression of the soul's life, whereas before they claimed validity too much upon their own account. Upon the whole, therefore, in spite of the special excellences which are peculiar to other earlier, more restricted forms, especially the fugue, the Sonata seems to be the highest, richest, ripest art form which instrumental music so far has developed. And it shows itself in its full splendor in the works of BEETHOVEN, who first, with titanic power, carried on to the end the grand new art-creation which Haydn had begun. But the reader must bear in mind that, when we speak of Beethoven's Sonata creations, we think first, to be sure, of his piano-forte Sonatas, but that all his Duos, Trios, and Quatuors, even to the Symphonies, belong to the same art kind, inasmuch as their formal build is thoroughly alike in fundamental outlines, and only the different material for which the artist works requires certain special peculiarities of style; so that, for example, a Quartet for string (or bow) instruments, or an orchestral Symphony, will always show, ceteris paribus, a richer, stricter polyphony than a solo piano-forte Sonata. Now this Sonata, from that of the piano solo to the Concerto and the Symphony, formed for about a century the focus of the whole activity of art on the domain of instrumental music; and decidedly its greatest representative was Beethoven, about whom the other eminent masters in this kind of art stand naturally grouped.

(To be continued.)

ARTHUR SULLIVAN.

SULLIVAN was born in 1844 in London, and inherited his musical taste from his father, who was a teacher of music in Kneller Hall, a training school for band-masters in the army. His precocity may be judged by the fact that when only three years old he was a singer in the Royal Chapel, and at fourteen received the Mendelssohn medal, being the first to be thus honored. He was at first taught by his father, and afterward pursued his studies at the Royal Academy under John Gloss and Sterndale Bennett, and at the Leipzig Conservatory under Rietz, Hauptmann, and Moscheles. The latter took a great fancy to him, and pronounced him "a lad of great promise," and one who he was "sure would do credit to England." When seventeen years old his music (Op. 1) to Shakespeare's "Tempest," performed at a trial concert, created quite a sensation, and much delighted Prof. Moscheles, who saw in the work good promise of the fruit of his predictions. In 1862 his "Enchanted Isle" was brought out at Covent Garden, and was received with much favor. His cantata of "Kenilworth" was given at the Birmingham Festival in 1864, and in 1865 a "Te Deum" of his was given to the public. About this time a number of excellent songs and an anthem were published; also a few piano solos, one of which was performed by Mme. Schiller in Boston, in 1874. In 1869 his "Prodigal Son" was performed in Worcester, England, and a selection from it has often been sung in concert by Mr. John F. Winch. "On Shore and Sea" was written for and produced at the International Exhibition, London, 1871, and was sung in Chicago, in 1877, at an Apollo club concert. The "Light of the World" was brought out in Birmingham in 1873, and the Pastoral Symphony and Overture of it have been given in America. His "Miller and his Men" was composed in 1874. He has written many duets and part-songs for male voices, and his compositions of this class are great favorites with concert people everywhere. Of his published works, we refer last to his dramatic compositions, which all belong to the school of comic opera. We believe they are all included under the titles of "Thespis," "Il Contrabbandista," "Sorcerer," "Box and Cox," "Trial by Jury," and, "H. M. S. Pinafore." The last three are well known, "Box and Cox" being often heard, and "Trial by Jury" has become a general favorite, certainly in this country, having been performed at numerous theatres since it was first given here at the Globe, in 1876, by the Soldene Troupe. In the recent performance of his "In Memoriam" overture by the Paris Société des Concerts du Conservatoire, Mr. Sullivan has received a compliment which is said to be the first of the kind ever accorded to a living Englishman by this national institution. The work gave entire satisfaction. "H. M. S. Pinafore" has been more instrumental than all the others in making his name known to the whole world. In fact a sort of lunacy seems to have taken possession of the public in its admiration of this sprightly work. Mr. Sullivan holds two honorable and responsible positions in England: that of Principal of the National School of Music at South Kensington, and Professorship of Harmony at the Royal Academy of Music. He is a Doctor of Music by virtue of a degree of the Cambridge University, and is highly esteemed, not only as a successful composer, but as a friend and companion. In disposition and character, he is said to be of the most genial and generous kind. We have a somewhat positive assurance that he will visit America in October, and should he do so, he may expect such a welcome from all his sisters and his cousins and his aunts on this side the salt pond as is — hardly ever — accorded to any but our most distinguished visitors. — Kunkel's Musical Review.

MUSICAL CLUBS OF HARVARD: THE PIERIAN SODALITY.

[From The Harvard Book, 1875.]

THE musical clubs of Harvard, although they may contribute nothing to the history of music, have always formed a pleasant element in the college social atmosphere, and, on the whole, however frivolous at times, have had a really refining influence among the students. Their record, could it be fully written, would be full of interest. But that is by no means an easy task, nor do the materials for such a narrative, save to a very limited extent, exist. It would be useless to attempt, in this brief space, anything more than a very general sketch.

There doubtless had been musical clubs in college at various times before the most enduring one, the Pierian Sodality, was founded. Evidence of one, at least, we find in a curious little book containing "The Accompts of the Treasurer of the Singing Club of Harvard College," begun November 9, 1786, and continued to May, 1803. How much earlier or later this club may have flourished, we have no means of knowing. The little oblong, leather-bound, well-worn, and yellowed volume, in shape resembling a common psalm-tune book of pocket size, shows from year to year the dues and payments of the several members, all set down in shillings and pence, — pounds seldom figuring, — until the Federal currency comes in, in 1797. From such entries as these, — "3 vols. Worcester Collection, 4th ed., 15 shillings;" "Holden's Music, 8 shillings;"

"Harmonia Sacra;" "Harmonia Americana;" "Law's small Collection," etc., — it is clear that the Singing Club mainly, if not exclusively, courted the muse of old New England psalmody; while several mentions of incredibly small sums (£2, or so) spent for a bass-viol, and frequent pence and shillings for strings and bows, intimate that the vocal consortus was not altogether without instrumental accompaniment. The writer well remembers one of those old 'cellos standing in the corner under the paternal roof, where it was still cherished in his boyhood's years. Some honored names appear in this old record: in 1786, for instance, President Kirkland, Judge Samuel Putnam; in 1799, Leverett Saltonstall, etc., etc.

Of clubs or bands for instrumental, or "pure," music, we know of none earlier than the most famous and long-lived among them, which still flourishes, The Pierian Sodality, founded in 1808. The secretary's records for the first twenty-four years of its checkered experiences have strangely disappeared. For all that period our only sources of information (though doubtless one who could devote himself with singleness of purpose and with one-ideaed persistency and zeal to such a task, might gather quite a mass of pleasant reminiscences from veteran survivors) are an old MS. volume of music, dating back to the foundation, and a printed catalogue of officers and members down to the class of 1850. From this last it appears that the "founders" were Alpheus Bigelow, Benjamin D. Bartlett, Joseph Eaton, John Gardner and Frederic Kinloch, all of the class of 1810, and all long since enrolled among the Stelligeri, as well as their associates of that and several succeeding classes, with the single exception of Nathaniel Deering (oldest surviving Pierian), who still lives in Portland, Me. Among Pierians of 1811 we find the names of Thomas G. Cary, William Powell Mason, and the Rev. Samuel Gilman, author of "Fair Harvard;" of 1812, the Rev. Dr. Henry Ware and Bishop Wainwright; of 1816, William Ware (author of the "Palmyra Letters," "Zenobia," etc.); of 1817, George B. Emerson and General H. K. Oliver, the latter still among the most active and enthusiastic spirits in the musical life of Eastern Massachusetts. But we forbear to single out more names from the rich catalogue.

The writer's personal recollection of the club begins with the year 1827-28. What it had been socially, as a sodality, down to that time, appears most creditably from a perusal of the catalogue of names. What it was musically is for the most part matter of conjecture. Probably it varied in form and color, as in degrees of excellence, from year to year; your musical undergraduate is but a bird of passage. The old book of copied music, however, appears to contain the club's essential répertoire (at least fair samples of it) from the year 1808 to 1822. A long string of once popular marches comes first (Swiss Guards', Valentine's, Grand Slow March in C, Massachusetts, Dirge in the Oratory (sic) of Saul, Cadets' March, March in the Overture of Lodoiska, Buonaparte's March, etc., etc.). These are all written out in regular orchestral score for Primo and Secondo (doubtless violins), Oboe, Corn, primo and secondo, Tenor, and Bassoon. Some of these scores, however, show above the first and second violins another "primo" and "secondo" (perhaps flutes). Evidently the little band originally took a more orchestral form (with violins) than it had afterwards for many years in the long fluting and serenading, — what we may call the middle — period of the Pierian career. We find also Rondos by Haydn and Pleyel, interspersed among more marches; the Downfall of Paris; waltzes; a Divertimento by Pleyel, with pairs of flutes and clarinets, besides the strings; a portion of Handel's Water Music; airs, like Robin Adair, Yellow-Haired Laddie, Fleuve du Tage, Aria in the Brazen Mask, etc. (These, of the more sentimental kind, occur more frequently as we come further down; doubtless the tender melodies were mingled with many a student's finer dreams — and many a maiden's.) The name of the copyist — possibly in some cases he was also the arranger — is affixed to each piece. Some of these copyists survive, and could, we doubt not, tell us more of the musical complexion and accomplishment of the Pierians of their day.

When the Sodality began to play at college exhibitions, or when the flutes came in, and, with those soft, persuasive instruments, of course the serenading, we are not informed. Both practices were fully in vogue when we first heard the Pierians, in 1827-28 (the days of E. S. Dixwell, and of Winthrop, and the late lamented F. C. Loring), and were kept up, with occasional short interruptions, for many a year afterwards. Shall we forget the scene of Exhibition Day, when the Latin School boy, on the eve of entering college, eager to catch a glimpse beforehand of the promised land, went out to University Hall, and for the first time heard and saw, up there in the side (north) gallery, the little group of Pierians, with their ribbons and their medals, and their shining instruments, among them that protruding, long, and lengthening monster, the trombone, wielded with an air of gravity and dignity by one who now ranks among our most distinguished scholars, orators, and statesmen? Had any strains of band or orchestra ever sounded quite so sweet to the expectant Freshman's ears as those? And was not he, too, captivated and converted to the gospel of the college flute, as the transcendent and most eloquent of instruments? Nevertheless within a year or two he chose the reedy clarinet, wherewith to lead a little preparatory club, — the purgatory which half-fledged musicians of his own ilk had to pass through before they could be candidates for the Pierian paradise. This was called the Arionic Society, and if its utmost skill was discord, the struggle of its members for promotion into the higher order was persistent. We think it was founded some years later than the Sodality, for which it was in some sense the noisy nursery; how long it lasted we know not. The Sodality in our day (1830-32), under the presidency of accomplished flutists (Isaac Appleton Jewett, Boott, and Gorham), was comparatively rich in instruments; besides the flutes (first, second, third, and several of each) we had the clarinet, a pair of French horns, violoncello, and part of the time a nondescript bass horn. But with the graduation of the class of 1832 the band was suddenly reduced to a single member, who held all the offices and faithfully performed the duties, meeting and practicing (his flute parts) on the stated evenings, and so keeping the frail deserted shell above the waves, until one by one a little grew had joined him. On such a slender thread did the existence of the proud Sodality once hang! Perhaps more than once, before and since.

Plainly, the club was not at all times in a condition to respond at exhibitions to the expectatur musica of the venerable Præses. But the records, from 1832 down, show that to bring themselves into fit condition for that service, and thereby shine in the good graces of the fair ones, as well as of their fellow-students, on that day assembled, was all the time the highest mark of their ambition; and oftentimes they borrowed aid from ex-Pierians, or amateur musicians from without, to eke out the harmony and help them through the task. For the same cause the serenading joys and glories were in like manner intermittent; there was now and then a season when the summer nights of Cambridge and vicinity were as full of melodies as Prospero's island.

We are saved the necessity of entering into any details of these things by the reminiscences of a Pierian of the class of 1839, which furnish a vivid inside view of the Pierian life during his time. We append it as a representative description equally good for any time in twenty years or more.

In July, 1837, several ex-Pierians passed a pleasant social hour with the actual members of the club after an exhibition. It was at a room in Holworthy, and then and there was the first suggestion made, and the first steps were taken, for the formation of the Harvard Musical Association, which, for a few years, was composed of past and present members of the Sodality; but afterwards the connection was dissolved, and the Association has carried on its separate life in Boston, replenishing its membership from year to year, however, principally from the graduate Pierians. The Harvard Musical Association has always had among its chief objects to promote musical culture in the University; and it is in great measure due to its appeals and influence that the college has, for fifteen years or more, employed a learned and accomplished musical instructor, on whom it has only during this last year conferred the rank of Assistant Professor (now Professor) of Music.

So much of what we have called the middle period of the Pierian history, — the fluting, serenading, exhibition-playing period. We may remark, however, that music has its shifting fashions, and that there was a time (about the year 1844) when a new sentimental brazen siren, under the various forms of cornet-a-piston, post-horn, etc., possessed the fancy of the college amateur, and was in vogue for some years, like the flute, between which and the heroic trumpet it was a sort of ambiguous cross; but it has had its day as the "instrument for gentlemen." Perhaps it was the germ that culminated in the great monster "Jubilee" of Gilmore!

With the year 1857-58 we may consider the third and present period to have begun. This was the time when violins were reinstated in the place of honor, and when the band was led by players of the violin, among whom was young Robert G. Shaw, heroic martyr of the late war; there was also Crowninshield's 'cello, a double-bass, and a piano-forte to fill out the harmony. Since then the tendency of the club has been more and more toward the character and the proportions of a bona fide orchestra. And, naturally, the classic instrument ("fiddle" no longer) brought in with it intermittent aspirations for a higher kind of music, though the chief occupation of the club has always been with music light and popular, and of the day. Thus in the record of a meeting in May, 1859, we read as follows: "We had obtained from the library of the Harvard Musical Association of Boston (an aftergrowth of the Pierian Sodality) copies of twelve of Haydn's Grand Symphonies, arranged for piano, two violins, 'cello, and flute; and, after our regular pieces for full orchestra, we proceeded to try these, and became so infatuated by their harmony that we continued playing until one o'clock in the morning."

We believe serenading soon went out altogether; and in the place thereof, the brave little band began to feel its strength sufficiently to venture (with the Glee Club) upon the giving of concerts in Lyceum Hall to crowded audiences of their invited friends; and from that day to this the practice has been continued; more than once have Boston and the neighboring larger towns enjoyed the favor of such concerts.

This period has been also marked by the suspension of the college exhibitions; for a number of years the field of glory has no longer fascinated the young college amateur's imagination. For outward motive there remains to the Pierians the concerts, and for an inward and abiding spring (may we not hope?) a sincere zeal for music, and in a somewhat higher sense than heretofore. Probably the band was never in so good a condition, musically, as it was last spring, when it numbered two first and two second violins, one or two violas, two 'cellos, and a double-bass, besides flutes (reduced to the orthodox pair), a clarinet, a trumpet (if we remember rightly), and serviceable hands at the piano in the background.

Their performance, at a concert with the Harvard Glee Club, under their energetic conductor of the year before, now a member of the Law School, was said to be "in point of spirit and precision creditable, although it will cost more experience to keep the wind in exact tune with the strings." Already they have gone so far as to try their powers upon a Haydn Symphony, a Mozart Overture, etc., and with encouraging results; and possibly we have here the germ of what may one day be a proper college orchestra. J. S. D.

(To be continued.)

THE ORIGIN OF ENGLISH OPERA.

JOHN GAY AND HIS "BEGGAR'S OPERA," THE FORERUNNER OF "PINAFORE."

[From the Springfield Republican.]

THE unexpected and very great success of "Pinafore" is not unprecedented in the history of English opera. The first work of the kind, "The Beggar's Opera," was also a happy combination of wit, melody, and satire, that hit the fancy of mankind and set them to laughing and humming.

This was one hundred and fifty years ago. Walpole, Chesterfield, Pope, Swift, Congreve, Cibber, and others were the great names of the day. Addison was but lately dead, and his brother essayist, Steele, was stricken with paralysis; the second "snuffy drone from the German hive" had just come to the throne, a disreputable, ignorant, passionate Hanoverian; Parliament was corrupt, and Walpole, for a quarter of a century prime minister, "judged human nature so meanly that one is ashamed to own that he was right;" but under this dissolute, boozing, card-playing government there was peace, plenty, and the three per cents nearly at par. England, torn for half a century by questions of loyalty (how history repeats itself), prerogative, church, religious freedom, and whatever cries of stalwart partisanship, was settling into peace, ease, and freedom. Walpole made no pretension to morality, public or private, but he knew that prosperity repressed the rage of faction; he sought no glory abroad, but by moderation and lenity he promoted the happiness of the people at home.

It was the "Merrie England" of song and story. London had not then, like a great wen, as Thackeray says, drawn all the blood from country life. Gentlemen lived on their own estates, rarely going to town, hated foreigners, and indulged in hearty sports and simple amusements. Travelling was not easy, for the roads were quagmires the greater part of the year, in that oozy climate, and the lonely heaths were infested by bold highwaymen who "took to the road" when fortune frowned at the gaming table; but there was sport enough at home, every large town had its assemblies, race-meetings, cocking mains, and every hamlet its games. There was much sound of junketing and fiddling all over the land; a coarse, hard-riding, loud-bawling people are pretty good drinkers; the opinions of the time are well expressed in a stanza of a song that was sung in the comedy of "The Provoked Wife": —

"What a pother of late
Have they kept in the state,
About setting our consciences free!
A bottle has more
Dispensations in store
Than the king and the state can decree."

The court of the first George had been inclined to much junketing, gaming, and riot. The King brought over a train of Germans, male and female, who were determined to get all they could while the game lasted. Italian opera, that had crept in during the reign of Anne, was much patronized. The Prince of Wales, who hated his father almost as much as he afterward detested his own son, like many other inharmenious, quarrelsome people, was devoted to music, and subscribed handsomely to the opera; in this he was followed by people of fashion and by the travelled aristocracy; but the general body of play goers hated the foreign innovation; it was not only the constant subject of the ridicule of wits and jesters, but it was also denounced in the gravest manner by various censors of the public morals.

John Gay, poet and wit, patronized by the powerful duke and duchess of Queensberry, had written charming verses, and some successful "pastorals," idyls of the bucolic sort, in which imaginary shepherd lads and lasses disported themselves as they seem to be doing in china mantel-piece ornaments. Gay was one of the men that are fortunate in being much beloved; I imagine that he had a sympathetic feeling for others and did not spend his time in talking about himself and his own affairs. Cold, self-engrossed men grow rich oftentimes, wear purple and fine linen, but they are not loved and petted as John Gay was. Among his other conquests he had found a soft spot in the cynical, bitter heart of Dean Swift, who, with his usual contempt and scorn of human nature, suggested to Gay that he should write a "pastoral," introducing highwaymen, thieves, informers, and such other rogues as made the population of Newgate prison. Gay took the idea readily and wrote a comedy with songs; unlike the Italian opera it had no recitative, but it was the exact form in which English opera has remained to this day, a combination of singing and speaking; what might more properly have been called at first, ballad comedy.

The production was intended to satirize Italian opera, and it is rather a funny coincidence that the class of people who speak of Sir Joseph Porter as "the Admiral," say that "Pinafore" was written to ridicule Italian Opera. Gay's satire is mostly in the name of the production, "The Beggar's Opera," and in the prologue, spoken by a beggar, which contains a very stupid story of its origin. There was, however, pointed and clever satire upon the ministers of the crown and politicians in general, and the whole thing is a more terrific exposition of the administration of criminal law than Gay intended, or than his audience could understand. Gay's friends were deeply interested in the work and gave him their assistance; Dean Swift wrote the song, —

"When you censure the age;"

Sir Charles Hanbury Williams contributed, —

"Virgins are like the fair flower in its lustre;"

The great Lord Chesterfield wrote the song Macheath sings to the air "Lillibullero," — "The Modes of the Court," while Fortescue, the master of the rolls, wrote the precious production, —

"Gamblers and lawyers are jugglers alike."

Dr. Pepusch composed an overture that is good music and set the many songs to popular airs. When all was done, cold water began to come — Dean Swift shook his head about it; Cibber, manager of Drury Lane, refused to produce it;

Congreve, who was crowned with the lays of a literary success never surpassed, oracularly declared that the piece would succeed greatly or be confoundedly damned. Failing to get inside the charmed circle of Drury Lane, they were compelled to go to Rich, the manager of Lincoln's Inn Fields, the house then celebrated for pantomime, in which Rich excelled as "Harlequin;" this manager is immortalized in Pope's "Dunciad" as one of the ministers of Dullness, —

"Immortal Rich! how calm he sits at ease,
Midst snows of paper and fierce hail of peas,
And, proud his mistress' order to perform,
Rides on the whirlwind and directs the storm."

Rich was, like most of the theatrical managers of our times, a vulgar, ignorant showman, ready for anything, and he took up Gay's work because it was powerfully supported. Lincoln's Inn Fields was one of the "Patent" theatres, and enjoyed equal privileges with Drury Lane; it had a fine company of actors, at the head of which was Quin.

At that time to be an actor meant more than it means now. Players were not divided into tragedians, comedians, eccentrics, etc.; there were no "one part" men who, making special studies of idiocy, drunkenness, or what not, wandered about year after year until their performances became as dry and perfunctory as those of Sothorn or Jefferson; there were no tramping tragedians, patronizing Shakespeare by reciting half a dozen "roles," until they become hard, cold, and vacant as the benches which the public refuse to fill. The actors of the last century have left a record of scholarship, wit, and accomplishment that we do not parallel. They acted before the same audiences for years, continually studying new parts and cast in a wide range of tragedy, comedy, and farce. If we believe their written lives, the history of literature, and the more trivial records of gossip and letters, they filled an important place in social life, and when Garrick died, the gravest and greatest literary authority declared that in the event "the gayety of nations was eclipsed."

Quin was the head of Rich's company, and though easily the second best tragedian of the day, he filled all important parts of comedy, and it was not strange that he should be cast for Captain Macheath. When the first copies of Pinafore came to this country there was not a theatrical company in America that could produce it except that of the Boston Museum. I record this to the honor of that management. It was there cast, sung, and acted, without an addition to the company, and the performance was the very best, take it all in all, that the public saw. Mr. Wilson's performance of Sir Joseph was perfect in conception and rendering, and the other performers "acted up" to him. When the piece became a success other managers "faked it up" by taking on people from burlesque troupes, minstrels, church-singers, and a heterogeneous lot that could sing but not act, or act but not sing, so that no performance anywhere equaled that at the Museum. Does not this show that the management and company of the Boston Museum is for general theatrical purposes the very best in America? It certainly proves it to me. But we will leave the last opera and glide back through the many years to the scenes that heralded the birth of the first.

We left Gay and the actors rehearsing the opera, all doubtful and prophetic of evil. Quin disliked his part; one morning a sweet, fresh voice behind the scene was heard trolling easily the music of Macheath. Quin remarked: "There is a man, Mr. Gay, can do you more justice than I can," and forthwith called in a manly, handsome fellow whom he presented as Tom Walker, an actor whose name is on the scroll of fame connected with the success of Macheath. Other changes were made, but it was not until the last rehearsal that it was resolved to accompany the songs with the music of "the band," as the orchestra was then called, and as it should now be called.

Probably a curtain never rose on a more uncertain houseful than when the scene of The Beggar's Opera was revealed and Hipposley, as Peachum, opened with a song, —

"Through all the employments of life
Each neighbor abuses his brother."

The audience remained cold and silent until the grand chorus at the end of the second act, "Let us take to the road," which was taken, scene and music, from the opera of Rinaldo, with accompaniment of drums and trumpets. At this the hitherto stolid audience burst into applause that soon became general, and the success of English opera was secured. Among the audience were Pope, the Duke of Argyle, Sir Robert Walpole, and his rival in the king's ministry, Lord Townshend; it was generally thought that the quarrel scene between Peachum and Lockitt, in the play, referred to a row in the ministry between these two statesmen, which went so far that they drew their swords.

It has always seemed strange to me that the success of this play and the remarkable event that it really was make so small a feature in the literature of the time. It is mentioned in Swift's letters (who happened to be in Ireland upon its production), and in the notes to the "Dunciad." Cibber's "apology" for his life, the most complete dramatic history ever written, and one of the most entertaining books, says little about it; probably because Cibber was mortified that he had refused it at his theatre. Dibdin's comprehensive "History of the Stage," does not recognize that it was the invention of a new and brilliant entertainment, and Doran in his famous "Annals" is equally obtuse. Victor's Register makes slight mention of it, and Thackeray, in his lecture upon Prior, Gay, and Pope, scarcely alludes to it. None of these writers looked upon it as important that a new form of entertainment had been invented, because until the production of Pinafore, English opera has not been important, nor is there a work of the kind between The Beggar's Opera and Pinafore except Sheridan's opera of The Duenna, that is of consequence.

It happened fortunately that Macklin was present at the first performance; he had also witnessed the rehearsals, he lived seventy years after it, seeing two centuries and almost touching the third (he was born in 1699 and died in 1797); and he is the source of most of the information that we have about the first performance. The success after the first night was unbounded, the town was wild about it; it was acted all over Great Britain, and like Pinafore was sung by amateurs and children. I have before me, in a copy of 1728, a cast of "Lilliputians" (Swift was then at the height of his fame), in which the various parts of thieves, highwaymen, prostitutes, etc., that compose the dramatis personæ are taken by young misses! Italian opera, that had borne all down before it, was silenced; the shameless songs of The Beggar's Opera were in all mouths, printed on fans, and the scenes represented upon screens and chintzes.

But the world was not all of a mind; there were sober, decent people like Arbuthnot, the archbishop of Canterbury, and others, who denounced its cynical spirit and coarse brutality. Sir John Fielding declared it was a school for highwaymen, and that the number of them rapidly increased. But the public laughed and vowed that the success had "made Gay rich and Rich gay." On the seventy-second night of the performance, Rich, at the wing, noticed that Walker, as Macheath, was imperfect in his part, and as he came off attacked him: "Sir, I should think your memory ought to be good by this time." "Zounds sir!" cried Tom, "do you expect my memory to last forever!"

The great luck of the performance fell to Miss Fenton, the beautiful Polly; the Duke of Bolton fell in love with her, and in Swift's letters the blessed dean writes: "The Duke of Bolton hath run away with Polly Peachum, having settled four hundred a year upon her during pleasure and two hundred upon disagreement," but disagreement never came, for she lived with the duke twenty-three years, when, the Duchess of Bolton dying, he had the good sense to marry his faithful and beloved mistress, who had borne him several ante-nuptial children. She was a beautiful woman, a fine actress, and a sweet singer; in one of Dr. Warton's notes subjoined to a letter from Dean Swift to Gay, he says she had wit, good sense, a just taste in literature, and was much admired by the first men of the age.

Of course with the changes of manners and customs, The Beggar's Opera has become merely a curiosity; it was the origin of English opera, and it gives us a very clear view of the brutality, coarseness, and indecency of manners in the first half of the last century. No audience of our time could endure a single scene of it as it was originally written, yet we coolly look upon scenes that our ancestors would have booted from the stage: "Autres temps, autres mœurs," — that is all. The plot and story would now be insufferably dull. We have no interest in highwaymen; the people who get away with our money are an unromantic, plodding set whom we trust in a fiduciary capacity.

After Gay's triumph he was more loved and petted than ever, for he was then not only amiable and clever but successful and rich. He was self-indulgent and a great eater. Congreve in a letter to Pope says: "As the French philosopher used to prove his existence by, 'I think, therefore I am,' the greatest proof of Gay's existence is, he eats, therefore he is." But ease, eating, drinking, and much petting made an end to John Gay. Few men have been so mourned as he was; for though he wrote The Beggar's Opera and "Trivia," he had also written the charming ballads of "T was when the seas were roaring," "Black-Eyed Susan," and many other sweet and tender things that had the touch of nature in them. They buried him in the abbey, where England has gathered her illustrious dead, and his ashes mingle with those of kings and heroes. On the stone that marks the spot are graven the worst lines he ever wrote: —

"Life is a jest, and all things show it,
I thought so once, but now I know it."

WILDAIR.

TALKS ON ART. — SECOND SERIES.¹

FROM INSTRUCTIONS OF MR. WILLIAM M. HUNT TO HIS PUPILS.

XIII.

In this country it is seldom that we get an artist's best work, because the critics growl so. People will never get their money's worth until they take things for what they are intended.

You will all find among your acquaintances a class of people who consider themselves of vital importance, and whose lives have never proved them to be of any utility to anybody. They are always foremost in their remarks to decry this and to discourage that. You must judge such people's opinions according to the amount of love which they have shown to humanity.

¹ Copyright, 1879, by Helen M. Knowlton.

No one who has not devoted his life and soul to the pursuit of art can feel the same exultation in its brightest ornaments and loftiest triumphs that an artist does. "Where the treasure is, there the heart is also."

In all our criticisms of art very little attention seems to be paid to what I should call Wit in Painting. I mean the effect produced by rapid, electrical work. When Stuart Newton was invited by an English gentleman to see his collection of pictures, and did not seem much pleased with them, the owner said, "Mr. Newton, at any rate it is a tolerable collection?" Stuart Newton replied, "How do you like a tolerable egg?" The argument of a day would not contain the pith of these few words.

By the same process in painting, three lines made by capacity, with conviction, will sometimes produce more effect than a year's painstaking tinkering. Labor is not necessarily effective. It is like damp powder, which kindles slowly, conscientiously, and surely, one grain at a time.

It is the suddenness of the explosion of powder which gives the irresistible power to the cannon-ball. Most men's work is like damp powder, and burns one grain at a time. There is a great smoke and a great smell, and the rock is not blasted.

It bores some people to think that any one can work except through their own long processes; and nothing so irritates a community as to witness rapid success.

Do your own work in your own way. Don't embroider other people's work upon your own, or you make an extinguisher to put out your own light. You can't have all the good qualities — the drawing of Raphael and the color of Titian! You may wish to draw like this one and paint like that one, but you can't work better than you know. So you must be content to sing your own song in your own way. Be content with one quality. I know how hard you are going to find it. Corot could not have developed himself in this country. He would have been snubbed and laughed at, and advised to paint like this one and that one, until he would have been pushed out of his own direction.

Why put a line under that eye when there is none? You put it there because you thought it ought to be there. Well, so it ought; but the maker of that cast did not think so, so you won't have to make it. Let me tell you a secret. Don't tell anybody, but the best way to learn to draw is, To draw only what you see!

I lend you these heliotypes and photographs, and ask you to take as much care of them as you would of one of your own handkerchiefs that you had had washed for eight cents.

Don't try to paint better than any one else! Try to have other people paint better than you. That will help you to paint. We go on only by being among our superiors.

In preparing grounds to paint on, remember to paint light on dark, cold on warm, warm on cold. You want the struggle of opposites.

Nobody ever lived who began to be the colorist that Diaz was.

MRS. NILSSON has signed an engagement with M. Vaucorbell, the new Director of the Paris Opera House, for two years, beginning early next spring. She will "create" the part of Francesca in M. Ambroise Thomas's forthcoming opera of "Francesca di Rimini," and will possibly also take the principal part in M. Massenet's "Herodias," for which MM. Meilhac and Halévy have supplied the poem.

Dwights Journal of Music.

SATURDAY, SEPTEMBER 13, 1879.

SAVE THE MUSIC HALL!

MUSIC, in our great cities, and just now in Boston particularly, stands in need of two things: organization, and liberal endowment on the part of men of means. Musical culture — at all events the love and taste for music, and for the higher forms of art — now interests society as never before; it is one of the great topics of the times, as every newspaper of every day will show. At the same time music, like all refining public influences, now meets an enemy more dangerous, more ruthless and destructive than it ever knew before. That enemy is the soulless, grasping, and insatiable spirit of mere money-making business, as represented by a certain restless set of men whose highest ideal of a great city is a vast wilderness of trade, a dead level of mere business streets, one like another, all monotonous, uninteresting, wearisome. No matter for that so long as there is room enough for "business." For "bees'niss is bees'niss," saith the Jew, and that is all their argument. All that there is of picturesque and charming in an old town, all that attracts the feet of travelers towards it, all its historic monuments, all its fine buildings reared in the interests of art and education, all its cheerful, wholesome, and refreshing parks and shady avenues of trees, all that a city prides itself upon and that its children love, all, in short, that makes one place different from or better than another, all its individuality, its peculiar character and glory, must be sacrificed, razed to the ground the moment any little knot of avaricious, money-making people take it into their heads that the "interests of trade" require a new street running right through the Music Hall, the Art Museum, the high school, or the venerable church which happens to stand so as to "obstruct" their hankering for an increased valuation upon their private estates. At this moment it is our beautiful and noble Boston Music Hall which is the special object of attack; but the movement, rather say the dark conspiracy, is all part and parcel of a wider and a wilder dream, which contemplates the destruction of the Common, the digging down of Beacon Hill, the robbing Boston of its lungs and breathing spaces, of all its noble institutions and buildings, of all that in any way relieves the vulgar dead monotony of trade. It would in fact obliterate all that distinctively and properly is Boston. Probably there are some native-born sons of Boston whose souls are not superior to schemes and dreams like this; but doubtless the strength of all such movements lies in the increase of population from abroad, whereby we have a majority of voters who know not Boston, who feel no interest in its preservation and its honor, and who are only drawn here as to a great market-place where they may earn a livelihood and possibly get rich.

It is true that the narrow limits of this peninsula on which our fathers built are small for the present population and its active industry and trade. But why shall a short man compete in stature with a man that is tall? Why not compete in something else, and something that is better? Why will not Boston be content with being Boston? Why not make the most of our peculiar advantages, cherish the good things we have got, and not try to be Chicago or New York? Is Florence any the less glorious because it is not so vast a city as London? Is Leipzig a less important fact of European civilization than Berlin? But to come to the immediate point.

Cincinnati appears just now to possess both the requirements which music lacks in Boston. She has rich men who give largely of their wealth for the support of music. There music has a music hall on a grand scale given outright to music, and not likely to be floated down into the stock-market. It will probably be held in permanence sacred to the cause of music. With that hall for a nucleus and centre, the so called "College of Music" has been successfully organized, and apparently almost the whole musical activity of Cincinnati pivots mainly upon that. This, or some such unitary, comprehensive and consistent organization, is what Boston needs for music. But music, now a more important interest than ever before, lacks the material means for further progress in this large organic sense. Worst of all, and very mortifying, it seems to lack the means of holding what it has got. We have a Music Hall, which we all fondly fancied was to be a permanent possession and stronghold of the musical art in Boston. It was built by those who intended it for that. To be sure it is private property and held in shares; but those who subscribed to its stock originally, did so for music's sake and with no expectation of reaping a pecuniary profit. But alas! the plan was faulty; it should have been a gift to art outright; there was debt incurred to make up the amount required; and so there were plenty of holes through which the Evil One, in the shape of the stock-jobber, could creep in and undermine. Its shares began by little and little to change hands; the sales were quoted in the reports current of the stock-market, with all sorts of fluctuations, and sometimes fictitious, fancy prices. In fact the Music Hall, supposing it to be a sensitive being, with a sort of moral consciousness of its own original design, almost ceased to know itself, it was so bandied about in the stock market and "mixed up" with other "babes." Once, when speculating outsiders, on a "still hunt," were picking up its shares with the hope of controlling the property and converting the building to mercantile purposes, the stock went up for a brief time to a fabulous height, although the hall had never paid a dividend. In that emergency it was saved for music through the generous investment by two of its friends in its stock, to an extent which gave them a controlling interest. Both of these friends are dead, their heir has failed in business, and, although anxious to have the hall preserved, is compelled to act in the interest of creditors to whom the Music Hall, as such, is of no concern compared with the income to be derived from it, whether by selling it to the city for the extension of Hamilton Place, or by any other means. Such is the strength of the enemy that seeketh to destroy, and such the weakness of the fortress.

How can the Music Hall be saved? The danger is immediate. The thing required is that the controlling interest in its stock should pass into hands that will hold it for music and refuse to sell for any vandal purposes like that now contemplated.

It would seem, then, that the case appeals distinctly to the wealthier friends of music in our city. With them rests the responsibility of the salvation or destruction of the Music Hall. Money alone can save it. Some one true friend of music, or a number of such combined, must purchase the five hundred plus a few more of the one thousand shares of its capital stock, and refuse to sell them for the threatened Hamilton Place extension, or for anything that would divert the Hall from its original and legitimate uses. Cincinnati has her Springer and her other generous donors of the funds for her great music hall and college; has not Boston men as rich, as public spirited, as generous in a thousand ways, and some of them as deeply interested in music as an important element in social culture? Surely her "merchant princes" are proverbial for their munificent endowment of all kinds of noble, humane, or artistic institutions. They give most freely to found professorships even in branches of learning and of science which can expect only a handful (comparatively) of students. They give for all the other arts, for art museums, sculpture galleries, schools of art; but unaccountable as it may seem, no one has yet appeared who gives a handsome sum to Music, — music, which interests the whole community, and in its taste for which, in its halls and oratorios and concerts of the highest kind, Boston so prides itself. Yet here we are reduced to the mortifying strait, that we cannot even save what we have built up, not even the place which makes grand music possible among us, for want of money enough to outbid the destroyers! We do not say that it is the best music hall conceivable; or that we do not need one or more new halls in addition to the one we have (all the more now that Tremont Temple has been burned down); but we do need this one, and in the present emergency it is all-important to our musical interests that we "hold the fortress." It would not cost a hundred thousand dollars, perhaps not half that, to secure and hold that larger half of the Music Hall stock which otherwise will join the march of the destroyers. Doubtless there are a dozen men, and more, in this city, who could do this single-handed, men who have some zeal for music. If not, let several men, and generous wealthy women, too, combine to do it. Or, were it not that the danger is so imminent, and time so short, it would seem to be an easy task to raise the required amount in single shares, widely distributed among musical people of moderate means. At all events it should be done; and these mere mercantile and selfish onslaughts upon institutions which are the ornament and pride of our good old city, should be signally rebuked.

And when this is done, when the stock of the Music Hall is once more held by the right sort of people, purely in the interests of music, then at once will vanish all those objectionable features in the administration of the Hall, which have made not a few of our most musical citizens indifferent to its preservation. Then it will no more be desecrated by dog shows, poultry shows, stupid and interminable walking matches, and even brutal and disgusting prize fights; nor will the Hall itself, directly or indirectly, compete with its own customers (musical societies who hire it) in the matter of concert giving. We want the Music Hall kept pure; we want it kept out of the stock-market; we want it held sacred to Art, unpurchasable and unassailable, as much as Harvard University, or Trinity Church, or the Art Museum, or the Capitol.

Questions of other possible and better halls, of other localities, etc., appear to us irrelevant just now. When we have saved what we have got, we may begin to think what more we might have.

These remarks perhaps require apology to many of our readers as being mostly of mere local interest, confined to Boston. But they involve principles with regard to the right organization and endowment of the public music, which are worthy of consideration in all other cities.

MUSICAL CORRESPONDENCE.

ST. LOUIS, Mo., AUG. 25. — Your Chicago correspondent, in his vacation meanderings, finds himself in this old and wealthy city; and as he has enjoyed the opportunity of familiarizing himself with some of the musical affairs of the place, as well as making the acquaintance of many of the musical people, he takes the liberty of transmitting some of his reflections to the JOURNAL. The musical art often suffers in its progress in a city on account of the want of a concentration of effort on the part of those interested in it; for no matter how earnest are the individual members of the profession, or how eager a number of musical lovers may be for good home music, yet without concerted action for the support of musical enterprises, it is impossible to advance the art to a sure position. It has been said by a wise writer on the subject of education, that to educate a person fully was simply to lift him from "a state of dependence to one which gave him the full power over his faculties and of himself." So it seems to me that every city that pretends to have a love of culture, and desires to advance the arts, must make herself independent of all other places, by supporting within her limits all those artists who can best carry out all enterprises that have this aim in view. In St. Louis I find the material for a much greater degree of advancement than is at present indicated. In the other arts much enterprise is manifested, and the Washington University, with its comprehensive views of education, has an art department that is shaping its way toward a self-supporting independence. They have fine collections of pictures, casts, and artistic treasures, while cultivated artists give instruction in all branches of this art. Yearly courses of illustrated lectures are given; and sketch clubs and other enterprises are successfully carried out for the advancement of this branch of culture. It pleased me to learn that Mr. Ives, the gentleman who is the professor of Art at the University, had arranged a number of classical recitals of piano-forte music, which were given before the students of the institution, thus signifying his love of the sister art of music.

The Beethoven Conservatory of Music is the largest institution of a musical character in this city, and it gives instruction to a large number of students. Mr. W. Meimé, the gentlemanly correspondent of many musical papers, has a music-school that is doing earnest work. Mr. Robert Goldbeck also has an institution of like character under his direction. He is also conductor of a choral organization bearing the name of the "Harmonic Society." The German Musical Club — called the Arion — is one of the largest societies that the city contains. It gives a number of concerts each season. The "Operatic Society" also gave a number of operas during the past season, all the singers being from home talent. Their performances were most highly spoken of. I have had the pleasure of hearing a large number of the home vocalists of this city, and find that it is rich in voices of a good character; and indeed some of the singers have organs that have given them a much wider reputation than comes from simple local fame.

In orchestral matters St. Louis, like Chicago, suffers, and no home organization for symphony concerts exists, although there are a number of good men with whom to form a band, should a well-directed effort be made.

In regard to the public support given to musical enterprises of a home nature I heard much complaint, and was informed that nearly every endeavor made for the advancement of oratorio, or symphony concerts, failed for want of financial aid. Yet it must not be supposed that St. Louis does not contain music-lovers, for a most appreciative audience is often assembled to give welcome to some great artist who may visit the city. Yet it seems to me that the whole matter of its want of activity in music rests mostly upon the fact that it goes outside of itself for its dependence. If the musical profession would organize with the intent of advancing their art, by the formation of societies that could give in an adequate manner symphony, oratorio, and chamber concerts, and collectively try to awaken the public to the realization that the home-talent was in earnest in its endeavors to cultivate a love for good music, I think the city would take a pride in her own, and give them of her wealth to support their undertakings. There might follow the large festivals after a season, and the city would draw from the outside world, and music-lovers would come to pay homage to the shrine of art. The dependent would find their own powers, and use them with a self-satisfying certainty. There are golden opportunities for the earnest lovers of art, if they will only concentrate their endeavors until they are stunted with a true purpose.

St. Louis is the home of Dr. W. T. Harris, the learned editor of the Journal of Speculative Philosophy, and his pen has been active for music, in so thoughtful and brilliant a manner as to call the attention of the great minds of the country to new reflections upon this wonderful art. The oneness of the beautiful in all arts, the aim of all culture toward the elevation of the spirit of man to the Infinite in perfection, should so enlist the minds of all earnest thinkers everywhere, that co-operation in endeavor would win that recognition that comes from a cause that is universal in its intent to promote the true and the good. C. H. B.

MILWAUKEE, WIS., SEPT. 3. — I have been silent a long time, mainly because there has been no music here the record of which need take up the valuable space of DWIGHT'S JOURNAL. The summer concerts have had their interest, but mainly for the seeker after hot weather recreation. The programmes, however well given, have all been light, as befits the season.

But I ought not to omit recording the work of Mr. W. S. B. Mathews's Normal School at Evanston, of which I saw a good deal. It is long since I have been in such a thoroughly musical atmosphere. I found there numbers of earnest, thoughtful, enthusiastic teachers and their pupils, who had come to get what could be got out of five weeks of work, under the stimulus of excellent teaching, and of musical companionship; I found also, stimulating lectures, or rather, off-hand talks, by Mr. Mathews and others, and equally stimulating and interesting recitals of the best music, both songs and piano-forte.

There were some twenty of these recitals in all. The song recitals were given by Miss Grace A. Hiltz, of Chicago, a pupil of Mrs. Hershey-Eddy. I subjoin one of her programmes, and must express my hearty approval of the way it was sung. Miss Hiltz has evidently been thoroughly well taught; and though she has still a good deal to learn, she sang much of this programme in a way that left nothing to be desired. Her singing of the Schubert and Franz songs, was especially delightful. But see what a fine programme this is!

1. (a) "On wings of Music" } Mendelssohn.
(b) "Zuleika" }
(c) "Song of Spring," Op. 71, No. 2, }
2. Five Songs, from the "Poet's Love" Schumann.
(a) "'T was in the lovely month of May."
(b) "Where fall my bitter tear-drops."
(c) "The Rose and the Lily."
(d) "When gazing on thy beauteous eyes."
(e) "A Young Man loves a Maiden."
3. "Blondel's Song" Schumann.
4. Nine Songs Franz.
(a) "Dance Song in May," Op. 1, No. 6.
(b) "In Vain," Op. 10, No. 6.
(c) "Two Faded Roses," Op. 13, No. 1.
(d) "May Song," Op. 33, No. 3.
(e) "The Lotus Flower," Op. 1, No. 3.
(f) "Rosemary," Op. 13, No. 4.
(g) "Slumber Song," Op. 1, No. 10.
(h) "Oh tell me is my wandering Love," Op. 40, No. 1.
(i) "The Woods," Op. 14, No. 3.
5. Five Songs Schubert.
(a) "Thou art the Rest."
(b) "Hark! Hark the Lark."
(c) "Faith in Spring."
(d) "Barcarolle."
(e) "Whither."

A good many of the piano recitals were given by Miss Lydia S. Harris, a pupil of Mr. Mathews, and a young lady who will be heard from by and by. Her most satisfactory work to me was her playing of the E-minor concerto of Chopin; a difficult work, but done so well that many artists of more pretensions need not have been ashamed to have played it as she did. There were also several pupil recitals, among which, one by a Miss Jones, a pupil of Miss E. W. Scott of Cincinnati, was especially creditable. There was also one by Miss Amy Fay, which I did not hear; one by Miss Bertha Burge, a pupil of Carl Reinecke, and an excellent pianist of the classical school, and one by Mr. Emil Liebling, a pianist, who has great execution. I ought not to omit to mention the vocal teaching and chorus directing of Mr. Wm. B. Chamberlain, a pupil of Mme. Emma Seiler, and a teacher in the Conservatory of Music of Oberlin College. So far as I can judge, his methods are thoroughly scientific, and his work is certainly effective.

Altogether, I am certain this "Normal" did a great deal of good. J. C. F.

NOTES AND GLEANINGS.

NEW YORK AND BROOKLYN have the prospect of an abundant supply of Symphony Concerts, Oratorios, etc., during the coming season, according to the following schedule in the Tribune :—

Nothing is known as yet of what the principal compositions will consist that the different societies will select, but each announces, as is the wont of such societies, that it has important novelties for production. The concerts will be given at the usual places, the New York Philharmonic at the Academy of Music, the Symphony Society and the Oratorio Society at Steinway Hall, Mr. Carlberg's concerts at Chickering Hall, and the Brooklyn Philharmonic at the Brooklyn Academy. The Philharmonic Societies of New York and Brooklyn will be conducted by Theodore Thomas, the Symphony and Oratorio Societies by Dr. Damrosch, and the Chickering Hall Concerts by Mr. Gotthold Carlberg. The dates of the rehearsals and concerts will be as follows:—

- November 6 and 8, Symphony Society.
- 13 and 15, Carlberg Concert.
- 17 and 18, Brooklyn Philharmonic Society.
- 21 and 22, New York Philharmonic Society.
- 23 and 29, Oratorio Society.
- December 4 and 6, Symphony Society.
- 11 and 13, Carlberg Concert.
- 15 and 16, Brooklyn Philharmonic Society.
- 19 and 20, New York Philharmonic Society.
- 26 and 27, Oratorio Society.
- January 8 and 10, Carlberg Concert.
- 15 and 17, Symphony Society.
- 23 and 24, New York Philharmonic Society.
- 29 and 30, Carlberg Concert.
- February 6 and 7, Oratorio Society.
- 12 and 14, Symphony Society.
- 16 and 17, Brooklyn Philharmonic Society.
- 20 and 21, New York Philharmonic Society.
- 26 and 28, Carlberg Society.

March 11 and 13, Symphony Society.
15 and 16, Brooklyn Philharmonic Society.
19 and 20, New York Philharmonic Society.
April 1 and 3, Symphony Society.
8 and 10, Carlberg Concert.
16 and 17, Oratorio Society.
19 and 20, Brooklyn Philharmonic Society.
23 and 24, New York Philharmonic Society.

Mrs. JULIA RIVÉ-KING, assisted by Mrs. Anna Drasidil, will give recitals in Boston and other cities this season, commencing in October.

Max Maretzek has selected the 24th of September for the initial performance of his new opera of "Sleepy Hollow" at the Academy of Music, the same date as that of the first concert of the Carlotta Patti Company.

MR. W. R. DEUTSCH, who has just arrived home from Europe, makes known the fact that he has engaged for the ensuing season a musical company composed of twenty-two persons, and styled the "Estudiantina Figaro." The English name will be "The Spanish Students." This company is, in fact, a band made up entirely of guitars and mandolins. The performance that it gives is said to be poetical, delicate, and charming, and also to be extraordinary for the attribute of unanimity. The spectator, in fact, sees these twenty-two musicians, as the poet Wordsworth saw the cattle, when he said "there are forty feeding like one." — N. Y. Tribune.

Miss ABIE CARRINGTON, a Boston lady, who has been singing in Milan with considerable success, was introduced a short time since to an invited audience in Boston at the rooms of Henry F. Miller. The Transcript says of her: "Her voice is a clear and powerful soprano, agreeable and uniform in quality, its upper notes being better developed than those of the lower register, whilst her execution, even in the most trying passages, is exceptionally fine. Her delivery is marked by earnest expression, intense dramatic feeling and distinct utterance, her attack of high notes admirable, and her intonation correct and satisfactory. Although she has yet to demonstrate her ability as a dramatic artist, enough was shown last evening to prove that she has decided talent in that direction."

A BOSTON VOCALIST, who was especially esteemed and valued here some few years ago on account of her musical ability, as well as for her personal character and worth — we refer to Caliste M. Huntley, now Signora Piccioli, of Milan, — will return next month to her city and home, after a twelve-years' absence. During this period she has acquired a vocal and operatic experience and recognition that are not often so well accorded to our native artists in the profession abroad. Since Miss Huntley (for so we must really recall her in remembrance) left Boston she has sung in opera and concerts, principally in Milan, but also in the chief musical cities and centres of Germany; fulfilled operatic engagements in Liverpool, Edinburgh, and Dublin, and, crossing and recrossing the Atlantic twice, made successful trips to South America, singing in opera at Buenos Ayres and Montevideo, winning in every place the best commendation for her lyric gifts and capabilities of vocal expression. Now, with a longing desire to visit her relatives and former friends, and musical companions and associates, she will return to Boston for a time. So many of our musical habitués will recollect her vocal ability in her fine participation in the first Boston performance of Mendelssohn's "Hymn of Praise," under Mr. B. J. Lang's enterprise and directorship; in her subsequent accomplishment of the exacting soprano part in Schumann's "Paradise and the Peri," when Mr. J. C. D. Parker first introduced it to musical Boston; and further, in her successes in a more florid and operatic school of vocalism under Signor Bendelari's practiced style and teaching, that there can be no mistake about the pleasurable interest that will be taken by musical people in the lady's presence again in her home-city, and among familiar musical scenes. — Transcript.

THE New York Times says: "New York is not likely to suffer during the coming season from a lack of pianists. In addition to the hosts of aspirants for artistic fame, and the innumerable performers of the second and third rank, whom it will hardly do to name in this connection, we are certain to have ample opportunities to hear Messrs. Franz Rummel, S. B. Mills, Max Pinner, Joseph Katten, W. H. Sherwood, Mrs. Julia Rivé-King, and Mme. Teresa Carreno. Miss Anna Mehlig has it in mind to revisit this city, where she formerly won both fame and money, but as yet she has not made any definite arrangement looking to this end. The announcement which has been several times made that Nicolaus Rubinstein was to come to New York in the season of 1880-81 is pronounced, on good authority, to be at least premature. This famous artist cannot leave Moscow, owing to his engagement as director of the concerts of the 'Friends of Music' and at the Moscow Conservatoire."

OUR VOCAL CLUBS. — The Herald of last Sunday has the following: —

"The season with the Boylston Club begins on the 19th of this month. The chorus promises to be finer than that of last year, and the concert, so far as their character has now been determined, not only more interesting, but more important. The first concert will occur on the 14th of November. Its leading feature will be the performance, for the first time here, of Astorga's world-renowned "Stabat Mater." It is very likely that the chief objects of importance in the remaining concerts of the year will be, "By the Waters of Babylon," by the much-lamented gifted composer, Hermann Goetz; some one of the more noteworthy psalms of Orlando di Lasso; and, possibly, Max Bruch's new setting of the "Lay of the Bell." New part-songs by Rheinberger, Herberger, Rubinstein, and Raff, will make up the balance of the work. Among the novelties of the first concert will be the famous madrigal, in ten parts, by De Pearsall, entitled, "Sir Patrick Spens," a new song for the female chorus by Raff, "Now the day is at last departing," and Schubert's "Nachtheile" for the men.

The Apollo Club will, as usual, present many novelties in the way of compositions for male voices, though the selections are, as yet, undecided upon. The leading work of the year will be the "Edipus" of Mendelssohn, which will be given complete, with orchestra and reader, for the first time in this country.

"The Cecilia will give but four concerts during the season, but they will each be of an unusually attractive character, even for this society. Some additions to the honorary membership will be made, and the music committee proposes to fully maintain the high standard of excellence reached by the members in their concerts last season."

We may add that the Cecilia sent out orders for the music of Goetz's two cantatas ("By the Waters of Babylon," and "Nenia") some months ago.

THE musical festival at Worcester, Mass., will be held this year on the 23d, 24th, 25th, and 26th of September. Gounod's "Cecilia Mass" will be given in full, and the "Messiah," besides six smaller choral selections. Henrietta Beebe, Annie Louise Cary, Ida W. Hubbell, Mrs. H. M. Smith, Jennie Sargeant, Theodore Todd, Alired Wilkie, W. H. Beckett, Clarence King, D. M. Babcock, and many others appear.

BOSTON'S OPERATIC PROSPECTS are thus presented by the Herald: —

The "Home Opera Company" will open the season of this class of attractions with the "Ideal Pinetore," at the Boston Theatre, Monday, Sept. 29. The cast of last season will be presented, with slight variations, Miss Adelaide Phillips assuming the role of Buttercup, and Mr. W. H. Fessenden that of Ralph. Similar changes will be made in the cast of "Fatinilla," which follows in the engagement, and a third opera will be shortly put in rehearsal to be presented during the season. The exceptional success which attended this company's performances last season seems to warrant a belief that it will become a permanent organization, to which the musical public of this city can look for the presentation of standard operas of the lighter and more popular style. It is more than probable that, beginning the musical season in this way, this company will repeat its successes at the close of the Boston Theatre season, when musical entertainments of a light character are so popular.

The Emma Abbott English opera company begin a two weeks' season at the Park Theatre Oct. 20, opening with Massé's "Paul and Virginia," an opera which had a decided success on its production in Paris with Capoul and Mlle. Heilbron in the title roles. Here Mr. William Castle will be the Paul, and Miss Abbott the Virginia. An English version of "Carmen" will probably also be produced during the season, with Mrs. Zelda Seguin in the title part, as well as an English version of Gounod's "Romeo and Juliet." The troupe will include Mesdames Abbott, Marie Stone, Seguin, and Pauline Maurel, and Messrs. Tom Karl, Castle, MacDonald, Stoddard, Byne, and Edward Seguin. Mr. Caryl Florio will be the musical director, and Messrs. Pratt and Morrissey the managers.

In the way of grand opera the probabilities point to only one season of two or four weeks, by the Mapleson company, the date being as yet undecided, though the chances are that it will follow the opening season in New York, as last year. Manager Mapleson's plans are as yet rather vaguely outlined, but should he come with even his last year's company he will receive a hearty welcome and profitable patronage from the musical public of this city. A visit from Manager Strakosch is also one of the doubtful matters as yet undecided, though the chances are that Boston will not hear his new organization during their season. The route contemplated for the company now will locate them in the Southern cities during the best part of the season North, after the Christmas holidays, and their dates until Christmas are definitely fixed in the Western cities.

NEW ARRIVALS. — Among the artists who will probably make their appearance here early in the season, we may mention a young Polish violinist, Tinothée d'Adamowski, a graduate of the Warsaw Conservatory in 1874, where he took the first prize. During the last few years he has held high rank among the resident musicians in Paris, and his name frequently occurs in programmes of the best concerts there. His tastes and style are classical. He is full of youthful fervor, has a thoroughly musical temperament, and a sincere, earnest, winning manner. We have had the pleasure of hearing him in private, when he played the Mendelssohn Concerto, some of the violin solos of Bach, and a very difficult and very interesting Sonata-Duo of Grieg with Mr.

Lang. He has a large, rich tone, a remarkable legato, and he plays with fire, with pure intonation, fine execution and expression, entirely free from all the cheap tricks and false sentiment of mere concert virtuoso.

Mrs. Chatterton-Bohrer, a distinguished solo harpist, has been in Boston this week, and will probably appear in concerts here and in New York during the season. She is a daughter of the English composer and harpist, J. B. Chatterton, who succeeded Bochas as professor of the harp at the Royal Academy, and in 1844 was appointed harpist to the Queen. She has recently been giving concerts in Canada with great success. She is accompanied by her husband, a classical pianist, who is a son of Max Bohrer, the violoncello-virtuoso, who visited this country at least thirty years ago.

Mrs. Peris Bell Campanari, who will be remembered as one of the first and the most brilliant fruits of Mr. Kichberg's violin school, and who used to play the Bach Chaconne so well, returns to Boston concert halls as a soprano singer. Sig. Leandro Campanari accompanies his wife, and is open to engagements as solo violinist, coming indorsed by Sir Julius Benedict of London.

FOREIGN.

THE famous "Harmonious Blacksmith" of Handel has had numberless stories told of the origin of its name, most of which have been poetical, and all of them more or less false. The following interesting information concerning this well-known air is given by a correspondent of The London Times, and would seem on the face of it to be true: "The famous air in No. 5 of the 'Suites de Pièces pour le Clavecin,' was originally named 'The Harmonious Blacksmith' by Lintott, a music publisher at Bath, who, on being asked why he so called his edition of the music, replied that his father was a blacksmith, and that it was one of his favorite tunes. In 1820, one hundred years after the piece was first published, a newspaper writer of the time concocted the tale of the blacksmith's shop, and Mr. Richard Clarke was deceived by the fiction. Mr. Clarke went to Edgware, found out the descendant of Powell, the blacksmith, whose shop was near Canons Park, bought the anvil, and satisfied himself that he had verified the newspaper writer's account of an incident in Handel's life. A more absurd delusion never existed. As Schlickeher, Handel's biographer, says, 'the "Harmonious Blacksmith" has been published a thousand times under that title, but Handel himself never called it so; the name is modern.' The air is found in a collection of French songs printed by one Christopher Ballard, in 1565. It is not likely that an English blacksmith ever heard it, and still less probable that Handel, with his love of finery and dignified manners, would have adopted an air heard under the circumstances believed in by Mr. Clarke."

A MUSICAL TREASURE-TRUVE. — An authentic portrait of Mozart has just been made accessible to the German public by photographic multiplication. The fortunate possessor is one M. Eckert, a Berlin bandmaster, who received it as a present from his foster-father, Francis Förster, the friend and companion of the poet-soldier, Theodore Körner. Förster had obtained it from Körner's mother, whose sister, Doris Stock, was the artist. The style differs from the usual portraits of the great musician, but is far more striking and effective. The reverse bears two inscriptions. One, "Given to Förster," written by Körner's mother; and the other, "This likeness of Mozart, drawn from life by Doris Stock, in Dresden, 1787, was given to me by Theodore Körner's mother, and by me to Karl Eckert. Berlin, 22 May, 1859. F. Förster." The portrait is in crayons, a half length, in a small oval, and represents Mozart in the dress of the period, with wide collar, frill, and hair brushed back and united in the queue. The features are more finely cut than those of the usual portraits and bust, and bear a slightly beetle stamp. The nose is rather large, and, with the entire lower half of the face, somewhat prominent. The mouth has a peaceful, pleasant expression. But the impressive features are the fine and ample forehead and the enchanting eyes.

MR. HULLAH, in his report to the British Education Department on Music on the Continent, says a very unexpected thing. He is pleased with the system of teaching in Holland, and of some instances in Belgium; but as for Germany, he is of opinion that the instruction given is worse than useless, and its results absolutely nothing. In Switzerland, Mr. Hullah says, the natural aptitude for musical instruction seems low, while in Belgium, though taste and inclination both foster the study of music, the schools where it is most appreciated, are not rich enough to obtain the high instruction they deserve. Mr. Hullah is so pleased with the results of musical instruction in Holland, that it is considered probable that he will urge upon the English the adoption of a system modeled on the Dutch.

THE contra-Wagnerian movement, already powerful in Germany, has been invested with fresh force by the proposed Mozartian programme to be set forth by Herr Jauner, of Vienna. The whole of Mozart's operas are to be mounted, the Wagnerian artists are dismissed, and Mme. Pauline Lucas, Mme. Schuch-Proska, and Mlle. Bianchi are to be retained in their stead. On the other hand, for the benefit of the tourists, the whole of the "Nibelungen Ring" is to be performed at that Wagnerian stronghold, Munich, between August 23 and 28.

BOSTON, SEPTEMBER 27, 1879.

Entered at the Post Office at Boston as second-class matter.

CONTENTS.

SANZIO. Stuart Sterne	153
THE DEVELOPMENT OF PIANO-FORTE MUSIC, FROM BACH TO SCHUMANN. From the German of Carl Van Bruyck	154
REMINISCENCES OF THE BIRMINGHAM FESTIVAL (1879). Max Bruch's Lay of the Noll	155
MUSICAL CLUBS OF HARVARD: THE PIERIAN SOCIETY. Reminiscences of an Ex-Pierian. J. S. D.	155
REAL AND IDEAL IN FRENCH ART. W. F. A.	157
TALKS ON ART: SECOND SERIES. From Instructions of Mr. William M. Hunt to his Pupils. XIII.	157
WILLIAM MORRIS HUNT	157
THE BIRMINGHAM FESTIVAL	158
"SANZIO"	159
LYCEUM BUREAU CONCERTS	159
MUSICAL CORRESPONDENCE	180
NOTES AND GLEANINGS	180

All the articles not credited to other publications were expressly written for this Journal

Published fortnightly by Houghton, Osgood and Company, 220 Devonshire Street, Boston. Price, 10 cents a number; $2.50 per year.

For sale in Boston by CARL PRUEFER, 30 West Street, A. WILLIAMS & Co., 283 Washington Street, A. K. LORING, 369 Washington Street, and by the Publishers; in New York by A. BRENTANO, JR., 39 Union Square, and Houghton, Osgood & Co., 21 Astor Place; in Philadelphia by W. H. BOWEN & Co., 1102 Chestnut Street; in Chicago by the CHICAGO MUSIC COMPANY, 512 State Street.

SANZIO.

BY STUART STERNE, AUTHOR OF "ANGELO."

(Concluded from page 145.)

It was the third day now Since Benedetta had been called, and far Into the lonely night. The helpful Sister — Obedient to her cloister's rigid rules, To hasten back into its walls at eve — Had long departed; poor old Nina, too, Gone for an hour to seek much-needed rest, As Benedetta urged, who sat alone Near Sanzio's couch.

He moved but rarely, rapt In peaceful, dreamless slumber, it appeared, With quiet breath, and placid lip and brow. The room was silent, and the shaded lamp Cast but a feeble light, and so at length, Wearied with much unwonted care and watching, She laid her head upon her arm, for but A moment's rest; yet soon unwittingly The heavy eyelids fell, unconsciousness Stole over all her senses, and she slept In peace untroubled. Slept so long and deep, She heard and saw no more, and heeded not That time rolled swiftly onward; never knew That from the city churches far and near Hour after hour pealed out, and how towards midnight A gradual change, a fitful restlessness, Came upon Sanzio, — that he moaned and tossed, With trembling lips and a contracted brow, And grasped at things unseen, with feeble hands. Later a hush fell on him; he lay still, And in a moment opened large, clear eyes, That slowly gazing round rested on her; And suddenly he rose up, and stretching out His arms to her, called softly, "Benedetta!" Then he fell back, — his eyes closed, a great light Passed like a burst of glory o'er his face And swiftly faded, and a long-drawn sigh Broke from his lips.

It was the early morning, Whose ray well-nigh put out the yellow lamp, When Benedetta woke, startled at last By a strange, sombre dream. She walked alone On a long, weary road with aching feet, Yet ever on before, and leading her Further and further, flew a snow-white dove, Until the city towers rose in her sight, And her guide paused, alighting on a roof. And looking up she found 't was Sanzio's house, And the white dove transformed into a raven, Whose wings overshadowed it from top to base. She started hastily up, and glanced about The unfamiliar room in vague surprise, Then flew to Sanzio's side with anxious heart.

His arms still half outstretched, yet motionless, The soft, brown hair clustering about his brow And drooping on his shoulders, and his face Turned towards the window, through whose undrawn curtains The first sweet flush of dawn stole gently in, Tinting his cheeks with a faint glow of life, While the closed lips and eyes had caught and kept A dim reflection of that burst of light In whose transfiguring glory he had passed;

And on his pallid brow serenest calm, A full, unutterably deep content Had quenched the sadness of that yearning look That once had cast its sober shadow there. Yet something in the peace on that still brow Awoke a sudden, awful pang of fear In Benedetta's heart, and she bent down To kiss the smiling lips.

But as she touched them, A great, wild cry rang through the silent house, A cry wherein it seemed unto herself Her soul leaped from its rending tenement, And left an empty, crumbling shell behind; As in a dizzy vision she beheld A lifeless figure that was not her own, Fall prostrate over Sanzio's quiet form, Burying her face upon his breast, unmoved By any faintest breath or pulse of life, And twine her arm round his unbending neck, While a mad gush of tears burst from her eyes.

O Sanzio, Sanzio! Oh, my love, my love! Oh, even in the night and while I slept, Must thou go from me, and alone, alone, Set out upon thy fearful way, my soul! Were the wild words that rang incessantly Through swooning heart and brain, that had no thought For God or life eternal, when once more Slowly her reeling consciousness returned, And the lost spirit, coming from afar, Crept shivering back through every aching sense. Before her, as she lay with eyes still closed, Above, below, around on every side, There rolled and whirled and tossed in mad confusion A chaos of black, shadowy, shifting clouds, A night in whose blind darkness naught was clear, Save that a fierce, intolerable fire, A piercing anguish, like a living flame, Was burning up her heart, and that the tears Whose flood streamed on and on resistlessly, Were hot and sharp and bitter past endurance, And seemed to sear the heavy, smarting lids, Whence they must burst a passage out.

How long She thus hung over him with quivering frame And fevered brow, she knew not; but at last, As though the fountains of her grief were drained, And in them all her life had flowed away, Her tears ran dry, and she lay motionless, Even as the dead himself, but turned her head And pressed her cheek to his. And gazing now Upon the troubled waters surging round, In the dim, far-off distance, she perceived, A feeble speck of whiteness, more than light; Yet it grew larger, brighter, drew more near, Until it swelled into a luminous point, And then a shining star, that stood quite close Above her, yet receding into space, — And suddenly it seemed as though the earth Had sunk away below her, and she floated Upward into the air, so gently first She could not tell when it began, but soon With softly, swifter motion gradually, Following the star, which streamed from out its heart A mild, yet ever deep and deeper radiance, Till all the space around with brightness filled, Till the star vanished and dissolved at last In the wide golden glow, and she was borne, As through a sea of moving, throbbing light, Vast, measureless, unfathomed, without end, Without beginning, whose small, countless waves Lapping each other, spread in beaming circles, Still gathering fuller glory on their way, Further and further, till they lost themselves In purpling, dim infinitudes. And still Her sight went on and on, she ever rose Higher and yet higher, till suddenly, close above And swiftly floating downward, she beheld A heavenly form, — clad in white, flowing robes, A golden halo round his head, that shone Still brightly even through this flood of light, — Who bent a smiling countenance on her. Was it the Saviour, — the dear Lord Himself? She thought, and a great thrill passed through her soul, Or could it be, — Oh, Heaven, the features changed And shifted strangely, — Sanzio, Sanzio, mayhap? And a faint cry of joy sprang to her lips, As she stretched out her hands.

She saw them seized, Felt herself folded to a throbbing heart, And a mute kiss upon her brow, and then In deep, unutterable ecstasy, Fancied she closed her eyes, and knew no more Through long, unconscious hours.

When she awoke The mellow evening light was in the room, Her own small chamber, where she lay alone Upon her couch; yet a deep, peaceful calm Filled all her senses, and she thought of him, Of his white, smiling lips, without a pang; Even the swift tears, that would flow forth again As that last image rose within her sight, Seemed sweet and soothing. "Oh, my Love, my Sanzio!" She whispered, "Aye, I understand thee now, And what it was in my unconscious heart, My childish love, that could not satisfy The deeper needs of thy immortal soul! But yet thou wilt forgive me where I failed! I loved thee with what feeble power I knew, I gave thee all the simple soul I had, Thou first and only love of all my life!" And with a joy unspeakable, remembered How he had told her still, he was made glad By their dear love, that she had been to him The brightest dream of all his wayward days. Remembered, too, those other words of his, — "He ordereth all, and ordereth all things well, His will be done!" — and meekly clasped her hands. But oh, where was he! — thought she then. Wherefore Have they thus parted us!

In one dark night Sanzio's sweet bud had burst into full flower, But what a storm-tossed, broken form was that Which slowly rose, and with unsteady steps And outspread hands, like one half-blind, who feels More than he sees his path, groped her dim way Out through the door!

Not far from it she came On the good Sister, who put out her hand, And kindly said, "You here, my poor, dear child! I came to see if you were yet awake."

But Benedetta, sinking on her knees, Cried out, "Oh, Mother, sister, friend! take me To your still home! I have nought left to live for Save memory and God!"

And raising her, The Sister fondly clasped the fresh, young life, So wrung with sorrow, to the aged heart That long had done with tears. Then silently Led forward her who bowed her weary head Upon the friendly shoulder. Yet she asked, "Will you not come and look upon his face?" As turning down a corridor, they saw At its far end a chamber hung in black, Through whose wide doors streamed a sweet cloud of perfume, The breath of flowers and incense blent. A throng Of weeping mourners pressed about the bier, That stood with roses and dark violets strewn, And many glimmering tapers set around, While at its head rose up the last great work, Whereat the busy hands had paused forever, Leaving it incomplete, yet shining far In undimmed glory, — the transfigured Lord.

A quiver passed through Benedetta's frame, — Oh, now she understood the strange, sharp pang That seized upon her unsuspecting soul, When she beheld it first!

"Oh, no," she said, And shuddering turned away, "He is not there!" And the new wound began to bleed afresh.

For yet a third time, joyous as of old, Had come the hope of summer, when two friends Rode through the gates of the Eternal City. Another spring, another setting sun, An eve like that — and yet, great God, how changed! Was the mute thought of both, and looking back, One with a passionate gesture stretched his arms Towards the gray town they speedily left behind, And cried aloud, "City, where is thy king!" Then dropped them listless by his side, his head Sinking upon his breast.

"Nay, Baldassar," — The other gently asked, and touched his hand; "Can you not yet forget, — be comforted Even for a little while?"

"Forget, Giovanni, — In such an hour as this!" he cried again, — "Forget, — oh, never, never! All the world Is darker since he left it!"

Thus they rode Long in unbroken silence, heedlessly Suffering their steeds to choose the way, who climbed Of their free will the gently rising path. Near the gray Cloister on the Hill. Again The pious women two by two walked forth, In the last golden light of fading day; Again their murmured chants rose softly up, And a sweet bell from somewhere far away Sent out its faint, vibrating sounds, that died On the clear air but slowly. Yet those two Saw naught, nor heard, when suddenly Baldassar Cried in a hasty whisper, "Hold, look there!" And putting out his hand, stayed his companion.

They checked their horses. Further up the road, On a small hillock near a Virgin's shrine, Sat a young sister, round whose slender form The rosy evening glow played lovingly. The long, white veil that framed the beautiful face And floated round her shoulders, half concealed

The simple, dark-hued cloister garb; her hands
Lay lightly folded in her lap, and clasped
An ebony crucifix, hung from her girdle
By a fine silver chain. Profound repose,
Yet something of brave, bright, full-flowing life,
And strength unbroken, in her face and form,
She rested motionless, — so still, it seemed
A breath scarce stirred the gently heaving breast, —
With a faint smile on the half-parted lips,
And a soft radiance on the up-turned face,
While a deep light beamed in the eyes she fixed
Upon the first great, tremulous star, high up
In the flushed heavens above her.

"Benedetta!"

Said Baldassare, in low tones at last,
When he had gazed upon her image long, —
"Madonna — plead and make thy prayers for us!
Forget not on those shining, heavenly heights
Thy soul has gained, that our sore hearts still grope
In pathways full of darkness! Thou, sweet saint,
Surely hast need of mortal aid no more!"
Then added slowly, "She has found the peace
That passeth understanding! Let us go!"
And turning back, they rode away unseen.

THE DEVELOPMENT OF PIANO-FORTE MUSIC, FROM BACH TO SCHUMANN.

FROM THE GERMAN OF CARL VAN BRUYCK.

(Continued from page 148.)

HAYDN and Mozart are names which the world likes to couple with Beethoven, and designate as masters of the "Vienna school." Their piano works indeed contain much that is beautiful and excellent, including some things really significant (for example, the A-minor Sonata, the C-minor Fantasia, the G-minor Quartet, and several of the Concertos of Mozart). But all that these two great masters have created in piano-forte music seems of subordinate importance compared with their extraordinary activity in the whole wide field of music. Especially is this the case with Haydn, who was but a mediocre piano player himself, whereas Mozart can be counted among the most important virtuosos of his time. Moreover, Haydn found the instrument itself, which had not then begun to be very much in fashion, a still more meagre one than that used by his great successor, who came upon the stage of the world and of art some decades later. His chief aim was directed to the orchestra, which owes to him, above all men, its more modern (not the newest!) development. Hence it is easily conceivable that the thin-toned clavichord of that day could not stimulate his artistic fancy to the same degree as the so-called string-Quartet and the orchestral Symphony, in which it unfolded the most splendid blossoms.

On the other hand we must here name, in the period mostly preceding Beethoven, at least one master artist, Clementi, who in many of his very numerous Sonatas had already developed the resources of the instrument in a high degree, and who was himself still more of a virtuoso than Mozart, whom he long outlived. In this art form (the Piano Solo Sonata), which he cultivated exclusively, so far as I know, he produced much that is uncommonly fine, charming, lovely, full of soul, including some things quite incomparable in this way. I need only cite the two Sonatas in C, and that in D major (Nos. 40, 53, and 55, in the Breitkopf and Härtel collection of sixty-four Sonatas), as examples, which every piano player ought to have in his repertoire. The fancy of this artist was mostly directed to the graceful, the refined, the tender, and the humorous. But a passionate vein also pulsates in his music, which makes him sometimes aspire to the grandiose and rise to a mightier expression, as in his B-minor Sonata (No. 57), partly, also, in the one in G-minor (No. 64), which is superscribed "Didone abbandonata." Several of his Adagios have an enchanting tenderness and thrilling depth of expression. His form is close, precise, so that in this respect his works for the most part may pass for classic models. On the other hand, it must not be concealed that this master is very unequal in his works, and that a great, perhaps the greater, number of his Sonatas seem to be rather weak, sketchy, fugitive productions, incapable of life to-day, beside which those other genuine children of a genial inspiration shine in all the more brilliant light, and deserve to be all the more cherished.

Unquestionably, taken as a whole, the works of Beethoven form the crown of all that has been done, since Bach, in instrumental, and particularly in piano-forte music, above all in this form of art (the Sonata). Beethoven, — that hero of the musical art, whom Hans von Bülow once called, with an expression which sounds extravagant, yet not entirely ill-chosen, the "incarnate god of music," and to whom Cornelius, the great painter, referred with the admiring words: "That was an artist," a word which in all its plainness from such a mouth meant as much as when the first Napoleon, after an interview with Goethe, exclaimed to those about him: "Voilà un homme!" To characterize the incommensurable greatness which Beethoven's art unfolded before the eyes and ears of the astonished world during the three decades (about) in which he wrought, would here be quite impossible; but fortunately I may spare myself the mere attempt, since it has already been made in countless writings, to which it has been my privilege to contribute here and there a mite in the course of my life. Let it suffice here to say, that, after and with the works of Bach, those of Beethoven must form the principal study of those who wish to gain artistic culture through the study of piano playing, and who feel the impulse to take up into themselves the noblest and the highest which art has produced in this department.

But there is one element in this exceeding greatness of Beethoven, which is recognized by nearly all the parties into which the musical world is as much divided as the political; and that is his (comparative) universality, — just the same peculiarity that characterizes the greatest poets of modern times: Shakespeare, and the next greatest, Goethe, and that has made this trefoil of genius a true light of a whole age. This (I repeat it, relative) universality, which includes all tones of the human breast, from the most tender to the most powerful and thrilling; which wanders through the whole scale of human feeling, so far as it may reveal itself in tones (and in what art has it revealed itself with more power and depth!); which conjures up before us now a lovely idyl, then again a picture of the boldest humor (Beethoven was master of that in all its shades), only to lift us again to the highest heights and plunges us into the deepest depths of tragedy; which smiles on us with the innocent eyes of childhood, and anon comes roaring in the storm of demonic powers and forces (spirits, however, always chained by art!); which now sinks into the soul of the people and sings their simplest melodies, and then again, as in the cycle of songs "To the distant loved one," soars to the sublimest heights of feeling; which in Fidelio has sung to us in heavenly tones the song of changeless constancy, as in the Adagio of the Ninth Symphony the song of world-embracing love: this primeval power, which with giant arms has sucked into itself the marrow of the earth, crystallized into tones, and then, in unexampled estrangement from the world, dies away in the ethereal bliss of self-dissolution (so to speak): this harmonious mood, which embraces all positive ideals of humanity (gleaming so clearly through his compositions) with a loving and a reverent fervor, and then again with world-annihilating humor flies away beyond them all: this unexampled and immense Protean power, by the side of which stood an equally gigantic, an exhaustless, purely musical inventive, plastic faculty: this exceeding power and fullness, this harmony between extremest opposites, is what I would lay the chief stress on, in considering, or in merely mentioning, the works of Beethoven.

Of Beethoven's works, taken collectively, the same thing holds that has been said of Shakespeare's, and in general, too, of Goethe's, that no one of his works is like another; each describes its magic circle more or less from a distinct centre. This is the case with nearly all his Sonatas for piano-forte solo, only a few excepted. They stand, collectively, alike from the ideal, the poetic, and from the purely musical stand-point, incomparably high above all that has been created in this field by earlier or later masters. They indicate the highest perfection of this kind of art, to which the Sonata works of Haydn and Mozart, and of course also those of Clementi, are mere preliminary steps, just as Bach's repeatedly mentioned great fugue work (which contains the gist of all creations of the sort) appears the supreme canon of that kind of art. And the same is true, also, of all his Duos, Trios, Quatuors, and not less of his Concertos, among which I might designate the Piano Concerto in E-flat, and the Violin Concerto, as the highest ideal of the kind.

The form of the Sonata under Beethoven's hands shows no essential change from that which it received through his great predecessors; only he has given it great expansion through the mighty soul which he breathed into it, so much so that from his first to his last works of this kind it has grown continually, until the ideal contents (Inhalt) with which he filled it in some of his last Sonatas, like the gigantic Op. 106, and the entirely unique, sphynx-like Ninth Symphony, at last actually overstepped all artistic bounds, — at least in the final movements, which seem already like forerunners of the anarchy, which more recently has broken into the domain of art. I can but allude to those extensive, broad Adagios, swollen with mightiest respirations; there is but little, at all events, in this whole field of art that can compare with them in soulful depth and inwardness. Also the Scherzo, which Beethoven for the most part puts in the place of the earlier Minuet, deserves special mention, since this form of expression seems entirely a product of the Beethoven genius, in which he really is unapproachable.

And there is still one more form to which Beethoven has given the highest perfection, namely, the Variation. This — both in his greater works, where it appears only as an integral part of a greater whole, and in some independent works of this kind — he has endowed with a richness of invention and treated with a freedom, with which there is little to be compared in the works of his great predecessors (if we except the mighty Variation works of Bach which we have mentioned), a freedom which indeed becomes almost willful in the Thirty-three Variations on a Waltz by Diabelli, but which, in the Variations on a theme from the Sinfonia Eroica, has produced, perhaps the noblest, the most genial, most brilliant work of this kind, — one which, moreover, seems remarkable on account of its well-nigh "modern" virtuoso treatment of the piano-forte technique.

(To be continued.)

REMINISCENCES OF THE BIRMINGHAM FESTIVAL (1879).

MAX BRUCH'S LAY OF THE BELL.

REVERTING to Herr Max Bruch's Lay of the Bell, the question first arises whether the composer was altogether happy in his choice of a theme. We are growing somewhat more critical than heretofore on this matter. At one time anything was thought good enough to be — as Wagner would put it — set to music. Pathos or bathos, an expression of sentiment or a logarithmic table, — all was one to composers content to tack on strains which their nominal subject neither inspired nor befitted. But this deplorable age has passed, and though the faults of our own time are many we have at least come to demand that words used for music shall be such as are adapted for — nay, such as require — musical expression. The perception of such words, however, is a gift which does not appear to be bestowed upon everybody. Apropos, there is a very pregnant passage in one of Mendelssohn's letters to his sister. Referring to a composition from her clever pen, the master said: —

"At the beginning of the air alone are the words vigorous and spirited, and from them emanated the whole of your lovely piece of music. The music of the choruses is, of course, good, for it is written by you, but it seems to me . . . as if it were not necessarily what it is; indeed, as if it might have been differently composed. This arises from the poetry not demanding any particular music. . . . I would advise you to be more cautious in the choice of your words, because, after all, it is not everything in the Bible, even if it suits the theme, that is suggestive of music."

Here we have Wagner's theory on the same subject before Wagner announced it, and here also a true test by which to judge the fitness of a composer's theme. Words must suggest music, and that with such definiteness that the music must be necessarily what it is. Applying this test to Herr Bruch's choice of Schiller's poem, the result is not satisfactory. Beyond question there are many passages in Das Lied von der Glocke which ask for musical expression in irresistible accents, but there are many others which do nothing of the kind — passages such as the old Italian composers of operas would have given to "speaking recitative," or which the Germans, leaving them to dialogue, would pass over. What, for instance, is the music demanded by such lines as these? —

"Wie sich schon die Pfeifen bräunen!
Dieses Stübchen tauch' ich ein;
Seh'n wir's überglass't erscheinen,
Wird's zum Gusse zeitig sein."

One may hit this verse anywhere without getting a musical ring out of it, and if Herr Bruch's cantata be a dull one it is principally because he had to deal with so many like it, and solemnly brought to bear the whole apparatus of his art, grinding the wind with a vast amount of noise and whirling wheels. When the composer has to do with really musical words he is often happy, but otherwise he simply affords an illustration of the fact that you cannot grow grapes on a thorn-tree, nor pick figs from a thistle. In saying this, I do not lose sight of the fact that Romberg set music to the same poem, and that his work still lives in the enjoyment of widespread favor. But Romberg treated the theme in a much simpler fashion than Herr Bruch — an observer of modern custom — could well follow, passing lightly over the unmusical portions of his text, and fastening upon those really lyrical or dramatic. Thus, Romberg had an advantage not enjoyed by Bruch. A composer must now be "intense," or nothing, and roll his eyes in a fine frenzy, even if he set to music the multiplication table.

Herr Bruch is very intense throughout this Lay of the Bell. His fires are as lurid as those which dart from the melting furnace, and the poor master-workman is not allowed to say, "Well, we'll now begin the casting," without a degree of "agonizing" which must materially add to the heat of his labors. Vainly do we ask, as the cantata goes on, for some repose. How the repose should come we do not stipulate. Let it be a commonplace duet in thirds and sixths, or a little instrumental episode, with a pretty accompanied melody for the violins. Anything you please, Herr Bruch, to relieve the ear from that ponderous orchestration, and the eye from those gladiatorial strivings. But, no! Herr Bruch thunders away like a general who depends upon his heavy artillery, and there is a great deal of resultant noise, together with much smoke. Herein, however, the composer is but a victim to fashion. Music is nowadays very much an affair of nerves, and everybody knows that stimulants soon lose their effect unless the dose be from time to time increased. So, no doubt, our orchestras will continue to grow, and our composers to devise combinations more and more thrilling, till the nerves can respond no longer, and some one discovers that the real purpose of music is to affect the mind and heart rather than the ganglionic centres whence issue the "creeps."

Let us now see what is good in Herr Bruch's work. In the first place, it shows a knowledge how to produce orchestral effects, even if that knowledge be not always judiciously used. This, however, is a very common merit, because it is more easily acquired now than in the past, when the resources available were smaller. Herr Bruch's scoring is essentially modern, — in other words, a play of color rather than of graceful or striking forms, the color always as brilliant as he can make it. The result diverts the eye in a great measure from aught else, and whether, in a work of the kind, orchestra or voices should have the first place is a question needless to discuss. Nevertheless, the fact that Herr Bruch holds rank as a successful colorist should be mentioned for such credit as it may deserve. It is even more essential to point out that his treatment of lyrical subjects, especially those which are very tender in sentiment, shows real feeling and aptitude. To passion he is seldom equal, but when not required to fathom its depths he commands a large meed of approval. In this Lay of the Bell, for instance, we have a chorus, referring to the joy of a child's birth, admirable alike in workmanship and expression. So with a tenor solo and chorus concerning the days of youth and love, and, for the same reason, a trio, "Peace benignant, gentle concord," should be classed among beautiful things, while a largely developed chorus, "Hallowed order," is masterly in construction and suggestive in character. On the level of these efforts Herr Bruch is at his best. Here he writes with true feeling, and reaches our hearts. As a master of melody, he never, perhaps, asserts himself with the fullness to be desired, but his phrases, when spontaneous, lack neither sentiment nor beauty. Having to ascend higher or go lower, he gives us less pleasure. Herr Bruch, as we now see him, is not fit for the "Ercles vein."

Dramatic vigor with him becomes mere empty clamor, while his cry de profundis is too often labored and dull. The fire chorus, for example, and that in which the horrors of civil strife are depicted, have no genuine power. The music would serve for anything else requiring noise, and is but an uproar in rhythm. With regard to the composer's treatment of the more profound and solemn portions of his text, it is clear that he does not atone for going out of his depth by elaboration of manner. Herr Bruch seems to have a horror of being simple; yet simplicity would have served his turn better here than any amount of studied effort. When Handel, in his Messiah, approached the mystery of Incarnation, he, giant as he was, put the sacred words, "Behold a Virgin shall conceive," into recitative. Herr Bruch, apparently, would have stormed around them with his entire force, and, after all, left them untouched.

Another characteristic of this music is its polyphony. Our composer is not a mere chord monger. He has a fancy for "real parts," and goes on writing them, not only with skill, but with indiscriminateness. In the solos the complexity of the orchestral accompaniment is often a cause of embarrassment, while the more important choruses are rendered needlessly difficult by a movement of parts without apparent object or obvious result. Intricate details are sometimes necessary to the working out of a composer's themes, and then they exist for their own sake, and stand in the first place. But when they are non-essential, or buried beneath other matter, they are superfluous. In music, as elsewhere, everything should have a reason, and for things without reason there can be no defense.

To sum up, Herr Bruch's Lay of the Bell is not a success. It has beauties, but they are outweighed by defects; and, as the composer writes in no particular manner, because that alone is his, it seems a pity that he did not live earlier, when lyrical gifts, exercised with simplicity and taste, might have served him well. For the present Herr Bruch has been blown away by his own storm, rent in pieces by his own "intensity." Romberg may sleep in peace. — Lond. Mus. World.

MUSICAL CLUBS OF HARVARD: THE PIERIAN SODALITY.

(Continued from page 148.)

REMINISCENCES OF AN EX-PIERIAN.

AMONG all the advertising-boards which met the eye of the student as he ascended the steps of University Hall to evening prayers, notifying the meetings of the different college societies, none so arrested the attention of one of the youth who entered the college in 183-, as that which announced every Monday the rehearsals of the Pierian Sodality. Whatever of intellectual or convivial entertainment "Institute of 1770," "I. O. H.," "Porcellian Club," "Hasty Pudding Club," might promise, this signified to him that, amid the severer pursuits of university life, some place would be permitted for the continued cultivation of the cherished art of music. At that time the flute was almost the only instrument played by gentlemen. The violin was held in small repute; so small, indeed, that one which the lad brought with him was very soon laid aside for the more popular instrument, to learn which was an almost indispensable accomplishment. Scarcely a sound but of flutes was heard. From these the gentle murmurings or liquid trills rose from every side of the quadrangle the moment the bell at twelve rang the close of morning study hours. A single piano, at which a graduate, a devoted amateur, rooming in Massachusetts, studied Beethoven's Sonatas, then just beginning to become known, seems now, with its superior character and capabilities, fitly to symbolize the advanced position already occupied by the critic who has ever since held the most influential musical pen in this community. The violin above referred to, and one other, with a violoncello, all by chance in the same class, and all afterwards associated together in the Sodality, were the only stringed instruments known among the students during the whole four years of the writer's college life. There had once been a serpent in the society; but as far back as 1833, no one having been found to play it for several years, it had been exchanged for a French horn. For this how a player was sometimes sought may be seen by the following vote: "Mr. — was proposed as a member; but, it being stated that he wished to try the French horn before he was proposed and see how he liked it, we agreed to put off voting for him till next meeting, and to keep our old French horn a week longer for him."

On one occasion, in 1833, a double bass-viol was introduced by a gentleman, afterwards a judge, of which it is recorded, "it had a good effect, and was a great addition to the music of the club." There had also been bass-horns. One, spoken of as a "semi-brass monster," was exchanged for a "copper-brass horn," in 1834. Bass was always the prevailing want; and to supply it this instrument was from time to time placed in the hands of almost any one enterprising enough to learn the less than half a dozen notes required for the simple harmonies. But this was not always successful. In one instance, at least, it was dispensed with, because it "did not chord with the flutes." But at the time of the writer's connection with the club all these, double-bass, serpent, French horn, and bass-horn, had disappeared from the scene,¹ and nothing broke the monotony of the flutes excepting a single clarinet, which came in 1836 or 1837, and a trombone which one of the violinists had been forced to take up, the violoncello being not always available. It was not strange, perhaps, that this instrument should have exposed the performer to the charge of disturbing the quiet of his entry in Holworthy by his practice of the airs, with variations, from which he sought to acquire facility in its use; but it certainly betrayed an imperfect knowledge of the trombone in the president, when he gravely, with searching eye, interrogated the offender, — had he not been amusing himself by "blowing it the wrong way?"

The Pierians held their rehearsals in Number 6 University Hall. The faculty at one time forbade them the use of this room, having ordered the doors of the hall to be closed in the evening on account of some damage done within the building by the "Euphradians." But a remonstrance was sent up and the privilege restored. For unexcused absence a small fine was imposed.

¹ Of the ultimate fate of these instruments the writer has no knowledge; but there remains a tradition of one of the French horns that, after having been for some time missing, it was discovered, on the departure of its last player, in inglorious repose in his opal-closet.

To govern the playing cannot have been a difficult task. In 1833 they once made trial of a metronome, which, thought the secretary, "is likely to do us much good in keeping time, when we get used to it." It may be gathered from the records that the musicians, either from love of fun, or under the influence of enthusiasm, would sometimes take liberties with, or go astray from, their notes in a manner which could not be allowed in a well regulated orchestra. Now and then a visitor, perhaps from the "Pierian Glee Club," entertained them with a song; as when "Mr. H — sang with great applause the beautiful air of 'The Mellow Horn,' accompanied by — and — on flutes."

No small pleasure was it after one of these rehearsals to come out under the piazza and give their fellow students a touch of their quality; and then the sudden swell of music floating from in front of University Hall across the silent yard would be echoed back with hearty hand-clappings all along the windows of the buildings opposite.

Special delight the Pierians took in their more elaborate serenades. These were not confined to Cambridge, but extended to Watertown, Brookline, Roxbury, Jamaica Plain, Boston, etc. Excursions of this sort would, of necessity, be protracted far into the night. Not seldom, indeed, long after daybreak, "the chiding of the sharp-tongued bell" for morning prayers was heard by the returning vagrants, summoning them, just within sight of their longed-for rooms, with tired limbs, to the duties of a new day. For these expeditions even the chill air of March and April was not too harsh; but in the balmy nights of early summer the rural quiet of the old village, not yet dreaming of street-cars and a thickly peopled Dana Hill, with the scarcely less unbroken stillness of Otis, Winthrop, and Chauncy Places, of Franklin Street, of Beacon Street, wherever, in short, dwelt celebrated belles, was interrupted by the delicate strains of the little group of players, who found a sufficient reward in the sound of a window raised, a blind thrown open, or any other indication that the sleepers were alert. The recollection of every one who took part in them will supply him with abundant incidents of these romantic excursions, oftentimes sufficiently amusing; such as the lavishing of the tender strains at the wrong house (as when once the leader, not familiar with the arsenal yard, drew up the band before the gun-room instead of the commander's quarters); or upon the ears of the servant-maids when the ladies were away (as when Judge Y's family had not yet come from the party at Judge Z's); the encountering of another company of serenaders (as happened once in Brookline, where the jealous later comers diverted themselves by taking a drive with the carriage and horses of their rivals); the disappointments, fatigues, hopes, exultations numberless; and many a hospitable mansion can tell how it welcomed in to a hastily improvised repast the players that had stolen upon its inmates with such sweet harmony as the night becomes.

But it was upon exhibition days the Pierians sought to achieve their highest honors. The order of exercises on these days usually gave ten or twelve parts to the declamations and three to music, besides the introductory performance while the faculty were taking their seats. July 17, 1839, when, having had a large accession to their stock of tunes, they were ambitious to display them, and managed to introduce an unusual number into the programme, they were charged by the corrector of the proof with making an "innovation;" but, says the secretary, "the audience did not attempt to frown out of countenance the innovation, nor has it come to our ears since that any one thought we played too much."

In preparation for the day, the pieces which had been selected by a committee for performance were diligently practiced at extra meetings as well as on the stated evenings, commonly also once just before the day in the organ loft, between twelve and one o'clock, and again in the morning before the hour of beginning the exercises. These were held in the chapel in University Hall; and the dignity of the occasion to all the musicians, especially to him whose distinction it happened to be in the capacity of first flute to lead the band, cannot easily be overrated, at the present moment, when from behind the green curtains of their little gallery the procession, headed by President Quincy in cap and gown, was seen to enter at the southerly door, the line of half a dozen flutes stretching along the front seat struck up the grand march in El Hyder, esteemed the most imposing of all their introductory pieces. From Helicon's harmonious rills no richer stream of music flowed along. On melody like that the Muses from their sacred seats with favor might look down. Here are the first bars of the grand march in El Hyder: —

This stately opening was followed by some piece in livelier time (the selections at each playing consisted always of one slow and one quick movement), a waltz, or quickstep, in the same key. Every one who attended exhibitions in those days must often have heard a quickstep by Walsch that began in this way: — and may remember how charmingly it dropped directly upon the chord of E-flat: — and returned again to its key: —

And this waltz: —

And this, which was No. 53: —

One of these went by the name of Twelfth Waltz; but why twelfth, or whose, who can tell?

In all this the part of third flute was not very exacting. Beyond the sense of fulfilling a duty, there could have been little satisfaction, one would think, in playing whole pages of bars like this : — varied only by the change of time or key. It is amusing to recall what elegant and costly flutes, with long extent of silver-keyed magnificence, were put to this seemingly uninteresting though indispensable service; yet flauto terzo, beyond a doubt, would look back to these monotonous bars with as true pleasure as primo. The violins, it may be mentioned, afterwards helped to supply this "light time," as we called it, with good effect.

The musicians' gallery projected from the northerly wall, high up near the ceiling, and directly over the pulpit where the president took his seat, the platform for the speakers being just below him. The entrée to the gallery was a coveted privilege, not alone because the occupants bore so important a part in the services, but also because from between the curtains the eye could range unobserved over the assembled beauty that graced the benches of the hall below, or the pews in the professors' gallery opposite, where were congregated in large numbers, to witness the débuts of their young friends, the fashionable dames and damsels of Cambridge and vicinity.

Once there was a narrow escape from a miss in the præludium, from the tarrying too long at the wine: "An hour before exhibition we met in the organ-loft to see how it sounded. We were delighted with our playing, and to prove our delight we adjourned to the Presses room to pledge each other in a bumper and also to take courage. Whilst we were pleasantly chatting we heard the bell toll for the entrance of the faculty. We ran as hard as we could to get into the loft before they could get in the chapel, but unfortunately they had the shortest distance to go and were already seated when (out of breath) we seized our instruments and began to blow as hard as the state of our lungs permitted; but Madame Discord had already taken possession of our instruments and made us perform horribly. We were in despair, and sneaked off without being seen by the audience. In our first tune we felt a great deal the absence of the first horn. The rest of the playing went off pretty well, and made up, in some degree, for our bad playing."

(To be concluded.)

REAL AND IDEAL IN FRENCH ART.

(From a Private Letter.)

ANYTHING more celestial than our sail from Geneva to Vevey, cannot be imagined. The smell of the lindens and orange blossoms that pours in at our window now is a sort of chrism in itself. I don't think there can be a better preparation for the enjoyment of nature than a slight course of French Art. It seems to me the French had better stick to naturalism and realism; in that they are masters. Zola is an epoch making man, and will suffice to counterbalance all the idealists can do for twenty years to come; Cherbuliez cannot touch him. The modern idealists do not seem to feel that idealism must have a real basis; that to be a good idealist, you must be a realist and something more. The French idealists swim vaguely in mid-air, and talk only words. They have too little real meaning in them; it is not true idealism, but mere fantasticism and sentimentality. Hugo is the latest man who could start from the earth and really soar; the others climb up on a ladder of sentiment; when they have got to the top, they knock it out from beneath themselves, and then down they come. I do not wonder that the realists occupy themselves so much with what is vile. Zola's dirt and squalid misery are human and refreshing after foundationless fine sentiment and aimless enthusiasm. Only it must be admitted that the realists look at life too much from below, like the sloth, which passes its life on the under-side of branches. Let it seem natural for man to look up, rather than down, even as his face is turned to the sky. If the idealists, who spend so much of their time in the air, would only sometimes look downward, they might do the world good service; but they don't; they still keep their faces turned skyward, and, as Hauff very rightly says, they see — nothing.

Of the French heroic painters, David seems to me to be the most pleasing. He is too grandiloquent, but he has genuine sincerity and a great deal of elegance; he moreover preserves the importance of his figures, and does not waste his powder on mise-en-scène. His pictures have a focus. Of the classic masters, Raphael pleases me less and less, compared with his companions. If Andrea del Sarto had not been bedevilled by his beast of a wife, he would have been able to put Raphael in his pocket! A man who could paint children as he did must have had a good fund of purity in him. W. F. A.

TALKS ON ART. — SECOND SERIES.¹

FROM INSTRUCTIONS OF MR. WILLIAM M. HUNT TO HIS PUPILS.

XIII.

(On a Criticism of Millet and French Art.)

ART is not an exotic, and we must receive it through the channels by which it has come to us. America has no opinion — has not gone far enough; has no place in the art-world; is a student and a beginner, and is always handled with the greatest gentleness on account of her youth. If we are going to turn up our noses against nations that have done everything, we go against our advantage. Our acts will be like those of an idiotic monkey, who, because he can't crack a cocoa-nut shell, throws it away. It is dangerous for a young nation to turn anything to ridicule. To develop Art, the first thing is to shut our eyes and not think of it, instead of being so forth-putting, and spending our energy in broiling about.

What rank does America hold in the art-world to-day as art-critic? Before a nation slurs a country like France, it ought to have a reputation. There is no criticism here. There is a good deal of growling and talking against French Art, but nobody takes up the subject and handles it with any intelligence.

One test of an art-criticism is that it shall be valuable anywhere in the world. Nothing should be written against masters without being weighed.

"Now, little boys, look at your books. Don't open your eyes and look over there at French Art! I have seen it, and I know that it is not good."

A man who has studied Art in France and been familiar with the French way of studying it, ought to know something of the subject. I don't believe there is one man capable of earning his living with his brush who has n't the greatest respect for Art as it is understood in France. It is not absurd for a Frenchman to say anything against American Art, but it is absurd for an American to say anything against French Art.

If we want prune-boxes painted, we can't get them done here. It is so much cheaper for a man to say that he does n't like Shakespeare or Michel Angelo than it is to write a poem or paint a picture. We have had enough of this kind of talk. We want men capable of making things that will be received in any part of the world.

¹ Copyright, 1879, by Helen M. Knowlton.

We don't want our critics to be diminutives of Ruskin. We can tolerate a good deal from Mr. Ruskin, because he gives us so much that is beautiful and interesting; and his knowledge of Nature and his interest in Art are great.

But let us paint our opinion on canvas, and not on the newspapers. It is very easy to avoid painting the way that Millet and Delacroix paint. In fact it would not be very easy to paint as Veronese painted.

William Blake says that the best of the English engravers were not capable of making their first etchings. They were always made and laid in by Frenchmen.

We don't say that the French are Greeks or Venetians; but if ever anybody handled a subject well, it was Jean François Millet.

Now, come! We are a young nation; we are trying to learn something, and we are perfectly aware that, as a people, we are rankly ignorant of Art. Would it not be better to let alone the different "schools" of the past, and go on, striving to learn something, so that we can be able to make a living, than to turn ourselves suddenly into judges of nations more capable than we are?

France might wish to be judged by her peers. She ought to have a chance. We assume to be her superiors. Why can't we show our work on canvas, and criticise French Art by making an art so superior to theirs that there'll be a call for it in Spain — or New Zealand?

The only way to arrive anywhere is to be modest. If we ever expect to be anything, we must keep our future open, so that we may learn from what is best. Imagine a freshman instructed, in his first lesson, to turn up his nose at French Art! That will not make a Michel Angelo of him when he comes to be a sophomore. There are a certain number of people in this world who find French Art good for something.

You have given your advice; I'll give mine. If you wish to teach drawing, go straight to France; and, when you've come to be so smart that you can teach there, I'll pay your expenses.

Dwight's Journal of Music.

SATURDAY, SEPTEMBER 27, 1879.

WILLIAM MORRIS HUNT.

[Born March 31, 1824; died September 8, 1879.]

WHAT genius is, people have not found out yet. It has been styled a "capacity for taking pains;" but a man without it may take a great deal of pains and not convince us he has it.

It is intensity, a power of coming close to Nature and Life, and its bottom fact is Love.

But whatever it may be, we all feel that William Hunt had it. He did not have it in its usual American form, a gift of invention, or audacious speculation, for he was no Philistine. His was the old consecrated kind of genius, creative only in painting with a sympathetic charm which reached all who cared for what he did. This gift is so rare with the Anglo-Saxon race, and especially in America, that it will be long ere the fullness of our loss will be felt. It is the extinction of a great light; a fervent hand is cold; and the warmth which glowed through so many friends and disciples is like a trodden ember extinguished.

Already many appreciative sketches of the master have been published, and more will follow, as friends find the leisure from grief to analyze and describe his powers.

Mournful as we are at such a removal, we must not forget to remember how opportune his life was. He partly created here, and partly found, that longing for artistic culture which is one of the striking facts of our day. He helped when help was most needed; and acting directly as he did upon so many minds, the pain and distress of his loss is felt as those indifferent to art can hardly imagine.

I shall not seek to characterize, now, his genius or his method of work. By what he did, by what he said, by what he wrote, that is largely apprehended. But I would notice one or two points of his career which naturally escape general observation.

From his earliest years his inclination for form showed itself, as soon as the penknife was laid aside, by cutting, in shell-cameo, portraits which were often faithful and beautiful. This led him, when he went abroad with his brothers, to select sculpture as the natural issue of his skill. But whether it be that the marble he invoked chilled his ardent nature, or that something within him was keeping him for other fields, he has left us little of importance in that branch of art. He studied with Pradier, a Genovese, who, more Parisian than any Frenchman, delighted the world with figures who charm was their graceful naturalness. His chief work is the monument to Molière, where two female figures equaled all that was hoped of his skill, and will carry entwined with the name of Molière his own to future generations.

After a journey to the East, and during the sad days of depression in the cholera-infected air of Paris, the good genius of Mr. Hunt took from his hand the chisel, and placed there the brush. He found in Thomas Couture a manly and simple method for painting, which, with the acquaintance later with the profounder genius of Millet, made the school in which he grew to the noble artist we all admired. Something he had of these two men; but happily also much of his own, without which he could not have influenced as he did. His method was large, suggestive, of great breadth and simplicity. He never was a great colorist, nor would one call Millet such; but they both aimed at character, and attained it.

His temperament was wholly artistic. He saw, he felt, he created. There was the same flash in his touch that there was in his speaking eye, the same emphasis that there was in his cordial and ringing voice. He was all over not only a man, but one different from others, a nature not repeated, copied from none, and one to be found nowhere else.

It has not been remarked, I believe, how much the early habit of modelling from the form has been of use to him through life. He did not think of an object as a flat, as many do, but of something which one can walk round. We feel the same thing in the Sistine figures of Michel Angelo.

His electric temper forbade "niggling." He could not even finish as a more equable nature might have done. He felt this, but he was loyal to his own temperament, and would not accommodate the public with smooth and uninspired work. When he had done, he left a picture. It was done by a jet, and he would not piece the fiery mould with the cold metal of a later hour.

In conclusion, I will merely say that in France, where art is so honored, it is the custom, when a great painter dies, to collect his works, no possessor of them daring to refuse, in a single exhibition, — a monument and an ovation at the same time, to one of Heaven's choicest gifts, — a noble nature and a genius which continues to inspire, long years after the remorseless grave has seized and made what was perishable its own.

T. G. A.

NAHANT, September 15, 1879.

These words, from one most competent to write on such a theme, — a theme so rich, so sad, — are better than anything which we could write of our great painter (who also had much music in his nature), whose death is felt so deeply and so widely by all who knew him as an artist of rare genius, and as a genial, cordial, frank, and independent man, — one with whom to love the beautiful was to create, to reproduce, — one whose presence, like his work, was cheering and inspiring.

Happily, "though dead, he yet speaketh," not only through his masterly creations, but in these very columns, through those pregnant, quickening, and frequently original words which sprang from him in the course of his instructions to his pupils, and which one of the most devoted and intelligent of these, Miss Helen M. Knowlton, has so faithfully recorded, and is now contributing to each number of our JOURNAL. These "Talks on Art" took place mostly a few years ago; but they now appear in print for the first time, and they are as fresh as if uttered to day. Miss Knowlton's stock of notes is not yet exhausted, and the "Talks" will still continue to enrich our columns. Naturally they will be sought and read with a new interest henceforth.

Gladly would we fill a whole number of the paper with the many tender and appreciative tributes which have been paid to the dear friend and noble artist, — the master, if we had one, in his art, — in almost every paper that we open. For the present we select the following, which will interest many of our readers who may not have seen it in the Courier of September 14.

THE LAST YEAR OF WILLIAM HUNT'S LIFE.

THE month of June, 1878, found him at Niagara Falls, painting sketches of great power and even sublimity. The trip was taken as a needed recreation after a long winter's work in the studio. It was his intention, after leaving Niagara, to go to Europe for a short stay; but this plan was given up on the arrival of the commission to paint two large panels for the new Assembly Chamber at Albany. At first, Mr. Hunt seriously objected to undertaking the work. He had not the health and strength, neither had he pursued such a course of study as would enable him to complete so important a work in so short a period of time. He constantly replied, "I am not the man;" but Lieutenant-Governor Dorsheimer was not to be thwarted in his splendid plan, and Mr. Hunt was at last persuaded to submit his designs to the committee, who received them with enthusiasm. He left Niagara and went to Boston, where he spent the entire summer, studying his compositions for the great panels. Few people are aware of the immense amount of work required for the preliminary study of such large paintings, and most any other artist would have demanded two years for the completion of the work.

It was expected that the staging would be ready for him by the first of September, and he strained every nerve to be able to meet the occasion. People who saw him at that time found him literally "on the heights," in a severe, classical mood. More than one said, "In a year's time he will not be alive."

September 1, 1878, found him with characteristic punctuality, ready to go to Albany, the two compositions painted on large canvases with an effect that he hoped to reproduce in grand size on the somewhat ill-lighted panels of the Assembly Chamber. But a tiresome delay occurred, by which the necessary staging could not be made ready for him until after the middle of October, thus allowing the artist less than sixty working days in which to complete the great work.

Mr. Hunt was earnestly besought not to undertake such a superhuman task; and, for a time, expected to be able only to broadly sketch in the designs, and to leave them curtailed during the inauguration. But those who knew him can understand how he threw himself into the work with tremendous energy, tempered by intense thought and keenly critical taste, and would see how impossible it was for him to rest for a moment while the spell was on him. Work went on, sometimes even in the night, and Sundays only were given to driving and changing of scene. One brief vacation of two or three days saw him in Boston, keenly absorbing Michael Angelo's D'y, studying the turn and foreshortening of the foot, which caught his eye and seemed to remind him of the foot of the sleeping mother in his own Flight of Night, "thirsting," as he said, "for knowledge which he so much needed," feeling how little he knew and how great the work he had undertaken. Never forgetting to express his delight in the work which he enjoyed as only a man can enjoy who possessed so eminently the creative faculty. Never forgetting to speak with delight of his co-workers in Albany, and of the helpfulness of every one concerned. Of the committee he said, "Their applause makes me modestly hopeful of success."

And success came. Even professional enemies and carpers were silenced. No other living man could have done it.

Feeling never so well, never so ready for work, he took no rest after this great exertion, but settled down in his Boston studio, and, in January and February, painted his last portraits — one, fortunately, of himself.

As spring came on, his energy failed, and nervous prostration followed, from which he never recovered. With the best of care he lingered on, month after month, unable to do more than occasionally write some business note, and feeling that he "should never touch a brush again." To him life meant work, and work meant life, and notwithstanding his cheerfulness and apparent hopefulness, there was an underlying current of sorrow at the thought that his work was done.

Whether his drowning was accidental or not may certainly never be known. But enough has not been said of his extremely weak physical condition, with depression so great as to closely border on possible insanity.

HELEN M. KNOWLTON.

THE BIRMINGHAM FESTIVAL.

THE thirty-third of these famous triennial musical festivals, which took place on the 26th, 27th, 28th, and 29th of August, seems to have shown some falling off in interest. A correspondent of the London Times complains of three things in which reform has long been needed. He says (1) that "repetition of a few works, masterpieces though they be, appears absolutely unwarrantable;" (2) that, "besides a single Symphony of Beethoven, the splendid body of musicians was independently employed only in the performance of a few of the most familiar overtures, such as are heard at every promenade concert;" and (3) that "the dignity of the festival was not increased by the amount of time granted to the singers for the purpose of mere vocal display." Elijah, the Messiah, and Israel in Egypt were the oratorios, — the first two everybody knows by heart in England. With the former the festival opened on Tuesday morning, and, strange to say, the local critics write about it through several long newspaper columns as if it were something wholly new, giving its whole history from its first production at the same festival in 1846. Yet the sale of tickets this time fell much below that of the festival three years ago. Even Elijah is becoming an old story even to John Bull! Or at least he is learning to feel that there can be too much even of a good thing (unless it be of Bach or Beethoven)! The performance seems to have been in all respects satisfactory. The principal solo singers were: Soprano, Mme. Gerster; contralto, Mme. Trebelli-Bettini and Mme. Patey; tenor, Mr. E. Lloyd and Mr. Vernon Rigby; bass, Mr. Santley. Mme. Gerster was heard for the first time in oratorio, at least in the English language. The Times says: —

On this account her decided success was all the more remarkable. At the beginning her voice seemed to suffer a little from the effect of nervousness, but too natural in the circumstances, but no trace of this remained as soon as her first solo, "What have I to do with thee?" was reached. The beautiful melody, in which the widow of Zarephath implores the prophet's help for her son, was delivered with an impressive simplicity as truly dramatic as it was free from all operatic exaggeration. Although far removed from the bravura style in which Madame Gerster excels, the music is well adapted to her voice, and her declamation also was deserving of high praise, especially if the novelty of the idiom is considered. The same remarks of unreserved commendation apply to the delivery of the soprano air, "Hear ye, Israel," at the commencement of the second part; but, perhaps, even more remarkable than either was the purity of intonation with which the, in that respect, extremely difficult utterances of the Youth, "There is nothing, etc.," were delivered. According to the etiquette obtaining at the sacred concerts, no marks of approval were given by the audience, but the impression produced by Madame Gerster, and, indeed, by most of the other artists, was nevertheless distinctly discernible.

In the evening was given one of the two principal novelties of the festival, Max Bruch's Cantata: "The Lay of the Bell" (Schiller), conducted by himself. In another column we have copied what appears to be a very just criticism of the work, which, though new to Birmingham, was first heard (as Op. 45) in May, 1878, at Cologne. The solos were sung by Mme. Lemmens-Sherrington, Mme. Trebelli, Mr. Rigby, and Herr Henschel (as Master Founder). The Musical Standard says:—

At the first hearing we were convinced of Herr Bruch's complete mastery of the art of writing for the orchestra; his intimacy with the most elaborate contrapuntal resources; his felicity in descriptive writing for voices, for instruments, and for both combined; his genuine and deep appreciation of his subject, and of his determination not to write down to the public, but to endeavor to lift his hearers to the contemplation of art pure and simple. We felt, however, that in the solo parts there is a lack of anything individual or striking, and the solos seemed to us to have been written almost expressly for the purpose of uniting the links of the story; the cantata is also overburdened with recitative. One of our Birmingham contemporaries suggests that Herr Bruch has been over anxious to show that he belonged to the rigidly classical school; we think, rather, that he has not humbly, though still most effectually, at the feet of Richard Wagner. The brief Leitmotif, with which the Master Founder is allied—like that of Hereward in Mr. Prout's new cantata—would suggest this, if nothing else did; but the long recitative passages, and the absence of any single solo with a clearly-defined and well-developed subject, suggest still more emphatically the erratic Meister who, after growing weary of the hardness of heart and persistent unbelief of the old world, is pathetically appealing to the new one. The solos are some of them very beautiful, but they are valuable only because they are links in a strong iron chain, and do not seem to us to be forged of such precious metal that they would be eagerly sought for whether in the chain or alone. This may not be a fault—we do not say that it is, and of course a composer has a perfect right to do what to him seems best; but the solos in "The Lay of the Bell" are not all or nearly all beautiful, in the sense that the adagios of Beethoven's or Mozart's piano sonatas, or the andantes of Spohr's violin concertos, are beautiful. The choruses are broad and grand—those descriptive of the house-burning, and of the rising of the lawless mob, are sublime—at any rate, they had a sublime effect as performed by the Birmingham band and chorus.

The second part of the concert offered a miscellaneous and hackneyed selection: Overtures to Semiramide and Fra Diavolo; Air, "Nymphes attentives," from Gounod's Polyeucte (Mr. Lloyd); Duet from Il Giuramento (Miss Williams and Mme. Patey); Air from The Magic Flute: "Gli angui d'Inferno" (Mme. Gerster); Air, "Caro mio ben," Giordani (Mme. Patey); "Robert, toi que j'aime" (Miss Williams); Duet from Balfe's Talismano (Mme. Gerster and Mr. Lloyd).

Wednesday morning was occupied with Rossini's sensuous and melodious Opera of Moses in Egypt metamorphosed into an English Oratorio (!), of which, perhaps, the less said the better here, since we have known it in the same nondescript form only too well ourselves in times gone by. The singers at Birmingham were Mme. Sherrington, as Anais; Mme. Trebelli, as Zillah; Miss Anna Williams, as Sinai; Mr. Santley, as Moses; Herr Henschel, as Pharaoh; Mr. Lloyd, as Amenophis; Mr. W. H. Cummings, as Aaron, and Mr. Bridson, as Osiris. The evening concert presented the same vocal solo artists in the following mixed and lengthy programme:—

Symphony, (No. 7)	Beethoven.
Song, "Anges du Paradis" (Mireille)	Gounod.
Song, "Che farò" (Orfeo)	Gluck.
Trio, "Qual Volutta" (I Lombardi)	Verdi.
Air, "Celeste Aida"	Verdi.
Trio, "Tremati, empl, tremate"	Beethoven.
Air, "In veder l'amata stanza" (Mignon)	Thomas.
Finale, "Ah non credea mirarti" (Son-nambula)	Bellini.
Part Song, "The Silent Land"	A. R. Gaul.
Overture, Concert overture, in F	Dr. C. S. Heap.
Duo, "Ah se di mali miei" (Taurcredi)	Rossini.
Solo and chorus, "Where the pine-trees wave" (Faust)	Schumann.
Air, "Dalla sua pace" (Don Giovanni)	Mozart.
Duo, "Canta la Serenata" (Mefistofele)	Boito.
Air, "Au bruit des lourds marteaux" (Philémon et Baucis)	Gounod.
Song, "Mi tradi" (Don Giovanni)	Mozart.
Ballad, "My love far away"	Balfe.
Duo, "Dove vai?" (Guillaume Tell)	Rossini.
Quartet, "A te o cara" (I Puritani)	Bellini.

The new feature of the programme was the Overture, in F, by Dr. C. Swinnerton Heap, who was a "Mendelssohn scholar," at Leipzig. The Standard says of it:—

It opens with an introduction of a placid character; con poco allegro, the horns giving out the dominant pianissimo, followed at the last beat in the bar by the strings muted. Some very tasteful polyphonic writing follows, relieved by light passages for the wood wind, while a short figure assigned first to the clarinet and bassoon, then to the flute, oboes, and horns, prepares the ear for the first principal subject, which enters at the twenty-ninth bar, the measure changing to 12-8, the time to allegro grazioso. This theme is very graceful and melodious, and is started by the strings, with coloring passages for the softer wind instruments. Some development follows, and the subject is repeated forte, the trumpets, trombones, and drums entering with fine effect, while contrast is obtained by beautiful, episodic passages, piano. The whole is of a very animated character, which, in preparing the entry for the second theme, gradually subsides into quiet chords for the wind, with strings pizzicato; the first bassoon gives a farewell fragment of the first theme as the strings enter the dominant of the new key (C); the first violins play alone a syncopated passage, ushering in a new theme, equally graceful with the first, which is taken up by the flutes, followed by the strings a third lower; this is followed by a subordinate theme of a different character—a true cantabile—given out by the cello and oboe, accompanied with a short figure, which, divided between the first and second violins, is very flowing; the theme is then worked out with much skill, and the first part is brought to a close with a brilliant climax. The thematic development, or free fantasia, as it is generally called, which follows, is very masterly from the musician's stand-point, and most interesting to the listener; the second theme is mostly employed, a very skillful application of the latter portion thereof giving great animation to this part, and the effect is increased by a striking modulation of the remote key of F sharp. The orchestral treatment is throughout exceedingly good. This portion ends with a pedal passage of twelve bars, poco tranquillo, during which parts of the second theme are heard from the bassoon, clarinet, and first violin; after a pause the first theme is resumed, and the proper recapitulation follows; there is varied orchestral treatment, the climax is more extended, and is followed by a coda vivace—really presto—introducing a new motive, which brings the overture to a close in a most spirited and brilliant manner. Dr. Heap, who conducted, met with a hearty round of applause on appearing in the orchestra, and was honored with a recall at the conclusion of the performance.

Handel's Messiah formed the crowning height, the Mont Blanc, in the middle of the festival (Thursday morning). The solo artists were Miss Anna Williams and Mme. Sherrington, Meses. Trebelli and Patey; Mr. Joseph Maas; Herr Henschel and Mr. Santley. It goes without saying that the Messiah is always grandly given at Birmingham. We see that some of the critics of the London press complain of being slighted by the management in sending them no tickets for the Messiah and Elijah; was it not considerate on the part of the management not to put these veteran reporters under any implied obligation to hear and write long, fulsome columns about great works of which they have said their say a hundred times?

The evening programme offered the new Cantata, composed for the festival by Saint-Saëns, sandwiched between several thicknesses of the same sort of miscellany as in the previous evenings, to wit:—

Overture, "Merry Wives of Windsor"	Nicolai.
Duet, "Pronta lo son" ("Don l'aquele")	Donizetti.
Song, "Bianca al par" ("Gli Ugionotti")	Meyerbeer.
Part Song, "The sea hath its pearls"	Pisauti.
Cantata, "The Lyre and the Harp"	Saint-Saëns.
Overture, "William Tell"	Rossini.
Air, "Un aura amorosa" ("Così fan tutte")	Mozart.
Duo, "Una remota vaga (remembranza)"	Wagner.
("Fliegender Holländer")	Wagner.
Air, "Oh, 't is a glorious sight" ("Oberon")	Weber.
Song, "Ombra leggiara" ("Dinorah")	Meyerbeer.
Trio, "Che fate qui Signor" ("Kauz")	Gounod.
Air, "La Habanera" ("Carmen")	Bizet.
Air, "Die zwei Grenadiere"	Schumann.
Duo, "Mille piacer" ("Favorita")	Donizetti.
Quintet, "Sento oh Dio" ("Così fan tutte")	Mozart.

Of the Cantata by the brilliant Frenchman we have no room to copy a description now, but may do so hereafter.

Friday, the fourth and last day, was after all the great day of the festival, if we measure by the solidity and sterling quality of the selections. These were: in the morning, Cherubini's Requiem in C minor, and Mendelssohn's Hymn of Praise, separated by Schubert's Salve Regina (Op. 47), and the Offertorium, Date Sontum, by Sir Michael Costa, the veteran conductor of these triennial festivals for many years.

"SANZIO."—The beautiful poem, which has occupied the first page of our journal continuously for four months, comes to an end to-day; and we fancy many of our readers, who are lovers of fine poetry, will regret the non-continuance of its fortnightly installments. Its theme is Raphael in the last years of his life, and his "Fornarina," here called Benedetta. The poem is not without historical foundation, although it is mainly the product of the poet's own imagination. It forms a worthy companion piece to "Angelo," which celebrates the love of Michel Angelo and Vittoria Colonna, by the same author, which was published in a beautiful small volume by Houghton, Osgood & Co., about two years ago. We trust that "Stuart Sterne" (whose prose name is Miss Gertrude Bloede, of Brooklyn, N. Y.) will be induced to republish "Sanzio" in the same form. We have received many assurances from appreciative men and women of the sincere pleasure they have found in reading it. Just now, this last instalment, describing the gloom which fell over all Rome on the death of Raphael, may be read here with peculiar interest; its solemn music chimes too well with what we all feel, suddenly bereft of our own noble artist.

LYCEUM BUREAU CONCERTS.—The time was when the "Lyceum" was a sober, useful, New England Institution, in all the large and many of the small towns, devoted purely to the instruction and improvement of the people. The best thinkers and men of literature and science were engaged to lecture, not for the sake of exhibiting the men, and gratifying an idle curiosity to see each notoriety in person, but for the sake of the solid, quickening matter which the lecture might contain. Perhaps the practice grew monotonous and needed a new stimulus, an infusion of new life,— "attraction" is what the showmen call it. At all events the Lyceum has fallen into the hands of the showmen, who, under the name of Bureaux, have for some years made it a field for speculation. Not only do they act as lecture brokers, taking commission from the lecturer on the one hand and the audiences on the other, but they have substituted amusement for instruction, personal exhibition for intrinsic worth of matter (or, as the Germans have it, intellectual Inhalt, ideal contents), and sensational "attraction" for wholesome, mental food.

Of late they have gone much further, and not content with reducing the lecture to a mere incidental figure in the programmes, and even then inviting a man to lecture to us not for what he has to tell us, but only to give us a chance to gaze at him, they have undertaken a certain nondescript style of concert-giving. Here, too, it is not music as such, music for its own sake, that is held up to tempt us, but only the array of brilliant galaxies of star performers, virtuosos, famous singers, violinists, or pianists; it is the artists, not the art. What the programmes are is easily imagined.

So the Lyceum has lost its legitimacy as a lecture institution, while it has taken up music in a way not less equivocal, in spite of the many names of famous artists paraded in its advertisements. We doubt whether the lecture business, as now administered, does much good; and we feel sure that the true cause of music, of musical taste and progress among our people, is more put back than forwarded by these sensational and miscellaneous displays of prima donnas out of place.

MUSICAL CORRESPONDENCE.

CHICAGO, SEPTEMBER 18. — After a long interval, I am again in the home city, and happy to send a little note, with greeting, to the JOURNAL. September calls the musicians back to their various duties, and activity once more is the happy condition of the musical world. On all sides I hear the pleasing indications of new life and promise; for our musical societies are preparing for the coming season, the music schools are opening, and conductors, teachers, and singers are awakening to fresh and hearty efforts for the art they love. The outlook is good, and I can safely predict more fine music, and a larger number of musical entertainments than we have ever had before in the same length of time.

The Beethoven Society is preparing for its winter's work, and has undertaken the production of the following compositions: Max Bruch's latest work, illustrating Schiller's "The Lay of the Bell;" "Cinderella," by Heinrich Hoffman; "Paradise Lost," by Rubinstein; Parker's "Redemption Hymn;" and Goldmark's "Festival March," from the "Queen of Sheba." All these works will be novelties in Chicago, and as they will be presented with orchestral accompaniments, I think they will prove very interesting and enjoyable. Besides the three large concerts during the season, this society will give monthly reunions, devoted to chamber music, at which we are to have, besides the quartets of the old classic masters, many new things, such as, — a quintet by Seabote; a quartet by Robert Fuchs; and quintets by Raff and Saint-Saëns. Knowing of the hearty efforts of this society to make this season a notable one, we can well look forward to the production of the works selected with the expectation of much pleasure.

The Apollo Club is not one whit behind its sister society, for the chorus membership is complete, and they are hard at work in preparing for the coming season. They will give the Messiah at Christmas time, and possibly The Creation before. The complete list for the season will not be announced until all their engagements with solo talent are made. It is not unlikely, however, that they will also give a work by Max Bruch, either a repetition of The Fridtjof Saga, which they gave so finely last year, or a new composition. They will have an orchestral accompaniment at each concert, and from their uniform excellent work in the past, we all anticipate even greater things from them this season.

A new impetus is being given to musical enterprises in our city, from the fact that a large Music Hall will be completed this fall, and fill a need that we have felt quite seriously ever since our great fire. The new hall is centrally located on the corner of State and Randolph streets, on the south side of our city, and from its imposing appearance promises to be a fine building. The hall will hold comfortably some two thousand people. It is to contain a large organ, and will thus be of great service to our choral societies. I am promised an early view of the inside of the hall, and it will be my pleasure to transmit a pen-picture of it to the readers of the JOURNAL.

At Hershey Hall, we are to have a number of organ recitals by Mr. H. Clarence Eddy, and also some chamber concerts. This new departure, in the introduction of chamber music, is a step in the right direction; and as the management of the Hershey School have such a pretty little hall at their disposal, I am sure that if this undertaking is wisely carried out, it will fill a want that has been long experienced in our city. Mr. Emil Liebling will shortly give a number of piano-forte recitals, and as I have seen an outline of his programme, I can mention that they include works from the representative composers from the old masters to the new compositions of living men, and are rich in variety as well as excellent in taste.

In regard to Opera, we are promised visits from the Mapleson and the Strakosch companies, while the English troupes, "The Emma Abbott," and the "American Opera Company," will surely come too, as will Opera Bouffe and Pinafore companies, ad infinitum. The weak point in our musical season seems to be in regard to symphony concerts. As yet the organization that was formed for this end has been unable to agree to any positive plan by which an adequate orchestra may be formed, a conductor engaged, and a programme for the year laid out. Too many different opinions seem to be at variance with one another; and, while no one can be blamed individually, it is a fact that, collectively, the members are at fault, if they are really in earnest in their expressed desire to promote the cause of good music in our city. It is to be hoped, however, that a concerted effort will yet be made to establish an orchestra that shall be able to supply our needs in regard to symphony concerts. With continued and well directed efforts the banner of success may yet gladden the earnest workers, who are yet but struggling for a foothold for what is best in their art.

A new school, called the "Drexell Academy of Musical Art," has come into being during the summer. Mr. James Gill, Mr. Heman Allen, Mr. Von Klengel, Miss Lowell, Miss Carey, and the writer, have its interests at heart. Our hope is to do a good work, and promote a taste for what is beautiful in music among the students intrusted to our direction. From humble beginnings, perhaps, shall arise the foundation of a permanent work. C. H. B.

NOTES AND GLEANINGS.

Mr. ARTHUR SULLIVAN will visit the United States in November, and during his stay here will direct the performance of one or more of his works at a concert by the Handel and Haydn Society, about Thanksgiving time.

WORCESTER, MASS. — The twenty-second Annual Festival of the Worcester County Musical Association has been the focus of general interest in the "Heart of the Commonwealth" during the five days from Monday to Friday of the week now past; indeed it has attracted thither numerous pilgrims from Boston and more distant places. It opened with a very large attendance, and with every promise of success. We hope to give a full report hereafter.

The following artists and vocal and instrumental organizations were expected to take part: —

Sopranos — Miss Henrietta Beebe, Mrs. Anna Granger Dow, Miss Gertrude Franklin, Mrs. H. F. Knowles, Miss Ida W. Hubbell, Mrs. H. M. Smith, Miss Edith Abell.

Contraltos — Miss Annie Louise Cary, Mrs. Louise Finch Hardenburg, Mrs. Isabella Palmer Fassett, Mrs. A. W. Porter.

Tenors — Theo. J. Toedt, Alfred Wilkie, A. D. Woodruff, George Ellard, G. J. Parker, G. W. Want.

Baritones and Basses — W. H. Beckett, John F. Winch, D. M. Babcock, Clarence E. Hay, L. H. Chubbuck, W. C. Baird.

The New York Glee Club — A. D. Woodruff, W. C. Baird, George Ellard, G. E. Aiken.

The Schubert Quartette — G. J. Parker, G. W. Want, L. H. Chubbuck, D. M. Babcock.

Senior Diaz Albertini, violinist; Miss Lettie Launder, violinist; Herr S. Liebling, pianist; E. B. Perry, pianist.

Eichberg Quartette (Instrumental) — Miss Lillian Chandler, Miss Lettie Launder, Miss Abbie Shephardson, Miss Lillian Shattuck.

The Germania Orchestra — Thirty performers.

Piano and Organ Accompanists — B. D. Allen, E. B. Story, G. W. Sumner.

Carl Zerrahn, Conductor.

And this was the order of the concerts: —

Monday afternoon, Sept. 22, — Eichberg Quartette, Mrs. H. F. Knowles, soprano; Mrs. A. W. Porter, contralto; Mr. C. E. Hay, basso; Miss Lettie Launder, solo violinist.

Tuesday afternoon, — Schubert Quartette, Miss Gertrude Franklin, soprano; Mrs. Louise Finch Hardenburg, contralto; Messrs. Sumner and Allen, organists.

Wednesday afternoon, — The New York Glee Club, Miss Edith Abell, soprano; Mrs. Isabella Palmer Fassett, contralto; Mr. E. B. Perry, solo pianist.

Wednesday evening, — Grand Chorus of the Festival, New York Glee Club, Miss Henrietta Beebe, soprano; Mrs. Louise Finch Hardenburg, contralto; Mr. Alfred Wilkie, tenor; Senior Diaz Albertini, solo violinist.

Thursday afternoon, — Gounod's "Messe Solennele." Grand Chorus, Mrs. H. M. Smith, soprano; Mr. A. Wilkie, tenor; Mr. W. H. Beckett, basso; Germania Orchestra.

Thursday evening, — Grand Chorus, Germania Orchestra; Mrs. Anna Granger Dow, soprano; Miss Annie Louise Cary, contralto; Mr. T. J. Toedt, tenor; Mr. W. H. Beckett, basso.

Friday afternoon, — Symphony Concert. Germania Orchestra, Grand Chorus, Miss Henrietta Beebe, Mr. Alfred Wilkie, Herr S. Liebling, solo pianist.

Friday evening, — Handel's Oratorio, "The Messiah." Grand Chorus; Germania Orchestra; Miss Ida W. Hubbell, soprano; Miss Annie Louise Cary, contralto; Theo. J. Toedt, tenor; John F. Winch, basso.

NEW YORK. — A correspondent of the Advertiser writes: In the way of orchestral music, although it is decided that Theodore Thomas is not dissatisfied with Cincinnati, and will not come back to live in New York, he will come every month to lead the Philharmonic concerts of Brooklyn and of New York, so that our venerable Philharmonic Society, which has steadily been losing ground for the last ten years, may regain, perhaps, something of its old fame. Dr. Damrosch will give six orchestral concerts, and so will Mr. Carlberg. This makes eighteen symphony concerts and eighteen public afternoon rehearsals. The Oratorio Society will give its usual four concerts, besides which our vocal societies will give their usual entertainments.

ABOUT Opera, the London Figaro informs us: Lieut.-Col. Mapleson has settled his troupe for the United States as follows: Sopranos, Madame Gerster, Misses Valleria and Ambre; contraltos, Misses Cary and Robiati, and Madame Démerie Lablache; tenors, MM. Campanini and Runelo; basses, MM. Galami, Del Poento, David, and perhaps, Behrens, and Signor Arditi as conductor. The company will probably be added to before it sails early next month. The chief operas to be performed will be "Lobengrin," "Talismano," and "Aida," the last with duplicates of the scenery and costumes devised for Her Majesty's Theatre by Signor Magnani.

THE performances of the Max Strakosch Italian Opera troupe for the season of 1879-80 will begin on Monday, October 6, at the Academy of Music, Philadelphia, with Mme. Theresa Singer, Mlle. Bianca Lablache and Marie Litta, as sopranos; Mlle. Anna de Belcoos, contralto; Signori Ricardo, Petrovitch, Boldanza, and Lazzarini, tenors; Signori Enrico Storti and Gottschalk, baritones; and Signori Castlemay and Carl Fornes, basses. Engagements have also been made with Miss Lancaster, Mr. W. H. Tilla, Signor Strini, and Signorina Arcona. The conductors are to be Mr. S. Behrens and Signor de Novelli. Of the former company Miss Kellogg remains in Europe, Mr. Conby joins Mr. Carl Rosa, and Signor Pantaleoni, Mr. Mapleson.

CINCINNATI. — The fall term of the College of Music, Theodore Thomas, Musical Director, with a Faculty of some thirty teachers, begins October 14. During the season of 1879-80, there will be eight Symphony Concerts, eight public rehearsals of the same, and six Chamber Concerts by the String Quartette of the College. The programmes of the Symphony Concerts, so far as yet completed, are as follows: —

First Concert, Nov. 8, 1879.

Symphony, No. 1, B-flat, Op. 38 Schumann.
Recitative and Aria, "Faust" Spohr.
Triple Concerto, Op. 56 Beethoven.
(For Piano-forte, Violin, Violoncello, and Orchestra.)
Vocal Number, "Siegfried" Wagner.
Kayer March Wagner.
(Orchestra and Chorus.)

Second Concert, Dec. 4, 1879.

Ode, "St. Cecilia's Day" Handel.
(Soloists, Chorus, Orchestra, and Organ.)
Symphony, No. 5, C minor, Op. 67 Beethoven.

Third Concert, Dec. 25, 1879.

Oratorio, "Messiah" Handel.
(Soloists, Chorus, Orchestra, and Organ.)

Fourth Concert, Jan. 8, 1880.

Second Symphony, D major, Op. 73 Brahms.
(With other works.)

Fifth Concert, Feb. 5, 1880.

Symphony, E-flat Mozart.
(With other works.)

Sixth Concert, March 4, 1880.

Cantata, { Actus Tragicus, "God's Time is the Best" } Bach.
(Soloists, Chorus, Orchestra, and Organ.)

Symphony, No. 4, B-flat, Op. 60 Beethoven.
Choruses, "Meistersinger von Nürnberg" Wagner.

Seventh Concert, March 25, 1880.

Overture, "Anacreon" Cherubini.
Aria
Symphony (Concertante) Mozart.
(For Violin, Viola, and Orchestra.)

Aria
Symphony, No. 3, "Im Walde" ("In the Woods"), Op. 183 Raff.

Eighth Concert, April 8, 1880.

Symphony Haydn.
Scenes from "Alceste" Gluck.
(Solos, Chorus, and Orchestra.)

Symphony, "Landliche Hochzeit" Goldmark.

THE cathedral at Baltimore has abandoned the exclusive use of the Gregorian music, and will at once return to the modern style. The music of Gregory and Palestrina has formed the entire repertory of the choir for two years, the late Archbishop Bailey having devoted especial attention to its culture.

BOSTON, OCTOBER 11, 1879.

Entered at the Post Office at Boston as second-class matter.

CONTENTS.

THE DEVELOPMENT OF PIANO-FORTE MUSIC, FROM BACH TO SCHUMANN. From the German of Carl Van Bruyck . . .	161
REMINISCENCES OF THE BIRMINGHAM FESTIVAL (1879). "The Lyte and the Harp." D. T.	162
MUSICAL CLUBS OF HARVARD: THE FERRIS SODALITY. From the Harvard Book, 1875. Reminiscences of an Ex-Psorian. S. J.	163
MARTIN LUTHER AS A MUSICIAN	164
TALKS ON ART: SECOND SERIES. From Instructions of Mr. William M. Hunt to his Pupils. XIV.	164
FASHION IN MUSIC. W. F. A.	165
CONCERTS	166
Radpath Boston Lyceum. — Mendelssohn Quintette Club. — Wellesley College.	166
THE WORCESTER FESTIVAL	166
MUSICAL INTELLIGENCE	168

All the articles not credited to other publications were expressly written for this Journal.

Published fortnightly by HOUGHTON, OSGOOD AND COMPANY, 220 Devonshire Street, Boston. Price, 10 cents a number; $2.50 per year.

For sale in Boston by CARL PRUEFER, 30 West Street, A. WILLIAMS & Co., 283 Washington Street, A. K. LORING, 369 Washington Street, and by the Publishers; in New York by A. BREWSTER, JR., 39 Union Square, and HOUGHTON, OSGOOD & Co., 21 Astor Place; in Philadelphia by W. H. BOWEN & Co., 1102 Chestnut Street; in Chicago by the CHICAGO MUSIC COMPANY, 512 State Street.

THE DEVELOPMENT OF PIANO-FORTE MUSIC, FROM BACH TO SCHUMANN.

FROM THE GERMAN OF CARL VAN BRUYCK.

(Continued from page 155.)

AMONG the piano-forte Sonata composers of this period, next to Beethoven the most noteworthy and influential were Hummel, Cramer, and Field. These were no "geniuses" in comparison with him, but they had very great talents, each provided with his own peculiar excellences. The first named would seem to be the most important of the three; but at the same time, through his fondness for externals, for effect, through the introduction of a certain modern rococo into the art, through the preponderance of elegant and tasteful phrases in his works, with all the great respect in which he was justly held, he contributed much to the corruption into which the art soon fell after the death of Beethoven, and which may be generally designated as the reign of virtuosity. Hummel himself was a much admired virtuoso, and his works, with all their wealth of musical substance, with all the clever, sterling quality of the work (albeit frequently somewhat prolix in form), are for the most part planned too purposely, too obviously for bringing out the technical facility of the player, to allow one to find a wholly pure artistic pleasure in them. This is the case even with those works which have remained most in vogue to this day, — the great Septet in D-minor, and the two great and still favorite Concertos in A and B-minor. It limits, also, the artistic effect of a work otherwise grandly laid out, like the Sonata in F-sharp minor. On the contrary, perhaps the least obfuscated by this æsthetic shadow (which, perhaps, plays over it from ethical regions) is the very beautiful four-hand Sonata in A-flat, which is laid out almost in the noble contours of a Grecian temple. Nevertheless the above-named genial and tasteful works, to which I might also add the solo Sonatas in D (with a very original scherzo and a splendidly wrought finale), in E-flat and F-minor, the Fantasia in E-flat major, and the Trios in E and E-flat major, maintain their artistic worth to-day, and are not to be underrated. Hummel might almost be called our musical Wieland, with whom he (as court capellmeister in Weimar) breathed the same breath of life. Hummel has also done good service in the composition of a piano-forte school, which, like Clementi's "Gradus ad Parnassum," is still much used for the basis of instruction.

Cramer, likewise, has furnished a series of studies (Études), the first parts of which happily combine a certain musical value with the technically pedagogic aim, which is less the case with the later parts. In the regard of the present piano-playing generation he lives almost solely through these studies, and it is now scarcely known or thought of any account that we have a whole series of Concertos by this very gifted author. Some of these I am inclined to consider not only equal to those by Hummel, but in many respects superior, although in them, as seems almost unavoidable in this art form, considering its practical destination, there is too luxurious an overgrowth of phrases; but such passage work with him seems to be more inspired than it is apt to be in Hummel's works. Beethoven's genius alone could steer clear of this rock almost entirely. We also possess some very precious sonatas and smaller piano compositions by Cramer, which are about as little known, and which occasionally strike a tone that might almost remind one of Schumann. If the practice were as common in musical as it is in poetical literature, a new edition of this author's works would seem very welcome; but only with careful selection, since among his later works, in which he more and more subserved fashion and the love of money, even more than with Clementi, we find much that is weak and even unenjoyable, hastily written off in self-satisfied vanity, or only from mere outward motives.

Finally, John Field, who had the most influence on his contemporaries as an executive virtuoso, shares the same fate with Cramer, in so far as his name appears now almost exclusively in connection with the dainty (so-called) Nocturnes, which he is said to have played so incomparably himself, and which alone have reached a new edition. But partly, no doubt owing to the overwhelming impression left by Beethoven's creations, no one any longer speaks of his incomparably more important, and in some instances even genial Sonatas; and so, too, a brilliant work like his E-major Concerto, which delighted Schumann (and my humble self likewise), seems to be pretty much forgotten.

And what I have here remarked of Field may also be said of another contemporary composer, Tomaschek, in whose Sonatas one willing to examine them would find many a precious little treasure, as well as in many of his very numerous smaller compositions (Eclogues, Rhapsodies, etc.), of which only a very small part (and as it seems to me not altogether the most valuable part) has sustained itself above high water-mark, after the deluge in which immeasurably the greater portion even of what is best in musical literature sinks after a certain time.

Of still higher endowment than those just named was C. M. von Weber, although more so on another field, the Opera, in which he actually made an epoch, while as an instrumental composer he occupies no equally prominent position. But his Piano Sonatas, although they do not bear the classical Beethoven stamp, are extremely genial, fascinating, lovely compositions, in which there pulsates the same fiery spirit that pervaded the composer of the Freyschütz, Oberon, and Euryanthe. His genial little tone-poem, "The Invitation to the Dance," has remained to this day a favorite piece of the piano-playing world, and gives, as well as the Sonatas, considerable scope for the modern "bravura," so that an over-varnished arrangement of it, like that by Tausig, seems superfluous, and even to be deprecated.

And still another genius was vouchsafed to the world at this epoch, just on the boundary line between two centuries, a not less astonishing phenomenon in his way than a Sebastian Bach, in original musical genius fully equal to him, although this genius developed itself in a wholly different direction. In the great forms of instrumental music he did not reach the pure perfection of art, which makes his great predecessors the types and models in this kind of art, but yet he shone a wonderfully resplendent meteor. I speak of Franz Schubert, the beloved, in his way incomparable tone-poet, the only one of the immortals who had his physical birthplace in Vienna itself, where they have erected a monument to him first of all, on a spot which could not have been more happily chosen. For his creations seem like a blooming garden full of the most multifarious and odoriferous growth; and now in such a garden this god of songs in effigy is throned, surrounded by Flora's charming children, and amid the cheerful song of birds. If in Beethoven we have, as Bülow said, the "incarnate god of music," so Schubert may be called our "god of songs," Apollo by the side of Jupiter. In fact, when we survey the abundant products of his inexhaustible creative power within so short a span of life, the highest, purest praise must on the whole be always given to his song creations; for on this field he seems peculiarly to have paved the way, and to have outstripped all competition, even of the greatest of his successors, Robert Schumann.¹

Schubert's imagination was so immeasurably rich (not one of our tone-heroes has possessed a richer), that it could not live out its life in so narrow a bed, comparatively, as song composition offers, but reached out after all the forms of art which he found in practice around him.

But here I must limit myself to a few words about Schubert's piano-forte compositions. They are so numerous and so valuable, that they would suffice almost of themselves alone, to earn for their author (who, it must be remembered, hardly survived the period of youth) the reputation of a strong productivity and to secure for him a brilliant place in the literature of art, — although they almost vanish in the immeasurable, and for those brief ten years hardly conceivable mass of his productions. Among them I will only specify the ten Piano solo Sonatas, the Fantasia in C, the two Trios in E-flat and

¹ Not a word of Robert Franz! — Ed.

B-flat; and among the four-hand pieces the "Lebensstürme," the Divertissement Hongroise, the Marches and Dances, and of his smaller tone-pictures the Impromptus and "Moments Musicaux." Almost without exception we meet in nearly all these works the deepest, tenderest feeling, and an exceedingly rich, luxuriant fancy, — a fancy whose exuberance the young tone-poet had hard work to confine within those moderate bounds which the laws of musical form, not the merely conventional ones, require, to awaken in us the impression of that rounded and complete artistic unity which dwells in the works of Beethoven, particularly those of his middle period, in so incomparable a manner, with all their richness of ideas, and all their splendor and their breadth of structure. Most masterly, therefore, because least obscured by such æsthetic faults, does Schubert appear in the smaller pictures above named, and in his more rhapsodical compositions, like the Divertissement Hongroise, in which last work especially the melodic and rhythmical charm that dwells in the Paszta strains is carried to a more artistically genial, brilliant, and sonorous pitch than in any other work of the kind, — for even Liszt's Hungarian Rhapsodies, brilliant as they are on the side of technique and high coloring, are not to be compared with it.

But Marches and Dances (I mean the "German Dances" and the "Valse nobles") of such genial invention, and so all alive with the essential rhythmical significance of these forms, are not elsewhere found in the whole literature of music, or at least not too many such. The above named Fantasia in C (a product of his earlier youth), which Liszt adapted to the orchestra, appears as a prototype for that boisterous impetuosity of this highly genial spirit, which often hurried him away through labyrinthine aberrations and to actual monstrosities. But the high worth and charm of the Sonatas and the two Trios rests, on the whole, more upon the beauty of single parts, the flow of melody, which streams through them, and the wonderful (especially harmonic) details of the working out, than on the "composition" as such, in whose luxuriant loose stratification we miss the firm, compact power of form. I might, as I have called Hummel our musical Wieland, and Beethoven our musical Shakespeare, call Schubert our musical Walter Scott. In these two geniuses we remark a similar almost unlimited fullness of imaginative force, coupled with nearly the same incapacity of severe concentration. The productions of both are characterized by that spring-like, blooming freshness of youth, through which the poet and the musician (for a long time at least!) have been the admiration and delight of youth.

(To be continued.)

[From the London Musical World.]

REMINISCENCES OF THE BIRMINGHAM FESTIVAL (1879).

"THE LYRE AND THE HARP."

The Lyre and the Harp certainly ranks among M. Saint-Saëns' best works, and, being also his latest, encourages hope of its composer. Hardly could the result have been otherwise, assuming the musician's susceptibility to a poetic theme of unusual beauty. Readers of Victor Hugo require no exposition of his charming poem "La Lyre et la Harpe," but it is needful, for the sake of those unfamiliar with the illustrious author, to explain his argument somewhat in detail. The main idea of the work — that of opposite influences contending for the possession of a human soul — has appeared in many forms and been illustrated by every art. Poet, painter, and musician have dealt with it in one or other of its Protean shapes, but that chosen by Victor Hugo is certainly the most beautiful of all. He supposes a gifted youth, himself a poet, lying passive between the genius of Paganism on the one hand and the genius of Christianity on the other, the first typified by a lyre, the second by a harp. The lyre begins in voluptuous strains: "Sleep and rest," it says, "the Muses have crowned thee." But the harp interposes with a different strain: "Awake, child of misery, dreams are misleading thee. At thy door a suffering brother calls for help." Then the lyre: "A radiant name and immortal memory belong to thee. Fear not the malevolent deities. They are harmless, for the poets created them." And then the harp: "Remember that in sorrow thy mother bore thee, and that God hath traced thy path to the tomb." "Come away from the busy world," once more urges the opposing voice. "Jupiter reigns, so rest thee amid the flowers and in coolest shades." Sternly responds the harp: "Go forth into the wicked world and tell them of an angry Judge; lift up thy voice above the city's roar." "See," cries the lyre again, "how Jove's eagle flies through the air upon the lightnings, lord of life and death!" But the harp points to the Christian Dove, and when the lyre, in seductive accents, sings, "Give thyself up to love; follow thy every desire," exclaims, "Cleave thou to one pure heart, and be ye both on earth as angels exiled from heaven." Yet again the lyre: "The river of life flows onward to great darkness. Float, then, gayly on its surface;" but the harp answers, "Weep with those who weep, sustain thy brother in affliction, and keep the end in view." All this the poet hears, and, waking from his lethargy, answers, though in trembling accents, to the echoes of the Pagan strain with a hymn of Carmel. A theme more suggestive in character or more exalted in its poetic beauty than this composer never chose, while never did musician find words that craved for union with his art more ardently than the sonorous verse of Victor Hugo.

In setting the original poem to music the course of M. Saint-Saëns was clear. First of all, he had the easy task of broadly distinguishing between the musical representation of the opposing forces, just as in Tannhäuser it was a facile thing for Wagner to place the sensuous strains of the Venusberg against the gravity of the Pilgrims' Hymn. Hence we have throughout an impressive contrast; the serious tones of the organ representing the Christian influence, and a wild, fanciful passage for the orchestra — tremulous strings, with "excursions" for the wind obviously borrowed from Wagner — doing service for the contrary force. I cannot, however, wholly approve the choice which M. Saint-Saëns has made of representative themes, and I contrast them very unfavorably with those which Mendelssohn would have adopted under the same circumstances. Both, as a matter of course, are displayed in the prelude, that for the organ being an unaccompanied melody in E-flat minor, subsequently used for the first utterances of the harp, "Eveille-toi, jeune homme, enfant de la misère." In this there is no special character, and it resembles most of the other themes as regards a want of tuneful charm. The Pagan motive, besides being a plagiarism from Tannhäuser, misrepresents the spirit of the faith with which it is here associated. Paganism was not all lewdness and riot, and the forms of it most likely to seduce a son of Apollo would be musically represented in fuller perfection by the chaste and graceful strains of the religious choruses in Gluck's classical operas, or the more serious parts of Mendelssohn's Antigone and Edipus. Among the many sins which Wagner has to answer for is his characteristic representation of the atmosphere surrounding the Pagan deities. They were not in all things perfect, I admit, but, at the same time, the gods whom the mighty sages of the elder world revered are symbolized better by the Doric simplicity of Gluck than by the voluptuousness of his successor. It may be added that, when the Christian theme is repeated in the prelude, M. Saint-Saëns awards it contrapuntal treatment, and so far a more complete vraisemblance is secured; but the counterpoint here, as elsewhere in the work, excites no very profound admiration. Indeed, it is of an elementary character, and could not possibly have been introduced for its own sake, though for the sake of what else the keenest eyes fail to discern. The opening chorus, "Fils d'Apollon," is by no means without beauty, although the instrumental introduction presents, for no apparent reason, the following dislocating sequence: G major, F minor, E-flat, A-flat minor, G-flat major, then by enharmonic change F-sharp major, and so on to the dominant of E-flat, in which key the voices enter. Why M. Saint-Saëns should thus make a round of visits on a lot of keys before deciding with which to dwell, is one of the mysteries that "higher development" so plentifully offers to a puzzled world. But when the voices enter there is a good deal to admire, the parts moving in simple massive harmony, and the accompaniment having appropriate significance without obtrusiveness. The first utterances of the harp, "Eveille-toi," set as a short solo, reproduces the contrapuntal treatment of the Christian theme, and may be dismissed without further remark; but not so the succeeding chorus of the lyre, "Ton jeune âge est cher à la gloire." Passing over some rudimentary counterpoint, which any half-educated student would recognize as on his own level, it must be said this number is worthy of the classic faith. Its music may be poor, its character, at all events, is appropriate. The next number, "Homme, une femme fut ta mère," is allotted to contralto and bass soli, and made remarkable by a very curious alternation of an arpeggio chord of the sixth on B natural, with the dominant seventh chord of the key (E-flat). In other respects it calls for little notice, the voice parts being singularly uninteresting. This, however, is one of the cases in which a mere trick, more curious than beautiful, serves the ingenious composer when he finds a resort to trickery useful. In the next number for soli and chorus, "Chante, Jupiter règne," the lyre becomes more impassioned, bringing forward its representative theme, and fluttering the orchestra with rapid and suggestive passages. Here, again, M. Saint-Saëns is good enough to become contrapuntal, and when the bass voices announce a well-marked theme in C-sharp minor, "Les immortels du couchant à l'aurore," confiding listeners expect a set fugue, but the facetious author of the Danse Macabre loves a sly joke as well as the open laughableness of skeleton antics, and the anticipated fugue, secundum artem, dies away, or, better, is swallowed up in an expansion of the movement with which the fugue has nothing to do. Of this it is only requisite to say, that a two-part episode, "Venus embrasse Mars," is Wagner in pinchbeck, pretty enough in its way, but very shallow. Let me add that the key is D major, and that the last few bars are taken up by tonic, and heard in alternation with the second inversion of the chord of C-sharp major. Why, in the name of all that is shocking, why? The harp speaks next through a tenor solo and chorus, "O Dieu par qui tout forfait s'expie." Here M. Saint-Saëns appears to more advantage. The theme of the solo is a real tune, and the accompaniments musicianly, while the brief chorus has a breadth of style which commands instant approval. How our composer treats the reference to Jove's eagle may be imagined. There is strength in his setting of the lines upon the Christian dove, marred though it be by an absurd effort to imitate through a flute the cooing of the innocent bird. Why did not M. Saint-Saëns represent the scream of the eagle also, as Mendelssohn certainly has done in his "Scotch" Symphony? Neglect of this may well be resented by the royal bird. The next number, devoted to Pagan love and arranged for soprano, contralto, and chorus of female voices, is altogether charming, though simplicity itself in point of construction, the voices moving for the most part in thirds and sixths. Nothing could better suit the subject, or so conclusively prove that the highest results in music are independent of elaborate means and phrenetic effort; but the next number for contralto and tenor soli, "L'Amour divin," is perhaps even more beautiful, the charm lying in the orchestra rather than with the voices. True, M. Saint-Saëns here repeats himself a good deal, but not in excess of what his subject will bear. The principal orchestral phrase runs through the entire piece, while combined with it at intervals is another of the most graceful and pleasing character.

This, beyond question, is true music, spontaneous and pure, like the waters that well up from a mountain spring, and its first audience were more than justified in bestowing warm applause. Yet another good number is the flag baritone solo, "Jouis, c'est au fleuve des ombres," an appropriately careless, not to say reckless, strain, conceived in the spirit of "Let us eat and drink, for to-morrow we die." Violently contrasting with it comes the solemn quartet, "Soutiens ton frère qui chancelle," the last and victorious appeal of the harp to the young poet whom it would conquer to the side of truth. A certain severity marks this concerted piece, as though the composer sought to show that, when the balance is trembling, Christianity can afford to be most exacting. From it we pass to the finale, where the threads of the argument are, so to speak, gathered up, and the triumph of the purer faith is confirmed in solemn strains. Now to sum up. The value of M. Saint-Saëns' work does not lie in the texture and quality of his music, which is often flimsy, albeit hiding its flimsiness under the cloak of a free and, to some extent, novel style. But The Lyre and the Harp will command attention because it is essentially poetic — seeking first of all to offer music fitted to the words, and leaving the rest to fate. The music of this cantata is not the result of a desire to win popular applause at any cost, otherwise it would have been much more full than it is of cheap claptrap. M. Saint-Saëns has honestly striven to treat his theme as an artist should who is conscious of the dignity of his work, and, though the result be not great, the obvious intention should secure substantial reward. D. T.

AMERICAN girls and young men who may think of coming to Italy to study singing may feel interested to know that before very long there will be a musical academy in Pesaro which will beat Milan and Bologna out of the field. Rosini left all his fortune for this; his widow did the same. The academy will have 100,000 francs a year with which to pay its professors. Moreover, all the copyrights of the illustrious master belong to the academy, and there are several works which have not yet been published. — Philadelphia Bulletin.

MUSICAL CLUBS OF HARVARD: THE PIERIAN SODALITY.

FROM THE HARVARD BOOK, 1875.

(Concluded from page 157.)

REMINISCENCES OF AN EX-PIERIAN.

BUT the Pierians, either from lack of numbers or of proficiency, were not always equal to the task. The annual losses were at times repaired with difficulty. Thus, in 1832, at the beginning of the college year, on reëntering the rehearsal-room, they could count but three names on their roll. "Present, G——, P——, R——, sophomores, who are the only members at present composing the Sodality." In July, 1833, it was "voted that as the Sodality cannot be always fully sustained by the undergraduates alone, members of the Law and Divinity Schools may belong to it." But, two months later, they receded from this, finding their ranks once more full. So at another time allusion is found to "the precious trio, the scanty remains of the once renowned," etc. Worse than this was their state when reduced to a single active member, as was the case when Mr. G—— held the meetings regularly alone, not forgetting, it is said, to put up the advertising-board for his own sole notification each week; calling himself to order, and proceeding conscientiously with his solitary rehearsal, practicing upon his flute his accustomed part till the hour of duty was complete, and so striving, not in vain, to keep the sacred flame alive.

And mark what wise forethought was taken, in June, 1839, for the situation of the one member about to be left behind by his fellows, who were all of the senior class, then on the very eve of graduating: "It being announced that there were some funds in the treasury, and that it was expedient for the present members to use them and not bequeath them to our forlorn successor to squander in solitary riot."

When their fortunes were at so low an ebb as this, and to furnish the music at Exhibition was impossible, a half-dozen band-men from the city were sometimes posted in that favorite perch. October 16, 1832, there were to be seen looking down on the astonished spectators "six strange and bearded faces, the owners of which were clad in the uniform of the Boston Brigade Band." "It is said," wrote the secretary, "that President Quincy is obliged to pay them from his own pocket, the Faculty refusing to do it on account of the enormous expense." He is generous, the secretary, in his estimate of the playing of the six stranger professionals, and admits that "the music, although not performed by the Pierians, was attractive and beautiful."

Sometimes the organ alone was depended upon; once, as it is related, with so unexpected a result as to give to a stranger, then attending a Cambridge Exhibition for the first time, the impression that the music proceeded, not from the real instrument which he observed standing in the loft, but from a hand-organ, which, to his great surprise, he fancied had been carried up there and used in its stead.

One extraordinary occasion on which the services of the Pierians were called into requisition is perhaps worth mention for the novel excuse in connection with it which one of the members ventured to offer for non-attendance at a recitation. Towards the close of the senior year, when the time had arrived for the distribution of Commencement parts, and those selected for honors had been notified to attend at the President's study, it was proposed that the class go in procession with the Sodality for musical escort. Accordingly, the "Navy Club" (Qu. ignavi), — of which all not included in the President's call were members, as it were, ex officio, — forming in advance, the class, preceded by the band, moved, two by two, from in front of Holworthy through the yard, passing out by the great gate near Massachusetts, and over the sidewalk till it halted under the President's windows, having by this time attracted a considerable concourse of the curious townspeople. At the moment of passing Massachusetts one of the Sodality, a Junior, who had not been apprised of the movement, had descended from his room, book in hand, on his way to recitation. Hailed by his brother musicians and inquiring the meaning of the unexpected call to duty, he ran back into the building, dropped his book to snatch up his flute, and hurrying down took his place in the ranks. The sound of the advancing instruments — four flutes, a clarinet, a violin, and trombone, emphasized by a tambourine beaten by a volunteer — penetrated to the President's sanctum. As they were approaching, it is related that the President, puzzled at the unusual character of this demonstration, and somewhat apprehensive lest it might imply insubordination, sent down a messenger to observe the temper of the students, who was enabled speedily to bring back report that no signs of disaffection were manifest. And the column, the purpose of the march being accomplished, returned to the starting-point, where, after the customary call and cheering of names, the class dispersed. When the Junior had occasion to present afterwards his excuse for absenting himself from the recitation, with a show of ingenuousness he proceeded to justify himself as having yielded only to an instantaneous impulse to render his assistance with his comrades in carrying out the time-honored custom — "Time-honored custom!" interrupted in his emphatic manner the astonished President, who, with all his advantage of years, had never before heard of the like foolery.

The Sodality was by no means made up always of men of inferior rank in their class: so it was not strange if some one of them should now and then be called to the honor of performing a double part on Exhibition Day. To pay in such a case a passing compliment to his fellows who were watching him from overhead would be but natural. By chance, having been led to repeat from recollection a passage of this description from his oration, a Pierian, thus distinguished, now a well-known city official of the place sometimes called Charlesbridge, consents to submit it, thus rescued from undeserved oblivion. He says, never having seen his manuscript since, he can recall one sentence only of it, which was fixed in his memory undoubtedly by its allusion to the musical portion of the exercises of the day.

"Utinam amorem scientiæ hos omnes hodie in hanc aulam attraxisse credere possem! Cum vero tot sodales in illis superioribus contempler, aut ad fores oculis errantibus stantes, fortasse sodalitatis sermones suaves voci meæ anteposcentes, et hanc orationem prælongam ægre ferentes, qui tamen, me egrediente, has parietes magno plausu concutient, aliqua alia causa eos actos esse non confiteri non possum."

And what one of Sodales or Alumni who may read these felicitous periods, even admitting that the melodies descending from that elevation were more enchanting to the ear than the oratio in lingua Latina, will hesitate to declare the applause well bestowed which followed him, modest scholar, orator, first flute, retiring, as he descended from the platform and hastened through the entry to the organ-loft, with flowing robe still about him, "to add his flute part to the suaves sermones which were next in order"?

Nor, perhaps, will the orator object to the mention of the anecdote he related on repeating this passage, illustrative of the nice scholarship of that learned professor and punctilious gentleman, Dr. Beck, who, on revising the student's composition as prepared for delivery, finding the words he had made use of to express the "sweet strains" of the Sodality not altogether the best adapted to convey the meaning intended, suggested these two as more suitable; and so let that graceful phrase, suaves sermones, stand to denote the soft discouragements of the Pierian Sodality of forty years ago.

One might suppose that during the period alluded to there must have been a remarkable dearth of musical talent. In a class of over sixty, six could play the flute. One other played the 'cello. Four or five sang; as many more, perhaps, could hum a tune correctly. An examination of the list of names in the classes of the two previous years shows that out of them the Sodality or Glee Club could have hardly enlisted a larger number. Eight or ten, therefore, may be judged to be about the average number of such as could in any way be called musical men in each class, say from fifteen to twenty per cent. of the whole.

The entire number of members of the Sodality, drawn from all the classes, at about this period, say, for instance, in 1837, was ten or twelve. Such persons as gave evidence of suitable musical attainments were chosen, in each successive year, to supply the vacancies left with every recurring Commencement Day. Juniors and Seniors in general made up the society, the qualifications of the men in the lower classes not always coming so early into notice, and the want of freedom of association between the more advanced students and the Sophomore and Freshman having a tendency, it may be, to exclude them.

Perhaps the most interesting portion of a sketch like this would be the list of tunes that were played. Pleasant it would be to read again the little slips of music-paper, to handle the forgotten books. A small number only of the airs can be recalled with certainty. The records most frequently give them by their number. For instance, October 17, 1839, they played at serenading "69, 53, and 18;" then they moved on and played "18, 53, and 69;" and again, at the next place, "53, 69, 18, and 81;" and finally, "81, 69, 18, and 53."¹ But the copied parts and the books are lost, and the lapse of years has quite effaced from the memory of at least one trio who blew flute and drew bow, as well as recited side by side in the same division throughout college life, all the meaning of these numerals, so that they are now no better than an unknown tongue. Some, however, are occasionally named in the records. "O Nannie, wilt thou gang wi' me?" is mentioned as arranged by Mr. Comer, together with "Spring-time of Year," in 1833: which last, the secretary wrote, "went splendidly, and all were extremely well pleased with it. We played several other tunes in fine style, but the Spring-time seemed to be the universal favorite." Comer was also employed to arrange the "Popular Extravaganza called Jim Crow." There were Roy's Wife, Kinlock of Kinlock, most of the charming "Moore's Melodies," "Oft in the still night," "Come rest in this bosom," "Araby's Daughter," "The harp that once thro' Tara's halls," "My lodging is on the cold ground," a name which had not yet given place to "Believe me, if all those endearing young charms," still less been quite superseded, as it may now be said to be, by "Fair Harvard," to the first public singing of which at the celebration of the two hundredth anniversary in 1836, the undergraduates of that time may take some pride in saying they were among those who listened.

Of the popular airs of the day, such as seemed most readily to lend themselves to adaptation for so scanty an orchestra were selected from time to time to be added to the small répertoire. In this way were contributed in the writer's time Zitti, zitti, a waltz in C by Mozart, airs from Caliph of Bagdad and from Le Dieu et la Bayadère, something by Von Weber called the Witches' Dance, Celeste's Dance, and many others. It was even presumed to attempt to compress the Overture to Le Nozze di Figaro within those narrow limits. As for Strauss, it is odd to recall that his sun had scarcely yet risen in New England. The Duke of Reichstadt's Waltz is remembered as a sunburst of beauty and brilliancy, after the old-fashioned "Buy a Broom," and Waltz from William Tell, which used to do duty in the slow-moving round dances. The Cracovienne and Cachucha in their turn came in a little later, with the Fanny Ellsler furor. Among these favorite pieces was one which, mentioned in the records by the very indefinite title of Celebrated Air by Haydn, did not at once recur to recollection; but little effort of memory has brought back the following pleasing melody, which is appended as a most fitting conclusion. Scattered Pierians of 183—, do you hear the President's call? — Expectatur musica!

MARTIN LUTHER AS A MUSICIAN.

THE Revue et Gazette Musicale recently published two most interesting letters, the discovery of which is due to M. Edouard Fétis. They were addressed by a musician named Jérôme De Cockx to his "venerable master, Jean van Stiegen, at Antwerp," and treat of Martin Luther, with whom, at Wittenberg, the Flemish traveler often conversed on musical topics.

Cockx on first entering the house of the celebrated reformer was rather astonished at perceiving, among some diversely arranged pipes, a flute and a guitar. "Here," said Luther to his visitor, "are my two companions. When I am fatigued with writing, when my brain is dull, or when the devil comes to annoy me with his pranks, I take my flute and play some caprice. My ideas are soon refreshed like newly-watered flowers, the devil vanishes, and I return to my work with renewed vigor. Music is a divine revelation; it is the language of angels in heaven, and on the earth that of the prophets of old."

"Luther drank the health of the musicians of our country," continues Cockx, "and especially that of the celebrated master, Josquin, of whom he formed this opinion: 'Josquin governs notes whilst others are governed by them.' And he further says: 'I like not those who do not care for music, that celestial art by which one dissipates the inquietude and troubles of the heart. Sing! sing often! All schoolmasters ought to be musicians, and each preacher should not mount the pulpit, until he has learnt to sol-fa.'"

In his second letter, Cockx refers to an evening spent at an inn, the Aigle Noir, "which resembles our taverns in Antwerp." Luther was there surrounded by his disciples (some of whom had composed "a few canticles, which were not sung, and doubtless, never will be sung in our Catholic Flanders"), all drinking the native wine or beer. "The master drank the latter, and the name was given to it of 'Pope-beer,' from his having said that he was a Fleming and a musician, and that every one showed their friendship for him and drank his health. . . . Luther showed his honor for the musical art, for he said, 'Kings and princes ought to encourage music, for it is their duty to protect the liberal arts as well as the sciences. . . . Music is a course of discipline and a schoolmistress; it teaches us to be more amiable and sweet, more modest and intelligent. Bad musicians and bad singers contrast greatly with that which is the true art of music, and are to be held in the same relationship as dirt and rubbish have with cleanliness and purity. If we sing, the devil will have less power with us; for, as I have already said, he likes disorder and trouble, and hates music, which is the symbol of harmonious order. Sing, then, with all your hearts and with your best voices, and join with me in singing Mensch willst du leben.'

"All the disciples assembled around their master and blended their voices with his, singing the melody he had previously indicated to them. What beautiful singing! What splendid harmony! Never had I listened to music with such pleasure as then. The tears came into my eyes, which the doctor perceiving, held out his hand to me, which I took, though it was that of a heretic. After the termination of the before-mentioned composition, Martin whispered something to those who were near him, and they then commenced another piece, which I knew from the first notes to be a madrigal by Roland de Lattre. It was to please me that this work, written by a compatriot, was executed in my presence; and what a compatriot! One who was the prince of musicians of his time. When these gentlemen were finished, I gave them my best thanks for their courtesy, and also commended them for their fine voices, having rarely heard the like before, even among the vocalists of our cathedral."

" . . . I know what opinions posterity will have of Martin Luther concerning his treatment of the Catholic Church, in which he was born and brought up, and which he afterwards deserted, but I think and believe he will be known and long considered a great musician." . . .

TALKS ON ART. — SECOND SERIES.¹

FROM INSTRUCTIONS OF MR. WILLIAM M. HUNT TO HIS PUPILS.

XIV.

If you want a rule for painting, try to represent the color at once, frankly and fully. If you can't do this, put in every object in a frottée of local color. If this seems right in any place, put it in solidly. Make it suggest the color, and then paint it with a full brush.

I like your little woman in brocade and satin. You could n't have done it if you had n't painted still-life, — especially mutton-chops! Two years' work on figures would not have done it.

So you used chrome yellow in that sunset. And it's true enough; use chrome when you see chrome. You can't begin to get the vivid color of nature at sunset.

After indicating an eye or a mouth, try, with a pen, to see how much you know of its form. If you get to making a picture by values, you must work the harder for form.

¹ Copyright, 1879, by Helen M. Knowlton.

¹ Oct. 5, 1840, "Selected 144 for the Faculty to march in by."

Your figure has pretty movement and expression, but it lacks firmness, hardness. Too molle! You are so afraid of hard lines! You need not make them thin and wiry. Make them broad and full. In drawing a hand, make a firm, hard outline. Put a white paper behind, in order to see it. Bear on hard, and in time you will feel the hand as if it were your own. You'll feel it in your bones.

Try it on something that you don't care for. Draw, persistently, an outline that is hard and severe. Shading up to it will lose all unnecessary hardness.

You have put too much high-light business on that forehead. You saw the picture that the little fellow made in that position; and, in order to keep it, you must make the face look as if painted with one sweep. Not leave it in parts.

If you think that a form is round draw it again and again, until you see the straight lines and angles, and all the forms that run into that form. A shoulder into an arm, for instance.

(Sketch of a house.) The action of that house is good. Everything in the world has its action.

Put five miles of atmosphere between yourself and the mountain, and do it with color; not black.

Have been reading Mrs. Merrifield's book, and it revives recollections of Europe. Everything in this country tends too much towards photographic effect, to niggling and surface-work. Why niggle over anything if you can arrive at a result immediately?

One picture, I remember, by Correggio, has an arm, life-size, painted from shoulder to wrist with one stroke of the brush; and a full brush, of course. One leg, too, painted from hip to ankle in the same manner.

In charcoal, and in paint, draw with a full brush. Get effects by feeling; and be careful not to destroy what you have thus obtained.

If you wish to work on that head a second time, paint it in gray, keeping it lighter than it is to be when done. When fully dry, paint cool colors into a warm frotté. Or you might try Rubens's method.

There have been very few great painters: Velasquez, Tintoretto, Paul Veronese. Titian almost became one. Beautiful color, but he had not the grandeur of the others.

Michael Angelo was second only to the Almighty. "A disappointed man?" Pshaw! I know that, when he had his plaster all wet, and he was ready to put those designs on the Sistine ceiling, he was happy as no one else could be happy. The happiness of being almost a Creator.

Look at the Madonna in his Adam touched by Jehovah! All other madonnas seem conscious by the side of this one. She is not even conscious of the Child, but looks far on, into the future.

Michael Angelo's types are of the grandest. You see them now in Italy; in women washing, or in the market-places.

THE London Figaro says: "Mr. Carl Rosa, who has started with his provincial company for Dublin, has made a very important engagement for his London season in the person of Herr Anton Schott, first tenor at the Imperial Opera of Hamburg, and who accompanied Dr. Von Bülow to London this summer—I mean this season. Herr Schott will play but two roles, those of Lobengrin and Rienzi, two parts for which his fine stage presence and his histrionic and vocal capabilities seem to be exactly adapted. Mr. Maas, Mr. Rosa's other principal tenor, has been assigned the parts of Rhadames in Aida and William in Mignon, in both of which he may be expected to show his high talents to advantage."

Dwight's Journal of Music.

SATURDAY, OCTOBER 11, 1879.

FASHION IN MUSIC.

It might seem to a thinking person to-day as if many art-loving individuals had become so filled with respect for the influence which fashion exerts upon art as really to believe that fashion is well-nigh all-powerful in art matters. One can hardly venture to expatiate upon the beauties of a work of art belonging to a by-gone period, in the presence of some people, without being met with a depreciative shrug of the shoulders, and a "Nous avons changé tout cela." The work is after an obsolete fashion, and ergo obsolete of itself. If this sort of deduction is sound, one is tempted to believe in the utter frivolity of art, a field where a Haydn can destroy a Bach, a Beethoven annihilate a Haydn, and a Brahms, or Raff, forever erase the footsteps of a Beethoven, just as trousers can rout knee-breeches, or crinolines be put to flight by gored skirts. But is it so? Does the old fashion of a work of art, — say a composition — make the composition itself old-fashioned and obsolete, as mere wearing apparel is after the second season? If it is true, one can say truly that music, or any other art, is something fit for only cobblers and tailors to expend their energies upon, and that men of genius had better take to the exact sciences or political economy. No, it is not so; it is not true. The influence that the art-fashion of any given epoch in the world's history has upon the art of that epoch is strong indeed, but no stronger than the fashion of clothes has upon the man who wears them, if he be not a mere forked instrument whose whole mission in life is to exhibit wearing apparel. We would not underrate the power of dress. To nine tenths of those he met John Sebastian Bach was but a mere perambulating wig, full-skirted coat, knee-breeches and hose; a wholly respectable apparition, but capable of becoming hugely ridiculous in fifty years or so. Yet there was something under that wig and coat which would have been the same under any covering, and which was beyond the power of tailors and barbers to modify. Just so with Bach's music; its external cut was according to the fashion of his day, a fashion now long since gone by, and probably never to be revived again; but the true gist of it — "das Genie, ich meine den Geist" — belonged little more especially to his time than to any other. Beethoven's Ninth Symphony could no more touch a hair of the St. Matthew Passion (in an aggressive sense) than it could shunt our globe off from its track. It is one of the glories of art — perhaps its chief glory — that whenever a man does anything truly great in it, he does it for all time. A great composition is practically eternal, and the changes of fashion leave it unscathed.

It is the poorest of poor arguments to say that if Palestrina only lived now he would write in a very different style from what he actually did. Of course he would; there cannot be the faintest shadow of a doubt of it; it is equally indubitable that, if Homer lived to-day, he would wear trousers. It has nothing to do with the question. No one in his senses wishes Palestrina's or Bach's style to be revived now, even if such a thing were possible. That fashion — as a fashion — is dead as dead can be. But shall we forever lose the grandeur, beauty, and soul of Palestrina's works merely because of their peculiar form? We have but one choice left us; we must accept either the form, or lose the works.

Some persons may say, too thoughtlessly, that we can afford to lose the works; that there is enough fine music in the world without them, and music written in a style more in accordance with the present prevailing taste. To this we can never agree. In the first place, the world can in no wise afford to lose anything that is truly great; the human race has need of all its real achievements; it cannot spare one of them. We are by nature insatiable, and need all that we can get that is good, and must keep all that we already have.

In the next place, admitting, for the sake of argument, that more modern or the most modern music is intrinsically as fine, or even finer than that of a more remote period, there is one essential element in the older music that we look for in vain in the compositions of our own day, and which is so priceless that we can in no way afford to lose it; the very fact that it is practically obsolete renders it only the more worthy of being jealously and carefully preserved. We mean the element of truly grand and spontaneous simplicity.

This is no mere external, "fashionable" attribute; it lies at the very heart of the old music. Nowadays no one can be truly simple; our life, our thought, our very faith are complex and involved. If an artist — most of all a musician — attempt simplicity to-day, it is either an affectation or an imitation; it is not genuine; it lacks the true ring; its want of spontaneity is transparent as glass. And let us say here, by the way, that we greatly mistrust the truth of a very common criticism upon modern music, that it lacks spontaneity because it is involved, complex in purpose, and often bewildering. It seems to us, on the contrary, that men like Brahms, Wagner, Berlioz, Liszt, and others are, as a rule, spontaneous only when they are complex and involved. Complexity of thought is their natural element, and in it they are more or less easily at home; it is when they attempt the simple that they painfully labor, and become affected and mannered. But the straightforward, unaffected simplicity of the old composers is something entirely by itself. Our complexity may be better and higher; that is not the question; the old simplicity is something true and genuine, and, moreover, something that is utterly inimitable, and not to be reproduced. And, be it said emphatically, it is something that we absolutely need, were it only as a foil to ourselves.

As it is wholesome for a man who can only doubt to look upon a man who honestly and wholly believes, and refresh his troubled mind with the assurance that belief of some sort is possible in this world; so is it wholesome for us, whose thought and expression are necessarily complex, to be brought face to face with thought that is essentially simple and complete. It rests us, and gives us fresh strength and vigor. The true and beautiful are always inspiring.

The composer to-day who, after listening to a Palestrina Gloria, only feels himself inspired to write a piece of vocal counterpoint in one of the old church-modes, cannot have listened to much purpose, and his counterpoint will be but a very uninspiring sham. But the wondrous, simple spirit of the grand old music, so sure of its own purpose, might well inspire him to try to express his own highest ideal in his own spontaneous way; and whether he sets to work upon an opera finale or upon a symphonic poem, he will work with better heart and more fervid inspiration for the hearing of it.

Fashion is great and powerful, but works only surface deep. The man whose heart it reaches has a shallow heart at best, and no one would wish to look up to him as a law-giver on anything higher than etiquette or clothing. The man whose eye cannot pierce through fashion may be set down as morally purblind, and no safe guide.

Yet let us say this: he who cannot, or will not, go beyond the fashions of his own day, has at least one grain of respectability; he is to a certain extent a man of the time, and reflects honestly much of the true spirit of the age he lives in. But his hapless brother who willingly buries himself under the effete modes and fashions of a by-gone age, simply because they are old; who goes about like an æsthetic dustman, tediously collecting the shot rubbish of centuries, is a man of no age and no time, and reflects the spirit of nothing whatever. If a man must pin his faith to a fashion, let him at least take a living one that has not been worn threadbare.

W. F. A.

CONCERTS.

REDPATH BOSTON LYCEUM.—The first concert of this popular course of concerts and lectures took place on Tuesday evening of this week. The Music Hall was full, the audience delighted with all they heard and saw, and the stage end of the hall was richly adorned with flowers and evergreens. The programme, too, was printed with rare taste. It was a miscellaneous concert. There was a small orchestra (the Germania), which, under Carl Zerrahn's direction, accompanied the more important arias nicely and effectively, and played the overture to Zanetta, the quaint little Turkish march by Michaelis, which was encored, and selections from Gounod's Faust. There were solos on the harp by Mme. Chatterton Bohrer, who has brilliant, tasteful execution, and was well received. There was the inevitable cornet solo also—in this instance a remarkably good one ("Grand Russian Air" with variations), and remarkably well played, both in the expressive singing passages, which were given in a chaste, pure style, and in the fine precision of the rapid florid business.

The rest was all vocal solos and duets. The chief star was Miss Marie Litta, of the Strakosch Italian Opera Company, who has a very pure and flexible soprano voice, of good power, and of a sweet and tender quality, and who sang Bellini's "Qui la voce" in a highly satisfactory and charming manner. She was persistently recalled, and answered with a smaller piece. One such prima donna was enough, one would think, for any concert; but there was another, of almost equal excellence, Mrs. Abbie B. Carrington, — her first appearance in America after studying in Italy. She, too, pleased decidedly by the sweet, true, flexible voice, and the graceful ease and fluency with which she sang the "Shadow Song" in Meyerbeer's Dinorah, and something requiring the same bright play of execution, which she gave for an encore. Another lady, set down as a tenor (!), Mlle. Selvi, sang the "Cantique de Noël," by Adam, in a voice certainly of exceptional depth and fullness, and in even, simple style; she sang in English, and altogether, in spite of the Italian name, seemed like an English-woman. Signors Baldanza, who has a smooth, sweet tenor, and Papini, a large man, of the unctuous, free and easy buffo quality (both of them members of the Strakosch troupe), gave the Duet from Donizetti's Elisir d'Amore in a felicitous and artistic manner.

We did not wait to get the answer to Miss Litta's conundrum: "Why are Roses red?" a song by Claude Melnotte, for nothing so fags out our listening faculties as a long, miscellaneous series of unconnected solo pieces. And so we lost Sig. Baldanza's Romanza from Luisa Miller, "Hear ye Israel," from Elijah, which we should like to hear Mrs. Carrington sing, Mme. Bohrer's second harp solo, the Duet from Don Pasquale, by Miss Litta and Mme. Selvi, and the Faust selections. When the thick of the concert season comes, such entertainments will have to be despatched more briefly, or noticed but occasionally.

MENDELSSOHN QUINTETTE CLUB.—A small roomful of musical people were invited last week to Chickering's warerooms, to hear a couple of string Quartets played by the club as newly organized; the places of Messrs. Listemann and Hennig being now supplied by two young artists recently imported. Mr. Heimendal, from Hanover, a youthful looking man, of refined, intelligent and earnest mien, takes the first violin; and Mr. Geise, a Hollander, the violoncello. Mr. Dannreuther still holds the second violin, so that the Quartet has a very youthful aspect, Mr. Ryan looking like the father of the three. The quartets selected were a well-known one by Haydn, in B-flat, and the third (in A) of the three by Schumann. Enough to say that it was some of the best quartet playing we have had in this city. The unity was remarkably perfect, each individual instrument duly loyal to the whole as one. The intonation of the new violinist is singularly pure, his tone fine, and he phrases like a master. The 'Cellist has a very rich tone, and plays with great execution and with feeling. He also played as solos the Aria from Bach's Orchestral Suite in D, and a Bach Sarabande and Gavotte to great acceptance. We hope we may hear the Quintette Club, in its rejuvenated condition, at some of the Euterpe Concerts during the season.

WELLESLEY COLLEGE.—Last Saturday the 58th concert was given before the young ladies of this institution. The solo performer was Mr. E. B. Perry, the very accomplished pianist, who needs no allowance on the ground of blindness with which he has been afflicted from childhood. He interpreted the following selections:—

Beethoven: Rondo, from Sonata, Op. 53.

Schumann:

(a.) Aufschwung, Op. 12-2.

(b.) Warum? Op. 12-3.

(c.) Traumewirren, Op. 12-7.

(d.) Nachtstück, Op. 23.

(e.) Novellette, Op. 31-4, E major.

Henselt: Song of the Gondolier, Op. 13-2.

Von Bülow: Intermezzo, from "Carnival of Milan."

Perry: Nocturne, Op. 6.

Kullak: La Gazelle, Pièce Caractéristique.

Chopin:

(a.) Nocturne, F minor, Op. 55.

(b.) Valse, D-flat major, Op. 64-1.

(c.) Berceuse, Op. 57.

(d.) Ballade in A-flat, Op. 47.

THE WORCESTER FESTIVAL.

By all accounts the twenty-second Annual Festival of the Worcester County Musical Association, held in Mechanics' Hall during the five days from Sept. 22 to 26 inclusive, surpassed all the preceding festivals, both in artistic interest and in the remarkable material support rendered by the music lovers of the "Heart" of the old Commonwealth, who eagerly bought up all the tickets even at a premium. These "Festivals" have developed out of the old-fashioned "conventions," or meetings of choristers and others for a week of joint practice in psalmody; they were also markets for the "working off" of some new hymn tune book, or "collection" prepared by the conductor of the convention. Many such conventions, in various parts of the country, still retain this mercantile feature. But in some places, notably in Worcester, they have grown into annual festivals of music of a more important and artistic character. Worcester seems well situated for becoming in some sense the musical Birmingham of New England, at least of Massachusetts. We have already mentioned the somewhat formidable array of vocal and instrumental forces employed in this last and crowning effort. Now we must gather from programmes and reports some brief résumé of what was done. The first concert (Monday afternoon) was miscellaneous, and was opened by the four young ladies of the Eichberg String Quartet (Misses Lillian Chandler, Lillian Shattuck, Lettie Launder, and Abbie Shephardson), who played the Andante and Presto from Mendelssohn's Fourth Quartet, followed by a Minuet of Boccherini, and very creditably for such young artists. A Salve Maria by Mercadante, for contralto, was sung by Mrs. A. W. Porter. Then the bass aria: "Honor and Arms" from Handel's Samson, to which Mr. C. E. Hay, of Boston, is quite adequate. The Prayer and Aria from Der Freyschütz (accredited to Bellini on the programme book!) was sung by Mrs. H. F. Knowles. Next came Wieniawski's difficult Polonaise for violin solo, played by Miss Launder; the Aria "Vado ben spesso" by Salvator Rosa, sung by Mr. Hays; two duets by Gade ("Spring's Greeting," and "The Rose on the Heath"), sung by Mrs. Knowles and Mrs. Porter, and finally, Mr. Eichberg's Concertante for four violins, played by the same four clever pupils of his who opened the concert.

The morning of the second day was devoted to rehearsal of Gounod's St. Cecilia Mass, and in the afternoon concert, the following programme was performed, with Mr. B. D. Allen as accompanist:—

Part Song, "The Letter"	Hatton.
Schubert Quartette (Mr. G. J. Parker, Mr. G. W. Want, Mr. L. H. Chubbuck, Mr. D. M. Babcock).
Theme and variations	Rode.
Miss Gertrude Franklin.
Song, "Homeward"	Abb.
Mr. G. F. Parker.
Organ duo, Symphony, "Hymn of Praise,"	Mendelssohn.
Mr. G. W. Sumner, Mr. B. D. Allen.
Quartet, "The Long Day Closes"	Sullivan.
Schubert Quartette.
Song, "Expectancy"	D. Buck.
Mrs. Louise Finch Hardenburgh.
Song, "Heaven's Chorister"	Pinault.
Mr. D. M. Babcock.
Song, "It was a Dream"	Cowen.
Miss Franklin.
Quartet, "Italian Salad"	Genée.
Schubert Quartette.

A correspondent of the Advertiser says of this concert:—

"The quartet sang very well, earned abundant plaudits, and were twice recalled, giving, after Hatton's bright song, Bishop's glee, 'Sleep, Gentle Lady,' and repeating at the close of the concert a portion of Genée's masterpiece of burlesque. Miss Franklin, who is a new candidate for the honors of the concert room, proved to be a skilful executant, with a bright and clear voice, in all respects reflecting credit on her careful training by Mme. La Grange. She sings with taste and a certain amount of feeling, but has not yet acquired the art of expressing sentiment and passion so completely as to conceal the means. It is rather as an executant than as a dramatic singer that she is at present to be rated. For an encore after her first song she gave 'Il primo d'amore,' by Widor. Mrs. Hardenburgh is well known to Boston audiences under her maiden name, Miss Louise Finch. It is enough to say that her performances showed her familiar characteristics of finish and refined delivery to excellent advantage. Mr. Babcock's sonorous voice and impressive delivery were well suited to Pin-suti's song and to the piece given on a recall, — Mozart's 'Who treads the path of duty.' Mr. Babcock has steadily improved within a year or two."

On Wednesday there were two concerts, afternoon and evening, besides a morning rehearsal of the more difficult choruses in the Messiah. The afternoon programme was miscellaneous, and without orchestra, as on the two days before, to wit: —

- Glee, "Health to my Dear" Spofforth.
New York Glee Club.
(Mr. A. D. Woodruff, Mr. G. Ellard, Mr. W. C. Baird,
Mr. G. E. Aiken.)
Aria, "Lascia ch'io pianga" Handel.
Mrs. Isabella Palmer Fassett.
Song, "The Anchor's Weighed" Brahm.
Mr. George Ellard.
Aria, "Al Desio" from "Figaro" Mozart.
Miss Edith Abell.
Piano solos, Rondo from Sonata, op. 53 Beethoven.
Gavotte, E minor Silva.
Mr. E. B. Perry.
Part Song, "The Snow-Drop" Barnby.
Glee Club.
Song, "The King of Thule" Liszt.
Miss Fassett.
Songs, "The Distant Shore" Sullivan.
"Jack's Yarn" Diehl.
Mr. W. C. Baird.
Song, "St. Agnes' Eve" Sullivan.
Miss Abell.
Glee, A Franklyn's Dogge Mackenzie.
Glee Club.

The New York Glee Club seems to have sustained its old reputation for fine part-singing. Two of its members, Messrs. Woodruff and Ellard, are new, at least they have not yet been heard in Boston. Their tasteful singing of Barnby's delicate song won an encore. Mrs. Fassett, according to the correspondent already quoted, "is a contralto of excellent parts;" her voice "strong, deep, and of a very rich quality," and she made "a decided impression." Miss Abell confirmed the good impression which she made last spring in Boston. Mr. Perry is the blind pianist, of whose sensitive, yet strong and brilliant interpretation of Schumann, we had occasion to speak last summer. He was recalled and gave Schumann's "Traumeswirren."

In the evening, for the first time, the chorus appeared, with Carl Zerrahn as conductor, and for accompaniment the organ (G. W. Sumner), and piano-forte (E. B. Story). The chorus opened and closed the concert, singing, "with great precision and firmness," Sullivan's Anthem: "I will mention the loving-kindnesses," with Mr. Alfred Wilkie as soloist, and a chorus by Calkin: "Rejoice in the Lord." The intervening numbers were these: —

- Slumber Song France.
Mrs. Louise Finch Hardenburgh.
Glee, "Return, my love" Horsley.
New York Glee Club.
Violin solo, "Souvenir de Bade" Leonhard.
Señor Albertini.
Glee, "The Belle of St. Michael's Tower" Stewart.
Miss Henrietta Beebe, Mrs. Hardenburgh,
Messrs. Woodruff, Baird, and Aiken.
Duet, "The laurel and the rose" Greil.
Mr. Woodruff, Mr. Ellard.

- Glee, "When shall we three meet again" Horsley.
Miss Beebe, Mrs. Hardenburgh, Mr. Aiken.
Part song, "Oh, who will o'er the downs so free." Pearse.
Pearsall.

- Glee Club.
Song, "Come live with me" Bishop.
Miss Beebe.
Violin solo, Andante e Polonaise Vieuxtemps.
Señor Diaz Albertini.
Glee, "A knight there came" Cooke.
Miss Beebe, Mr. Woodruff, Mr. Ellard,
Mr. Aiken.
Duet, "Song of the summer birds" Rubinstein.
Miss Beebe, Mrs. Hardenburgh.
Glee, "Humpty Dumpty" Caldicott.
Miss Beebe, Mrs. Hardenburgh, Mr. Woodruff, Mr. Aiken.

The Glee Club quartet, this time of mixed voices, and the solo songs by Miss Beebe and Mrs. Hardenburgh, were much admired. Of the violinist, Señor Albertini, we are told: —

His tone is thin and light, but pure and true, and his execution very brilliant. He is a young man, a Cuban by birth, and has not before appeared in America. He can hardly fail to command the popular favor as soon as his merits shall have become more generally known. Albertini is only twenty-two years old. At an early age he displayed great musical talent and skill as a violinist; attracted the attention of Gottschalk while still a child; began studying at Havana in 1865. His whole name is Rafael Diaz Albertini Urioste. Played in New York in private in 1868, and attracted the attention of critics there. In 1871 entered the Paris Conservatory; won there the first "accessit;" then the second prize; then the Medal of Honor in 1875 on graduating in 1875. Has made successful concert tours in Europe and given a series of concerts in Havana. Been decorated with several orders in Spain and elsewhere. After his first piece to-night he was recalled and gave "Chanson de Mignon" by Jules Garcin. After his second piece, being again recalled, he gave "St. Patrick's Day" with variations, by Vieuxtemps. Again recalled, he repeated part of the variations.

So far the performances have all been without orchestra, and the programmes miscellaneous and for the most part light, yet not hackneyed, certainly not vulgar, but on the whole put together with taste, and more select than many of the evening concerts after the oratorios at the great festivals in England. On Thursday afternoon a small yet efficient orchestra, from Boston, was on hand, — an orchestra of thirty members, including among its first violins Mr. Bernhard Listemann, and our old friend Carl Meisel, who has returned from Germany. Gounod's St. Cecilia Mass, which high authorities esteem the greatest of his ecclesiastical music, formed the first part of the concert. The solos were taken by Mrs. H. M. Smith, Mr. Alfred Wilkie, and Mr. W. H. Beckett. The Advertiser correspondent thus describes it: —

The first movement, Kyrie, is an humble and touching prayer; a figure for the violins in the accompaniment is conceived and carried out with a charming grace. The Gloria is a piece of genuine, pious enthusiasm — the enthusiasm, that is, of a devotee who, feeling himself filled with the glory of the Most High, utters his praises in a subdued and reverential tone, unaccompanied by an orchestral fanfare. There is a charming passage in this movement assigned to the female voices, and accompanied by harp, violins fremolo and wind instruments muffled, — an aerial orchestration, so to speak. At the verses, Qui tollis, etc., the music has a character of tender supplication, and at the Quoniam tu solus, it takes on an air of august and mystical pomp. The Sanctus is, as of right it should be, the most impressive portion of the mass. The mysticism of belief is expressed here in a grave, majestic march by the basses, while the chorus passes in review all the articles of faith. At the Et incarnatus the expression of adoration is admirable. The resurrection, so often treated by composers with an almost fierce energy, is here gently proclaimed by female voices. Then the basses in the Credo motive, persistently adhered to, lead us to the Et vitam venturi seculi, where the composer in heavenly harmonies lifts a corner of the veil and shows from afar the glories of the celestial Jerusalem. Gounod has written a delightful orchestral interlude for the offertory, the instrumentation of which is in his best style. The Sanctus never fails to make a deep impression. The crescendo at the close is a magnificent stroke of genius, and very remarkable is the effect produced by the bass drum. Again, in the Benedictus, the Agnus Dei and Domine, non sum dignus, Gounod reasserts his masterly skill in expression. From this hasty and altogether insufficient description there has been omitted all mention of the method of treatment pursued by the composer — the system of division, that is, with solos and concerted movements. The execution of the work was very fine, after making proper allowance for the limited opportunities for rehearsal of chorus and orchestra.

After the Mass, the following selections formed the second part: —

- Overture, "Zanetta" Auber.
Orchestra.
Song, "Santa Maria" Faure.
Mr. W. H. Beckett.
Aria, "Gratias agimus tibi" Guglielmi.
Mrs. H. M. Smith. Flute obligato.
Song, "Tell me, Mary, how to woo thee" Hodson.
Mr. Alfred Wilkie.
Potpourri, "Faust" Gounod.

The Thursday evening concert, also with chorus and orchestra, had more of "the dignity of a festival occasion" than the preceding miscellaneous concerts. This was the programme: —

- Overture, "Tannhäuser" Wagner.
Orchestra.
Aria, from "Maeked Ball," Verdi.
Mr. W. H. Beckett.
Aria, "Qui la voce" Bellini.
Mrs. Anna Granger Dow.
Cavatina, "Salve dimora," from "Faust" Gounod.
Mr. T. J. Toedt.
Vintagers' Chorus, from "Loreley" Mendelssohn.
Basses and tenors of chorus.
Aria, "Oh, don fatale," from "Don Carlos" Verdi.
Miss Annie Louise Cary.
Song, "I love thee" Buck.
Mr. Beckett.
Song, "What are they to do?" Randegger.
Mrs. Dow.
Duet, "Si la stanchezza," from "Il Trovatore" Verdi.
Miss Cary, Mr. Toedt.
Polonaise, from "Struensee" Meyerbeer.
Orchestra.
Recitative, "Awake, Saturnia," and aria, "Iris, hence away," from "Semele" Handel.
Miss Cary.
Song, "The Harbor-Bay" J. F. Barnett.
Mr. Toedt.
Canon-quartet, from "Fidelio" Beethoven.
Mr. Dow, Miss Cary, Mr. Toedt, Mr. Beckett.
Solo and chorus, "Crowned with the Tempest," from "Ernani" Verdi.
Solo by Mr. Beckett.

Miss Cary's rendering of the noble Aria from Handel's Semele, as well as of the very dramatic aria by Verdi; the Quartet from Fidelio, the Vintagers' Chorus from the Loreley, and the two orchestral pieces, must have been well worth hearing.

Friday (Sept. 26) was the last and great day of the Festival, which appears to have improved both in the matter and the manner of performance, as well as in public interest, as it went on. The seventh concert (afternoon) offered a really interesting programme: —

- Overture, "Anacreon" Cherubini.
Orchestra.
Ave Maria, from "Loreley" Mendelssohn.
Miss Henrietta Beebe, and chorus of ladies.
Aria, "Cujus Animam," from "Stabat Mater" Rossini.
Mr. Alfred Wilkie.
Symphony, No. 8 Beethoven.
Orchestra.
Duet, "Oh, Flower of the verdant Sea," from "Rebekah" Barnby.
Miss Beebe and Mr. Wilkie.
Piano sonata, op. 7 Grieg.
Mr. S. Liebling.
Aria, "As when the Dove," from "Acis and Galatea" Handel.
Miss Beebe.
Polonaise, from "Struensee" Meyerbeer.
Orchestra.
Aria, "Let us eat and drink," from "The Prodigal Son" Sullivan.
Mr. Wilkie and Chorus.

In the evening the Festival reached its climax in a very creditable performance of Handel's Messiah, under the baton, of course, of Carl Zerrahn, who had made numerous trips to Worcester to drill into unity the four or five hundred voices of the various societies and choirs from all parts of the country. The solo singers were Miss Ida W. Hubbell, Miss Annie Louise Cary, Mr. Theo. J. Toedt, and Mr. John F. Winch. We need not to be told how well the Alto and Bass recitatives and arias were sung. For the rest we will again cite the Advertiser: —

"Miss Hubbell proved to be a pleasing and well-trained vocalist. Her voice is of a delightful quality, and her delivery showed good judgment throughout. She seems to be one of those rare singing birds who are endowed with a strong musical feeling, to which cultivation has only added a finish without a sacrifice of the gift of nature. The declamatory parts in the portions describing the scene in the fields at Bethlehem were given in excellent style, as was also the aria, 'Rejoice greatly.' That she could also express the delicate emotions was satisfactorily shown in her execution of 'Come unto me.' The audience was interested and generous in applause, but no encores were granted. Mr. Toedt confirmed and strengthened the excellent impression made last evening. The opening recitative and aria were sung with a most refined taste, especially in the matter of phrasing. His enunciation deserves equal admiration for its distinctness. All of his work, in a word, was done in a most artistic manner. Mr. Sumner's organ accompaniments were judiciously played, and orchestra and chorus reflected the highest credit on Mr. Zerrahn's training. The hall was crowded to its utmost capacity by an interested and closely attentive audience. The association had never before sung the Messiah, though it had been given by the local society which forms the nucleus of the association. Several of the choruses were, however, entirely new to all but a very small proportion of the choir."

MUSICAL INTELLIGENCE.

MME. CAPPIANI, the accomplished prima donna and successful vocal teacher, has returned to her numerous pupils, at her rooms in Winter Street. The call for her services is so great in New York that she will teach there on Saturday and Monday every week, and in Boston from Tuesday to Friday inclusive.

Many, too, will welcome the return to our city of MME. ERMINA RUDERSDOFF, after her great successes in New York. There is room enough for both, and enough for them to do in properly educating young singers for concert, oratorio, and opera.

Mr. William H. Sherwood, the pianist, is in much demand for concerts in New York and elsewhere. In Boston he has removed from his music rooms in West Street to 157 Tremont Street, next door to Chickering's warerooms. — His clever pupil, Mr. H. S. Hanchett, has secured rooms for teaching in the same building.

The first of the five popular concerts by Mr. Listemann's "Philharmonic Orchestra," will be given in the Music Hall, October 25. Here is a list of some of the pieces in the repertoire:—

- Beethoven: Symphony in F. Selections.
- Overture, "Egmont."
- Overture, "Leonore No. 3."
- Schumann: Symphony in D minor. Selections.
- Overture, "Manfred."
- Symphonic in C. Scherzo and Adagio.
- "Evening Song." Adapted for orchestra by Raff.
- Raff: Leonore Symphony. Selections.
- Spohr: Overture, "Jessonda."
- Mendelssohn: Overture, "Midsummer Night's Dream."
- Wagner: Overture, "Tannhäuser."
- Introduction to Lohengrin.
- Bach: Air and Gavotte.
- Chaconne. Adapted for orchestra by Saint-Saëns.
- Schubert: Unfinished Symphony in B minor.
- List: Preludes.
- Hungarian Rhapsodies.
- Polonaise in E.
- "Faust" Symphony, Grotchen movement.
- "Tasso." Symphonique Poem.
- Mozart: Overture, "Magic Flute."
- "A Musical Joke." For strings and two horns.
- Zopff: Serenade for wind instruments.
- Weber: Overture, "Oberon."
- "Invitation à la Danse."
- Saint-Saëns: "Danse Macabre."
- "Le Rouet d'Omphale."
- Tchaikowski: Andante for string orchestra.
- Litolff: Overture, "Robespierre."
- Volkman: Serenade for string orchestra.
- Dvorak: "Slavonic Dances."
- Svendson: "Carnival in Paris."
- Vieuxtemps: Fantasia-Caprice for orchestra.
- Johann Strauss, "Waltzes."

ENGLISH OPERA. The season of English opera at the Park Theatre will begin Monday evening, October 13. Miss Emma Abbott is the prima donna of the troupe, which also includes Mrs. Seguin and others of repute. An important feature of the season will be the production of Massé's Paul and Virginia.

The Globe Theatre will open for the season on Monday night, October 13, with Auber's bright and charming opera of Crown Diamonds. The company will include Miss Laura Schirmer, Miss Clara Poole, Mr. Charles R. Adams, Mr. Alfred Wilkie, Mr. Henry Peakes, and others. Gounod's Mock Doctor will probably be produced during the season.

One of the coming musical events that will attract especial attention will be the visit of Carlotta Patti. She will be accompanied by the same artists who have assisted her in New York, two of whom, Mr. Henry Ketten, the Hungarian pianist, and Mr. Ernest De Munch, the violoncellist, are spoken of in terms of high praise. Sig. Ciampi-Cella and Mr. L. A. Phelps are also members of the troupe. The former is a baritone of the modern Italian school, and the latter a tenor, who has passed some years in Europe. The concerts will be given in Music Hall on the evenings of October 15 and 17, and the afternoon of October 18. — Courier.

The following information concerning the purposes of The Cecilia for the coming season has been published: Four concerts will be given, no one of which will be repeated. The first two concerts will be in Music Hall, and at the first, to be given probably December 22, Odysseus, a cantata by Max Bruch, will be sung, with orchestral accompaniment. The second concert will probably be given February 9, and its programme will be made up of one of Bach's shorter cantatas, part-songs, and madrigals, and pieces for solo voices. The remaining concerts of the season will be in April and May. The programmes for these concerts cannot be announced definitely as yet, but one of them will undoubtedly contain Schumann's music to Manfred with orchestra, the dialogue being given by a reader. — Ibid.

The Albany Musical Association have engaged Tweddle Hall for two nights in the early part of December, the first night for the oratorio of St. Paul, and the second for a miscellaneous concert. Miss Fanny Kellogg, Myron W. Whitney, and Wm. H. Fessenden of Boston, and Mrs. Fassett of Albany, are to be the soloists, and the Germania orchestra of Boston, Bernard Listemann leader, will furnish the accompaniment.

NEW YORK. — The concert given by Theodore Thomas last night, on the occasion of the reopening of Steinway Hall, might almost be called a festival. The room was crowded, and a bright and sympathetic audience testified by loud and long applause the popular gratification at Thomas's return. With a fine programme, a noble performance, and a brilliant assemblage of listeners, nothing was lacking to the success of the evening. The old orchestra was there, very little changed in its personnel; and when the conductor took his old place at the desk a storm of welcome broke out. The following was the bill:—

- Symphony No. 2 Beethoven.
- Air, from the suite in D J. S. Bach.
- Piano-forte Concerto Schumann.
- Slavonic Dance Mr. F. Rummel.
- Siegfried Idyl Dvorak.
- Fantasia on Hungarian Airs Wagner.
- Liist.

There was one absolute novelty in this list, namely, the Slavonic Dance, in minuet time, the fourth of a series of eight, by Anton Dvorak. It is a composition of considerable strength and originality, full of pomp and splendor, and betraying the characteristic national taste for a semi-barbaric magnificence. The Siegfried Idyl, fascinating to hear, difficult to execute or interpret, has been played here by Thomas before, but it is little known. Mr. Rummel played the Schumann Concerto with force, freedom, and a fine technique, and made a still more marked impression by his spirited rendering of Liszt's heroic Fantasia, the orchestra in both pieces lending him an admirable support.

The great features of the concert, however, were the Symphony and the Bach Air; the first was enthusiastically applauded after every movement; the second was re-demanded. — Tribune, Oct. 7.

Of the orchestral prospects generally, "Delta" writes as follows to the Tribune: "The programme of the first concert of the New York Philharmonic comprises Berlioz's 'King Lear' overture, Wagner's 'Ride of the Valkyries,' and 'Siegfried's Death,' the Fifth Symphony of Beethoven, and, with the aid of Mr. Franz Rummel, the Tchaikowsky Concerto. The programmes of the Brooklyn society will probably be similar to those in New York, and a larger orchestra than ever before will be employed. It was to the enterprise of the Brooklyn society that the public was indebted last winter for the opportunity of seeing Mr. Thomas as conductor of an orchestra in this vicinity, and it is by the courtesy of the same society, in changing the long-established evenings of its concerts, that Mr. Thomas is now able to appear in New York.

"Mr. Gotthold Carlberg's success with the course of symphony concerts, given at Chickering Hall last season, was so decided as to encourage the management to give another series of six rehearsals and six concerts, beginning in November. A number of orchestral novelties are promised, including Hugo Ulrich's 'Symphonie Triomphale,' Anton Dvorak's 'First Slavonic Rhapsody,' the entire music to the drama 'Struensee,' by Meyerbeer, and Tchaikowsky's latest symphonic work. Mr. Carlberg is an accomplished musician and an excellent conductor, his orchestra, forty-five in number, is a thoroughly competent one, and the concerts will doubtless prove to be, as they were last season, attractive and entertaining.

"Dr. Leopold Damrosch will, as usual, conduct the orchestra of the Symphony Society of New York during the coming season. Six rehearsals and six concerts will be given by the society at Steinway Hall, and it will have the assistance of the chorus of the Oratorio Society, and of the male chorus of the Arion Society, the best of our German musical organizations. The Ninth Symphony of Beethoven and Berlioz's 'Damnation of Faust' will be given during the week, and several new works of interest will also be brought out. The season is sure to be a prosperous one."

The Oratorio Society has already begun its rehearsals and under the charge of Dr. Damrosch, some excellent work may be expected from it at the concerts and public rehearsals to be given during the season. Elijah, the Messiah, and Bach's St. Matthew Passion music are among the works to be produced, and it is probable that for the solo parts the aid of Mme. Gerster and of Miss Thurbury will be secured. — Ibid.

Of pianists and their promises the name is legion, and the catalogue thereof must form a topic by itself another time.

The Salem Oratorio Society will give two concerts the coming season. At the first, Mendelssohn's Walpurgis Night will be rendered, and at the second, Haydn's Seasons.

FOREIGN.

DR. VON BULOW, like a giant refreshed, returned to his work as conductor of the Hanover Opera House last week. The Doctor resolved to give the Hanoverians a taste of his quality, so he offered them the "Jauchhäuser," "Don Giovanni," "Der Freischütz," and "Le Prophète" in one week. Furthermore, finding that "Carmen" had for some reason or other been neglected by many German opera houses, he has resolved to give it, it is stated, for the first time in Germany, with Frau Koch as the heroine. Berlioz' "Beatrice and Benedick" will also be given. In November the Doctor will give two recitals at Cologne, and will then have a short concert tour through Germany, afterwards coming to England. — Figaro, Sept. 13.

ON Monday Mr. Arthur Sullivan, having returned from his Swiss holiday, appeared at the Promenade Concerts and conducted the C minor symphony of Beethoven. On Thursday he was expected at Hereford to conduct "The Light of the World." Madame Essipoff is still the great attraction of Messrs. Gatti's concerts, where she will be succeeded tonight by Mr. Charles Hallé. The last English programme included a brilliantly written March from the pen of Mr. Duvivier, the prelude from a cantata, "Hagobert," by Mr. Burnett; and a symphony in G minor from the pen of Mr. Hamilton Clarke. The last-named work is a neatly written specimen on the old models, remarkable more for the excellence of the workmanship than for any particular display of individuality. Both Mr. Clarke and Mr. Duvivier conducted their own compositions. The programme on Tuesday included a gavotte in F by Mr. Hamilton Clarke, the "Slage of Rochelle" overture of Balfe, and the "Hebrides" overture of Mendelssohn. On Wednesday the classical programme included the "Jupiter" symphony of Mozart and Mendelssohn's concerto in G minor, played by Madame Essipoff. — Figaro, Sept. 13.

PARIS, Sept. 14. — Gustave Hippolyte Roger, the famous French tenor, is dead at the age of sixty-four.

He was born near Paris, August 27, 1815. He studied at the Conservatoire, and was engaged as a tenor at the Opera Comique from 1838 to 1846, after which he accompanied Jenny Lind to London. Subsequently he appeared in grand opera, but was not as successful in that line as on the comic stage. In Berlin he won favor in "Les Huguenots" and in "La Dame Blanche"; in Munich in "La Juive," and in Hamburg in "Le Prophète," when he sang in German. He was again at the Paris Grand Opera from 1853 to 1859. In the latter year he lost an arm while hunting, and although he subsequently appeared with an artificial arm he never acquired his former popularity. In 1868 he was appointed Professor of Singing at the Paris Conservatoire.

HERE WAGNER announces in the Bayreuther Blätter that the first representation of his new opera, "Parsifal," cannot take place in 1890, as he hoped, and that he is dependent on the state of the subscription list in progress before he can resume the "Bühnenfestspiele."

MAD. CLARA SCHUMANN celebrated her sixtieth birthday on the 13th September.

JOACHIM and Brahms have taken advantage of a holiday trip in Transylvania to give concerts together in the principal towns there.

BOSTON, OCTOBER 25, 1879.

Entered at the Post Office at Boston as second-class matter.

CONTENTS.

THE DEVELOPMENT OF PIANO-FORTE MUSIC, FROM BACH TO SCHUMANN. FROM THE GERMAN OF Carl Van Bruyck . . .	169
HOW ROSSINI WROTE "OTELLO" AS RELATED BY ALEXANDER DUMAS. M. W. F.	170
RICHARD WAGNER TO THE NEW WORLD. D. T.	171
MUSICAL MATTERS FROM FAR AND NEAR. Dr. Edward Hans- lück	171
MR. JOSEPH'S DEBUT IN NEW YORK	172
TALKS ON ART: SECOND SERIES. FROM INSTRUCTIONS OF MR. William M. Hunt to his Pupils. XV.	172
OUR PLANS	173
IS ROBERT FRANK A FAILURE? W. F. A.	173
A CALIFORNIA MUSICAL INVENTION. The Bow Piano and the Violin Flauto	174
MUSIC IN BOSTON	174
Concerts of Mme. Carlotta Patti, Sig. Campanari, and Redpath Lyceum.	175
MUSICAL INTELLIGENCE	175
GROSS RECEIPTS OF THE THEATRES AND OTHER PLACES OF AMUSEMENT IN PARIS	175

All the articles not credited to other publications were expressly written for this Journal.

Published fortnightly by HOUGHTON, OSGOOD AND COMPANY,
220 Devonshire Street, Boston. Price, 10 cents a number; $2.50
per year.

For sale in Boston by CARL PRUEPER, 30 West Street, A. WILL-IAMS & Co., 283 Washington Street, A. K. LORING, 369 Washington Street, and by the Publishers; in New York by A. BERN-YANO, Jr., 39 Union Square, and HOUGHTON, OSGOOD & Co.,
21 Astor Place; in Philadelphia by W. H. BAKER & Co., 1102
Chestnut Street; in Chicago by the CHICAGO MUSIC COMPANY, 512 State Street.

THE DEVELOPMENT OF PIANO-FORTE
MUSIC, FROM BACH TO SCHUMANN.

FROM THE GERMAN OF CARL VAN BRUYCK.

(Continued from page 162.)

AT about the end of the third decade of the present century, those two great geniuses, Beethoven and Schubert, had completed their artistic career. For a full century the musical movement which began with Haydn, from a new point of departure (the free unfolding of the melodic-harmonic style), had its field mostly in south Germany, especially in Austria, and still more especially within the city of Vienna. On the contrary, the two most prominent masters who continued the same movement, and, led by their own genius, strove to turn it into new paths, Felix Mendelssohn-Bartholdy and Robert Schumann, belong again to the north. They found the art, as generally practiced, shallow and degenerate. Beethoven and Schumann had already suffered under the influence, and Schumann for ten long years waged war against it even with the weapons of the word. The very ascendancy of piano-forte music on the one hand, and of Italian opera on the other, as well as the direction taken by the most respected representatives of piano music, with Hummel at their head, conduced to this degeneration. All art threatened to go under in a shallow, empty stringing out of phrases, in a merely sensuous jingle; and virtuosity began, particularly since the appearance of Liszt and Thalberg, to play the first part and to harvest the laurels (and not laurels merely!) which had been much more sparingly bestowed upon the great creative geniuses, to say nothing more.

With all the earnestness of a genuine artistic nature, Mendelssohn set himself against this running wild of art; and he it was, too, who did most to revive the half extinct interest in Sebastian Bach, in many respects the greatest musician of all times. He, as well as his genial and slightly younger contemporary, Schumann, introduced certain new elements into music, which (as Wagner justly maintains) had already completed its great orbit, for every art exhausts itself at last. In the domain of Piano music these new elements are even more decidedly prominent in the productions of Schumann, especially the smaller works, than in those of Mendelssohn.

But before passing to a summary consideration of what these two most prominent representatives of the newest phase of music (with whom in some respects Chopin also should be coupled) have done in art, I will first mention, for the sake of greater completeness, two artists, one of whom, both as composer, and as virtuoso and teacher, exercised through several decades an important influence, namely, Ignaz Moscheles; the other, Ludwig Berger, to be sure, became of no remarkable importance for the general development of art, yet, on the part of the piano-playing world at least, deserves more consideration than seems ever to have fallen to his lot.

Moscheles as a Piano composer, belongs on the whole to the direction in which Hummel led off, and his Concerto in G-minor may be called one of its noblest products. His clever, interesting Concert phantastique, on the contrary, breathes a warmer, more impassioned tone than we commonly find in Hummel's compositions, since even those of a pathetic subject seldom deny a certain academic character. The Etudes by Moscheles have become favorites on account of their technical utility, and because this book of Studies unites the utile cum dulci in a felicitous and tasteful manner; it may be counted among the most excellent and most commendable works of its kind,—a kind which unfortunately through several decades has been altogether too much exploited, and has produced many weeds, among them Czerny's Etudes, which, devoid of all musical charm and ideal contents, degrade the young player to a mere rude machine. In the third part of the Moscheles Etudes, we remark already that striving after characteristic expression, so-called, which has become so important for the newer and still more the newest phase of art, and which we are accustomed to call "programme music." But on the whole this third part is inferior to the first two, and runs very much into the turgid style.

Of Berger I must be content here with merely mentioning the name, with the fact that of him too we possess some (in part) exceedingly fine Sonatas, and above all an Etude work of real genius, which, while it is "very useful for practice," at the same time affords rare artistic enjoyment—musical champagne—such as we get still more sparkling to be sure in these later days.

Less so from Mendelssohn, whose works on the whole bear a far more staid, collected character, than those of Schumann, especially his youthful productions, or those of Chopin, the Pole who was ripened in the Champagne province, whose muse shows now a dreamy, melancholy, gloomily impassioned, now an excessively bold and even a coquettish countenance, and in sheer nervous irritability is prone to welter in the sensuous charms of sound.

Mendelssohn, like Moscheles, of Jewish origin, seems of less conspicuous, or "epoch-making" importance for a history of piano-forte music (although he has "made a school" decidedly), inasmuch as it can hardly be said that he has introduced an essentially new element on this field of art, although he did develop a certain individuality of style which found imitators on all sides. Moreover, Mendelssohn never concentrated his great artistic energies upon the piano-forte, as Chopin did, who spent nearly his whole force on that, or as Schumann did in his first period. One of his most brilliant firstlings was an orchestral work, the altogether charming, highly genial Overture to Shakespeare's Midsummer Night's Dream. In his admired and famous Songs without Words, for the piano-forte, he has indeed in a certain sense given a new form. Yet not unfitly may, for example, the Adagio in Beethoven's C-sharp minor ("Moonlight") Sonata, and Field's Nocturnes, be designated also as Songs without Words; in fact the predominance of Cantilena, and a more homophonous structure altogether, forms the distinctive characteristic of the more modern instrumental music. Under the influence of song writing, it has already become decidedly prominent in Schubert, just as in the works of Haydn, Mozart, and Beethoven, compared to those of Bach, the contrapuntal, polyphonous element recedes into the background before the melodic-harmonic, homophonous manner. Mendelssohn, although a very rich mind, yet much inferior in inventive faculty to Beethoven, the incomparable, had formed for himself a quite peculiar phraseology, which, although with ingenious variations, recurs continually in most of his instrumental, at any rate his piano-forte works, whereby they acquire a certain mannerism,—which, by the way, may also be remarked in Mozart (much more than in Haydn), and from which, among all the epochal composers and tone-poets of old or modern times, only Beethoven and Schubert seem to be wholly free.

